These principles were laid down in a book which was put into the hands of naval officers for their guidance. As a general principle it seemed to him that the right of seizing an enemy's goods wherever they might be found ought to be maintained. There was no doubt that unless our Navy had that power the enemy would obtain an advantage over us. A practical difficulty arose immediately after the rupture of 1803. French commerce was spreading all over the world, and a large number of French vessels were in the Black Sea. These vessels Nelson had made arrangements to seize and secure, because they were not only conveying the commerce of the enemy, but that which would have been contraband of war also, if they succeeded in escaping Nelson's vigilance. He stated in his despatch that he was thrown to great difficulty by reason of the facilities the enemy's ships had of changing their flags. It was stated in the Life of Nelson—

"Without entering into the merits of the case . . . there was great cause for suspicion that the vessels or cargoes, or both, were belonging to enemies, and were merely covered with neutral papers. My orders are positive for respect to the neutral flag. . . . I shall only truly observe that 170 French vessels were in the Black Sea at the commencement of hostilities, and that by a magic touch of merchants they came in a moment Russians, Imperials, Ionians, Ragusans, and not one French vessel remained."

Nelson had not had then the power which the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Man, the trade stored, the trade under the Declaration allowed them to. All experience show that this trade vessels are on board was resistance. In respect he thought we the Declaration however desirous of manning it had, as he thought, a sufficient number for the outbreak covering the commerce of hiring or commission and he contented to be bound by Treaty which the best course declare that by Declaration in our interest had great place Motion of his for the Isle of Man.

whole life was devoted to the study of what was best calculated to promote the freedom and the happiness of mankind; he was also for some years in Parliament, and sat on the side of the House on which I sit. The other is a renowned and experienced practical statesman, who was for a long time at the head of the Liberal Party in this country. All these eminent men have condemned the Declaration of Paris. Considering the circumstances under which it was signed, the country had a perfect right at the time, or within a reasonable time afterwards, to renounce it altogether, and to tell the Powers of Europe that the Parliament of Great Britain—that the English nation—would not consent to part with, or to jeopardize, one iota of its power as a great nation, or of its means of self defence in time of war. I say that Parliament should, at the time, or within a reasonable time after, have declared itself upon the matter, and have called upon the Government of the day to make known our refusal to sanction the course taken by our Plenipotentiary. But what was done? There were debates in both Houses; that was all; and although two or three times since the matter has been discussed in one House or the other, for 19 years we have slept upon our rights, and not only have we taken no active measures to intimate our dissent, but we have induced other nations to accept the Declaration. How then can we now, with any regard to consistency or honour, call upon the Government to “withdraw” from the Declaration? This is the position in which we are placed. We cannot “withdraw;” we cannot repudiate; and yet a time will come, as I firmly believe, when our safety, as well as our honour, will require us to take decisive action in this matter, and when, perhaps, war alone will relieve us from this fatal engagement. The hon. Member who moved the Previous Question (Mr. Cartwright) has referred to Treaties which have been entered into between ourselves and other countries, in order to show that we had given up before what was given up by the Declaration of Paris, and that, therefore, we had not parted with any very important advantage when we gave up the right of seizing enemy’s goods in neutral vessels. In fact, as I understood the hon. Gentleman, or as I have heard others arrage was allowed there either unfair or a law? This was the public law of Europe and of Paris. Two of which I am mentioning the Consolato as containing some of the Maritime Law, Molloy, Lamakerahöek, our own and the same. In well, and Wheaton, three great American and confirm the others. These men the highest order of logic to different it may be supposed respects different upon many questionable policy; and yet asserting and confirming the Consolato as a

It was never disavowed of Frederick the English claims after 1763, and then, for the first time, was made to put in principle that "free ships, free goods;" but we resisted the claims were paid. The Arbitration Commission, an Arbitration Commission, was to alter the old maritime law to establish a set of rules to protect Prussian interests. These were issued by the British and answered by the British of Newcastle, and which Lord Mansfield, General, assisted in the case. We heard nothing of the Armed Neutrality until the Armed Neutrality when the Empress Catherine decided to give effect to the new rule of maritime law. The Armed Neutrality of 1780. It was levelled at England, but 15 years after that had joined against England, one it was found that it had shed its interests, and itself being the cause. It is curious, if the British, to refer to some of these nations when they were brought into agreement into which France was the first to throw over the new rule. By the decree of the National Convention on the 9th May, 1793—"enemy's goods on board neutral vessels" were declared "good prize, the neutral ships being released and freight paid by the captors. Here is the old rule of the Consolato revived. This decree was enforced by the decree of the Executive Directory of the 2nd March, 1797. On the 8th February, 1793, Russia renounced her Treaty of 1786 with France, declaring that the principle "free ships free goods" should be "no longer obligatory until the restoration of order in France," that is, until the French nation should acknowledge the "right divine of kings to govern wrong." In the same year Russia renewed with England her Treaty of 1763 stipulating that neutral commerce should be carried on "according to the principles and rules of the Law of Nations generally recognized"—that is, according to the old established rule of the sea. On the same day she made another Treaty with us engaging that the contracting powers should unite all the efforts—to do, what does the House think?—

"To prevent neutrals from giving on the occasion of common concern to every civilized State, any protection whatever, directly or indirectly, in consequence of their neutrality, to the commerce or property of the French on the sea or in the ports of France."

A similar article was inserted in the Treaty of the same year between Great Britain and Spain, between Great Britain and Prussia, and between Great Britain and the Emperor. Thus, as these Powers had combined against us to establish a new rule, the moment they found themselves affected by it, they combined again to abandon the principles of the Armed Neutrality and to reaffirm the old rule. The new rules were abandoned by Sweden in the year 1786 and by Russia, France, Spain, Prussia and by the Emperor. In 1809, Russia herself issued a ukase declaring that—

"Ships laden in part with goods of the manufacture or produce of hostile countries shall be stopped, and such merchandize confiscated as sold by auction for the profit of the Crown and," the article continues, "if the merchandize aforesaid compose more than half the cargo, not only the cargo, but also the ship shall be confiscated."

After these specimens of Treaties, which of these nations has a right to set up

a claimant for enlarged privileges of neutrality? But the great grievance, or at least the danger arising from the right of seizing enemy's goods, as I have always understood it, was not so much the seizure itself, as the right of search which it involved. This was the chief cause of our differences with the United States of America in 1812. But has the Declaration of Paris removed this grievance, or this danger? It has expressly excepted contraband of war. But how are you to ascertain whether a vessel is carrying contraband of war, unless you go on board and search her? There is no stipulation that the production of the ship's papers shall be sufficient; so that, according to the terms of the "Declaration," if we were at war, we should have still the right to go on board a neutral ship, in order to satisfy ourselves as to whether she was carrying contraband or not. But it has been said the right of seizure is an interference with trade, and that it is demoralizing to allow our maritime population to be rovers on the seas, seizing and carrying away, as spoils of war, the property of innocent people. But I would ask, is it not more demoralizing to feed a war for the sake of gain, to assist an enemy's resources, and enable it to prolong the miseries which war entails? Is it conducive to public morality that one part of a nation shall be at peace while the other is at war? That your merchants and traders shall be carrying on a roaring trade with the enemy, increasing and strengthening its means of aggression or resistance, while we are sending the bravest, the very flower, of our youth to bleed and to die on the battle-field? To my mind, there is a heartless selfishness involved in such a condition of things that is repugnant to every manly sentiment. This is not the way to foster or promote public spirit, or great national virtues in a people—to employ the terse eloquence of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli),—"You might produce rich communities, but you will create weak States." This modern notion of humanizing war, as it is termed, may be well expressed in the phrase, "Slay your enemy, but spare his property"—yes; "Blow him to atoms at the cannon's mouth, but do not touch his goods." How are we, a maritime nation, to defend ourselves against a formidable military power upon such a pretext to cross our military force? could we oppose her trade and army? If a war were to be such a thing to ourselves and our army were maintained, resistance could be upon the ocean—consider the character that to the mistaken, but the nations of those who as they think, but trade of belligerents into a sort of conditions. Sir, that ity, or of a sound policy. Every itself. It owes for to each one. As Rome taught and the sciences to spread to show how free social order, is free will becomes most civilizing—one, so to agents—let us position among tions, and so good.

the reason they thought themselves bound to abandon. Therefore, he said the course taken by the Government to limit as much as possible the scope to be considered by the Conference at Brussels. That course was decided. It was laid down in papers before the House. They perfectly determined not to enter any discussion of the rules of International Law by which the relations of Governments were guided, or undertake new obligations or engagements of any kind in regard to general principles and they required, before sending a delegate to the Conference, the most explicit and distinct assurances from the Government taking part in the Congress they agreed to the course proposed by the Government, and would not enter in any shape, directly or indirectly anything relating to maritime law, or naval warfare. Such were the instructions given to General Lord, and that officer had carried out the instructions to the entire satisfaction of the Government. Having laid down as the rule of their conduct the Government would have been very to blame if they had departed from it, and they should have been aware of the grossest inconsistency if they had brought forward any subjects not suggested by the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight. He need not go to the reasons for not going further. It had been asserted that the Government of St. Petersburg had some reason for inviting us to join the Conference in that City. He was not sure what that secret reason could be; there was a secret reason, it was more necessary for the Government to take the course they did on that point—not to allow any discussion of questions of International Law, nor to follow the suggestion of the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight. In the course which they had taken, the Government had received the unanimous support of the Press throughout the country, and they had also received the support of the country for having adhered to that course. The Declaration of Paris contained four points, but after all, it was only one to which very little objection had been taken, and that was the Article with regard to the capture of ships. Well, in conceding the principle of taking enemy's goods out of principle that "free ships made free goods," there could be no doubt that this country gave up a belligerent right which it had exercised from very ancient times and which she considered a powerful arm of maritime warfare. There was no doubt that that right had been incorporated from time immemorial in the code of our maritime laws, and this country on two memorable occasions showed that it was prepared to brave nearly the whole world for the purpose of sustaining those ancient maritime rights. That right had been sanctioned by the highest authorities ancient and modern—by Grotius, Vattel, Hubner, Chief Justice Marshall, Kent, Story, and Wheaton. Under these circumstances, we could not be surprised that there were living statesmen among us who had the greatest possible doubts as to the wisdom of the course taken in 1856, and that we ought to leave ourselves to act, as in 1854, not binding ourselves by any new Declaration, but acting on the principle of what was most expedient for us to adopt. But that was not the question of the present day. The question now was, having now this Declaration as part and parcel of International agreements—was it our duty to denounce that Declaration because at the time when we entered into it there were some persons in this country who thought we had taken a false step? These persons seemed to forget that if such a course we were met face to face by another Declaration—the Declaration that was made, on the meeting of the Black Sea Conference in London in 1871, which was to this effect—

"That it is an essential principle of the Law of Nations that no Power can liberate itself from the engagements of a Treaty, nor modify the stipulations thereof, unless with the consent of the contracting Powers by means of an amicable arrangement."

Both Houses of Parliament had refused to denounce the Declaration of Paris when the subject had been brought before them. They had refused to alter the terms of the Declaration of Paris and he was a little surprised to hear some hon. Gentlemen say that because that instrument was not ratified we were not bound by it. All he could say with respect to that was, that he hoped he should never see the day when a Minister of the Crown or one of its Law Officers would repudiate an engagement sible for the foreign policy of this country; but he should like to lay before the House the opinion of Earl Russell concerning it. In 1857 the noble Earl said—

"The rules—'Free bottoms make free goods,' and 'The goods of a belligerent are safe in neutral vessels, and the goods of a neutral safe in belligerent vessels,' have always been regarded as injurious to the interests of maritime countries, and especially to the maritime power of England. . . . I hope no Minister of Great Britain will set his seal to a treaty containing any stipulations of this kind without the most cautious deliberation."—[3 Hansard, cxliv. 2084-6.]

The late Earl of Derby said, in 1856, that—

"Whatever losses Russia may have suffered by this war, whatever embarrassments she may have experienced, I hesitate not to say that they are more than compensated by the adoption of that one Article."—[3 Hansard, cxlii. 537.]

What said Mr. Stuart Mill?—

"Sir, I venture to call the renunciation of the right of seizing enemy's property at sea a national blunder. . . . Unless by resuming our natural and indispensable weapon we place ourselves again on an equality with our possible enemies, we shall be burthened with these enormous establishments and these onerous budgets for a permanency, and, in spite of it all, we shall be for ever in danger, for ever in alarm, cowed before any Power or combination of Powers capable of invading any part of our widely-spread possessions. . . . Happily, the blunder is not an irretrievable one. The Declaration of 1856 is not a Treaty. It has never been ratified. The authority on which it was entered was but the private letter of a minister. . . . How war is to be humanized by shooting at men's bodies instead of taking their property, I confess surprises me."—[3 Hansard, clxxxix. 878-882.]

Mr. Cobden said—

"The Congress declared that the neutral flag covered enemy's goods. This resolution reverses the most venerated judgments of our Admiralty Courts, and for the first time imparts the force of maritime law to principles which were resisted by England against the world in arms until the close of 1815. The practical effect would be in case of war with a naval Power to transfer the trade of even our own ports to the neutral Powers."

There was only one other authority he should like to quote, and it was that of Mr. Mitchell, his former Colleague, who said—

"I believe there is no man acquainted with Russia, who would not be of opinion that the greatest means of coercion that could be used against Russia would be the closing of her ports and the stopping of her export trade; and that the best means of hostility against Russia at the beginning of the war would have been to take steps to stop the whole of the export trade of that country."

Mr. Basilie Cochrane

The authorities he had quoted were most eminent men on both sides of the House. He could refer to several other men in support of his view, but to none more important than these. This was not a Party question. It was a question concerning the interests and the maritime greatness of this country. If we accepted the principle that a neutral flag covered enemy's property all the neutral countries would take possession of our place, and the name that Napoleon gave to our Volunteers of the sea in time of war—namely, les loups de mer—would be swept away. If we were to have Volunteers for the defence of our shores, we were equally justified in making use of our great commercial marine in case of war to defend this country. There were various points of view from which the question might be argued. There was the point of view—free ships; then there was another point—that the sea was the highway of all countries, and that in the case even of a ship carrying contraband of war she should not be searched, but he could not conceive anything more fatal—he might almost say, more ridiculous—than such an idea as that. There were thousands of persons who adopted the principle of Silent leges inter arma, and who thought that the Declaration of Peace was nothing—was not, in fact, to be taken into consideration in time of war. That, however, was not an honourable way of looking at the question. Do not let us follow the bad example of 1870 in this matter, when a Treaty was torn up and declared to be so much waste paper. There were those also who said that as we did not intend to interfere with foreign politics, free ships in time of war would be of the greatest possible advantage to us; but then it would be necessary that we should carry out a selfish isolated policy, and we might as well have no Army and no Navy at all. It had been well said that England did not so much support the right of search as the right of search supported England. The extent and variety of our commerce were so great that we, more than any other nation, were bound over to keep the peace of Europe, but for that very reason we ought to have at our command every means of hostility in case we were dragged into war. No fortifications, no torpedoed, no ironclads, no increase of our Army or Navy, could give us the power that we should derive from the right of seizing enemy's goods at sea in time of war. He denied that we might be called upon by military Powers to discuss that right. We were a great maritime Power. Of all the commercial Navies of the world put together, what was the proportion of ships which belonged to England? 37 per cent. And of the steam navies of the world 58 per cent of the steamers belonged to England. Surely that placed us in an exceptional position. If we armed those great ocean steamers in case of war, and allowed them to defend themselves, what a force we should have. He knew that Lord Clarendon said he was going to inaugurate an era of peace. That prophesy was not fulfilled at all. He (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) was not there to prophesy disaster, but he could not be blind to facts. Twenty years ago the Russian frontier was 1,000 miles from our Indian possessions; now it was not much more than 80; and that was owing to the apathy with which we had viewed these matters. He contended that unless we were to adopt for ever a principle of selfish isolation, we should do everything to maintain the maritime greatness of this country. We had heard a great deal—and he thought we had heard too much—about the "silver streak" that protected us. As long as we insisted on having our maritime rights we should have command of the seas of the world. As Lord Nelson said—

"We should lose our last shilling and the last drop of blood of our last man sooner than give up those maritime rights."

In 1870 Prince Gortchakoff wrote to Count Brunow—

"The Emperor commands you to declare that His Imperial Majesty cannot any longer be bound by the stipulations of the Treaty of Paris, as they restrict His Majesty's rights in the Black Sea."

If, then, he (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) should be told that he was doing wrong in proposing that this country should withdraw from the Declaration of Paris, his reply would be that the Treaty of Paris was at an end when the Emperor of Russia disregarded the greatest stipulation in it, and for the insertion of which stipulation we had expended a great deal of money and blood. He would urge upon the House, by their vote that evening, to let foreign Governments know that we were determined to go back to the England of long ago; and by exercising to the fullest extent when occasion should require their maritime rights to do everything in their power to maintain the dignity and independence of the Empire. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

Mr. HERMON, in seconding the Motion, thanked his hon. Friend, to whom he thought the House and the country were indebted for having brought forward this important question at such a favourable opportunity. There was at present peace upon the Continent, and we could therefore withdraw with honour from engagements which had never been ratified by the Queen, sanctioned by Parliament, or approved of by the people. His hon. Friend had so eloquently explained that portion of the subject, and had given so many quotations from the speeches of eminent men and high authorities, that he would not weary the House by going over the same ground. It had been said that in case of war this was a Declaration which would be at once rescinded; and, therefore, its continuance placed England in a position which she ought not to occupy. For his part, he hated and detested war, and he might be asked why then did he support the Motion? His object in doing so was that war might be made as disagreeable as possible, so that it might become hateful in the eyes of all civilized nations, who would thus be induced to recoil from it. He was aware that the proposition before the House would not be pleasant to the Representatives of those nations who took part in the Declaration agreed to at Paris; but they were not there to make things pleasant, but rather to make war odious. It ought to be thoroughly understood by other nations that England was prepared to exercise in time of war her great maritime power in her own defence, and that, he thought, was one of the things which would prevent us drifting into war. He could not but remember the great amount of sympathy which had been exhibited in this country for the sick and wounded during the Franco-German War, and the large fund which had been raised for their relief. He must say he regretted that he had contributed to that fund, for he now believed that it was false philanthropy to do so. The horrors war entailed ought to be forced upon the attention of the nations that went to war, and it ought to be shown them that it was as much their duty to provide food and medicine for their soldiers, as it was to provide powder and shot for them to fight with. With respect to the question of the neutral flag, Mr. Pitt said in that House, in the face of a powerful Opposition—

"That although he was anxious for peace, yet upon the question of the neutral flag covering the cargo of the enemy, sooner than give it up he would wind it round him and find his glory in his grave."

On the 22nd of May, 1856, Lord Colchester brought forward a Motion in the House of Lords to the effect that the right to capture an enemy's goods on board a neutral vessel was an inherent right, the abandonment of which was a serious injury to our naval power; and the late Lord Derby declared that "in signing that Declaration"—that of Paris—"you have sacrificed the maritime greatness of England on the shrine of Russia"—[3 Hansard, cxlii. 537]—while Lord Hardwicke said that "It had struck down the maritime power of England."—[Ibid. 508.] And what said Lord Clarendon himself on that occasion? He intimated that he had not acted within the strict limits of his attributions, by which he supposed the noble Earl meant his instructions. He would remind the House that the United States had declared that in the event of war they would not renounce the use of their Mercantile Marine. Under such circumstances, what position would we be in if we were at war with the United States or with any country of which the United States was an ally? Surely England would not allow herself to be placed at so great and serious a disadvantage? On such a subject the House ought to take a decided view, and express themselves as those who had gone before them had done—in a manner that could not be mistaken. The opinion expressed by Mr. John Stuart Mill on this question had been already quoted by his hon. Friend, and in that patriotic opinion he fully concurred. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had expressed himself strongly on this subject. He said—

"I believe it (the Declaration of Paris) to have been a most impolitic step, calculated to cripple the Powers of this country . . . we must emancipate ourselves from its fatal trammels in a regular manner."—[3 Hansard, ccv. 1497-8.]

There could not, then, be a more regular or constitutional manner of doing so than by means of the action of Parliament. It having been declared that by the declaration in the Treaty of Paris we had given up the cardinal principle of our maritime power, and that in consequence of that Treaty never having been ratified by Parliament or by the Queen it was not binding upon us, he thought the present moment, when peace was universal, was the best that could be selected for repudiating our obligations under it. He would further suggest that Her Majesty's Government should take this opportunity of sweeping away many other obsolete Treaties which trammelled us, and which at some future date might be productive of inconvenience if not of danger to this country.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in consequence of a Conference having been held at Brussels in 1874 on International Law, and the proposed renewal of the Conference at St. Petersburg this year, a favourable opportunity is afforded to the Country of withdrawing from the Declaration of Paris of 1856, and thus maintaining our maritime rights, so essential to the power, prosperity, and independence of the Empire."—(Mr. Baillie Cochrane.)

MR. CARTWRIGHT assured the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. B. Cochrane) that it was not from any underrating of the importance of the subject, or from any desire to restrict the maritime force which this country could command in time of war, that he rose to move the Previous Question. It had seemed to him from the first that the Resolution which had just been submitted was extremely inopportune—that there was no practical reason for bringing it forward, and this impression had been fully confirmed by the speech of the hon. Member. The substance of the charge brought against the Declaration of Paris appeared to be that it involved an apostasy from principles which had hitherto governed the policy of this country. He believed it could be shown conclusively by a reference to the acts of English statesmen of undoubted patriotism that that argument was not founded in fact. The Lord Protector Cromwell, who in a peculiar degree sought to establish British ascendancy at sea, put his hand to a Treaty by which the principle of a neutral flag covering an enemy's goods was recognized. Sir William Temple, no mean exponent of British feeling, took part in carrying out a similar policy. The principle was acknowledged in the Treaty of Utrecht, and in 1786 it was embodied by Mr. Pitt in a celebrated Treaty of Commerce. In one respect the Declaration of Paris was an improvement on preceding instruments, for it did not renew a preferential bonus in favour of French shipping which had previously been allowed. On no occasion, he would observe, was the Declaration of Paris condemned, although it had been reviewed and discussed in that House, not only in heat and passion, but also at subsequent periods. In the year 1860 the matter was considered by a Select Committee of the House of Commons on the Merchant Shipping question—a Committee remarkable for having among its Members such men as Mr. Lindsay, Mr. Milner Gibson, Mr. Baring, Mr. Cardwell, and the Representative of West Norfolk. By that Committee the question of belligerent rights was discussed, and they stated in their Report that, while aware that grave objections had been urged by high authorities against the Declaration of Paris, they could not refrain from expressing the hope that in the interests of humanity and civilization all private property not being contraband of war should be exempt from seizure. The Committee went on to say that Great Britain was deeply interested in the adoption of such a course, inasmuch as she had at all times a greater amount of property afloat than any other nation. On that recommendation he would not venture to pronounce any opinion, beyond remarking that it showed the Declaration of Paris had not been subjected to all the censure which some supposed. But it was contended that the Declaration might be acted upon unjustly. In contradiction, however, to that, he would point out that when hostilities had occurred between the Republic of Chili—which was a party to the Declaration—and Spain—which was not a party to it—all the facilities and advantages for war the loss of which was deplored by those who were opposed to the Declaration were brought into requisition with the assent of all by the Republic of Chili. No argument had, therefore, he maintained, been adduced by the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight to justify the course which he asked the House to adopt; and he would appeal to hon. Members not by a chance vote to reverse that which was a very solemn agreement, made after mature consideration, and the spirit and substance of which had been ratified by public opinion, as expressed by those who represented it in Parliament. He begged to conclude by moving the Previous Question.

SIR JOHN HAY said, the subject now under consideration was one on which he should not have ventured to intrude his opinions were it not that the defences of the country and its maritime supremacy were principally delegated in time of war on the Navy. The argument of the hon. Member who had just sat down was rather in support of maintaining the principles of the Declaration of Paris untouched than the postponement of its consideration to some more convenient time. He would, therefore, endeavour to show that it was an entire mistake and would go far to sap the naval power of this country, in the event of our being engaged in war. By the 11th Article the neutralization of the Black Sea had been effected, and the result had been the Convention between Russia and Turkey, closing the Dardanelles to ships of war, and limiting the naval forces in the Black Sea. It was a Treaty binding and ratified by the contending parties. The Treaty of Paris, so called, was not a Treaty in any sense of the word, and was negotiated by Ambassadors that were not accredited for that particular purpose. In his opinion, the first two Articles of that Treaty were calculated to impair the naval supremacy of England. They contained this declaration of maritime law:—1. Privateering is and remains abolished. 2. The neutral flag covers enemy's goods, with the exception of contraband of war. 3. Neutral goods, with the exception of contraband of war, are not liable to capture under enemy's flag. 4. Blockades, in order to be binding, must be effective—that is to say, maintained by a force sufficient really to prevent access to the coast of the enemy. It was laid down by a high authority that—of all merchant ships, wherefore resistance to such search amounts to a forfeiture of neutrality. Particular States have relaxed the rigour of this rule, and by express Treaty granted immunity by establishing a maxim—free ships, free goods. A neutral ship refusing to be searched would from that proceeding alone be condemned as a lawful prize. If we find an enemy's effects on board a neutral ship we seize them by the rights of war; but we are bound to pay the freight to the master of the neutral ship, who is not to suffer by such seizure. The effects of neutrals found in an enemy's ship are to be restored to the owners, against whom there is no right of confiscation, but without any allowance for detainer, decay, &c."

And with regard to neutral things found with an enemy—

"Since it is not the place where a thing is, which determines the nature of that thing, but the character of the person to whom it belongs, things belonging to neutral persons which happen to be in an enemy's country, or on board an enemy's ship, are to be distinguished from those which belong to the enemy."

These principles were laid down in a book which was put into the hands of naval officers for their guidance. As a general principle it seemed to him that this right of seizing an enemy's goods wherever they might be found ought to be maintained. There was no doubt that unless our Navy had that power the enemy would obtain an advantage over us. A practical difficulty arose immediately after the rupture of 1803. French commerce was spreading all over the world, and a large number of French vessels were in the Black Sea. These vessels Nelson had made arrangements to seize and secure, because they were not only conveying the commerce of the enemy, but that which would have been contraband of war also, if they succeeded in escaping Nelson's vigilance. He stated in his despatch that he was thrown into great difficulty by reason of the facilities the enemy's ships had of changing their flags. It was stated in the Life of Nelson—

"Without entering into the merits of the case there was great cause for suspicion that the vessels or cargoes, or both, were belonging to enemies, and were merely covered with neutral papers. My orders are positive for respect to the neutral flag. . . . I shall only lastly observe that 170 French vessels were in the Black Sea at the commencement of hostilities, and that by a magic touch of merchants they became in a moment Russians, Imperials, Ionians, Ragusans, and not one French vessel remained."

If Nelson had not had then the power which the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Wight asked to have restored, the transfer of the flag would, under the Declaration of Paris, have allowed them to have eluded his vigilance. All experience, he maintained, went to show that this power of searching neutral vessels and seizing an enemy's goods on board was one of the highest importance. In respect to privateering, also, he thought we should do well to denounce the Declaration of Paris. No doubt, however desirous this country might be of manning a large naval force, and we had, as he thought we had not, a sufficient number of ironclads for defence on the outbreak of war, the only way of covering the seas and of destroying the commerce of our enemy would be by hiring or commissioning merchant ships; and he contended that since Russia declined to be bound by the portion of the Treaty which related to the Black Sea, the best course for us to pursue was to declare that we would no longer abide by Declarations which were framed, not in our interest but in that of others. He had great pleasure in supporting the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for the Isle of Wight.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON: Sir, as the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hermon), as well as the hon. and gallant Gentleman who has just sat down (Sir John Hay), has appealed to me, and referred to the views which I expressed on a former occasion when this question was before the House, I trust that the House will give me its attention for a short time. In answer to the hon. Gentleman's appeal, I beg to say that my opinions have not changed. I have always thought, and I still think, that the so-called Declaration of Paris was a serious mistake, and that when our Plenipotentiary put his hand to that document he did an act which, in my judgment, will materially affect the interests, and, I will add, the safety of this country in time of war. Holding this opinion, I nevertheless feel myself in great difficulty when called upon to support the Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane). According to the terms of the Motion, the assertion of our maritime rights in time of war is made to depend, in a manner, upon "the opportunity arising out of the Conference at Brussels." I do not see the connection. If there is any one act of Her Majesty's Government which commands, and, I believe, has received, the universal approbation and thanks of the country, it is the course they have taken with respect to the Conference of Brussels. When they consented to send a representative to Brussels, they did so under reservations and restrictions having relation to this very matter of our maritime rights, and they have since refused altogether to take part in the adjourned Conference. What opportunity, then, does the Conference offer? Does the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) mean that Her Majesty's Government should reverse their policy and send a Representative to St. Petersburg? The objects of that Conference have been disclosed. We now know that the regulation of military operations on land is not the sole purpose for which the Powers have been invited to meet, and Her Majesty's Government when they found this, did wisely, I think, in declining to take any further part in their proceedings. Again, with regard to our "withdrawing," as the Motion expresses it, from the Declaration of Paris, I would ask the hon. Member (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) to consider whether the Declaration is or is not an engagement. If it is an engagement, then we cannot withdraw from it without the consent of the other parties. To do so would be a breach of honour and good faith. If it is not an engagement, then there is nothing to withdraw from. Now, there is a great deal of misapprehension on this point. There is a notion in some quarters that because the Declaration is not a Treaty properly so-called, we are not bound by it; but just as a man in private life might be bound by his pledged word,—by a parole undertaking, so may a nation be bound—bound in honour and good faith—by a document not bearing the more formal attributes of a Treaty. I have always regretted and condemned what was done at the Congress of Paris, believing it to be fraught with evil, and probable disaster for us hereafter. I may be wrong in this opinion. If I am, I but share the error of many of our most eminent statesmen and public men. The same opinion has been expressed not only by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, the present Prime Minister, and many of his Colleagues, but by the late Mr. John Stuart Mill and Earl Russell. The one was a great philosopher, whose whole life was devoted to the study of what was best calculated to promote the freedom and the happiness of mankind; he was also for some years in Parliament, and sat on the side of the House on which I sit. The other is a renowned and experienced practical statesman, who was for a long time at the head of the Liberal Party in this country. All these eminent men have condemned the Declaration of Paris. Considering the circumstances under which it was signed, the country had a perfect right at the time, or within a reasonable time afterwards, to renounce it altogether, and to tell the Powers of Europe that the Parliament of Great Britain—that the English nation—would not consent to part with, or to jeopardize, one iota of its power as a great nation, or of its means of self defence in time of war. I say that Parliament should, at the time, or within a reasonable time after, have declared itself upon the matter, and have called upon the Government of the day to make known our refusal to sanction the course taken by our Plenipotentiary. But what was done? There were debates in both Houses; that was all; and although two or three times since the matter has been discussed in one House or the other, for 19 years we have slept upon our rights, and not only have we taken no active measures to intimate our dissent, but we have induced other nations to accept the Declaration. How then can we now, with any regard to consistency or honour, call upon the Government to "withdraw" from the Declaration? This is the position in which we are placed. We cannot "withdraw;" we cannot repudiate; and yet a time will come, as I firmly believe, when our safety, as well as our honour, will require us to take decisive action in this matter, and when, perhaps, war alone will relieve us from this fatal engagement. The hon. Member who moved the Previous Question (Mr. Cartwright) has referred to Treaties which have been entered into between ourselves and other countries, in order to show that we had given up before what was given up by the Declaration of Paris, and that, therefore, we had not parted with any very important advantage when we gave up the right of seizing enemy's goods in neutral vessels. In fact, as I understood the hon. Gentleman, or as I have heard others argue, these Treaties go to show that this power of seizure was always opposed to the general feeling of Europe, and that, therefore, we had been obliged from time to time to yield it up. Nothing can be more fallacious. There is the widest possible distinction between waiving a right on a particular occasion, or in a particular case, and giving it up altogether. This is what was done at the commencement of the last war with Russia, when we waived our right of seizure, and this is what was done by the Treaties referred to by the hon. Gentleman. Each of those Treaties was between this country and some particular nation, and was entered into to serve a specific object. They contained stipulations for certain reciprocal advantages, and in time of war between ourselves and any one of those nations a Treaty so made was to be, and was, of no effect. Nay, so far from these Treaties affording proof that the Law of Nations, or the general opinion of nations, was opposed to the right of seizure in time of war, they show the very contrary. The very fact of entering into Treaties or inserting stipulations on the subject was an admission of the right as a well-known, acknowledged, universal maritime rule. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cartwright) said that hon. Members should study History and Treaties more minutely before citing them, and he then referred to two or three in particular, and called special attention to the Treaty with Holland, which was negotiated by Sir William Temple. He could not have cited a more unfortunate instance. What was the history of that Treaty? After it had been in existence some 90 years we went to war with France, and finding that the Dutch were rendering material assistance to the French, especially in their trade with their Colonies, we issued an order to our cruisers to seize all enemy's goods in Neutral vessels. The Dutch remonstrated, but we persisted, and we put a stop to the French Colonial trade. Here was an example of what the necessities of a war entailed upon us as a maritime nation, and of the impossibility of giving up under all circumstances a right, or a usage, which we had always exercised, and which was necessary to our strength in time of war. I repeat, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cartwright) could not have cited a more unfortunate instance for his argument, nor could he have practised himself the precept respecting the study of History and Treaties which he enjoined upon others. But it is said that this practice of seizing enemy's goods in time of war is a barbarous practice, and owes its origin to barbarous times. What are the facts, and what is the Law of Nations on the subject? I will not go so far back as the Roman Empire; I will content myself with the period when the Maritime Code known as the Consolato del Mare became the acknowledged Law of Europe. This period has been variously fixed, but general opinion assigns it to the 13th century. What was the condition of Europe then? There was the Greek Emperor on the throne at Constantinople. Syria, Cyprus, and the Balearic Isles were actively engaged in commerce. You had the Republics of Venice and Genoa, and France and Spain alike, engaged in trade. In the West, the German Emperor was on the throne, and his influence extended to the Netherlands, and as far as the Southern shores of the Baltic. All civilized Europe, in fact, from the East to the West, and throughout the Adriatic and the Mediterranean, and up to the North, as far as the Baltic, was engaged in commerce. It was at that time, and under these conditions, and it was by these maritime communities, that this code of laws was accepted as the rules that were to regulate their intercourse, and their relations in time of war. And what was the particular rule of which we are speaking—I mean with reference to the right of seizing enemy's goods in neutral vessels? Why, it was simply this—it may be summed up in a few words—namely, that a neutral should not be allowed to feed the resources of one belligerent as against another, but that in order to prevent this, besides contraband of war, an enemy's goods should be seized whenever found on board a neutral vessel. And how was this done? Not to the injury of the neutral, but of the belligerent only. The goods of the enemy were seized, but not the vessel. The vessel after adjudication in a Court of Maritime Law, was not only released, but the owners were to be paid, and were paid, the freight to which they would have been entitled had they taken the goods to their destination, and in some instances demurrage was allowed as well. What was there either unfair or barbarous in such a law? This was the acknowledged public law of Europe down to the Declaration of Paris. Two centuries after the time of which I am speaking, Grotius mentions the provisions of the Consolato as containing the constitutions of the Maritime States. Albericus Gentilis, Molloy, Lampredi, Heineccius, Bynkershœk, our own Zouch and Vattel do the same. In later times Lord Stowell, and Wheaton, Story, and Kent—three great American jurists—repeat and confirm the authority of these writers. These men were all jurists, of the highest order and authority, belonging to different countries—countries, it may be supposed, having in some respects different views and interests upon many questions of national, or public policy; and yet they all agree in asserting and confirming the provisions of the Consolato as a code of public law. It was never disputed until the refusal of Frederick the Great to satisfy the English claims after the cession of Silesia, and then, for the first time, the attempt was made to put forward the new principle that “free ships make free goods;” but we resisted it, and the English claims were paid. Afterwards the celebrated Commission, known as the Prussian Commission, was appointed in order to alter the old maritime code, and establish a set of rules more favourable to Prussian interests. The memorials which were issued by this Commission were answered by the able letter of the Duke of Newcastle, and the masterly report which Lord Mansfield, then Solicitor General, assisted in drawing up, and we heard nothing more of the new doctrine until the Armed Neutrality of 1780 when the Empress Catherine determined to give effect to the new principles of maritime law. But what became of the Armed Neutrality we all know. It was levelled directly against us; but 15 years afterwards, every nation that had joined this combination against England, one by one, as soon as it was found that the new rule touched its interests, abandoned it, Russia itself being the chief instigator. It is curious, if the House will allow me, to refer to some of the Treaties made by these nations when repudiating the engagement into which they had entered. France was the first to throw over the new rule. By a decree of the National Convention of the 9th May, 1793—“enemy’s goods on board neutral vessels” were declared “good prize, the neutral ships being released and freight paid by the captors.” Here is the old rule of the Consolato revived. This decree was enforced by a decree of the Executive Directory of the 2nd March, 1797. On the 8th February, 1793, Russia renounced her Treaty of 1786 with France, declaring that the principle “free ships free goods” should be “no longer obligatory until the restoration of order in France,” that is, until the French nation should acknowledge the “right divine of kings to govern wrong.” In the same year Russia renewed with England her Treaty of 1766, stipulating that neutral commerce should be carried on “according to the principles and rules of the Law of Nations generally recognized”—that is, according to the old established rule of the sea. On the same day she made another Treaty with us engaging that the contracting powers should unite all their efforts—to do, what does the House think?—

“To prevent neutrals from giving on this occasion of common concern to every civilized State, any protection whatever, directly or indirectly, in consequence of their neutrality, to the commerce or property of the French on the sea, or in the ports of France.”

A similar article was inserted in the Treaty of the same year between Great Britain and Spain, between Great Britain and Prussia, and between Great Britain and the Emperor. Thus, as all these Powers had combined against us to establish a new rule, the moment they found themselves affected by it, they combined again to abandon the principles of the Armed Neutrality and to reaffirm the old rule. The new rules were abandoned by Sweden in the year 1788, and by Russia, France, Spain, Prussia, and by the Emperor. In 1809, Russia herself issued a ukase declaring that—

After these specimens of Treaties, which of these nations has a right to set up as a claimant for enlarged privileges of neutrality? But the great grievance, or at least the danger arising from the right of seizing enemy's goods, as I have always understood it, was not so much the seizure itself, as the right of search which it involved. This was the chief cause of our differences with the United States of America in 1812. But has the Declaration of Paris removed this grievance, or this danger? It has expressly excepted contraband of war. But how are you to ascertain whether a vessel is carrying contraband of war, unless you go on board and search her? There is no stipulation that the production of the ship's papers shall be sufficient; so that, according to the terms of the "Declaration," if we were at war, we should have still the right to go on board a neutral ship, in order to satisfy ourselves as to whether she was carrying contraband or not. But it has been said the right of seizure is an interference with trade, and that it is demoralizing to allow our maritime population to be rovers on the seas, seizing and carrying away, as spoils of war, the property of innocent people. But I would ask, is it not more demoralizing to feed a war for the sake of gain, to assist an enemy's resources, and enable it to prolong the miseries which war entails? Is it conducive to public morality that one part of a nation shall be at peace while the other is at war? That your merchants and traders shall be carrying on a roaring trade with the enemy, increasing and strengthening its means of aggression or resistance, while we are sending the bravest, the very flower, of our youth to bleed and to die on the battle-field? To my mind, there is a heartless selfishness involved in such a condition of things that is repugnant to every manly sentiment. This is not the way to foster or promote public spirit, or great national virtues in a people—to employ the terse eloquence of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli),—"You might produce rich communities, but you will create weak States." This modern notion of humanizing war, as it is termed, may be well expressed in the phrase, "Slay your enemy, but spare his property"—yes; "Blow him to atoms at the cannon's mouth, but do not touch his goods." How are we, a maritime nation, to defend ourselves against a formidable military power upon such a principle? If Russia were to cross our Indian frontier, by what military force could we resist her? How could we oppose her, except by crippling her trade and annihilating her commerce? If a war were to arise—God forbid that such a thing should happen—between ourselves and the United States, and an army were marched into Canada, what resistance could England make except upon the ocean? These are contingencies—considerations of a practical character that to my mind outweigh entirely the mistaken, however well-meant, intentions of those who would humanize war, as they think, by giving immunity to the trade of belligerents, and converting war into a sort of duel by proxy between nations. Sir, that is not my notion of humanity, or of a sound national or international policy. Every nation owes a duty to itself. It owes a duty also to the world; for to each one a mission has been given. As Rome taught the art of government and the science of law, so it has been ours to spread the blessings of liberty, to show how freedom can combine with social order, and how a nation that is free will become great. As one of the most civilizing influences of the world,—one, so to speak, of its chief moral agents—let us beware lest we lower our position among the great family of nations, and so weaken our power for good.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, the question appeared to divide itself into two parts; first, whether it would be advantageous to this country to withdraw from the Declaration of Paris; and, secondly, whether they were morally entitled to do so? At present, he could not see what great service their Navy would be to them in case of war if they maintained the stipulations of that Declaration. Were they to confine the operations of their fleet merely to the attack of fortresses which were situated on the sea, or of the vessels of their enemies? They were debarred from doing the former by the new system of torpedoes, while they were prevented from attacking men-of-war by their remaining under the protection of their own fortresses. Therefore, the whole function of their fleet would be to defend the shores of England, or to attack the merchant ships of other countries at sea. He would remind the House of the conduct of Russia, after the Treaty of Paris.

In the preliminaries of peace, which were put forward by England, it was laid down that all the ports on the Black Sea should be disarmed and their arsenals rendered useless for the purposes of war. After the Congress had met at Paris, Russia maintained that the port of Nicolaieff did not come within the terms of the preliminaries of peace. Our Law Officers of the Crown agreed that such was the case; but in consequence of the neutrality of the Black Sea, Russia undertook not to arm ships at the arsenal at Nicolaieff. The Russian Government, however, subsidized a steam company to build vessels there, and gave it the use of the arsenal on the condition that the ships should be so built that they could be converted into vessels of war. At any moment almost these ships could have waged war. That seemed to him to be an evasion not only of the Treaty, but especially of the stipulation that privateering was abolished. Then, during the war which took place between France and Austria, it was Greece, whose neutrality was guaranteed by other States, and which had, perhaps, the largest carrying trade in the Mediterranean, that profited by the Declaration of Paris. The next point he had to consider was how far would they be justified in withdrawing from the Treaty. Other nations had withdrawn from obligations equally binding. He would not allude to the case of Russia withdrawing from the Treaty with reference to the neutrality of the Black Sea, because the manner in which that withdrawal was made could never be sanctioned by the civilized nations, though he owned there were difficulties connected with the question, and he had not joined in any violent vociferation against the late Government, who had to deal with those difficulties. But it could not be denied that Russia, propria motu, withdrew from the solemn stipulation of the Treaty. But there were certain other Declarations from which other nations had withdrawn. In the first place, the Principalities were to be governed by two Princes. The Principalities evaded that by each electing the same man, Prince Couza, and when he was driven away, Prince Charles took his place. And now Austria, Germany, and Russia insisted on making a commercial treaty with the Principalities, which was a third evasion. Then there was another arrangement at the time of the Congress of Paris, not so solemn as those with regard to privateering, and the immunity from seizure of foreign goods in neutral bottoms, but it came next, as it was solemnly made in the Protocol. At that time Lord Clarendon proposed, and the proposal was agreed to and signed by the Plenipotentiaries, that in case of any difference arising between the Powers they would have recourse to arbitration instead of going to war. Almost every foreign Government gave its adhesion to that Declaration; but how many Governments had stuck to it? England was the only one which had done so in the case of that celebrated episode in our history, the Alabama Claims. Having shown that it would be necessary to resume the rights abandoned in 1856, and that there was full margin for doing so, he would recommend his hon. Friend not to press his Motion to a division. An almost unanimous opinion had been expressed by the House that we were not bound; he hoped his hon. Friend would rest satisfied with that, and allow the Motion of the hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Cartwright) to be adopted.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, it appeared to him, from the speeches of that evening, that a great misapprehension existed on this question. It seemed to be supposed that the Earl of Clarendon had, at the Congress of Paris, on behalf of the British Government, abandoned rights which had been up to that moment deemed essential for the protection of the rights and the honour of England. But it should be remembered that at the commencement of the Crimean War this concession to neutral nations was deliberately adopted by a Government, of which Lord Palmerston was a Member—a man not likely needlessly to have sacrificed the interests of his country. And it was adopted not only with a view to maintain the peace of the world, and to avoid dragging neutral nations unnecessarily into the war, but above all as a concession to the progress of commerce and civilization which undoubtedly had marked the space which had elapsed from the times of Nelson. No doubt they were very far removed from the times, though not from the spirit of Nelson. But when hon. Members called on them to practise those excessive acts of power and tyranny which were exercised in Nelson's time, they seemed, as the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight seemed, like another Rip Van Winkle, who, awaking from a 50 years' slumber, rushed into the House and exclaimed, "Good Heavens! what has happened since I was last among you?" It was well known that at the commencement of the Crimean War the Russian Government was going to commission privateers from the United States, and it was only the Declaration in question which saved the world from a horde of pirates issuing from the United States under the Russian flag. When, therefore, hon. Members discussed this question of the Declaration of Paris he must ask them to discuss it as a whole, and not merely as laying down the doctrine of free ships, free goods. Let it be taken in connection with that very important Article of the Declaration—very important for us as a maritime Power—that blockades to be effective must be real; that there must be no such thing as paper blockades. Let it be taken in connection also with the Article which abolished privateering, and he could not believe that any hon. Member could be in earnest when he expressed a desire to see us go back to times gone by, when the practice of piracy and privateering prevailed. With regard to what fell from the hon. and gallant Member for Stamford, he would point out that the abandonment of privateering would not prevent us from fitting out and putting into commission any number of ships taken from our merchant service, placing our own naval officers on board, remembering how far in advance of other countries we were in the resources of our Royal Navy, both as to competent officers and able seamen; he considered that we should, also, under this head, be distinct gainers. In conclusion, he said that, whether this was to be looked upon as a Treaty or not, the House must not forget that we had invited many nations to accede to its provisions, and that, except Spain and the United States, almost every civilized State had now joined in the Declaration.

Mr. BOURKE said, the House would agree with him that the subject which had been so ably brought before it by his hon. Friend the Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) was one well deserving of consideration. Her Majesty's Government were well aware that the question was interesting, not only to many hon. Members, but also to many of the people of this country, who took an interest in it from purely patriotic motives. The form of the Motion before the House was one of considerable ambiguity; but after the speech of his hon. Friend, it might be clearly divided into two different propositions—the first, that Her Majesty's Government ought to have taken advantage of the Conference of Brussels to bring the subject of the Declaration before it; and the second, that Her Majesty's Government was not bound by the Declaration. As to the first proposition, if Her Majesty's Government had been ever so willing to bring the subject before the Conference, it would have been impossible to do so for this reason—that the Powers who were signatories to the Declaration of Paris were not the same as those which met at Brussels. Because, although the Declaration of Paris was signed only by Turkey, Russia, Austria, Prussia, Italy, and England, yet upon the invitation of those Powers, various other Powers of the world subsequently sent in their adhesion to that arrangement. That might be looked upon by many as a technical reason for not going into the subject at the Conference of Brussels. But there was a stronger reason which must suggest itself to every man's mind, and that was, that the object of the Conference at Brussels was entirely foreign to the subject of the Declaration of Paris. The subject to be brought before the Congress of Brussels was an inquiry into the rules of military warfare, for the purpose of mitigating the horrors and calamities of war. And it seemed to be clear to Her Majesty's Government that their object ought to be to limit, rather than extend, that inquiry as much as possible. If the course suggested by his hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) had been adopted by the Government, the various theories of maritime warfare would have been discussed; the immunity of all private property at sea, and the most delicate questions of International Law would have been debated in the Congress, and our declared intention to depart from the Declaration of Paris would, no doubt, have been made the pretext by others for getting rid of engagements which for some reason they thought themselves entitled to abandon. Therefore, he said the course taken by the Government was to limit as much as possible the subjects to be considered by the Congress at Brussels. That course was clear and decided. It was laid down in the Papers before the House. They were perfectly determined not to enter into any discussion of the rules of International Law by which the relations of belligerents were guided, or undertake any new obligations or engagements of any kind in regard to general principles; and they required, before sending a delegate to the Conference, the most positive and distinct assurances from every power taking part in the Congress that they agreed to the course proposed by the Government, and would not entertain in any shape, directly or indirectly, anything relating to maritime operations or naval warfare. Such were the instructions given to General Horsford, and that officer had carried out his instructions to the entire satisfaction of the Government. Having laid that down as the rule of their conduct, the Government would have been greatly to blame if they had departed from it, and they should have been guilty of the grossest inconsistency if they had brought forward any subjects like that suggested by the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight. He need not advert to the reasons for not going further. It had been asserted that the Government of St. Petersburg had some secret reason for inviting us to join the Conference in that City. He was not aware what that secret reason could be; but if there was a secret reason, it was all the more necessary for the Government to take the course they did on that occasion—not to allow any discussion of questions of International Law, nor to adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight. In the course which they had taken, the Government had received the unanimous support of the Press throughout the country, and they had also received the thanks of the country for having adhered to that course. The Declaration of Paris embraced four points, but after all, there was only one to which very serious objection had been taken, and that was the Article with regard to the neutral ships. Well, in conceding the right of taking enemy's goods out of principle that "free ships made free goods," there could be no doubt the country gave up a belligerent right she had exercised from very ancient times, and which she considered a powerful arm of maritime warfare. There was no doubt that that right had been incorporated from time immemorial in the code of our maritime laws, and this country on two memorable occasions showed that it was prepared to brave nearly the whole world for the purpose of sustaining those ancient maritime rights. That right had been sanctioned by the highest authorities, ancient and modern—by Grotius, Vattel, Hubner, Chief Justice Marshal, Kent, Story, and Wheaton. Under these circumstances, we could not be surprised that there were living statesmen among us who had the greatest possible doubt as to the wisdom of the course taken in 1856, and that we ought to leave ourselves to act, as in 1854, not binding ourselves by any new Declaration, but acting on the principle of what was most expedient for us to adopt. But that was not the question of the present day. The question now was, having now this Declaration as part and parcel of International agreements—was it our duty to denounce that Declaration because at the time when we entered into it there were some persons in this country who thought we had taken a false step? These persons seemed to forget that by such a course we were met face to face by another Declaration—the Declaration that was made, on the meeting of the Black Sea Conference in London in 1871, which was to this effect—

"That it is an essential principle of the Law of Nations that no Power can liberate itself from the engagements of a Treaty, nor modify the stipulations thereof, unless with the consent of the contracting Powers by means of an amicable arrangement."

Both Houses of Parliament had refused to denounce the Declaration of Paris when the subject had been brought before them. They had refused to alter the terms of the Declaration of Paris, and he was a little surprised to hear some hon. Gentlemen say that because that instrument was not ratified we were not bound by it. All he could say with respect to that was, that he hoped he should never see the day when a Minister of the Crown or one of its Law Officers would repudiate an engagement because it lacked certain formalities. The Plenipotentiary had full power to sign the Declaration, and that went a great way to show that the Declaration was binding upon us. He must say that he thought his hon. Friends who were in favour of doing away with the Declaration of Paris seemed to have forgotten that in the last century the principle which had been acted upon for nearly 70 or 80 years of peace between France, Portugal, England, and the Netherlands was, that free ships made free goods, although no doubt in time of war every one of those Powers did not act upon that principle. He need not, however, remind the House that we had entered into treaties with various Powers acknowledging the principle, but that other Powers had done so to even a greater extent than ourselves. And when the effect of the rule was taken into consideration we could not be surprised that such was the case, because everybody must admit that if the right of taking enemy's goods out of neutral ships did to a certain extent allow a belligerent to injure his adversary, yet it must be admitted that it had at the same time the result of irritating one's friends. It had a tendency in times of war to involve belligerents with their allies and to excite the most rancorous disputes between neutrals, while it also served to produce litigation between individuals, for it was always most difficult to prove that the goods seized were the property of the belligerents. He could not, therefore, help thinking that circumstances might arise when the advantage we had gained, and which we certainly did sometimes gain, by capturing enemy's goods in neutral vessels would be more than counterbalanced by the very great evils which might be caused by the irritation of our friends. Should we, he would ask, be likely to bear with equanimity to see our vessels, when neutral, stopped on the high seas, brought into port, and detained for any length of time on the ground that there were enemy's goods on board? Yet, if we withdrew from the Declaration of Paris, that was a result which we must expect; because by withdrawing from that Declaration we should be asserting in the strongest terms our refusal to recognize the doctrine that the neutral flag covered an enemy's goods. He had heard it stated in the course of the discussion this evening that neutrals gained very little by the concession which had been made; but that was, he confessed, to him a somewhat novel statement, for he had always understood that it had been admitted that, whatever effect might have been produced by the Declaration of Paris on belligerents, there had been no doubt whatever entertained of its advantages in the case of neutral Powers. His hon. Friend the Member for the Isle of Wight did not seem to be quite satisfied that this country should be neutral; but he could not quite follow his arguments with respect to the taking of tallow during the Russian War, nor could he concur with what had been said by many hon. Gentlemen with respect to the abolition of privateers. Whenever he had occasion to speak on that subject he had always stated that this part of the Declaration of Paris, at all events, admitted of no doubt. He could not understand how hon. Gentlemen could justify privateering in a point of view which had been called by almost every person the curse of commerce. Even those by whom it had been upheld as the last resource of war had admitted that it was most desirable it should, if possible, be got rid of. This country had gained far more than any other by its abolition so far as we had gone, and if we could only get the rest of the world to agree with us in this matter we should be still further benefited. No nation was more open to privateers in proportion to the strength of our commercial marine compared with a belligerent. Let him suppose that one of the nations, not ourselves, were to be engaged in war with a country at the other end of the world. If either of those countries sent out privateers, there was no doubt our commerce would suffer; because in all probability those privateers would not be very particular as to the ships which they took, and in all likelihood a great many of those ships would have on board English goods. His hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay) had mentioned a species of privateering which he (Mr. Bourke) had never heard of, because he spoke of privateering being carried on by commissioned officers and by officers belonging to Her Majesty's Navy. That was, however, not privateering in the sense in which it was ever carried on, and there was nothing in the Declaration of Paris to forbid an arrangement which had over and over again been said to be most desirable if the commercial marine of this country would undertake it. The hon. Member for the Isle of Wight had said that privateers were nothing but volunteers of the sea; but there was the greatest possible difference between volunteers and privateers, because the volunteer acted under the command of officers and in a regular manner, while privateers could do whatever they chose without any commander or rule whatever, except rules they made for themselves; and they made war for their own purposes and profit. If, again, we became belligerents there was no doubt we should lose a certain portion of our carrying trade; but we should also recollect that we should be able to carry on our commerce in neutral vessels. He trusted, however, that if unfortunately we should be at war, we should be able to protect our commerce with our own Navy, so that as long as we continued to be a powerful maritime nation the fancied evil which would result to our carrying trade seemed to him to be very much exaggerated. For his own part, he did not think anything would be more impolitic than that we should declare beforehand that we were about to sacrifice the Declaration of Paris by stopping the neutral ships of our allies and searching for belligerent goods. Such a course would, in his opinion, be very likely to turn neutrals into enemies. In case of war, we should then be obliged to do one of two things—either to re-abandon the rights of capturing belligerent goods in neutral vessels—not a very dignified course after repudiating the Declaration of Paris—or we must inevitably run the risk of turning neutrals into enemies, as he had just observed. We must also bear in mind that although neutral rights were now more generally recognized than in more remote times, yet the Declaration did not infringe on the right of search, or on the law of contraband; and so long as those two laws remained we need not, in his opinion, apprehend any of those evil results which some hon. Gentlemen seemed to imagine. In consequence of the progress of science in the present day the tendency was to increase the number of articles declared to be contraband of war; and such articles would, of course, be liable to seizure if carried in neutral vessels.

In the few remarks he had made he had endeavoured to look at this question in a candid spirit. He did not think that the Declaration of Paris was open to all the grave objections that had been urged against it. He could not concur with those who wished to go further and to give immunity to all private property at sea, because he believed that by so doing we should be sweeping away the most valuable belligerent rights the great maritime Powers possessed. There was a cardinal difference between such a principle and anything that was contained in the Declaration of Paris, which put forward stipulations that were to be carried out by neutral Powers, whereas the abandonment of the right of capture of all private property at sea would concern those Powers who might be belligerent; and there was, therefore, no use in laying down a principle which would be swept aside the moment the two Powers interested went to war with each other. On the whole, therefore, it would not, in his opinion, be prudent or expedient to get rid of the Declaration of Paris, and Her Majesty's Government could not be blind to the grave results that would arise from disturbing that arrangement. A course of that kind could not be taken without arousing a great difference of opinion not only among the Powers who were the original signatories to the Treaty, but also among the 40 other Powers who had since signed it, and it could not be taken without infringing the great principle of fidelity to international engagements which this country had always endeavoured to uphold. He did not agree, therefore, in the opinion that the Conference at Brussels, or the proposed Conference at St. Petersburg, were occasions favourable for the discussion of this question, and he thought that this would not be a suitable time for discussing it in an European Conference. Entertaining, as he did, the views he had endeavoured to lay before the House, he should, in the event of the House being called upon to divide on the subject, vote with the hon. Member for Oxfordshire in support of the Previous Question.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had heard with satisfaction—and he was certain that the country would hear with satisfaction—the prudent, moderate, and sagacious statement of the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; it was a statement worthy of himself, and of the high position which he occupied as one of the responsible Ministers of the Crown. He (Sir William Harcourt) could assure the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) that he would not find in him an advocate of selfish isolation, nor had he addicted himself to the new-fangled doctrines of International Maritime Law which had long prevailed on the Continent of Europe, and which had been largely disseminated in this country. The little he had learnt on the subject of maritime law had been acquired as a disciple in the school of those great masters to whom his hon. Friend had alluded—Lord Stowell, Chief Justice Marshal, Kent, and Story—those great publicists who had established upon unshakable foundations the great principles which governed the maritime relations of States. He entirely concurred with the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs that those principles—some of which were deliberately abandoned at the Conference of Paris—were principles which were well established in the Law of Nations, and that to attempt to dispute that they were maritime rights were attempts which no jurists or publicists could listen to for a moment. He also entirely agreed with the Under Secretary that the proposition made to exempt private property at sea from capture, and the proposal to abolish the right of commercial blockade were untenable in International Law, and if attempted would be injurious to the maritime supremacy of England. To have introduced a discussion of these matters at the Conference at Brussels would have been entirely impertinent to the matters with which that Conference dealt, and would have been extremely imprudent and unwise on the part of Great Britain. When the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight said that by the Declaration of Paris two great blows were struck at the maritime supremacy of England—by the abolition of letters of marque and by the abandonment of the right of search—he confessed that he heard him with some surprise. Everyone knew that letters of marque were the powerful instruments of weak maritime States, and that they were a thorn in the side of States possessing great Navies, and that if any nation was in-

interested in getting rid of privateering it was the one that expended £10,000,000 or £11,000,000 a-year in supporting the greatest and most powerful Navy in the world. The nation that raised the strongest objections to the abolition of privateering was the United States, which possessed no considerable Navy, but which, from the enterprize of its sailors, and the extent of its Mercantile Marine, would, in the event of war, be able to send forth hordes of privateers all over the world. The very fact of the United States objecting to the abolition of privateering, therefore, was the strongest argument to show that privateering was injurious to England. It must have been by inadvertence that the hon. Member had suggested that the right of search had been surrendered by the Declaration of Paris; because the right of search existed at the present time, otherwise the right to seize contraband of war and of blockade could not be enforced. The hon. Gentleman had made another extraordinary statement. He had said that this claim of exempting enemy's goods from capture on board neutral vessels was not advanced till 1751. He alluded to the celebrated case of the capture of Prussian vessels with respect to the Silesian Loan, which all English lawyers admitted with the greatest respect was not altogether creditable to Prussia. He (Sir William Harcourt) had often heard the Prime Minister of England speak of the Administration which was the author of the Treaty of Utrecht as a great Tory Party which laid down the true principles of maritime law. He (Sir William Harcourt) did not admire the Administration of Bolingbroke and Harley; but it had one title to fame in the history of this country—its enlightened commercial policy. The Treaty of Utrecht had always been referred to as one which settled this very question. The Tory Administration of Lord Bolingbroke, which negotiated it, established the principle that free ships made free goods as between the parties to that negotiation; and England, in her Treaty with France and with Spain, made that one of the cardinal features of the Treaty of Utrecht. He therefore rather envied the Tory Party that they were the originators in modern Europe of the establishment of that very principle which was ultimately concentrated in 1856 in the Declaration of Paris. There was another thing which he had also heard the Prime Minister claim for the Tory Party, although in this matter he should feel inclined to dispute the title. In the early days of Pitt, when he was a great Parliamentary reformer, he was also a great commercial reformer, and, following the Administration of Bolingbroke, he also advocated the principle of free goods in free ships. If during the whole of the last century this principle was regarded as the cardinal feature of the foreign policy of England, and was ratified in the great settlement of Europe in 1815, and in the great Commercial Treaty of 1786, it was a little extraordinary that the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight had now come forward to say that it was a novel proposition. The hon. Member had referred to the history of the Armed Neutrality; but the declaration of Armed Neutrality was made in 1780, at the period of the great weakness of England, when, owing to the unfortunate policy of the war with America, the greatness which Chatham achieved for her had been almost annulled in Europe. England, it was true, accepted the principles of the Armed Neutrality, but she was not in a situation to resist them, and therefore, in 1780, although she protested against those principles, she was practically compelled to acquiesce in them. It was perfectly true that in the second Armed Neutrality, in 1800, she stood in a different position. She was then, by the genius of Nelson and the valour of her sailors, mistress of the seas, and in a situation to dictate to the world, as she did in the attack on Copenhagen. Then was made a Treaty which conceded not this particular point, but other points, which led to a protest by Lord Grenville. From 1815 this question slept in the policy of Cabinets, but not in the literature of International Law. There were Continental writers who were unanimous upon this subject and unanimous against the claim of capture. It was perfectly true that England had never conceded that right, but she was not bound to concede it. But when, unhappily, as he should always think, the great peace which had lasted 40 years was broken up by the Crimean War, England had to consider what she ought to do upon this matter. She was engaged in a war with Russia, one of the parties to—indeed, the principal promoter of—the doctrine of the Armed Neutrality. She was looking for allies, and her ally was France, and France was as deeply pledged to this principle as Russia, her opponent, was. She could not have found in Europe or this side of the Atlantic a single maritime ally who would have joined her upon the principles which she herself desired to maintain. She could not have found such an ally on the other side of the Atlantic. If she had gone into that war with Russia maintaining the right of capture of enemy's goods in neutral vessels, she would have found herself not only without any ally, but with every neutral Power in the world her enemy. It was under these circumstances that the Government of England waived—only in the first instance waived—this principle at the outset of the Crimean War. Then came the peace and the Conference of Paris. He had often had the advantage of conversing with Lord Clarendon, and he regretted, from the reverence he bore his name, the manner in which his hon. Friend the Member for the Isle of Wight had spoken of him. But he had heard Lord Clarendon say that this Declaration would have been made in Paris whether England had joined in it or not—that the Declaration of all the Powers of Europe upon the subject was so pronounced and unanimous that in that great Conference, which was in some sense a re-adjustment of Europe, that Declaration would inevitably have been made; and Lord Palmerston had also made that statement. Now, a very strong proof that the concession then made was irresistible was to be found in this—that the American Government declined to be bound, and was not under any obligation to observe it. But what happened? When they went to war with the Southern States in 1861 they were compelled to adopt the principles of the Declaration of Paris, and did adopt them. Both sides in that war, in fact, adhered to the abrogation of privateering—to the principle that the goods of an enemy were not to be taken in a neutral vessel, and acted in every sense as if they were signatories of the Treaty of Paris. That, he thought, was a sufficient proof that the course that was taken was necessary. He had always regarded the Declaration of Paris as a compromise, and not an unfair compromise, between the rival pretensions—on the one hand of the neutral claims of the Armed Neutrality, and on the other hand of the belligerent claims which had been previously claimed by England, and in former days by France and other countries. The document should be looked upon as a whole. While his hon. Friend had only referred to two points of the Declaration, his Resolution would abrogate the whole of it. He would first point out what was gained by the Declaration of Paris, and then allude to what was lost by it. We gained the abolition of privateering, and he agreed with the Under Secretary of State that to a great maritime Power that was an infinite gain. It was more; it was a gain to the civilized world. According to the French name for the word a privateer was a corsair, and that thoroughly expressed the meaning. Privateers were not bound by the sentiments which belonged to officers in the naval service or by the discipline which was to be found among regular soldiers. His hon. Friend compared them to volunteers, but they were more like Franc-tireurs, and volunteers did not go out for gain as they did. That was not the spirit by which they were actuated. The second gain was a practical regulation of the claim of the second Armed Neutrality on the subject of convoy—a claim set up in the great Swedish case decided by Lord Stowell—namely, that a single armed ship might exempt a fleet of merchantmen from search, although they might be laden with contraband of war. The Declaration practically repudiated that claim. The third thing England gained was a definition of blockade; and since that Declaration the war with the United States had established the doctrine of blockade on a sounder footing, and had guarded it with greater stringency with regard to belligerents than before. Now, that was a most valuable right to a maritime Power. It was shown to be in the war with the South, as it was by the stress of the blockade that the great superiority of the Northern States reduced the South to submission. The Declaration of Paris had strengthened rather than weakened a right which was most valuable to a maritime Power. One other right had practically been confirmed, and that was the right of search. There had been put forward by writers on behalf of neutrals all sorts of claims to limit the right of search, but these were practically repudiated by the Declaration, and in the war with the United States the right of search was more rigorously exercised than ever before. That was what England had gained. What had she lost? She had conceded the principle—for unquestionably it was a concession—of free ship, free goods. When we were a belligerent we lost the right to seize an enemy's goods on board a neutral vessel. But England had found herself unable to exercise that right, and she could not at present exercise it in Europe or in America unless she was prepared to fight the whole world, and no other statesman in his senses would maintain that the Declaration should be repudiated on such terms. [A laugh.] His hon. Friend the Member for the Isle of Wight laughed; but did he expect that we should be at war longer than at peace? Since 1815, happily, we had been very little at war, and he hoped our policy might be long of that character. But what had been the result? Since the Declaration of Paris, Europe had been at war and America had been at war, and England had monopolized the carrying trade of the world. In time of war what would happen? It might be thought that we should carry our own trade in our own vessels. Since the Declaration of Paris, however, there had been war in the United States, and a single Alabama drove the whole trade of the States into neutral bottoms. A merchant's goods would always be safer in a neutral bottom, and the mere difference of the insurance would induce the merchants of a belligerent State to ship them in neutral bottoms. What would be the result of a withdrawal on our part from the Declaration of Paris? That our enormous foreign trade, which was 30 times as great as in the days of Nelson, would be at the mercy of every South American Republic. ["Oh!"] Yes, England could not monopolize the principle, and if two American States went to war, they would have a right to search the whole merchant shipping of England in search of contraband of war. Was it for our advantage that hostilities, whether in Spain or elsewhere, should expose us to the exercise of the right of search by other Powers? No doubt the Declaration of Paris operated as a premium in favour of neutral Powers, and he was glad of it. It was a reward upon those who remained at peace, and a fine upon those who went to war. The conditions of warfare were very different from what they had been. Railway communication had wrought a great change. In old times many countries could only communicate with each other by sea, but now the trade could be transacted by land. The abrogation of the Navigation Laws had put an end to the coasting and colonial trade and to the rules of 1756. The hon. Member for the Isle of Wight did not deny that the Declaration of Paris was advantageous to England in time of peace. For 20 years we had derived all the profits, and had become the carriers of the world under this principle, and yet we were asked to repent of the obligations under which we had derived such advantages. He did not think that would commend itself to the House of Commons or to the English people. England derived great advantages from her maritime superiority and the courage of her seamen; but she derived still greater advantages from the moral strength belonging to a country that knew how to observe its engagements and maintain the stability of its policy. The hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hermon) had referred to the late Lord Derby. He would, on the other hand, refer to the present Lord Derby, who now represented the Queen in her relations with foreign States. He occupied the same high position in 1867, when this question was brought before the House by the late Mr. John Stuart Mill. Lord Derby answered Mr. Mill; and what would be the position of the House of Commons and the country if, after declarations such as he was about to quote had been made by Minister after Minister belonging to both parties in the State, the House of Commons should now attempt to evade engagements of this character? The present Lord Derby, in 1867, being then Lord Stanley, said—

“The power to intervene effectually is a temptation to do so; and, if the Declaration of 1856 has prevented us from mixing ourselves up with Continental complications with which we had nothing to do, all I can say is that that is one of the best arguments I have yet heard in its defence. . . . With regard to the subject generally, I entirely agree with the hon. Member in laying down the principle that it will not do to go on with a Declaration of this kind if we do not mean to act upon it. You are bound either to repudiate it at once, or to act on it when the occasion arises. . . . The trade of the countries going to war, for the time only, but still for the time, passes into neutral hands; in other words, both the combatants suffer heavy loss, both are heavily fined, so to speak, for their breach of the peace, and the fine goes for the benefit of those who have continued to remain on good terms. . . . I think we have to look at the question as a matter of good faith and consistency. We have given a pledge, not merely to the Powers who signed with us, but to the whole civilised world. We have urgently and continuously invited other States to join in that Declaration; we have done so with very considerable success, and it would be hardly intelligible or in accordance with our position to turn suddenly round and change our policy.”—[3 Hansard, clxxxix. 886-7-8-9-90.]

Some hon. Members thought that as this Declaration of Paris was not a Treaty we need not be bound by it. Our present Foreign Minister had, however, pointed out that this Declaration was not the act of the Executive alone, but had been repeatedly brought before Parliament, and on every occasion Parliament had refused to interfere and had practically given its adhesion to the Declaration of Paris. He would not think so meanly of one bearing the name of Stanley as to suppose that the Foreign Secretary, after holding that language in the presence of the House of Commons and in the face of Europe, could consent to repudiate that which he had declared England was morally bound to maintain. If the Motion of the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight was carried, Lord Derby, he was sure, would rather resign than give effect to it. He would detain the House no longer. The language he had read was far more deserving of attention than any he could command. It was worthy of the man, worthy of the office he held, and expressed the spirit which he ventured to think would influence the House of Commons in the decision at which they would arrive.

Mr. FORSYTH regretted that he could not say, with the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), that he had listened with satisfaction to the speech of the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs. It would have been different if the Under Secretary had merely maintained that we had been right in not taking part in the Conference at Brussels, and that the present time was inopportune for a withdrawal of the Declaration of Paris; but he had gone much further than that, for he had defended categorically every one of the propositions involved in the Declaration. It remained to be seen whether other Members of the Government concurred in that speech; but the present First Lord of the Treasury, in March, 1862, pointed out how seriously the Declaration of Paris affected the maritime strength of England, and suggested that the Ministers of the day ought to consider by what means it might be altered. It was right that the goods of neutrals should be respected wherever found; but in assenting to the proposition that the goods of an enemy ought not to be seized on board neutral ships, they gave up a cardinal principle of England's power and greatness. The principle for which he contended had, except in certain peculiar cases and for exceptional purposes, been steadily adhered to from the earliest times down to 1856. It had been said that we ought not now, owing to the lapse of time, to withdraw from the Declaration. That was a most dangerous argument, for as time went on we should find ourselves more and more bound to abide by it. If we deferred withdrawal till the outbreak of a war it would be natural for foreign nations to say to us—"You have lulled us into a false security, and you have no right to take this step now." Now was the time—a time of profound peace—when we had a right to say to foreign nations—"We made a mistake some years ago; we are not now going to war; but we are determined to assert the old principle which England always maintained—namely, that we have a right to seize the goods of the enemy wherever they are found." He would ask hon. Members who said that enemy's goods should not be seized on board free ships whether they were also prepared to say that the enemy's ships themselves should not be seized? If goods should not be seized, why should merchant ships be taken? And if this were adopted we might as well cease to be a great maritime power. Whatever might be the result of the division, he trusted there would be no misapprehension on the part of other nations as to the fact that the great body of opinion in that House was in favour of the proposition that free ships did not make free goods.

LORD CHARLES BERESFORD supported the Motion. If the Declaration of Paris remained unaltered the effect upon our merchant fleet might be very serious. Of course, if we went to war there would be many cruisers of the Alabama class belonging to the enemy, and after a few of our vessels had been destroyed by them, merchants would naturally put their goods in the vessels of other nations, and shipowners would have either to lock up their ships in harbours at home or sell them to foreigners, as had been done in America. The result in the case of the United States was that they had now a very small fleet. It might happen, under these circumstances, that the country would be even more affected after the war than during it. There was a consideration also as to prize money. He did not say that naval officers joined the service for the sake of prize money; but probably most Gentlemen would agree with him that a large bag of prize money was not at all to be despised.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE, in reply, said, he had not spoken disrespectfully of Lord Clarendon. What he said was that he could not comprehend how Lord Clarendon took the step he did of signing the Declaration of Paris. Under the circumstances, he was unwilling to press his Motion to a division. It was well known that a division did not always represent the opinion of the House.

Previous Question put, "That that Question be now put."—(Mr. Cartwright.)

The House divided:—Ayes 36; Noes 261: Majority 225.

DOVER PIER AND HARBOUR BILL. NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY nominated the Select Committee as follows:—Sir Massey Lopes, Mr. Shaw Lefevre, Mr. Cavendish Bentinck, Sir George Balfour, Mr. Malcolm, Mr. Reed, Mr. Ritchie, and Four Members to be nominated by the Committee of Selection.

MR. DILLWYN said, he was disappointed at the selection. There should have been a larger number of naval and military men upon it.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, there had been as many as about eight previous inquiries into this harbour between 1836 and 1859, including therein the Royal Commissions, Select Committees, and Departmental Committees, and in none of these inquiries had the Members appointed to make the inquiry been so restricted as the Committee now proposed was about to be formed; and, looking at the large outlay and the important character of the work, he regretted the Committee was to be so limited in number, and the Committee constituted a hybrid one, instead of a public Committee free to act, inquire, and report freely.

MR. BECKETT-DENISON was surprised there was no Member on the Committee practically acquainted with the navigation of the Channel.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, the Committee was a large one for the consideration of a hybrid Bill, and the Committee of Selection would be able to remedy the other objection made, if necessary.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee nominated:—SIR MASSEY LOPES, MR. SHAW LEFEBRE, MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK, SIR GEORGE BALFOUR, MR. MALCOLM, MR. REED, MR. RITCHIE, and Four Members to be nominated by the Committee of Selection.—(Sir Charles Adderley.)

MR. DILLWYN moved that it be an Instruction to the Select Committee on the Dover Pier and Harbour Bill, to report upon the advantages which the proposed Harbour, if successfully constructed, may afford to the defences of the Country in the case of an European war. He could not see of what benefit it could be to the country, even as a harbour of refuge, for the engineering evidence was strong as to the almost impossibility of preventing the silting up of the harbour. It could not be considered, therefore, that a case had been made out for the utility of the harbour in the Department of the Board of Trade. It was said, however, that it would be advantageous from a military point of view. His own opinion was that it would rather be a source of weakness; but he hoped the subject would be well considered, and that the Instruction he now moved for would be allowed.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Select Committee, to report upon the advantages which the proposed Harbour, if successfully constructed, may afford to the defences of the Country in the case of an European war."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, he had no objection to the proposition, except that it seemed to be wholly unnecessary. If, however, any Member desired that this Instruction should be carried he would not oppose it.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN said, he thought that the Committee should also be appointed to inquire into the uses of the harbour for the purposes of refuge and Channel communication, and proposed an Amendment to that effect.

Amendment proposed, to add at the end of the Question, the words "and for purposes of refuge and Channel communication."—(Sir Edward Watkin.)

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, these were the very objects of the Bill, and the only danger of adopting the Amendment would be that it might limit the inquiry of the Committee.

Question, "That those words be there added," put, and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Select Committee, to report upon the advantages which the proposed Harbour, if successfully constructed, may afford to the defences of the Country in the case of an European war, and for purposes of refuge and Channel communication:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records.

BANKS OF ISSUE.

NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved "That the Select Committee on Banks of Issue do consist of Twenty-one Members."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Select Committee on Banks of Issue do consist of Twenty-one Members."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. W. N. HODGSON said, he could not help saying that the Government had not shown much judgment in the selection they had made. In the county he had the honour to represent (Cumberland) the Scotch banks had established three agencies for carrying on their banking business. It was from the attacks made on the English banks in Cumberland that the opposition to the Scotch banks establishing agencies in England originated. He had waited on the Chancellor of the Exchequer in company with the manager of one of the chief banks in the North of England to represent to him the difficulties they were labouring under in consequence of the raids made on the English counties by the Scotch banks. But although they were very civilly received, he could not say that they obtained much redress. But he (Mr. Hodgson) believed it was in consequence of the representations made on that occasion that it was now proposed that a Select Committee should sit upon the question. It was rather singular, then, that while this opposition to the operations of the Scotch banks in England originated in Cumberland, a county that sent eight Members to the House of Commons, and while the adjoining county of Westmoreland sent three, making a total of 11, no one Gentleman had been selected from either of those counties to sit on the Committee. Only yesterday he received a communication from one of the managers of the chief bank in the North of England, in Carlisle, asking him several questions about the giving of evidence before the Committee, and the writer expressed himself as greatly astonished that no Gentleman from Cumberland had been nominated on the Committee. He (Mr. Hodgson) hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would consent to the three Northern counties being represented on the Committee. If that was not done, the people in those counties would not have much confidence in the Committee. He therefore moved that one Member from one of the three Northern counties should be added to the Committee.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "Twenty-one," in order to insert the words "Twenty-two,"—(Mr. William Hodgson,)—instead thereof.

MR. SPEAKER said, the House must first decide on the number of the Committee. The Amendment would be to leave out 21 and insert 22.

MR. M'LAREN suggested that two Members representing Scotch constituencies should be added to the Committee. The Committee as nominated included four Members of Scotch constituencies, two of whom were officially connected with banks, and the third had taken a leading part in conducting the case for the Scotch banks. He did not object to any of those Gentlemen, and should vote for all of them as being well qualified to serve. But it was essential for the interest of the property and trade in Scotland that other names should be added. If the question was simply one of the Scotch banks carrying on business in London, the composition of the Committee would not signify much; but from the observations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), and other influential Members of the House, it was certain that the carrying on of business by the Scotch banks in London would be the least important of the questions brought before the Committee. The inquiry would open up the whole question of the constitution of the Scotch banks; and if the Committee should think of permitting those banks to extend their business to the metropolis, the people of Scotland would look for the breaking up of the monopoly which those banks now enjoyed. There were only 11 banks in Scotland—five in Edinburgh, three in Glasgow, two in Aberdeen, and one in Inverness. Those 11 banks formed one of the most perfect trades unions that could possibly exist anywhere. They had purchased up all the other banks, about 10 in number; and they acted together in every respect as one institution. The five in Edinburgh could advertize any day that the rate of interest was altered, and every bank was bound to obey that decision. The effect of the Bank Acts of 1844 and 1845 had been that no new bank could profitably be established in Scotland; that the Bank of England could not establish branches in Edinburgh and Glasgow, as he thought they ought to be able to do; and that Bank of England notes were not a legal tender in Scotland. Looking at all the circumstances of the case, it was impossible to allow such a monopoly as now existed to continue. The banks had a nominal capital of £9,500,000; but so successful had they been in their monopoly that the selling price of the shares now represented in the aggregate £26,000,000. The deposits amounted to £77,000,000; and the House was as much bound to look after the interests represented by the £77,000,000 as after the interests of the £9,500,000 of the shareholders. When there was fair competition in banking in Scotland, the rule was, whatever they charged for discounting bills at three months—supposing, for instance, it was 4 per cent—they always allowed 3 per cent for balances in their hands. But, in Edinburgh, for the last year the average rate for discounts was $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, whilst the average interest allowed on deposits was only from 1 to $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The banks having such a monopoly, could do whatever they liked. The large traders, it was true, could discount their bills and get accommodation in London, but the smaller traders were entirely at their mercy. There were above 800 branches in Scotland which could be carried on with comparatively no capital, their notes being payable in gold only at the head offices, where the notes were first issued. Under the circumstances, he thought it was a very reasonable request that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should add to the Committee two Members unconnected with any existing bank. He should move that the number of the Committee be 23 instead of 21, and if that were agreed to, he should propose the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay) as one of the additional Members, leaving the Chancellor of the Exchequer to nominate the other. The hon. Member for Forfarshire had paid great attention to the question of banking, and was well qualified to serve on the Committee.

Mr. W. N. Hodgson

MR. SPEAKER pointed out that there was already an Amendment before the House to the effect that the Committee consist of 22 Members, and until that had been disposed of the hon. Member could not move his Amendment.

AN hon. MEMBER on the Liberal Benches agreed with a great deal of what had been said by the hon. Member for Cumberland (Mr. W. N. Hodgson). It was well known that the question was one affecting the Northern counties more than any other part of England, and he considered it very hard that they should have no Representative on the Committee.

MR. ANDERSON said, he had intended to make his strictures on the composition of the Committee at a future stage, but perhaps he might as well say what he had to say on the Amendment now before the House. He agreed to a very great extent with the remarks of the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) as to the monopoly of the

Scotch banks. He was no friend of theirs, though on this occasion he appeared so, because the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) thought proper to bring in a restrictive Bill which he, being averse to all restrictions and all monopolies, had felt bound to oppose. He was for free trade in banking as in other matters. The Scotch bankers were great monopolists, and although they did not look on him in general as their friend, yet he wished to see that House in the question now before it gave them fair play. The proposed constitution of the Committee would not give them that fair play. In objecting to certain names, however, he had not the slightest personal motive, his one simple reason for objecting being that they were practical bankers, engaged in the practice of their profession and taking their daily profits from it. Personally, he had great esteem—and in some cases strong friendship—for the hon. Members whose names he desired to expunge from the Committee. He hoped they would take no offence at the course he was pursuing. It was always an unpleasant and invidious thing to move the rejection of any Member of a Committee, and the House properly looked with jealousy on such a Motion, which certainly ought not to be made except under special circumstances. In this case he should justify the making of such a Motion by showing that a very important principle was involved, and that it was a case in which there were justifiable grounds for making a change. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer first spoke of appointing this Committee, he (Mr. Anderson) warned him that it would be exceedingly difficult to please everybody; and, indeed, that in all probability neither the Committee nor its Report would satisfy anybody, and that therefore it would be better to have a Royal Commission. What did the right hon. Gentleman think of that advice now? He must have already discovered the fact that the proposed Committee satisfied nobody, for his opposition had been by no means the keenest which the right hon. Gentleman had had to contend with. The Scotch bankers had certainly been dissatisfied, but others had been equally so, and hon. Members must have observed that for a week back it was impossible to go about the Lobbies without stumbling in every corner on knots of two and three dissatisfied bankers, looking as like conspirators hatching plots as it was possible for respectable elderly Englishmen to do. And they were hatching plots; and the result of their conspiracy had been that the right hon. Gentleman had been obliged to alter his original proposal, and he need hardly inform the right hon. Gentleman that in doing so he had contrived to make his proposal less acceptable to Scotland than ever; for he had added to the list three English Members and one Irish, but no Scotch, and two of the English were practical bankers. He would not have been surprised if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had come down at the eleventh hour in despair to please anybody, and had abandoned the Committee in favour of a Royal Commission. There might be some chance of such a proposal pleasing at least somebody. As to the names which he wished to remove from the Committee, he felt obliged to appeal to the House to do justice, and that was an appeal which he was sure would never be made in vain. The Committee originated in a Bill brought in by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London, at the instance of the London and English bankers, for the purpose primarily of preventing Scotch bankers coming to London, of depriving them of privileges which they had at present by law, and, further, of driving out of London those banks which had already established themselves there, which had created a business under the sanction and protection of the law, and created a good-will which was entirely their own property and their right. The first question that had to be discussed, and the primary one, was a mere question of privilege between the London banks as against the Scotch and the Irish banks. Under those circumstances, how was the House to decide fairly between the contending parties? It seemed to him there were two ways, and only two ways, of doing it. One was to select a given number of practical bankers from each party, and then to fill up the Committee with men of commercial knowledge and judicial minds; the bankers would then array their evidence, and the Committee would decide. That would be fair to both parties. Another way would be to keep the bankers off the Committee, and to allow no practical banker to be on it at all, but allow them to give their evidence; to construct the Committee entirely of commercial men and men of judicial mind, and let the bankers array their evidence on which the Committee would decide. Either of those two courses would be perfectly fair, and he would assent to either. But the right hon. Gentleman had selected a third course which was undoubtedly most unfair to one party. He had put English bankers on the Committee, while he had put no Scotch bankers on it to meet them. It might be a remarkable fact that while the Scotch bankers had shown a considerable desire to establish themselves in London, they had not shown a desire to establish themselves in that House. Accordingly, they had not in the House one single practical Scotch banker to represent their interest. Under those circumstances, he thought there ought to be no English bankers to oppose them. The English bankers had insisted upon their being on the Committee. They said they must be on, and if the Scotch bankers were not on, it was not their fault. The reason they gave for that was that if bankers were not on the Committee, the only men who knew anything of the subject would be left off it. That was, in his opinion, an entirely fallacious reason. It was only part of the mystery with which bankers endeavoured to surround their business. Commercial men and fair business men knew quite enough about banking to be able to take an intelligent place on the Committee. Besides, they did not wish to get the views of the bankers on the Committee, but the opinions of bankers as witnesses, in order to get information on both sides. The Committee originally consisted of 17 Members, four of whom were Scotch, but there was not one Scotch banker. However, the Committee was now proposed to be 21, and still to include only four Scotch Members. In the form now proposed there would be on the one side the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London, assisted by no fewer than six practical English bankers, while to meet them there was not one single Scotch banker on the Committee who had any practical knowledge of the question to array the evidence and make the best of the Scotch case. If his (Mr. Anderson's) Amendment were adopted—namely, to strike out the practical bankers from the Committee -- there would still be the right hon. Gentleman to array the evidence of the English bankers, and if the right hon. Gentleman was not a banker, he was so nearly the same thing as to have all the necessary practical knowledge. There was one other reason, and he thought it showed still more strongly than the others the unfairness that was done to Scotland, and would cause the interests of Scotland to be altogether crushed in the Committee. The reason was this—that all these practical English bankers had a direct pecuniary interest in the issue to be placed before the Committee. It was a well known Rule of the House that Members should not vote on any question in which they were immediately and personally interested, and he could not imagine any subject with which they could be more immediately and personally connected. It would be only an act of justice to the English bankers themselves to relieve them from the necessity of acting on such a Committee; because one of the principal questions to come before them was whether Scotch bankers should be allowed to come to London and compete with them for the business and profit which they had been in the habit of considering as their own. Under these circumstances, he could understand some hon. Members being so sensitive of their honour, so anxious not to be influenced by their own interests, as actually to vote against themselves, and this he submitted would be unjust. It was unfair to hon. Members to put them in the dilemma of having in the vote to choose between their pocket and their honour. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would agree to put ordinary business men, who were not connected with banking, on the Committee, and leave the bankers to appear in the character of witnesses.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, referring first to the proposal that the number of the Committee should be increased, said, it was found that 15 was as large a number as was usually found workable, and he thought he had gone far enough in proposing that this Committee should consist of 21 Members. A larger number would lead to a great waste of time, for the Members were likely to be irregular in their attendance, and a considerable repetition of evidence would be rendered necessary. Besides, he would remind the House that a Committee—and especially one like that which they were discussing—was not appointed to take upon itself the function of deciding finally upon the question which had been submitted to it. The House did not part with its own prerogative in these matters. What they had looked to in the appointment of the Committee was that the Gentlemen appointed to examine the subjects which were referred to them should draw out in an intelligent form all the views that ought to be brought before the House, and placing them then in juxtaposition, lay them before the House. It then fell to the House to decide upon the questions at issue. It was really, therefore, not a question whether there happened to be a majority on the one side or the other. It was only important that the Gentlemen who were appointed should be capable of going into the questions at issue, drawing up the necessary information, and placing it before the House in such a way as to enable the House to form an opinion upon it. He looked upon this Committee as one that was calculated to be of great use with reference to future legislation. He did not think that the question was one on which they should count heads, and say the constitution of the Committee was not a fair one, because there happened to be more Scotchmen than Irishmen, or a larger proportion of hon. Members from one district than another, and infer that this fact would give a certain turn to the decisions of the Committee. What was desired by those who had nominated the Committee, was to have a fair representation of the different interests and persons acquainted with the questions to be considered. With reference to the number of bankers on the Committee, there would be representatives of the Scotch banks, of the Irish banks, the London banks, the provincial banks of issue, the provincial non-issuing banks, the joint-stock banks, and representatives of persons engaged in commercial pursuits. Great pains had been taken to form a Committee which would be qualified for the work, and he was very sorry to find that it had not been possible to satisfy everybody—he hardly expected it would. He knew a great number of Members were anxious to serve on so interesting a Committee. The number he proposed was 21, but it was proposed by an hon. Member to add 10 names more. It was necessary, however, to draw the line somewhere, and he submitted that this was really a very fair proposal. He hoped the House would adhere to the number of 21, and there would then be a prospect of getting through the work in reasonable time, which was the more requisite as the Scotch banks had entered into an engagement to suspend any extension of their proceedings for another year with a view to the operations of this Committee.

Question, "That the words 'Twenty-one' stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That the Committee on Banks of Issue do consist of Twenty-one Members:—Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, Mr. GOSCHEN, Mr. STEPHEN CAVE, Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Sir GRAHAM MONTGOMERY, nominated Members of the said Committee.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Sir John Lubbock be one other Member of the said Committee."

The House divided:—Ayes 184; Noes 58: Majority 126.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Hubbard be one other Member of the said Committee."

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR pointed out that not a single person who had voted in the minority had done so from any personal objection to the hon. Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock), but solely on the principle that no banker ought to be a Member of the Committee. He hoped, therefore, his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow would not ask the House to divide again.

MR. ANDERSON said, he had expressly disclaimed any personal feeling against the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone, who was one of the most popular Members of the House; but so many hon. Members had entered the House when the Question was put who did not hear his reasons for objecting to the nomination, and he had been so strongly urged by many of his hon. Friends to test the opinion of the House upon the subject that he would take another division on the Question that Mr. Hubbard be not a Member of the Committee.

The House divided:—Ayes 160; Noes 66: Majority 94.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Anderson be one other Member of the said Committee."

MR. DENISON moved the omission of the hon. Member's name from the Committee. He considered that the hon. Member had made himself such a partizan that there would be no chance of the Committee reporting at all this Session if he was on it. He was like 20 Scotch bankers rolled into one. Of course, he disclaimed all personal feeling in the matter.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. M'LAREN gave Notice that he should take an early opportunity of moving that the Committee be increased to 23 Members, for the purpose of placing two Scotch bankers upon it.

MR. ANDERSON said, he had now entered sufficient protests against the composition of the Committee and he should not contest any further names.

Then Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. MULHOLLAND, Mr. LEVESON GOWER, Mr. BALFOUR, Mr. NORWOOD, Mr. ORR EWING, Mr. MUNDELLA, Mr. TORR, Mr. WILLIAM SHAW, Mr. BECKETT DENISON, Mr. BACKHOUSE, Mr. KAVANAGH, Mr. SAMPSON LLOYD, and Mr. HUSSEY VIVIAN were nominated other Members of the Committee.

Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

BANK HOLIDAYS ACT (1871) EXTENSION AND AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 30.]
(Mr. Ritchie, Mr. Wheelhouse, Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth, Sir Colman O'Loughlin.)

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [9th April], "That the Bill be now taken into Consideration."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. WHALLEY opposed the Motion, and moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Whalley.)

MR. BOORD said, there had been a very full discussion on the Bill, which had received the sanction of the House as to its principle, and he hoped his hon. Friend would allow the debate to proceed.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he hoped the debate would be allowed to continue.

Question put, and negatived.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered.

MR. RITCHIE moved, in Preamble, line 1, to leave out from "expedient" to "same," and insert—

"To amend 'The Bank Holidays Act, 1871,' and to extend certain of the holidays named therein to the Customs, bonding warehouses, and docks, and to amend the Acts relating to holidays in the Inland Revenue offices in England and Ireland."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. RITCHIE then moved in Clause 1, after "notwithstanding," to insert—

"Provided that such directors or governing body shall give notice thereof by inserting an advertisement to that effect in some newspaper circulating in the locality of such dock or docks."

Amendment agreed to.

Bill to be read the third time upon Thursday.

House adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock.

THE TICHBORNE TRIAL—CONTEMPT OF COURT—MR. SKIPWORTH.

IRREGULAR PETITION.

MR. WHALLEY said, he had to present a Petition from George Brown Skipworth, Esquire, and justice of the peace, of Morton House, Lincolnshire, praying that the fine of £500 which he paid, or rather which was paid for him, in consequence of a sentence for contempt of Court might be refunded. The Petition came from a gentleman of high respectability, and being very short, he would take leave to state its substance. It stated that the Petitioner on the 25th of January 1873 was summoned to Her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench on a charge of contempt of Court for speaking at a public meeting at Brighton on behalf of the then Claimant to the Tichborne estates, who was about to take his trial in that Court for perjury. With regard to the charge the petitioner asserted that at such meeting he was influenced solely by a love of fair play and a desire to see justice administered according to the laws of the land. That he could be acting with no disrespect to the Court in simply speaking his honest thoughts and exercising a strictly conscientious duty. That to shut a man's mouth when in defence of right, and preventing expression of public opinion in a defendant's favour would, in the Petitioner's opinion, be calculated most seriously to damage and prejudice his case, and militate seriously against a well-known rule of law—that a man was always presumed to be innocent before he was proved to be guilty; but that if, on the contrary, the Petitioner had declaimed the Claimant as guilty before trial, he might have laid himself open from a properly constituted Court to a charge of that nature by prejudicing his case, and deserved both fine and imprisonment; but in no other way could he conceive such a charge to have been applicable. Nevertheless, the petitioner was on the 29th of January, 1873, sentenced by the Court of Queen's Bench to three months' imprisonment and a fine of £500 for contempt of Court; that he underwent the full term of imprisonment, and declining on conscientious grounds to pay the fine he must have remained still longer a prisoner, but that a friend unasked, and notwithstanding the previously expressed declaration of the petitioner that he would neither pay the fine himself nor allow the country to pay it for him, as was offered to be done by voluntary subscription, paid the amount on the day the three months' imprisonment expired. ["Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Gentleman the Member for Peterborough that he is now going into details. He is at liberty to state generally the substance and the prayer of the Petition, but beyond that he is not entitled to go. If he wishes the Petition read by the Clerk at the Table, he can have it so read.

MR. WHALLEY said, he would of course at once defer to the opinion of the Speaker; but the petitioner wished the House to know that he considered this payment on his account a debt of honour to be repaid even with interest; but having infringed no law—[“Order, order!”]—or committed any such offence as was alleged against him, and therefore under no legal or moral obligation to pay the same, he felt it incumbent on him to exhaust every available means of obtaining restoration of the amount from the coffers of Her Majesty’s Treasury, which he inferred either held or had control of the same. [“Order, order!”]

MR. SPEAKER: I must draw the attention of the hon. Member to the fact that this Petition is irregular. No Petition can be received for refunding any sum relating to the public service or any debts due to the Crown, or for the remission of duties payable by any person unless it be first recommended by the Crown. This Petition not having been so recommended, cannot be received.

MR. WHALLEY: Perhaps I may be allowed to say that the Petition does not refer to any sum due now to the Petitioner. [“Order!”] But it is to ask the House under the circumstances stated in the Petition to intervene with the Government and to direct the Treasury to repay the sum of money not paid by the petitioner, but by some other person without his consent.

The Petition, being irregular, was not received.

ANCIENT MONUMENTS BILL.—[BILL 9.]

(Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Russell Gurney, Mr. Beresford Hope, Mr. Osborne Morgan.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, it had already been twice before the House. Once it was read a second time without objection, but the operation of the Rules of the House prevented it being carried any further that Session. Last year it encountered an opposition of which no Notice had been given, and it was defeated, though not by a very large majority. He did not the least complain of the absence of Notice, but it obviously put a private Member introducing a Bill at some disadvantage, and many hon. Members had told him since that they should have come to vote for the Bill if they had known it was going to be opposed. Under those circumstances, however, the Bill having already been two years before the House, he should not discuss it at any length, and would consequently confine his observations to the simplest resumé of its clauses. The object of the measure was to constitute a Commission whose duty it would be to watch over and preserve the ancient monuments of the country, and who would be termed the Ancient Monuments Commission. He hoped that the constitution of the Commission would be satisfactory to the House, seeing that it was to consist of the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales, the Master of the Rolls, the Presidents of the Societies of Antiquaries of London and of Scotland, the President of the Royal Irish Academy, the Keeper of the British Antiquities at the British Museum, and the following seven nominated Commissioners:—The Duke of Devonshire, the Duke of Argyll, Lord Talbot de Malahide, Sir William R. Wilde, Colonel A. L. Fox, Mr. J. Evans, of Nash Mills, Hemel Hempstead, and Mr. J. Stuart, of the General Register House, Edinburgh. A certain number of the most interesting and typical relics were thought worthy to be scheduled in the Bill, those in England being selected by the Society of Antiquaries, those in Scotland by the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, and those in Ireland by the Royal Irish Academy. Having thus been drawn up by such eminent authorities, he need say nothing in support of the Schedule. It was proposed that the Commissioners should give notice, in a form prescribed in the Bill, to the owners and occupiers of these monuments; and, if they thought fit, to those of any other similar monuments which they might deem of sufficient interest. After such notice, the owner or occupier would be required, before destroying or defacing any such monument, to give notice to the Commissioners, and the Commissioners would then state whether they were prepared to purchase the monument at fair valuation. If so, it would be bought, and thus preserved from destruction; if, on the other hand, the Commissioners were not prepared to buy, the owner would then be at liberty to do as he pleased with it. Thus the main effect of the Bill was really to gain a little time, during which the nation or the locality might, if so disposed, become the purchaser of such monuments. Under existing circumstances it had frequently happened over and over again that interesting and venerable, and in some cases sacred, monuments were destroyed, generally for very homely and trivial reasons, to be used as manure, to mend the roads, to serve as gateposts, or for other similar purposes, and when the mischief was done, everybody regretted it, and was sorry and surprised. One word about expense. He could not imagine that this House or the country would grudge a moderate sum to preserve our ancient monuments, but he really believed that the expense to the country which this Bill would entail would be infinitesimally small, and the amount would be determined by the Treasury, subject to the approval of Parliament. He, however, trusted that the interest in any particular monument in any neighbourhood would be so great that sufficient funds would be subscribed, which would prevent any appreciable burden being thrown upon the national Exchequer. It was one thing to keep up old houses which required endless repairs, but the monuments dealt with in this Bill only wanted to be left alone. In fact, the money spent under this Act would in the main be an investment, not any expense; it would be laid out in land, which might be let for grazing purposes, and would pay at least 2 per cent on the outlay. He really could not think, therefore, that any serious objection to the Bill could be made on that score. They had endeavoured to meet the objections which were made last year, not so much, indeed, to the Bill itself, as to what the Bill was supposed to be. For instance, they were told that any man's house might be invaded by bands of destructive and enthusiastic antiquaries, that the Englishman's house would cease to be his castle, and so forth; whereas in truth the Bill, as was wittily said last year by the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope), in this respect the Bill could only affect a man whose "lodging was on the cold ground." The Bill was not, and could not be applied to any dwelling-house—nay, so careful were they not to infringe on any person's privacy, that monuments situated in any garden, park, or pleasure ground were also expressly excluded from the operation of the measure. Again, it was said that the Bill would give unlimited rights of trespass; but it must be remembered that the Bill could only be applied to monuments which, in the opinion of a very well-qualified Commission, and one, from its constitution, most unlikely to interfere lightly with any rights of private property, were thought to be of national interest; and, secondly, even as regarded such monuments, the right of way would only be acquired after the monument had been purchased and paid for. Lastly, it was said that this Bill affected the rights of property; but if these monuments were to be preserved at all, he could imagine no milder method. They were told last year, and should probably be told again, that they were interfering with the rights of property; but they did so less than was the case, for instance, in every railway Bill. They did not call on the owners of those monuments to sell them; they did not in the least interfere with their rights of possession; all they asked was, that before destroying them, the nation should have the option of purchase at a fair price. He denied the measure was an unusual one, any further than the circumstances were unusual; but he had no objection to meet the wishes of those who thought so by agreeing that it should be referred to a Select Committee, provided it was read a second time, as he had now the pleasure of moving.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time.—(Sir John Lubbock.)

SIR CHARLES LEGARD, in moving that the Bill be read a second time upon that day six months, said, that last year, when the subject was discussed at great length, and when the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Lubbock) introduced a Bill substantially identical with the present measure, it was rejected by a majority of 53 in a House of 241 Members. And now they were asked to read the Bill a second time, although so far as he could see, it had not improved by keeping, neither was he aware that in the interval anything had occurred to alter their views. Indeed, in many respects, it was more objectionable than it was in its original shape. When his hon. Friend the Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) moved the rejection of the Bill last year, he termed it a "measure of spoliation," and as an Act "which meant legalizing a burglary by daylight," and he might have added to invade the rights of private property; but the hon. Baronet, in his reply, never gave any answer to those very startling phrases, which he must confess sounded to him (Sir Charles Legard), as a new Member, somewhat alarming. Notwithstanding the well-known ability of the hon. Baronet and the attention which this House was inclined to pay to anything undertaken by him, a Bill comprising such an enormous area and conferring such extraordinary powers, if it was absolutely necessary to interfere with the rights of private property, as he ventured to say this Bill did—such a measure should, he thought, be introduced by the Government, and not by a private Member. He had said that the Bill dealt with the rights of private property, and he thought he was justified in using those words when he turned to the 9th section, which was as followed :—

“When a power of restraint in respect of a monument is vested in the Commissioners by agreement or purchase, or under any conveyance, appointment, settlement, or devise, they or any of them, or any person authorized in writing by any of them, may at any time between sunrise and sunset enter upon and inspect the monument and all parts thereof, and may, in case of necessity, break open any doors or enclosure preventing their or his access thereto without being liable to any action or prosecution for trespass or otherwise.”

Now that clause was a gross violation of the rights of property, and alone ought to justify the House in rejecting the Bill. Further, how was that work to be done, and how were the philanthropic individuals who were to have power vested in them to perform these acts of violence and daring to be adequately rewarded? Why, they were to be remunerated out of the pockets of the people. And that was distinctly laid down by the 12th section—

“All expenses incurred by the Commissioners for the purpose and in pursuance of the provisions of this Act shall be paid by the Treasury out of moneys to be provided by Parliament for the purpose.”

Now, this was a principle against which he must emphatically protest. If these extraordinary demands were to be made on the Chancellor of the Exchequer to meet the “reasonable,” but somewhat philanthropic, views of every hon. Member of the House, his right hon. Friend would have some difficulty in making the interesting statement they were expecting to hear to-morrow. He should now turn for a moment to make the inquiry, What satisfaction could it be to anybody to make a discovery similar to the one they read of as being made recently in Ancient Etruria? When a tomb was broken into, the first man entering saw a soldier clad in all his armour and lying but owing to that unnecessary and ruthless intrusion that peaceful soldier, who had probably lain for many years in that condition, having, probably, earned a soldier's death, it might be a hero's burial, immediately on being exposed to the outer air crumbled into dust. Although he had no ancient monuments belonging to himself on his property, yet he had a few ancient barrows, amounting in number to 16; but, thanks to the kind exertions of the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone and some of his friends to whom he (Sir Charles Legard) gave leave in an unguarded moment to dig up and explore these barrows, and to pic-nic around them, nothing now remained but unsightly mounds, and nothing was discovered but a few slumbering bones, which he should have thought might well have been allowed to rest in peace. If the Bill was allowed to become the law of the land, they could not tell where the ravages of mediæval curiosity-mongers would stop, and unless cremation took the place of burying our dead in churchyards, there was nothing to prevent, but, on the contrary, every reason to fear that the tombs of our forefathers and of ourselves would be neither safe nor sacred. He could not but believe that wherever there was an ancient monument which was worthy of preservation either for its beauty or its antiquity, it would be safely and proudly preserved by those to whom it belonged. He could say, with perfect confidence and knowledge, of three beautiful and ancient abbeys in Yorkshire—Bolton, Fountains, and Rivaux—that they were worthily, anxiously, and proudly preserved by their respective owners; and he felt that such a proposition as was contained in the Bill would be regarded almost as an insult to the spirit and enterprize of private persons who inherited these ancient monuments. It appeared to him that the hon. Members whose names were on the back of this Bill did not consider when they were framing it the feeling of indignation which must be excited in the mind of every person who had an ancient monument in his possession, and who had, like his ancestors before him, spared neither care nor cost in its preservation. He begged to call attention to a very remarkable feature in that Bill—the Duchy of Cornwall was exempted from its operation. Why was it exempted? For a very good reason—that leave was refused to include it in this Bill of interference. Surely, if this Bill was not considered desirable for the Duchy of Cornwall, there was nothing to make them believe that it would confer any advantage on the rest of the United Kingdom. It was on these grounds that he moved its rejection, not on the simple ground of its being a Bill to preserve ancient monuments, but because it infringed in no slight degree upon a law which had prevailed through all ages and throughout the length and breadth of Her Majesty's dominions as one of the most valued and important, and that was the law of trespass. He opposed the Bill because he believed it to be unnecessary, an invasion of the rights of private property, and in no way conducing to the interests of an advanced and advancing civilization.

With his martial cloak around him ;”

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY, in seconding the Amendment, said, the Bill ought to be rejected at once and decisively. While the Bill recited that it was expedient to make provision for the preservation of certain ancient national monuments, and constituted Commissioners for that purpose, to be called the Ancient National Monuments Commissioners, there was no mention in the 3rd clause of national monuments, but any which the Commissioners thought proper were to come under the provisions of the Bill. The Stones of Shap were to be preserved; but Shap was a very stony place. Then there were certain tombstones with crosses which were also to be preserved, but they scarcely deserved the name of national monuments. In fact, the greater part of what were called national monuments in the Schedule to the Bill were not worthy of the name. The hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) who moved the second reading had said that the Bill, with the exception of one or two words, was the same as the Bill of last year; but in the Bill of last year there was a definition of "monuments;" that definition had disappeared from the present measure, which was by no means improved by the alteration made in it—on the contrary, it had been made worse. Extraordinary powers were to be conferred upon the Commissioners. They were to be able to apply the Act to whatever they might think constituted an ancient monument and 50 yards of the land on every side of it; and it being well-known that antiquaries were bad men of business, a saving clause was inserted to prevent them suffering the consequence of any informality they might commit. Now, the Devil's Dyke, near Newmarket, stretched for miles and miles across the country, and under this clause the Commissioners would become possessed of a very large estate. The University of Oxford was not allowed to hold lands of greater annual value than £10,000; but the Commissioners under the Bill were to have an unlimited licence to hold land in mortmain. Surely these were very extraordinary powers. What was most astonishing about the Bill was that the hon. Baronet proposed to exclude from its operation such places as Tintern, Fountains, and Furness Abbeys; and why? Because he knew very well that the Bill was not needed for their preservation. But if not needed for those places, for what places was it needed? It was said there were Celtic monuments which ought to be preserved. England was once inhabited by barbarians—he would not call them our ancestors, but our predecessors—who stained themselves blue, ran about naked, and practised absurd, perhaps obscene, rites under the mistletoe. They had no arts, no literature; and when they found time hanging heavily on their hands, they set about piling up great barrows, and rings of stones. Were these the monuments which the hon. Baronet was about to preserve? And, in order to do so, was he going to force the owners of property to defend their rights? There was another point. Penalties were imposed under the Bill, but those penalties were insinuated, not specified, and therefore the persons affected would not know what liabilities they would incur by defending their property. If the measure should get into Committee, he would move an Amendment which would enable people to know what penalties they might be subjected to. The hon. Baronet had also given the Commissioners power to break open doors, to take gates off hinges, and so on. Surely that was a monstrous proposal. Another point was, that the land taken by the Commissioners was to be exempt from rates. That was a matter upon which the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) would probably have a word to say. It was also proposed that when a corporation was intending to conduct, it might be, some sanitary operation for the public benefit, the antiquaries should have three months to make up their minds whether their crotchets were to be preferred to the public utility. He thought he had shown sufficient reasons why this Bill should not pass.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Sir Charles Legard.)

MR. BERESFORD HOPE begged to assure the hon. Baronet the Member for Scarborough (Sir Charles Legard) that he felt very much concerned for the state of alarm into which he was thrown by the Bill, and under the influence of which he had moved its rejection. What startled the hon. Member most was the invasion of all principles of property, not to say the Communistic doctrine which was established, when a man by agreement or sale allowed another to break in his gate; and the man, who had bought this power, exercised it; to make a grievance out of this, proved how entirely the Bill could be misconceived, for the power was only to be acquired with the express sanction of the owners, and no possible harm could be inflicted on the unwilling. He would tell the hon. Member that he should not prevent any man from breaking in his (Mr. Beresford Hope's) door, if by agreement or sale he had allowed the man to do so. But the hon. Member had also a crow to pluck with his hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock), because he had permitted him and some other gentlemen to dig into his 16 tumuli; and, after all, found there no British chieftains sleeping in their panoply of gold, but only a few bones, which they did not take away, but left where they found them. He (Mr. Beresford Hope) must express his regret that nothing more interesting was found, for otherwise he was convinced that so enlightened a Gentleman as the hon. Member for Scarborough would have had the antiquities placed in the British Museum. As to the dread of pic-nics to be held by the future Commissioners or antiquaries, he (Mr. Beresford Hope) would undertake to move in Committee that no pic-nic by them should take place within 50 yards of any tumulus. He must now turn to the noble Lord the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Lord Francis Hervey), the comic muse of the occasion, with regard to whom, should he so desire it, he (Mr. Beresford Hope) would also promise that the word "national," which the noble Lord so much disliked, should be struck out in Committee. The noble Lord had also found materials for some very transcendental merriment in the assumption that because it contained monumental stones, therefore, Shap was a stony place. But he (Mr. Beresford Hope) did not see what there could be in the stones of Shap to stimulate the jocosity of his noble Friend. His noble Friend had asked, why not include mediæval monuments like Tintern, Fountains, and Furness? The answer to this question was twofold. Regarding the matter from the actual standpoint, the immediate object of the Bill was to preserve monuments which possessed great, if not unique, value for the antiquarian and the historian quite incommensurate with their architectural pretensions. There was now-a-days little fear that any existing remains of mediæval art would be ruthlessly tampered with while mounds and unhewn stones of an earlier time invited the destroyer. But there had been a time, not so far back, when such a statute as the present Bill, applicable to those antiquities, might have saved many architectural treasures which had now been irretrievably sacrificed. Under the protection of an Ancient Monuments Act, half Glastonbury Abbey would not have been carted away to mend the roads, nor would the steward have unroofed Bayham Priory Church to repair the farmhouses; nor was it so many years since a noble Friend of his, who, asking an Archæological Congress to examine a neck of ancient dyke in his park, found his bailiff busy levelling it. His noble Friend had ridiculed the ancient inhabitants of this island. Taking the admirable historical details which he had found in Mrs. Trimmer and Mrs. Markham, he had described them as nasty savages painted blue, seated under the mistletoe, and practising obscene rites—and had asked, what did we want to know about such people? But he would remind his noble Friend that that was not the spirit in which a man, with his antecedents, should deal with the Bill. His noble Friend might play at ignorantism, but everyone knew that he was a man of culture and academical distinction, and such artificial posturing was helpful neither to his own reputation, nor to the success of the cause on behalf of which he was appearing. The word “prehistoric” had become a misnomer. We were going backward and backward in history—not centuries merely, but thousands and thousands of years—and problems of infinite importance to the antiquary, the historian, and the religionist—whatever his religion might be—were being solved by the inductions of an ever increasing array of specimens. We were bound to promote the development of those studies, and the way to do so was not to banter about sitting under the mistletoe, blue paint, or obscene rites. His noble Friend had made his jokes, and the House had laughed with him, and it was now time for him, and for the House, to regard the Bill seriously, and face the ugly fact that if some such measure were not placed upon the Statute Book, our country would lag behind any other civilized nation in its respect for its inheritance of national antiquities. If the House was dissatisfied with any of the details of the Bill, let them give it at least a second reading, and it could then be referred to a Select Committee, who no doubt would amend them.

MR. RAIKES said, he was sorry to have to ask the House to descend from the high ground taken by the hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope), and to invite its attention to a practical view of the Bill. He did not question the propriety of some steps being taken to preserve ancient monuments; but felt it his duty to bring to the notice of the House one or two features in the measure which he feared would place them in considerable difficulty. Being connected with the Private Business of the House, he wished to point out that under Clause 4 it would be possible for the rights of property to pass from the owner without either purchase or agreement. Supposing a gentleman to be possessed of the site of an extensive Roman camp, he might at present do what he liked with it; he might build upon it, alter its level, or exercise any of the rights of a private owner with regard to it. But after this Bill passed, he would cease to possess those powers, and if, disregarding the prohibitions contained in the measure, he injured, or permitted to be injured, a monument or part of a monument, he would be held to have acted in contravention of this provision. Was not that a very serious interference with proprietary rights? Standing Order No. 13 with respect to Private Bills provided that if it were intended to apply for powers of compulsory purchase of land, the Bill should specify such provision and notice should be served. But what notice was to be served on persons whose property was affected by this Bill? There might be gentlemen in distant parts of the country, say in Scotland or Ireland, who owned such monuments and who never heard of this Bill, and if, after its passing, they did anything which the Commissioners might disapprove, they would act in violation of its provisions and thus bring themselves under the power of restraint which the Commissioners would acquire by the Bill. A person so acting would be subject to the penalties provided by the 8th clause, which would bring him within range of the Act punishing persons for committing malicious injury. And not only did the Bill interfere in a manner never before attempted in this country with private rights, but it made a man a misdemeanant for the exercise of certain rights which attached to possession of property. That was a serious proceeding, which he hoped the House would not for one moment sanction. However desirable the objects of the measure might be, they should be effected in a legitimate manner, and if we were going to interfere with proprietary rights, we must be prepared to pay for them, and not endeavour to come round them in this circuitous manner. There was a curious reflection suggested by one or two of the later provisions of the Bill. It proposed to make use of the provisions of the National Defence Act. But it should be remembered that that Act was passed for the greatest possible occasion, and it gave to the Government of the day certain extreme powers, the exercise of which they were to accompany in all cases with compensation. But this Bill proposed to put the machinery of that Act in use at the discretion of the Commissioners, who were private persons—the Master of the Rolls, the President of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, the Duke of Devonshire, and other persons more or less distinguished. If the principles which had hitherto governed the transaction of business in that House affecting the rights of private individuals were still to prevail, it was impossible that the Bill should pass in its present form; and even supposing it to pass in any shape most distantly approaching its present form, the House would have to seriously re-consider its Standing Orders, for the Bill would cause a revolution in that system of procedure to which the country was thoroughly accustomed. Without wishing for a moment to question the decision of the Speaker that this was a public Bill, he (Mr. Raikes) must point out that it was of the character of a private Bill so far as it touched upon private property; and should it be read a second time, he must move that it be referred to a hybrid Committee, one portion of which would be nominated by the House, and the other by the Committee of Selection, and that power should be given to the persons whose property was scheduled in the Bill to appear by counsel and be heard before the Committee. He, however, would recommend the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) to take a step which he was sure was more convenient, and which would commend itself to the good feeling of the House, by withdrawing the Bill in its present form, and seeking to legislate in a manner more consistent with the Rules of the House and the rights of Her Majesty's subjects.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER thought the suggestions of the hon. and learned Member for Chester (Mr. Raikes) very valuable to his hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) and the House, but he could hardly agree with him in considering this as a purely private Bill. The object of his hon. Friend was a public one, and the Bill might be considered strictly in the light of a public Bill. He sought the aid of Parliament in carrying out a public object. The Bill did not interfere with the private rights of property any more than the Artizans Dwellings Bill and other Bills of that character. [Mr. RAIKES said, the Bill did not refer to the rights of specified individuals.] No; but it might apply to the whole Kingdom. He thought if the Bill were sent, after the second reading, to a Select Committee, the difficulty pointed out by the hon. and learned Member might be met by alterations in clauses so as to secure the rights of property. At the same time, he must say this was a case in which they might strain the rights of property too much. It was quite fair that the possessor of a monument, if not rich or patriotic enough to set it apart for preservation, should be compensated by the public, but he could not admit his vested right to destroy it. Clause 3 gave power to extend the Bill to monuments similar to those in the Schedule which were of Celtic and Druidical origin, but he wished its scope had been wider; and he might mention a very remarkable case in Cornwall, in which the necessity of some such enactment was painfully manifest. He alluded to a very ancient church supposed to be the first erected after the establishment of Christianity in this country. For hundreds of years it had been buried in the sand, but now that the sand had been blown away, so complete and wanton was the destruction, that almost every vestige of the church had disappeared. There was an old graveyard round it where many of the pilgrims were buried, and as their bones were laid bare people came and took them away. He hoped the House would not ask his hon. Friend to withdraw the Bill; and, on the other hand, he would recommend the hon. Baronet to accept the proposal to treat the Bill as a hybrid Bill, and see whether it could not be so altered as not to interfere with any legitimate rights of private property.

Mr. HENLEY thought it most important to inquire whether any notice had been given to the 70 persons who were interested in the monuments scheduled to the Bill. He was extremely glad that the objection had been taken by the hon. and learned Member for Chester (Mr. Raikes); for he (Mr. Henley) did not recollect having ever seen a Bill drawn—he hardly liked to apply the term which it really deserved—in so delusive a style. It first of all scheduled a particular number of monuments, as far as he could understand, without any notice or warning being given to the persons interested in the ground on which they stood, and then it was proposed to apply the Bill to any other objects of a similar character they might think fit, and in regard to which it gave an appeal, but there was no power of appeal in the first case. What justice could there be in such a proposal? It seemed to him the Bill ought to be dealt with as a private Bill, with proper notices to those affected by it, so as to enable them to state their objections. He thought such monuments as the Bill referred to should be taken care of and preserved, but for that purpose they ought not to be guilty of injustice to the owners of the property on which those monuments stood, and to avoid that he should be glad to see a measure drawn in a better form substituted for the measure before them.

Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN supported the Bill because he believed it sought to attain a great public object at the smallest possible sacrifice of private convenience. He admitted the high authority of the hon. and learned Member for Chester (Mr. Raikes), who had taken the objection that the Bill came within the 13th Standing Order, requiring notice to be served on those whose property was affected by it. But the hon. and learned Gentleman had himself suggested the answer to that objection, and it had been supplemented by the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), who justly urged that this measure, although unquestionably dealing with private rights, was a measure of public policy, and for that reason ought to be dealt with as a public Bill and not as a private one. With respect to what had been said as to the rights of private property, he (Mr. Osborne Morgan) contended that these monuments were part of our national history, and as such were in a certain sense national property, and ought to be in the care of the nation quite as much as the monuments which were housed in our museums. Experience, however, had shown that when they left these memorials of history to the tender mercies of their owners they fast disappeared. He respected as much as anyone the rights of private property; but the objection to this Bill—that it interfered with such rights—appeared to him to spring from a respect to the rights of property run mad, for the Bill treated private owners with the greatest tenderness. It was one thing to interfere with an owner's right of enjoyment, which the Bill did not, and another with his right of destruction, which the Bill did, but only to the extent of not allowing him to destroy or deface ancient monuments without serving notice on the Commissioners requiring them either to purchase the whole of the property or the right to sell; and for that he would be amply paid. No doubt, in a certain sense, that involved the right of a man to do what he thought fit with his property; but so did every Railway Bill when a great public object was to be attained, and in such instances they were obliged to sacrifice the convenience or the rights of private individuals. If, however, the House thought the measure might be improved, then let them agree to the second reading, and afterwards refer the Bill to a Select Committee to insert such safeguards as might be deemed necessary. As to the objection that the Bill would saddle the public with some small expenses, the House had freely voted sums of money for observing the Transit of Venus, and for an Expedition to the North Pole; and he would urge that liberality of that kind should like charity begin at home. But if they could not get public money, they were willing to raise private subscriptions in order to carry out the objects of the Bill.

LORD ELCHO said, he should support the second reading of the Bill as an affirmation of the principle that these ancient monuments were valuable records, and that it was the legitimate duty of the House of Commons to endeavour to preserve them for the nation. It might be open to the objections stated by the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), and the hon. and learned Member for Chester (Mr. Raikes), but, speaking for himself, he would say, if he thought it were intended to be an invasion of the rights of private property, no man would resist such an invasion more than he would. He resisted the Irish Land Bill, which he had seen it stated had, according to the late Sir John Gray transferred £80,000,000 of property from the landlord to the tenant; and why did he resist it?

Because for the first time legislation was passed through that House dealing with private property without compensation. He found nothing of the kind, however, in this Bill, neither did he think it was so intended. The Bill might seek to apply compulsion, like the Land Clauses Act in the case of railways, roads, or fortifications; but it had in it the great principle of compensation to private owners, where property was taken possession of for the purposes of the State. It was a Bill not to invade the rights of property, or to revolutionize the way in which the State dealt with it, but simply to preserve ancient monuments. If that was carried out in a way the House did not approve of, they could set matters right in Committee. He was the son of the owner of one of those old Roman camps in the south of Scotland which were regarded with so much interest; but it was with the greatest difficulty that they had prevented it being swept away. The same thing had also occurred in regard to Cæsar's Camp at Wimbledon, part of which had been laid out for building purposes, and it stood a chance of being blotted out of the features of the country. With regard to public monuments, the State had admitted the principle of dealing with them. In his own county, on his (Lord Elcho's) application, the Treasury had sanctioned the expenditure of £400 in the preservation of a fine old abbey church, and £1,000 for a similar expenditure in Montrose, and he was anxious to see some such measure become the law of the land. The noble Lord who had seconded the Amendment had spoken sneeringly regarding what he called ancient stones with crosses, &c., upon them, but possibly some of those very stones might, like the Moabite Stone, be found important links and lights in the history of the world and civilization.

MR. RODWELL must say that, having read the Bill with great care and consideration, he looked upon it as a measure at variance with the Standing Orders of the House, and which proposed to deal with the rights of private property and the rights of individuals in a manner that could not be justified. He did not, however, intend to import his professional opinions into the discussion; but he must say, if ever there was a Bill which came within the category of Private Bills, it was this Bill, which would compel a man to part with his property against his desire and without his consent in certain alternative cases. He should like to ask the hon. Member who introduced the Bill (Sir John Lubbock), and those hon. Gentlemen who supported it, whether the Bill was not a departure from the principle which required notice to be given to the owners of private property, when it was proposed to give power to obtain possession of it? The hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) admitted that no notice was required to be given. He (Mr. Rodwell) would ask the hon. Member who brought forward the Bill to bear in mind the consequences that would result from such a power. He must say that the grounds put forward for such a Bill had been greatly exaggerated; and he ventured to say that it was a measure which was at variance with the functions of Parliament, and with the principles which governed Parliament in dealing with the rights of property and the rights of individuals. He wished to know why the usual practice, whether in the case of one individual or a thousand, that a private person should have notice of the intention to deal with his property should be departed from in this matter? Some 50 or 60 persons might have their rights infringed without being consulted on the subject at all. For his own part, he believed the hon. Gentleman who brought forward this Bill had overlooked the consequences which would result from its operation, and he was surprised to hear the hon. Gentleman say that, as far as related to the expense involved, it would be a trifling matter altogether, not more than a few hundred pounds. Why, under this Bill as it stood, even the owner of Stonehenge parting with that ancient historical monument and having to be compensated for it, his compensation could not be valued at a few hundred pounds. And further than that, every borough Member might be pressed to bring forward the claims of particular localities, the result of which would be that, if the Bill passed, it would be difficult to estimate the expense that would attend its operation; and, looking at it in a financial point of consideration, it would, in his opinion, prove so costly in reference to the national funds that his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer might well say, in answer to applications for remission of taxes, that the pressure upon the national resources was so great that he could not afford to comply with these requests. He therefore hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone would withdraw the Bill, and bring in a large measure to deal not only with those particular monuments, but others equally interesting—namely, the abbeys and ruins generally, which were valued by the country quite as much as these monuments of antiquity. He regarded the preservation of these as a matter of great and serious importance, and he would suggest that a body of Commissioners should be empowered by Parliament to make agreements and arrangements with the owners of property, who might hand it over to them, and thus the objects sought by the Bill might be attained without doing violence to the feelings of individuals or the practice of Parliament. He must again submit that the Bill was a departure from the practice of Parliament in dealing with private property, which was that notice should be given to the owners of such property, and looking at the Bill as a measure which, if passed, would operate injuriously, he hoped the House would not agree to the second reading.

MR. LAW said, there were many ancient monuments in Ireland, and some in the county he represented, which, though not mentioned in the Schedule to the Bill, he hoped might yet be brought under the operation of the 3rd clause. He was of opinion that the measure was not open to any of the objections urged against it. It did not in any substantial degree interfere with the rights of private property. It did not propose to transfer any property from landowners to the Commissioners, but merely to provide that when an owner wished to exercise his right of property in an ancient monument by its destruction, he should not be permitted to do so without first giving the Commissioners an opportunity of buying it from him. The Bill sought to carry out a very desirable object with all possible fairness; and he submitted the proper course would be to read it a second time, and let matters of detail be considered in Committee. It appeared to him that the opposition to the Bill was somewhat unreasonable; nor did its opponents at all agree amongst themselves as to the grounds of their objections. Some said it went too far; others that it did not go far enough. One hon. Member would let all these ancient monuments be swept away; others desired their preservation, but thought that should be entrusted to the proprietors. Some urged that the measure should have been promoted as a Private Bill, others that it was of such national importance that it should be left to the Government to undertake. Now, probably the real ground of all those various objections was simply the fear of some invasion of the rights of property. Let them, then consider whether the Bill would interfere with the rights of private property. In his opinion, it would not. It was an entire misapprehension to allege, as had been done, that its object was to transfer the property of owners to the Commissioners without the owners' consent; the Bill would do nothing of the kind. As long as the owner forbore to exercise his right of property in a monument by destroying it, he would be wholly untouched by the Bill. So far, indeed, from being a measure of spoliation, its effect would be that an owner who had on his estate an ancient monument might go to the Commissioners armed with a certain amount of power to influence them, by threatening to destroy the monument, unless it should be purchased on his own terms. Well, the Commissioners would be ready to buy it from him, and to pay him a fair price for it. The object of the Bill being to preserve the ancient historical monuments of the country, surely it ought to be sanctioned by Parliament. When it was said that the Bill did not go far enough towards providing sufficient funds to effect its purpose, the answer was that the promoters were ready to accept it as it was, trusting to the bounty of Parliament and of the public outside to supply such means as would be required. If the Bill did not satisfy hon. Members, of course they could introduce clauses to enlarge its scope in Committee. It appeared to him that the technical objections expressed by some opponents of the Bill had been most completely answered by the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan). It had been ruled two years ago that the Bill was a public Bill; and it certainly seemed to him to be quite as much so as the Artizans Dwellings Bill, which authorized the taking of land for its owners, or the Irish Salmon Fisheries Act, which a few years ago confiscated valuable fishery rights of individual owners, some of whom had purchased in the Landed Estates Court. He hoped those hon. Members who objected to the Bill would withdraw their opposition to it, seeing that the objects which it had in view were admitted by almost all to be so desirable.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the Bill proposed to deal with three classes of ancient monuments — first, those specified in the 1st Schedule to Bill; secondly, British, Celtic, Roman, or Saxon remains, or any other monuments which, in the opinion of the Commissioners, were of the like kind as those those mentioned in the 1st Schedule; and, thirdly, it was proposed that the Commissioners should be empowered to obtain possession of any monuments which they could procure by the consent of the owners of the property. There could be little difference of opinion as to the desirability of preserving ancient monuments, and, as far as the Preamble went, it had his cordial support; but it appeared to him that every clause of the Bill was either itself an invasion of the rights of property, or depended for its efficacy upon some other clause which would interfere with such rights. However desirable and excellent the object of the Bill might be—and he was ready to add that the object which it sought to accomplish was good—he was unable to assent to the second reading, for, as the Bill was at present framed, all its provisions appeared to him objectionable, and he had not as yet heard any suggestions which led him to suppose that the Bill could be amended so as to satisfactorily carry out that object. It was proposed to interfere with the rights of the owners of the various properties specified in the 1st Schedule; and surely such persons ought to have an opportunity of knowing what the provisions of the Bill were, and of expressing their views on the subject; but they had had no such opportunity, and if this observation applied to the owners of the monuments scheduled to the Bill, how much more did it apply to the owners of those that were not named? He would admit, however, that the question was one well worthy the attention of the House, if a proper measure were brought forward on the subject. He did not propose to deal with the question of finance; he left that to his right hon. Friend near him; but it appeared to him that they were interfering with the rights of property in a manner which, if once sanctioned, he (the Attorney General) did not know where they were to stop. It might be very desirable that the nation should possess the best pictures and statues, and other works of art, many of which were quite lost to the public from being in private collections, or might be lost to the public from being sold and sent abroad; or coins of great value, as illustrating history; but would they justify the acquisition of them in such a compulsory manner as that now proposed?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the Bill appeared to be one for the preservation of ancient national monuments. It was wonderful to see how some hon. Members sank all their ordinary principles whenever one of their peculiar hobbies was affected. Even the hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope), for an object connected with art and learning, became a Communist, put on the red cap, and said that private property was nothing to him; and the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) had said things which would astonished Mr. Arch or anyone else at a farmers' Club. Suppose, however, the proposition had been one to make agricultural improvements with the view of providing more food for the people, and it became necessary to interfere with the right of entail, and become a disentailing Bill, would the hon. Member and the noble Lord have been so ready to interfere with the rights of landowners? They should recollect that the Bill gave power to the tenant-for-life to cut off the entail, and it was, therefore, a disentailing Bill. The great temptation, however, to vote for the Bill was the precedent it would afford for proposing an Amendment in an interesting Bill which was passing through the House of Lords; and, at all events, when this House came to discuss the tenure of land, he should be glad of assistance in imposing restraints on landowners who held land in such a way as to be injurious to the public interests. His noble Friend was fond of æsthetics, and ought to have been ready to forego the sacredness of contracts, if the object in view were to preserve Cæsar's Camp at Wimbledon. He (Sir William Harcourt) rather rejoiced over the conversion of the hon. Member and the noble Lord to the principle, that when it was desirable for the interests of the public, the rights of private property should be interfered with. He himself thought it justifiable for objects which affected the whole interests of the nation; and he did not agree with hon. Gentlemen who said they had no right to interfere with the rights of property, or what was called the freedom of contract, which very often meant a very different thing altogether—namely, contracted freedom. He was in favour of interference for justifiable objects and on great occasions; but, even if it were said it was a lawyer's prejudice, he was not in favour of such interference for fanciful reasons, although he might sympathize with the objects sought to be attained. In this case, he was not willing for mere æsthetic reasons to give such dangerous powers as were embodied in the Bill; for he had never seen any proposal which went half so far in the way of interfering with property as the present Bill did. Practically, it gave unlimited powers of restraining persons from doing what they liked with their property from considerations of an æsthetic character. The House of Commons undoubtedly had large powers; but he thought it never appeared to less advantage, and there was nothing more to be deprecated than that the House should resolve itself into a Committee of Taste. However, he did not rise so much to discuss the Bill as to express the pleasure he felt at the views on property laid down by the hon. Gentleman and the noble Lord to whom he had referred.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that as the son of a Commissioner named in the Bill, he desired to say that the objections to the Bill were based upon complete exaggeration. If an owner of an ancient monument was not going to injure it, but, on the contrary, would take every care of it, the Bill did not apply. All that the Bill called upon the Commissioners to do was to watch the monuments named in it, and only to act when the owners proposed to injure any of them. Would any hon. Gentleman say it was not within the province of Parliament to interfere with the proprietor of a monument like Stonehenge, if he tried to pull it down? Again, it had been said that such a Bill as this ought to have been brought in by the Government. Surely the country would not grudge a few hundreds of pounds to be spent for the purposes of the Bill, although he did not think that they would have to spend one shilling, because sufficient money would be found by private persons. Why, the people of the United States of America would be glad to buy the monuments which the people of England, it was suggested, would grudge the money to purchase. Some persons held that they might wait; but the Society of Antiquaries had stated authoritatively that those monuments were disappearing every day. That observation, however, did not apply to monuments of which the proprietors might be supposed to take care; but some of the monuments—many of which were at the roadside—were suffered to be injured by tourists. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had referred to the question of pictures as being analogous; but was there any owner of a valuable picture who would not take care that it should be carefully preserved? The House had already once assented to its principle without a division, and he hoped it would now do so again, and then send it before a Select Committee.

LORD ELCHO wished to make one word of explanation. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for the City of Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) had misunderstood his argument. He had expressly guarded himself against approving of the mode in which the objects of the Bill were proposed to be carried out, and confined himself to supporting an affirmation of the principle that ancient monuments were worthy of preservation. He found in the present Bill one principle that was not found in measures like the Irish Land Bill, the principle—namely, of giving compensation for land taken.

MR. WHALLEY said, the objections urged against the Bill by the hon. Mover and Seconder of the Amendment must have appeared to anyone who heard them inadequate and invalid. He believed it had been said that the object of the Bill might be effected by Provisional Orders to be made in necessary cases, but he feared that mode of proceeding would be most futile, if not discreditable. The question was, whether they should preserve those ancient monuments of history which were becoming increasingly precious; and what he would venture to point out was, that the question here involved was whether or not the nation should preserve those memorials of the early history of Britain on behalf of that portion of the community who believed that for centuries past those monuments had been subjected to intentional destruction. There was a large portion of the public who thought it was of the utmost importance to see preserved those monuments which were calculated to dispel such absurd, such wilful, and such deliberate ignorance of the early history of this country as that displayed by the noble Lord the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Lord Francis Hervey) who seconded the Amendment. The noble Lord spoke of the ancient inhabitants of the country as little removed from a race of cannibals; but he had suppressed the fact that it had been at all times considered of the utmost importance that we should endeavour to excavate the monuments of their heroism from those cumuli which had in the course of time become heaped upon them. These monuments were like milestones—they marked the progress of our national history. Why should the noble Lord have presumed to speak as he had that day spoken of the early inhabitants of England? Did he not know that Shakespeare had devoted the best efforts of his genius to illustrate what occurred in our history five centuries at least before the Christian era? Did he not know that Bacon, speaking of the secular history of the country—that Fortescue and others, speaking of our legal history, attributed our claims to be considered the mother of nations not to our wealth, not to our trade, not to our commerce, or to any adventitious circumstances of the kind, but to the indigenous character of the British people? He (Mr. Whalley) wished to repel all such attacks upon our national history; but he regretted to say that there was an influential literary party connected with the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, gentlemen who were the natural successors of the monks, who thought it necessary, in order to sustain the superstructure which they themselves had raised, that the memorials of our early history should be put out of sight and destroyed. Their motto was Delenda est Carthago. That strong and influential party deemed it necessary to destroy, leaving to the plough and to the course of time to complete the destruction of those physical monuments which confounded their own theories of ecclesiastical history. Some years ago a Bill was before the House for the destruction of some of the London churches, and among those scheduled in that Bill was the Church of St. Swithin, a church within which was placed a most valuable monument of our early history, and which was called "London Stone," about which centred the memories of our history for ages past. He, however, interfered, and the result of his interference was the preservation of that church and that monument, about which the old feeling of the country was, that if it were once removed the greatness and power of England would for ever disappear. Why, the greatest claim which Her Majesty had to the reverence of her subjects was that she was the lineal representative of the oldest dynasty in the world, a dynasty which had been in existence for more than 1,500 years before the Christian era. What he had now stated might 'be new and surprising to hon. Members; but those monuments afforded them the means of investigating those claims, and all that was interesting in the history of our nation, and for that reason he did hope the House would agree to give this Bill a second reading. The objection that it interfered with the rights of private property might be dealt with in the Provisional Orders, so that the Commissioners could not take into their hands any property without the direct sanction of Parliament.

Mr. BENTINCK said, that the statement of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) showed how, in their anxiety to carry this Bill, its supporters lost sight of both its vexatious character and of its injustice. He (Mr. Bentinck) thought that while all would agree with the Preamble of the Bill as to the desirability of taking steps to preserve our national monuments, the mode in which the Bill itself proposed to attain that object was open to question. Indeed, it might be said of it, that old proverb—"You should not do wrong that right may come." The proposal of the Bill involved the heavy charge against the owners of land on which ancient remains stood of a desire to destroy them; but he concurred with the hon. Baronet the Member for Scarborough (Sir Charles Legard), that the majority of the owners of such ruins were quite as anxious to preserve them as though they were compelled to prevent their destruction by Act of Parliament. He trusted that the House would look at the subject from a business, and not from a sentimental point of view. The provisions of the measure, as involving both an irritating visitation and an indefinite expense, were most objectionable, and in his opinion would be likely to lead to great litigation and endless expense, for if the details of the measure were carefully scanned, it would be found that lengthened disputes would probably arise between the owners of property and the Commissioners. It was also most unfair that the Commissioners should have an uncontrolled power to commit what had been described as burglary by daylight without the owner of the property having any power of appeal, and that the whole of the costs of this vexatious litigation should be saddled upon the latter. He also protested against the clause in the Bill that authorized the Commissioners to delegate their authority to unknown persons, on the ground that it would create doubt; and the owners of these monuments ought at least to be enabled to know who were the persons with whom they were dealing. His great objection, however, was that there was nowhere in the Bill any definition of the nature of the property to be dealt with by the Commissioners as an ancient monument. In consequence, if the Bill were passed into law extraordinary and unheard-of powers would be placed in the hands of the Commissioners. In his own neighbourhood, for instance, there was a bank, extending many miles, which was no doubt erected by the Romans to keep out the sea, and in which Roman coins might be found. In parts the bank was as perfect as when it was made, in other parts it had given way, and labourers' cottages had been erected. Under the operation of the Bill the control of the whole extent of that bank and the adjoining land, amounting to several thousand acres, would be handed over to the Commissioners. He did not believe the House of Commons would sanction the placing of any such powers in the hands of the Commissioners, and he trusted that, under these circumstances, no arguments, however specious, would induce the House to pass the Bill.

MR. FERGUSON said, that coming as he did from a district where the farm-houses, the churches, and the garden walls were built of the spoils of ancient monuments, he should support the Bill. He looked upon the measure as providing a necessary protection against the indifference, caprice, carelessness, or it might be imbecility, of the proprietors of ancient monuments. As to the question of expense, speaking from the lowest point of view, he undertook to say he did not know anything which would pay so well as the preservation of our ancient monuments, and he was satisfied that the taxpayers of this country would never object to pay a small sum annually for the preservation of these monuments of our history. There was an ever-increasing stream of visitors to this country from across the Atlantic, who came here, not to inspect our railways, our warehouses, or our docks, but to seek out in quiet nooks our ancient monuments, which were the landmarks of our common history. In times to come, when the English-speaking race should have spread itself over the greater part of the globe, and should have acquired wealth and power, the culture that wealth and civilization gave would lead it to seek for that which wealth could not purchase nor civilization create—namely, the monuments over which it could affectionately linger as the existing records of its old home in England. He thought that such a feeling was likely to conduce to the peace, security, and happiness of the world, and he was certain, as he had before observed, that such was the honourable feeling of reverence held by the working men of this country for such monuments that they would not object to the necessary expense being incurred for their preservation.

SIR HENRY PEEK said, that as one of the Conservators of Wimbledon Common he should give his hearty support to the Bill. In doing so he had to express his great gratification that so much had recently been effected in the way of securing open spaces for the recreation and enjoyment of the metropolitan public. As stated by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), he could confirm the statement that Cæsar's Camp, in the neighbourhood of Wimbledon Common was being levelled to the ground. It comprised some eight acres of land, the works on which were by antiquaries variously estimated at from 1,500 to 2,200 years old, and which he, in conjunction with some of his friends, had done their best to preserve. So anxious were they that they had offered the owner as much land on the common as an equivalent; they had offered privately to buy the property of him; they had done everything they could; but at this very time people were cutting down trees and preparing to build. It was said that the property had been let on a building lease for 90 years, at £10 an acre. He believed this to be one of the most interesting relics of which the nation was possessed, and situated, too, within eight miles of that House. A Bill like that before the House would enable them to deal with such a case; and if already law, the neighbouring gentry would have bought the property and presented it to the public, while now the monument was being destroyed before their eyes. The other day he saw a gentleman with a vase from Cyprus in his hand, which had been sold to the British Museum for £50. The acquisition of such curiosities was very desirable; but that a country like this, which spent its money by hundreds and thousands in increasing the treasures of the British Museum, should allow such interesting national monuments as Cæsar's Camp to be destroyed, he considered a great shame. For such reasons, and as a means of protecting what in a few years would have passed out of existence, he gave the Bill his cordial support.

MR. PEASE likewise supported the Bill, and in doing so remarked that while each of those who had spoken in opposition to it stated that they agreed to the Preamble, nevertheless attempted to defeat the measure. If, then, they approved of the principle of the Bill, why should not they agree to the second reading, and seek to have those matters of detail to which they were opposed rectified in Committee? Some of the most important buildings which they sought to protect stood in no man's ground, and therefore, so far as they were concerned, there could not be any invasion of the rights of property. Further, private property would under the Bill be preserved, unless the monuments were likely to be injured when, and when alone, it would come into operation. Still, he admitted that it was impossible to deal with the question without, in some degree, trenching upon those rights; but he entreated the House not to be frightened by the legal difficulties thrown in the way by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the City of Oxford (Sir William Harcourt). Not a day ought to be lost in passing it, for if such a measure as this did not become law, all our ancient monuments would undergo the process of chipping, until at last there would not be a vestige of them left. Most of the property in question, as private property, was almost worthless; whilst, as public monuments, they were things to be preserved—were priceless. He, therefore, called upon the House to preserve them not only for the benefit of the nation, but for the benefit of the whole Anglo-Saxon race in America and in the Southern hemisphere, and as a bond of amity and union between them. With respect to the cost, he would remind the House that the Commissioners could never spend more than Government itself sanctioned.

MR. W. JOHNSTON said, he rose to say a few words in this debate, in order that a voice might be heard from Ireland, on the Conservative side of the House, in favour of the conservation of her ancient monuments. In many places these were fast going to decay. It had been assumed by those who opposed the Bill that all persons who were the proprietors of ancient remains would be found in opposition to it. On his property there was a "rath" or "dun," referred to in Lewis's Topographical Dictionary. There was another near Downpatrick, included in the Schedule of the Bill; and there formerly stood, near Downpatrick Cathedral, a round tower, remarkable for the symmetry of its proportions. This tower, he regretted to say, was pulled down in 1790, in order, as was alleged, to make room for rebuilding the cathedral; but really, as he believed, in consequence of a dispute between a very reverend Dean and a noble Marquess in reference to election affairs. They had heard to-day what the Government would not do. He hoped they should hear, before the division took place, what the Government would do. He hoped that the Conservative Government would aid in the conservation of the ancient monuments of the country. At any rate, he heartily and cordially gave his vote for the second reading of the Bill.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON protested against the second reading of the Bill, because it would so largely interfere with the rights of private property. He trusted that no Government, whether Conservative or Liberal, would ever agree to the passing of a measure which sanctioned such interference. He did not think that there were many instances in which ancient monuments had been destroyed, and protection was not so much needed as some people seemed to imagine, as those who possessed really interesting ancient monuments would be anxious to preserve them, independent of other's interference. The powers which the Bill proposed to place in the hands of the Commissioners of dealing with private rights were such that he was surprised at the owners of property on either side of the House supporting it. Further, the Commissioners were not to be rated for the property which might come into their hands; a proposal which was quite inconsistent with the claims and the complaints of those who were interested in the question of local taxation. Were the House to adopt the suggestion that had been thrown out, and to read the Bill a second time with the view of amending it in Committee, they would have to expunge the measure as it stood altogether, and to make a new one, a course which he did not think was a Parliamentary mode of proceeding. Objecting in general terms to the Bill, he was opposed to it further on the ground that it proposed to deal partially with the country, and not to treat it as a whole. Why was Cornwall excluded from the operation of this Bill? If it were good for other parts of the Kingdom, it was equally good for Cornwall. He should vote against the second reading, which he hoped would be rejected by such a majority as would have the effect of deterring any further attempt at legislation in this direction.

MR. SULLIVAN, in supporting the Bill, said, that listening to the arguments which had been urged against it, one felt inclined to doubt if he lived in the 19th century. He thought the opposition to it was hardly worthy of the House, or of the age in which we lived. It was not only wilful destruction that they should guard against; but they should consider that mere neglect was constantly causing the destruction of ancient monuments. It was true that the Irish people and the Irish landowners had anticipated the Bill, and he might refer to the present condition of Muckross Abbey to show the fostering care of the Gentleman, a Member of the House (Mr. Herbert), on whose property it stood; but, sad to say, in the same county there lay neglected and falling into ruin ancient monuments which other countries would purchase with their whole wealth. The noble Lord who had supported the Amendment (Lord Francis Hervey) turned the question into ridicule, and boasted that a Celt had not been his ancestor. He (Mr. Sullivan) fully believed him, for the Celt was always influenced by a pious reverence for the past. The noble Lord asked why they should purchase such rubbish as Mr. Layard had obtained for the British Museum as evidence of Assyrian civilization, and which any skilful stonemason might, so far as art was concerned, excel; but he (Mr. Sullivan) had a respect and reverence for those monuments of the past, no matter to what country they belonged, and in the preservation of the historical memorials of those countries he hoped the House would put itself right with the sentiment of all men of culture throughout the world. The Bill would not injuriously affect private property, and he trusted that the House would assent to the second reading of it.

MR. DALRYMPLE, in support of the Bill, said, that any hon. Member entering the House for the first time during the speech of the hon. Baronet the Member for North Wiltshire (Sir George Jenkinson) would have thought some measure of spoliation was under discussion; whereas, instead of unduly interfering with the rights of property, the Bill before the House was conservative of those rights. He hoped that those who were interested in matters of taste, and had a care for works of art, among whom he did not presume to include himself, would not be deterred from bringing forward these questions by any sneers such as had been used on the present occasion by the hon. and learned Member for the City of Oxford (Sir William Harcourt). On the previous evening the same sort of tone had been adopted towards his hon. Friend the Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane), who brought on an important question of foreign affairs. Debates on foreign affairs were nearly as rare as debates on questions of art, and in neither case ought any sneers which might be levelled at the Movers of such questions to deter them from their purpose. It was most unwise needlessly to invoke the bugbear of interference with the rights of property. No person on that side of the House certainly would propose any undue interference with the rights of private property; but their ancient monuments, while in a certain sense private property, were at the same time subjects of public interest, and it was notorious that, while many of those monuments were in the hands of landowners who knew how to take care of them, there were others in the possession of persons who were totally incapable of appreciating their value, and totally regardless of their preservation. It happened that in the county he represented (Bute) there were many of those ecclesiastical remains for which the West of Scotland was particularly famous, and, thanks to the noble Lord who owned them, they were not only preserved from injury, but in many ways money was expended upon them, so that the public might have the benefit and enjoyment of visiting them. No one who watched the public Press could shut his eyes to the fact that in many parts of the country there was a danger of these ancient monuments passing away for want of due care being taken of them. But lately, in the West of Scotland, most unfortunate inroads had been made on an ancient abbey, which might have been prevented if the proprietor had had more knowledge of the high value from an antiquarian point of view of the ancient buildings which he possessed. The present Bill was a wise and moderate step in restraint of Vandalism, and he trusted that, notwithstanding the bugbear which had been conjured up of interference with the rights of property, the hon. Baronet

Mr. Dalrymple

(Sir John Lubbock) would proceed with his Bill, and that it would now receive a second reading.

COLONEL KINGSCOTE was of opinion that a more arbitrary Bill than the present had never been introduced into the House. He had just read it over as he came into the House, and to his great surprise he found it proposed in the Schedule to take out of his hands an ancient monument which was situated on his property, and that without giving him any notice whatever, and without his consent. His gates also might be removed to give access to this portion of his property. If the Bill were passed no one could be sure of being left in possession of his own property, and for the sake of that property he must oppose it.

DR. LUSH said, he rose to express his entire dissent to the hon. Baronet the Member for North Wiltshire (Sir George Jenkinson), who had expressed opinions on this subject which certainly were not those of the part of the country which he represented. He should give his hearty support to the Bill.

MR. PELL protested against it being said that if private property was to be interfered with, it should be for something of greater importance than the preservation of public monuments. Food had been instanced as one thing; but the instincts of the people would always induce them to provide food; whilst they had to preserve ancient monuments from the love of destruction which was indigenous in youth and universal to the British snob. A Bill of this kind was absolutely necessary to preserve such monuments as remained, for it should be observed that the spirit of mischief was constantly at work upon them, and tended to their destruction. In one memorable instance, that of the Logan Stone in Cornwall, when a lieutenant in the Navy had overturned it, he was made to replace it under fear of being dismissed the service, showing the interest taken by the authorities of that day in such objects. He did replace it, displaying in doing so singular energy and skill. The hon. and learned Member for the City of Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), when seated below the Gangway, was constantly engaged in defending the rights of the people—to quote the usual phrase—to the commons; but, curiously enough, he was now found opposing the rights of another section of the same people to preserve the monuments in which they took deep interest, and which were to be counted among the important historical records of the country. He should give his cordial support to the Bill.

MR. W. CARTWRIGHT in answer to the remarks of the hon. Baronet the Member for North Wiltshire (Sir George Jenkinson), said, that the object of the Bill was not to take away property, but to preserve it; and in every case where the proprietor took care of ancient monuments there would be no interference with his rights in any way. It had been said that private property should not be taken except for the purposes of public utility, but surely the preservation of these monuments was a matter of the highest public utility. He hoped that the Bill would be read a second time. Every argument against it referred to points of detail, which could be considered in Committee.

MR. MARK STEWART said, he found himself in a position somewhat similar to that of the hon. and gallant Member for West Gloucestershire (Colonel Kingscote), for until he came into the House he had no conception that property in which he had an interest was in the Schedule of the Bill, but he was not going to oppose the second reading on that ground. He approved of the principle of the Bill, and wished that it had been in operation for the last hundred years, and then they might have had preserved in that part of Scotland with which he was connected many interesting relics connected with the 3rd and 4th centuries, and many specimens of mediæval architecture, of which only slight traces now remained. He had in his mind's eye, on the property on which he lived, one of the most interesting monuments in Scotland—the earliest Christian monument—the stones on which the inscription was engraved were now the pillars to the gateway leading into an ancient burial-place—Kirkmadrine, in the parish of Stoneykirk, in Wigtownshire, and probably were now safe, but were almost the only remains left of interest on that spot, their neighbours having, no doubt, been taken at no very remote date to build some dyke, or for some such purpose. He could mention other places where now hardly any traces of remains were visible, the monuments and stones of interest having been used up in the most reckless and indifferent way, without regard to anything of the past. He had taken great interest in the ancient monuments of Scotland. He felt that the Bill did not really interfere with the legitimate rights of property, as his view was that only those who were really neglectful of the past would be brought under its operations, and that to those a fair price would be paid, in order that the ancient monuments in their possession might be handed down to posterity. On those grounds, therefore, he should cordially support it.

MR. W. H. SMITH, on behalf of the Government, strongly opposed the Bill as far as its details were concerned, although he admitted the Preamble, which affirmed the importance of preserving ancient monuments. He opposed the Bill, mainly because it proposed to constitute a very strong body of Commissioners, who were to have unlimited power to acquire ancient monuments of whatever origin—British, Roman, Celtic, or Saxon, which they might think it necessary to preserve. Another objection to the detailed provisions of the Bill was, that they would have a tendency to relieve owners of property of responsibilities which they had hitherto been called upon to discharge, and had in the main discharged faithfully and well. The provision that the owners of ancient monuments should not be permitted to allow injury to the monuments in their possession was one which no owner could fully carry out, and which would compel the owners for their own protection to apply to the Commissioners to take the monuments under their care. Representing the Treasury, he should not be prepared to assume the responsibility of framing and submitting to Parliament an estimate which would satisfy, on the one hand, the Commissioners under the Bill, and, on the other, the public whose money would have to be voted, for, in his view, the responsibility would not be measured by hundreds, but by hundreds of thousands of pounds, there being virtually no limit to the ancient objects of one kind and another which might be brought under the operation of the measure. Further, the Bill which would involve so large an expenditure of money was introduced by a private Member; and it was not proposed that either the Government of the day or that Department of it which was called the Treasury should be represented upon the Commission. It might be urged that the Government of the day would be able to check the presentation of unduly large estimates under this Bill; but he feared that a strong Commission appointed by Parliament would be one which the Government would scarcely like the responsibility of dealing with. As he had said, the Government accepted the principle of the Preamble—namely, that these monuments ought to be preserved, but they were not prepared to accept the conditions and the machinery of the measure, and if the hon. Baronet would withdraw the Motion for the second reading, he would undertake that a conference should be arranged between the promoters of the Bill and the Government in the autumn, with a view to the introduction of a measure which should have for its object the carrying out the Preamble of the Bill now before the House, with such modified details as the Government could accept and undertake to carry into effect.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, in reply, maintained that the Bill being essentially one of a public character, he had no choice but to bring it in as a public measure. The attacks that had been made on the drafting of the Bill reminded him of the old proverb, "If you have a bad case, find fault with the attorney for the other side." He took it that those who blamed the draftsman could not say much against the principle of the measure, and he thought that its supporters had reason to congratulate themselves upon the tone of the debate. The county of Cornwall was not excluded from its provisions more than any other county, but the Duchy of Cornwall for a technical reason, which he much regretted, was excluded. Many instances had occurred to show the necessity for such a measure, but, as he had already mentioned them, he had not thought it necessary on the present occasion to do so. He thought, however, it would not be denied by any one that our ancient monuments were gradually disappearing, victims of the increased value of land and the demand for road material and building stones. Now, he asked hon. Members to look at the ancient monuments in their own districts mentioned in that Bill, and tell him which of them they would see destroyed without regret. Was it Silbury Hill, the grandest sepulchral monument, perhaps, in Europe? Was it Avebury, the most remarkable of the so-called Druidical structures? Was it Stonehenge, enigmatical and unique? Was it Arthur's Round Table, or the Rollrich Stones; Kits Coty House, or Wayland Smith's Forge, dear to all readers of Sir Walter Scott? Or, turning to Scotland, was it the curious Dun of Dornadilla? Was it the Pictish Tower of Mousa, the only one, he believed, mentioned in the Sagas, and which was even now nearly perfect? Was it Sueno's Stone? or the Cat's Stane, with its inscription said to be in memory of Vetta, the grandfather of Hengist? Was it the Newton Stone, with its inscription as yet altogether unread? Was it Maeshowe, with its Runic records? or the Ring of Brogar? or the Stones of Stennis, with all their romantic associations? In Ireland, was it the Giant's Ring, near Belfast? Was it the curious fortification known as Staigue Fort? Was it the remarkable tumulus of Newgrange, with its curious decorations; was it the ruins of Teltown, or the remains of the Hill of Tara associated so intimately with the earliest of Irish records? He hoped that Bill would be rejected neither by Englishmen nor Scotchmen; and Irishmen surely would not grudge a slight and almost infinitesimal expense for the preservation of these fragments of early Irish history. Indeed the expense entailed by the measure would be very trifling, the amount, moreover, would be settled by the Treasury and controlled by the House of Commons, and it would not be necessary where there was no danger of the monuments being destroyed. Those monuments had passed through great dangers. They had been spared by Roman soldiers, by Britons, Saxons, Danes, and Normans; they were respected in our days of comparative poverty and barbarism; in these days of enlightenment and civilization, of wealth almost beyond the dreams of avarice, they were in danger of being broken up for a profit of a few pounds, or removed because they cumbered the ground. If the House allowed them to be destroyed, they could never be replaced. It was said that the Bill would interfere with the rights of property. What rights? The right of destroying interesting national monuments. That was the only right that would be interfered with. It was not incidental to the Bill, it was no drawback in the Bill, it was the very object of the measure. It was really, however, the rights of destruction, not the rights of possession, which it touched. It was now for the House to determine whether it would exercise on behalf of the nation the right to preserve those monuments; whether it would maintain the right of individuals to destroy, or the right of the nation to preserve. He hoped the House would agree to the second reading of the Bill, for it would surely be a shame and a disgrace to allow those ancient monuments to perish.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CHARLEY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that its principle was embodied in the Bills which he had introduced on the subject in 1872, 1873, and 1874, all of which had been read a second time in that House. Its object was to extend the protection of the law to young girls between the ages of 12 and 14. Was it just, was it fair, was it statesmanlike, to exclude from the protection of the law girls of so tender and critical an age. There were now young girls left at the mercy of every scoundrel who was base enough to take advantage of their youth and innocence. He believed that a large majority of the House was in favour of the principle of the measure. The 4th clause had met with some opposition, but he thought he might say that it now commanded very general assent. The 5th clause was new, and related to the seduction of, by fraudulent or false pretences, girls between the ages of 14 and 16, and it was founded on the analogy of the 49th section of the Offences against the Person Act; he thought, however, that perhaps it would be better to raise the age to 21, and abolish civil actions for seduction. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, who sympathized with the objects of the Bill, was then unable to be in his place; but he presented it to him as a humble contribution to that fabric of social reform which the right hon. Gentleman was rearing to his own honour and the advantage of the country at large.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Charley.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he did not offer any opposition to the second reading of the Bill, with the object of which he sympathized to a great extent; but he must take objection to some of its provisions, which would require consideration in Committee.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY expressed his approval of the Bill. He suggested, however, that the age of 13 should be substituted for 14 in Committee.

MR. WHITWELL was in favour of the principle of the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

BILL—(No. 39.)

(The Lord President.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Lord President.)

THE EARL OF AIRLIE said, that as in the opinion of his noble Friend who had introduced the Bill (the Duke of Richmond), there were reasons which rendered it expedient that there should be legislation of some kind on this subject, he should not say anything further on that point than that he concurred with his noble Friend. But in respect of the Bill itself, this very important question arose—namely, whether it was of such a nature as to satisfy all the reasonable requirements of the tenants, while it maintained freedom of contract; whether it should secure compensation for improvements where both landlord and tenant were willing to come within its provisions; or whether it should be compulsory, and compel both landlord and tenant to come under its operation, excluding freedom of contract altogether. Now, if the compulsory principle ought to be adopted, this Bill was worthless; but, on the contrary, if freedom of contract was to exist, then it appeared to him that there was no deficiency in the Bill which might not be amended in Committee. There were a considerable number of gentlemen who were entitled to speak with great authority on agricultural subjects, who condemned the Bill because it was not compulsory. One of those gentlemen said that because the Bill did not set aside freedom of contract and was not compulsory, it was not worth the paper on which it was printed. That gentleman, and those who acted with him, professed to represent the tenant-farmers of the country. Well, he much doubted that they did speak the opinion of the great majority of the tenant-farmers in respect of this Bill. Let their Lordships take the case of Scotland. Before Easter a deputation from the Scottish Chamber of Agriculture waited on his noble Friend opposite (the Duke of Richmond), and placed in his hands two resolutions which, he believed, had been unanimously agreed to at a meeting of that body. Those resolutions were—

"1. That if the hindrances which obstruct agriculture were effectually removed and producers were thus made safe to apply their means freely in developing the capabilities of the soil, there would be a large and rapid increase to the production of food and to the resources of the country.

"2. That if all laws of privilege and unequal presumption adverse to the producer of food were effectually taken away, there would be no need to interfere with freedom of contract."

Of course, it was very difficult to ascertain what was the opinion of the majority of the tenant-farmers; but he would remind their Lordships of a rather remarkable election in the county of Cambridge last winter. A gentleman who was said to have been brought forward by the great landlords of the country withdrew, and an hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Rodwell), who beyond all doubt was the candidate of the tenant-farmers, was returned. That hon. and learned Gentleman said that, though he was in favour of compensation, he was utterly and entirely opposed to doing away with freedom of contract;—so that the tenant-farmers in that country were not in favour of doing away with free contract. It seemed to be generally admitted that the landowners of England were not disposed to deal unjustly with their tenants. A gentleman who was one of the strongest advocates of a compulsory measure—Mr. James Howard, of Bedford—spoke the other day in terms so eulogistic of the landowners that as he was one of that body he was almost afraid to quote them. Mr. Howard told his noble Friend (the Duke of Richmond) recently that he had no indictment to bring against the landowners, and he stated on the other occasion to which he had just referred that they had done their duty nobly. But one of the arguments put forward by the advocates of compulsion was, that the presumption was now against the tenant, and that limited owners had not power to charge the land with compensation paid for improvements. The Bill before their Lordships met that argument. It altered the presumption of law in favour of the tenant who had made improvements, and it enabled the limited owner to charge the estate with the compensation paid for those improvements. Mr. Howard was reported to have made these observations in his speech at Hexham—

“He spoke rather feelingly upon this question, because some years ago he took two farms belonging to two friends of his, who were limited owners and had not the power to enter into an agreement to pay compensation. He (Mr. Howard) however drained the land 4 feet deep and 30 feet wide, and since that time one of his friends had died and the estate of the other had changed hands; so that in a year or two he had to give up the farms and he had no claims upon the owners.”

But the Bill now before them would have completely met this grievance of Mr. Howard's, inasmuch as it gave power to owners of settled estates to charge their properties in respect of compensation to tenants for improvements made by them. It was said that this Bill would be of no use because landowners would contract themselves out of its provisions. Without claiming for landowners the possession of sense superior to that of other men, he thought it fair to assume that in the conduct of their business they would be guided by their own interests; and every landowner knew that, in the long run, it was for his benefit that the tenant should have security for improvements. Such security gave the landlord a better tenant and better rent, and rent more punctually paid. The probability, therefore, appeared to him to be that instead of setting themselves to make the Bill of no effect, the great bulk of the landlords would—he did not say adopt this Bill, but set themselves to act in accordance with the spirit of those provisions in their dealings with their tenants. In saying this, he was not speaking on mere conjecture. He believed the landlords and tenants of Norfolk had lately met and agreed on a scale of compensation, which scale had been adopted in that county. A similar step had been taken in other parts of England; and if a considerable number of landlords became parties to such agreements their conduct would bring a pressure to bear upon others—for the latter would see that those who had adopted the principle of compensation got better rents. It was one thing to be in advance of a law of this kind; it was quite another thing to be behind it. He thought that those who advocated the setting aside of private contract were bound not only to show that their object would be effected in that way, but also to show that it could not be effected in any other way. He would not venture to indulge in prophecy; but it seemed to him more reasonable to suppose that landowners having a regard to their own interest would endeavour to frame agreements in accordance with the spirit of the Act, than to assume, as the advocates of compulsion did, that they would set themselves to make its provisions of no effect. Those who advocated the setting aside of private contract as between landlord and tenant had been at great pains to show what no one denied—that there were other cases in which private contract had been set aside by the Legislature. Mr. Howard referred to railways; but it must be borne in mind that railway companies came to Parliament to ask for certain powers, and Parliament said that if those powers were granted it would be on certain conditions. There Parliament imposed conditions no doubt; but the action of the railway company was voluntary from beginning to end. No one asked it to come to Parliament, and no one asked it to take the Bill if it did not wish to do so with conditions annexed. He was willing to admit that if a case were made out for Parliamentary interference with free contracts as between landlord and tenant, that interference would be justified; but he denied that such a case had been made out. Again, they were told that in this case other interests besides those of landlords and tenants ought to be consulted, because the public had an interest in the matter. He was glad to accept that issue. It would not be hard to show that compulsory legislation in reference to the relations between landlord and tenant would be injurious not only to both those classes, but to the public at large, for not only would it work injustice between the parties themselves, but it would be likely to affect the public in a way the promoters did not appear to have foreseen, and against which they had failed to guard. The Lincolnshire custom was very much held up to commendation. No doubt it worked well in Lincolnshire; and his noble Friend (the Duke of Richmond), when introducing this Bill, said that if he could have seen his way to doing so he would have been glad to have adopted it for the whole country. But his noble Friend could not see his way to doing that, and he believed that those best acquainted with the subject concurred with his noble Friend in thinking that no attempt of the kind would prove successful. The Lincolnshire custom had grown up under a system of free contract. In an interesting collection of letters written by Mr. Caird, it was shown that in Lincolnshire itself modifications had been made in the custom as it existed formerly—and that in some cases the landowners had found it necessary to limit and define it. In the case of Lincolnshire it should also be borne in mind that they had a body of arbitrators who had been trained to undertake the duties of arbitration, and a scale of compensation which was the result of long experience. They had no such body in a great part of England and Scotland; and if the Bill were made compulsory, questions of great importance would be left to the decision of arbitrators who had had no previous training. It was difficult to guard against fraud. Suppose, for instance, a tenant held two different farms lying close beside one another, and that he wanted to hold one and give up the other. He might consume feeding stuff on the one he intended to keep and charge compensation for it as against the farm he was about to surrender. He should not wish to have to act as arbitrator in such a case as that. A very curious light was thrown on this branch of the subject during the sittings of the Select Committee on Improvement of Land, presided over by the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury). Mr. Sanderson gave this evidence—

“Therefore what you know is only by hearsay? (as to the failure of drainage executed by the landowner with money borrowed from the Land Improvement Company.)—Only by hearsay. There was a case in Lincolnshire I was employed upon some years ago, where an incoming tenant was to pay a certain amount for drainage done by his predecessor. I was agent for the owner of the estate. He appealed to me that he would not pay the charge. I examined the drains; they were 16 inches from the surface and full of soil. They were never examined by the valuer who assessed the difference between the incoming and outgoing tenant.”

The other day he (the Earl of Airlie) heard of a Scotch farmer who, in reply to a person who said to him that a requirement for the production of receipts would be a check against fraudulent claims for compensation, said he knew men who would give him as many receipts as he liked for a glass of whiskey. In a letter written to The Times some time ago by Mr. Hope, who had had experience as a tenant farmer, that gentleman remarked that in the consideration of this matter the interests of the consumer ought to be regarded. That was very true. Was it for the interest of the consumer that the outgoing farmer should be over-compensated? Certainly not, because in 99 cases out of 100 the consumer paid what the incoming tenant had to hand to the outgoing one. If the incoming tenant paid too much he had the less capital to lay out on his farm. He was not speaking on this point merely from conjecture; it was well known that in the counties of Surrey and Sussex, where the customs were very onerous, the condition of agriculture was, or till a recent period had been, more backward than in any other part of England, and the reason was obvious—the incoming tenant was so burdened by the payment of exorbitant sums to the outgoing tenant, that he had but little capital left for the proper cultivation of his farm. Some gentlemen who spoke on this subject always assumed that the whole of the expenditure on a farm was made by the tenant, and that the landlord had no outlay at all. Landowners knew that not to be the fact; but he was very much afraid that if they were exposed to extravagant claims for compensation they would restrict their outlay as much as they could. Then it was to be remembered that every year men who had made money in commercial and other pursuits showed an anxiety to invest in land. He did not think that such men would continue to invest their money in land so freely as they had done hitherto if that freedom of contract, which was the life and soul of business, and to which they had been accustomed all their lives, were to be abolished by Act of Parliament. Two years ago the advocates of legislation for giving compensation did not go

so far as they did now. At that time they were content that the claim for compensation should not extend beyond improvements made with the consent of the landlord; but now they went much further, and wanted that the claim should be held good whether the landlord had consented or not. Mr. Howard was reported to have made use of these observations in his speech at Hexham—

“With respect to Clause 9, which made the previous consent of the landlord indispensable with regard to permanent improvements, it was a very natural provision for the owners to wish to see inserted in the Bill; but he was strongly of opinion that it would act disadvantageously to their interests, inasmuch as it would check the outlay in permanent improvements, and the great object of legislation was to encourage outlay on the part of the tenant in making improvements. Looking to the facts of the case, that the enjoyment by a tenant of his improvements would lessen his claim for compensation, that at the end of 20 years his claim altogether ceased—looking also to the fact that should he quit before the expiry of his lease his landlord would have the satisfaction of a valuation, and that the outlay had been of a suitable character and had added to the letting value of his holding—surely the interests of the landlord were amply secured without this proviso of previous consent.”

He would mention to their Lordships a case within his own experience. A few years ago he had occasion to let some land in the neighbourhood of Dundee. This land he knew would, before very long, be required for a reservoir in connection with a proposed supply of water to the town. He felt anxious to facilitate the object which the promoters of that scheme had in view, and, in order that he might be in a position to do so, he entered into an arrangement with the tenant to whom he was letting that he should be allowed to re-enter on the land at a short notice, and that compensation for improvements should not go beyond a certain amount. Subsequently the promoters of the water scheme did come for the land, and he was able to sell it to them at a price which certainly was satisfactory to himself, but which appeared to them to be reasonable. Now, if he had not provided against large claims for compensation, the town of Dundee might have had to pay 30, 40, or 50 per cent more than they actually did for the site of a reservoir; because the compensation would not have fallen upon him, but upon the town. But he ventured to think that a good supply of pure water for the town of Dundee was of much more importance than that a bushel or so more grain per acre should have been grown for a few years on this land. They could import any quantity of grain, but they could not import supplies of water for their great towns. There was another consideration in connection with this matter. Complaints were being made of the overcrowding in great towns; and in the other House of Parliament the Government had introduced a Bill to, in some way, remedy that state of things. But increased space would be required now and in the future, and the burdening of land with indefinite and, it might be, exorbitant charges for compensation would stand in the way of the acquisition of sites for building. It appeared to him, therefore, that from whatever point of view they looked at it—whether from the point of justice as between landlord and tenant, or from that of justice as between the incoming tenant and the outgoing one, or from that of consideration for the interests of the public—freedom of contract ought to be upheld. For those reasons he believed his noble Friend (the Duke of Richmond) was right in not proposing a compulsory measure, and in inserting safeguards against extravagant claims under this Bill. Having said so much, he wished now to submit that in one or two respects the Bill appeared to be a little one-sided in favour of the landlord. Clause 14, having described the several things which, under the Bill, should be regarded as waste, concluded with these words—

“But nothing in this Act shall prevent any act or thing not specified in the section from being deemed waste diminishing the letting value of the holding.”

That certainly appeared to be a little one-sided. Then, as to the terms at the expiration of which improvements were to be deemed exhausted, the term in the case of a house was 20 years as the Bill was now worded. Well, there was no denying that a house must be somewhat the worse after 20 years; but it might be worth something even after that period. Then, again, as to “liming,” to which the term of seven years was applied. It was stated that in some places liming was good for 14 years. As to the provision in Clause 20, giving power to the Referees and the Umpires to administer an oath, and providing that any person giving false evidence should be deemed guilty of perjury, that seemed to be a strong measure, seeing that the appeal from the Umpire was to the County Court and not to a criminal tribunal. It might, however, be right. As to the appeal, it would be from the nominee of the County Court Judge to the County Court Judge himself. He had not made those criticisms in any spirit of hostility to the Bill, but because he thought the points to which they were directed ought to be looked to by the noble Duke and their Lordships' House. With regard to the Bill as a whole, he did not think it would produce any violent or sudden change. Indeed, he did not think that even a compulsory Bill would give those who advocated it all that they expected from a measure of the kind. Some of them seemed to think, for instance, that it was a great evil that we had to exchange our manufactures for food. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) lamented that the other day at the Farmers' Club; but with great respect for his hon. and learned Friend and those other gentlemen, he had thought that one of the benefits of the repeal of the Corn Laws was to enable us to make such an exchange. He believed that the Bill would give a considerable stimulus to good farming; that the progress made under it would be steady and continuous; and that there would be no risk of that re-action which might be the consequence of a more stringent measure. For the reasons he had stated, he thought his noble Friend had exercised a wise discretion in not making the measure compulsory.

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY said, he could not say he regarded this measure with the same pleasure that had been manifested by the noble Earl who had just spoken (the Earl of Airlie). As, however, the attempt at legislation which he made last Session was pronounced by the noble Earl to be ill-timed, and by the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) to be crude, he could not but regard this Bill as a recognition that his attempt was neither so ill-timed nor so crude as it had been pronounced to be. There were only two provisions of the Bill to which he thought it necessary to draw attention, to both of which his noble Friend had already referred. The first of these was the right to appeal to the County Court from the reference to arbitration. Was not this unusual and somewhat absurd? In the Irish Land Bill arbitration and resort to a Court were given, but only as alternatives. The parties could not have both arbitration and appeal. After two men had agreed to settle their differences by the assistance of two arbitrators mutually chosen, and an umpire appointed by the arbitrators, who ever heard of an appeal? The second point, to which reference had been made by the noble Earl was this—the great difference in the Bill between the definition of deterioration and that of improvement of land. Surely Clause 6, defining "Improvements," should have a corresponding clause to the Proviso in Clause 14 equally applicable to the landlords. In Clause 14, after an enumeration of acts of waste, it seemed rather one-sided to provide that—

"Nothing in this section shall prevent any act or thing not specified in this section from being deemed waste diminishing the letting value of the holding."

The real question, however, was as to the principle of the Bill, and if it was made optional to the landlords and tenants to contract themselves out of the Bill, as was provided in Clauses 37 and 38, the statute would become a mere dead letter. From the speech made by the noble Duke when introducing the Bill, he was led to believe that the object of the Bill was to introduce a custom where a custom did not exist; but the adoption of the Bill was optional and the security illusory. He believed that with one single exception all the Chambers of Agriculture, some 30 or 40 in number, which had met during the Recess, had carried resolutions against the Bill, and there had been published a number of letters from farmers saying that the Bill was unsuitable. On the occasion of the first reading, the noble Duke, when asked why he did not give a right of appeal in the case of claims by owners of small farms, said that the man with 20 acres would never lay out a shilling that would entitle him to compensation. But did not the owners of orchards, who in many cases were the holders of only small farms, lay out money in improvements? The noble Duke, when introducing the Bill, said it would "satisfy all reasonable and moderate men." He did not concur with the noble Duke; but he believed it would satisfy reasonable landlords, who already gave their tenants as much as the Bill would afford them, and that it would also satisfy immoderate and unreasonable men who would snap their fingers at it.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON said, that if their Lordships failed to be guided to a wise decision in relation to the subject with which the Bill dealt it would not be from want of criticism on it. He had carefully considered the remarks that had been passed upon the measure by the various Chambers of Agriculture; and while he admitted that there were some parts of the Bill that required amendment, it struck him that the objections referred principally to matters which were subjects for consideration in Committee rather than on the Motion for the second reading. The extreme objection to the Bill appeared to be that it preserved the principle of freedom of contract—but that to him was the chief merit of the measure. It might, perhaps, be said that if it only maintained the principle of freedom of contract, the Bill was not wanted at all, because, as the law now stood, the landlord and tenant could make any agreement that they thought mutually beneficial. But he did not think that was quite correct. He thought it would be very advantageous that some rules should be laid down by Parliament for the guidance of landlord and tenant, and to which both parties might appeal as suggesting a fair basis for mutual agreement. But freedom of contract was the essence of the Bill, as it was of most dealings in this country. The framers of the Irish Land Bill had tried in every way to prevent freedom of contract from being introduced in that measure; but whenever an attempt was made to prevent by legislation freedom of contract, cunning was sure to step in and defeat that legislation. He was sure he should speak the opinion of all who had watched the working of the Irish Land Act when he said that in the case of that measure the attempt had been evaded, and means had been found to set its provisions at defiance. But their Lordships would recollect that in the case of the Irish Act Parliament had insisted that, while freedom of contract was destroyed in the case of small holdings, it must be preserved in the case of large ones. Now, what was regarded as a large holding in Ireland was looked upon as a small one in this country; so that in upholding freedom of contract in the case of English farms the noble Duke was only following the precedent laid down by Parliament in the case of the Irish Act. Farmers were, as a rule, perfectly well able to manage their own affairs and to make their own agreements—very frequently, indeed, they knew more about these matters than their landlords did. As a class, the landlords of England were a body of men who would not take an unfair advantage of a tenant. He did not wish, however, to praise them for this, because he believed such a course of action was dictated by the most powerful motive—namely, the motive of self-interest. It was their interest not to drive hard and unfair bargains with their tenants, because in the long run such a policy would not answer. He was persuaded that if their Lordships attempted to interfere to prevent landlord and tenant, being free and competent contracting parties, or if their Lordships attempted to lay down a hard-and-fast line by legislation from which no departure was permissible, we should again set to work the ingenuity of lawyers who would try to evade the Act. Therefore, whatever provisions their Lordships might see fit to introduce in Committee he earnestly hoped they would not go the length of making any change in those clauses which preserved freedom in contract. There were not the same reasons in the case of England which existed in the case of Ireland. There was not in the sister country any very large outlet for commercial enterprise, and consequently those persons who were precluded from obtaining agricultural holdings on fair terms had not the opportunity of carrying their capital elsewhere. But no one ever maintained that those conditions existed in this country, where there was an ample field for the employment of any amount of capital and enterprise. Sometimes he remarked with astonishment the number of energetic men who were still content to carry on the business of agriculture with the moderate returns it generally gave for the capital invested as compared with capital invested in strictly commercial undertakings. Their Lordships must be aware from personal experience of the extreme difficulty of obtaining a skilful tenant who was willing to devote himself wholly to agriculture and not to be diverted into some of the minor branches of commercial enterprise—such as auctioneering, valuing, and other occupations which would take him more or less from his proper work of agriculture. When a landlord succeeded in getting a good and improving tenant on his property, he was very loth to part with him. This being the case, he submitted that no cause had been shown why the freedom of contract should be interfered with, and why these provisions should be left out of the Bill. On the contrary, every reason of prudence and of policy would dictate their retention. He was convinced that if in an evil moment Parliament was induced to sanction their omission, the measure would be fraught with serious injury to the interests of the very class of the community whose welfare it was ostensibly intended to promote.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, this was in no sense a Party question, but it was one in which their Lordships, as landlords, were largely interested, and therefore it was most important to give it a fair consideration and to carry out, as far as they could, what he understood to be the principle of the Bill—namely, compensation to the tenant for his improvements and compensation to the landlord for waste. He put altogether aside a great deal of the talk there had been in the country about the position of the agricultural tenants. It was said, for instance, that the farmers were the great improvers and that the greater the power given to them the greater would be the improvement of the land. He maintained, on the other hand, that the land was improved by the owner, who looked to permanent improvements more than was done by the tenant, who looked to more immediate profit. He deprecated any change which would disturb the harmony at present existing between landlord and tenant. It was said that if the productive power were increased, the farmers would devote their whole energies to feeding the people cheaply. Well, when the farmers opposed the repeal of the Corn Laws, they had not the same anxious desire to see the people cheaply fed. Again, it was said that the agricultural labourer would profit by the Bill. But a farmer, whether he were an owner or an occupier, strove to invest his money profitably; and if, on the one hand, he looked to increased production, on the other he looked to economical labour. The Agricultural Returns showed that between 1872 and 1874 no fewer than 600,000 acres of land were laid out for permanent pasture. This was partly owing, perhaps, to the demand for animal food, but far more to the fact that the labourers had exhibited restlessness, striking for higher wages, and leaving their work without notice, and that the tenants were arming themselves against the future by laying out their lands in permanent pasture, on which it would not be necessary to employ so many men. Passing to the principle of the Bill, he agreed that compensation to tenants for agricultural improvements was just—but not exactly in the direction in which this Bill went. He found fault with almost everyone of its provisions, from the first to the last. First, as to the date at which the Bill was to come into operation, he pointed out that it ought to come into operation either at Michaelmas or Lady Day. Then the landlord's written consent was required for all permanent improvements; and he did not deny that some supervision was required as to what might be done by the tenant under this term; but, on the other hand, no limit had been placed on the extent to which a limited owner might charge his property. Then as to the second class of improvements—those which the tenant might do without the landlord's consent, there was no restriction at all. A tenant might, for instance, fancy to grow hops, and for that purpose kilns must be erected. Now, the cost of a kiln would be about £1,000, and this must be incurred if the plantation of hops were allowed. As regarded Kent or Sussex the power to plant hops might be very useful; but he should be very sorry to see hops planted on his land, and should object very much to have to pay for them. He thought there ought to be a much more careful schedule with regard to artificial manures, and that in all cases of proposed artificial manuring of land the tenant should give notice to the landlord, in order that he might have an opportunity of considering whether such manuring would be useful to the land. It was of great importance that some Bill should be carried on this subject which would satisfy both landlord and tenants that the Legislature desired to deal fairly between them; and he thought that when the Bill got into Committee they might be able to impart such a character to it.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY rejoiced that the noble Duke who had just sat down (the Duke of Somerset) approved the principle of this Bill—namely, that tenants should be compensated for unexhausted improvements; but he thought that the principal part of his remarks were more calculated for Committee than for the present occasion, when the question before their Lordships was the second reading of the Bill. The remarks of the noble Duke were well worthy of attention, and with regard to one or two of them he thought the noble Duke was not at all wrong. He hoped that the noble Duke would put down his suggestions in the form of Amendments, and that other noble Lords who objected to clauses of the Bill would also give Notice of Amendments before the House was asked to go into Committee on the Bill; and he could assure them that if they were put formally into shape, they would receive due consideration. The noble Duke was wrong in supposing that landlords would be bound under the Bill to bear the expense of any experiments conducted by their tenants except such as proved successful, and added value to the rental of the farm. The noble Duke, on the other hand, was right in saying that it would be sufficient to estimate the value of manures which had been sunk in the soil, and therefore the Bill provided that ample time should elapse after the manures had been used before any attempt was made to estimate the amount of value which their application had added to the farms. If a landlord and tenant chose to settle the amount between themselves they could do so; but in the event of their disagreeing it was provided that a settlement should be arrived at by the employment of arbitrators, an umpire, or, if necessary, the County Court. There was nothing in the Bill to prevent landlords and tenants following custom if they chose, for the Bill was voluntary. If it had been compulsory—as was desired by the noble Marquess who had spoken in the course of the debate (the Marquess of Huntly)—the contracting parties would not have been free to follow custom, but would have been bound within the strict letter of the Act. The Bill of the Government was introduced with the purpose of laying down some just principles on which compensation might be based as between landlords and tenants, leaving it to the parties themselves to arrange their own contracts. If iron rules were to be laid down for regulating the relations between landlords and tenants, it would inevitably follow that all custom must come to an end, and that the labourers would speedily raise an outcry to be strictly protected by law instead of abiding by the customs regarding service and other things connected with their state which now existed. He hoped their Lordships would bring their experience as landlords to bear upon the Bill in Committee, in order that such modifications might be introduced as might mould it into a thoroughly satisfactory measure.

THE EARL OF MORLEY thought it would be some satisfaction to the House to know that some of the details of the Bill were to be modified in Committee, and with that understanding he was prepared to support it. He agreed with the principle on which the Bill seemed to be based—that there should be a presumption in law in favour of the tenant where improvements had been executed during his tenancy; but it was also important that care should be taken to provide against the property of the landlords being deteriorated in value through careless or incompetent farming. One of the vital principles of the Bill was embodied in Clauses 5 and 7, which provided that the compensation to tenants should be based, not upon the cost of the improvements, but upon the additional letting value of the farms which the improvements might create. It might happen that an expenditure of, say, £1,000, on a farm would add £100 a-year to the letting value, but it would be hard upon a landlord to compel him to pay to his tenant as compensation the capitalized value of £100 per annum. Again, the letting value of land might be raised by the construction of railways, the erection of buildings in its neighbourhood, or many other causes entirely apart from the action of the tenant; and therefore the utmost care ought to be taken in accurately defining the principle on which the tenant's claim to compensation was to be based; for it would be very difficult for the valuers and arbitrators to distinguish how much of the increased letting value was really due to the improvement. Again, with regard to the classification of improvements, he thought the Bill was very imperfect. For instance, it entirely omitted all reference to the laying down of permanent pastures—one of the most important improvements that could be effected on a farm. As far as the first class of improvements was concerned—he referred to permanent structural improvements—he thought it ought to have been omitted from the Bill on the ground that, as was generally admitted, such improvements ought to be made by the landlords themselves; and as the Bill required the tenant to execute them with consent of the landlord it left things much as they were, except with regard to limited owners, and it appeared that it would be far better to deal with this part of the question in a separate Bill such as the noble Duke had promised to introduce. With regard to the improvements generally, it was provided that in the case of limited owners the cost was to form a charge on the estate. This principle was all very good, but there was no limit fixed to the amount which might be expended, nor any adequate provision that the improvements so charged should be such as actually to increase the value of the property. A provision of this kind was made in reference to loans made by the Lands Improvement Commissioners, and a similar one ought to be included in the present Bill. With regard to the question of compulsion, he thought it eminently desirable that freedom of contract should be preserved. The manner in which freedom of contract was preserved in the Bill he did not approve of. The provision that either of the contracting parties might, by giving notice to the other, exclude himself from the operation of the Bill, appeared to him to be absolutely unique in our Statute Book. He thought the Bill ought to be made generally applicable where there were no leases or written agreements, but that landlords and tenants should be allowed to come to what terms they pleased. In conclusion, he expressed a hope that the country would accept the Bill in the spirit in which it had been framed—namely, that the tenant should have compensation for improvements which he had made, while the landlord should have a remedy against the deterioration of his land. He thanked the noble Duke for the introduction of the Bill, and trusted that it would be so improved in Committee as to prove beneficial both to landlord and tenant.

LORD HENNIKER would not say the Bill was entirely satisfactory, for it required amendment; but, speaking generally, he believed it was an honest, straightforward attempt at legislation. No Bill could be so comprehensive as to include the requirements, or even necessities, of every locality, and, more than that, no Bill could deal satisfactorily in detail with the subject. If anything, this Bill went a little too much into detail. The soil and the mode of carrying on farming operations varied so much, even in the same county, that it must be impolitic to lay down any but a very broad rule. In his own county, almost every field on some farms required a different treatment: therefore, any measure which might be passed should lay down the broadest rules possible. One of the principal reasons for the cry for legislation, and for legislation of a compulsory character, was that tenant farmers very often rushed into the farming business without due consideration and without sufficient capital. It was said that persons in this position required protection; but he did not think legislative interference was likely to be a benefit to either landlord or tenant. In other branches of business no one thought it politic that the Legislature should protect people who could not protect themselves. It was worth consideration whether the state of the labour market, and the fact that farmers were at the present time rather unsettled, had not helped to make the cry for compulsion, and whether the desire for stringent legislation was really so great as it appeared to be. There were three classes of grievances—a real grievance, an imaginary grievance, and a grievance which was hardly a grievance at all—one which was an exceptional grievance, or which affected only a small number. This question seemed to belong to the latter category. By the most energetic advocates of a compulsory measure it was acknowledged that legislation was only required for exceptional cases. The fact was that landowners, as a rule, gave more liberal agreements than any of the Bills that had been proposed; and where no agreement existed, there would be, nine times out of ten, such a liberal custom of the locality, or of the particular estate concerned, that the tenant had ample security. It was said it would take 20 or 30 years to bring a measure of this kind into operation, whereas five years would bring a compulsory measure into full force. But it was far better to act gradually in a matter of this kind—especially when it was acknowledged that out of 10 cases it was generally only in one that there was any hardship or injustice. Surely there was no ground for disturbing all existing arrangements and setting landlords and tenants by the ears. It was said the landlord had too much power in fixing the rent; but there were two safeguards—first, the tenant ought to know what rent he should give, and, secondly, no sensible landlord would ask more than would give the tenant full opportunity of farming advantageously. Bad tenants generally offered too high rents; most landlords were pretty well aware of this. In 1873 he had a farm to let, and one or two applicants offered, broadly speaking, to give “more than anyone else” for the farm. He knew what that meant; it meant either no capital and no qualifications for farming, or an intention to take as much out of the land as possible, without putting anything into it. It was said that tenant farmers were buying land all over the country. That was true to some extent; but, at the same time, he had known many well-to-do farmers sell their own farms, and farm them or others as tenants, reaping the benefit of 10, 12, or 15 per cent for their capital, instead of 3½ to 4 per cent, at the outside, while it was invested in land. There was something, too, in the fact that almost every Englishman wished to possess land. Every owner of purely agricultural land would be a richer man by investing his capital in almost any other security; but land was preferred on account of the pleasures, the occupation, and the opportunities of leading a useful life, which its possession afforded beyond all other kinds of property. He objected to compulsion as unnecessary, for it was as much to the interest of the landlord as the tenant to give liberal agreements, and he particularly objected to any approach to turning a landlord into a rent-charger. Tenants, too, would find such a change to be to their disadvantage. He had been told by more than one Irish landlord that the present state of affairs there made a landlord afraid to spend money on his estate, and that the tendency was to obtain as much rent as possible, leaving the rest, as it were, to take care of itself. As to compulsion, he would say no more than that he believed it was not necessary, and that, if the whole tenantry of England were canvassed, a majority would be found to be opposed to it. Some persons thought, he might add, there was no necessity for legislation; but in that view he did not join, for he thought, as a general rule, it might be said in agricultural matters—Modus vincit legem. Customs were no longer applicable to many places where they existed, and it would be a boon that a good sound rule or custom should be laid down, having all the force of legislative enactment, and a good measure, laid upon broad lines, would be pretty generally followed. Landowners would see that it was wise to alter the custom of the country when it could be ameliorated. His own agreements were nearly according to custom; but he saw where he could alter those agreements beneficially in many respects. He was also of opinion that the customs of his own county might be amended. It was everything to a tenant to have a fair valuation, and if a too high valuation were given by any Bill it would be injurious. In Lincolnshire, taking a calculation upon which he could depend, already quoted in public, he found that 10 farms under the Lincolnshire custom, with an average rent of £1 10s. 4d. an acre, were allowed for compensation, for average of cake allowed 5s. 10d. an acre, for artificial manures 5s. 5d. an acre, and for seed, labour, improvements, and fixtures £1 8s. 1d. an acre, making in all £1 19s. 4d. an acre. Now, in his own county, land might be said to let for 25s. to 30s. an acre on the average, taking heavy land and light land, and yet the valuations were said to come to from 50s. to £3 an acre, and even in some cases to £4 an acre. Surely there must be something which required revision; the much-praised custom of Lincolnshire, with £1 19s. 4d. an acre, and his own county, with a much higher valuation. He would—for he would not attempt to go into details, take one instance—the payment for tillages. These must be taken by valuers more or less on trust; excessive sums were often paid when it was of no benefit to the incoming tenant, and a far better plan was to pay for results, as in Norfolk, for roots. He believed a Michaelmas entry to be the best, for the farming year began, as it were, then; but, if carefully looked into, there was hardly a single custom of any agricultural locality which did not require revision. The Lincolnshire valuers had lately revised their custom; why should not valuers in other counties do the same? He wished for a moment to turn to one or two of the provisions of the Bill. One of the most valuable and important was the year's notice. He was not sure that this or the extended proposal of two years made by the Prime Minister would not have satisfied very many requirements, with a payment for permanent improvements, under proper restrictions. A simple measure—the simpler the better—was what was wanted, leaving small details to be settled as much as possible by those chiefly interested in different localities. Nearly, if not all other improvements were paid for by the incoming tenant, and a satisfactory arrangement could be easily arrived at. However, the Bill must be taken as it stood. Draining, he thought, should be allowed for over 12 or 15 years, instead of 20; but no draining by wood or straw. The difficulty was, how draining was to be valued—whether it were really properly done. There was a great deal of difference in the mode of draining, and if it were not done properly it was worth but little as a permanent improvement; while if it were well done 20 or 25 years, or more, would not exhaust its value. Ten years was the Lincolnshire system. Clause 33, he might add, would do more than any other, perhaps, to bring the Bill into practical operation, for it would give a fair power of charging a settled estate if the Bill were properly revised, so that the present powers of borrowing were not brought into collision with it. However, details were for Committee, and he would not enter further into them. He did not speak as wishing to legislate for landlords alone, but as much in the interest of the tenant, the labourer, and for the increased production of the soil. While he admitted the Bill might, and probably would, lead to increased production, it must be remembered that doubling the produce, or anything of that sort, with the increased cost of labour, was not possible; that much land was now brought into cultivation which did not pay the enterprising people who brought it into cultivation; and that sometimes two or three sets of tenants might be ruined before any one was really benefited by it. The labourer must be considered, too. If too much were put upon the landlord by stringent rules, cottages, which were required in some places, must be paid for by an increased rent; they were required principally for the good of those who farmed the land, and the labourer would be the sufferer. What was required was some broad simple rule which would encourage tenants to farm in the best possible manner up to the day they left their farms; not complicated rules which would be constantly broken, from the fact that they were inapplicable to certain districts and certain systems of farming. It was said in his county that the best year for a farmer was the year of leaving the farm, the worst when he entered it. This was not to be got over in a moment, and certainly not by regulations which, if carried out compulsorily, would do away with all those farmers who were struggling against difficulties; for if they had to pay excessive valuations for artificial manures, and so on, no one but men of large capital would stand against it, and the occupation of land would become a monopoly. It was natural to skimp a farm when one was not likely to reap the benefit. That was a shortsighted policy now, and it would not be got over in a moment. It was because he believed this Bill would lead to the desired result, to the greatest possible freedom of action on the part of the farmers which could be allowed—and he should like to give all the freedom it was right and fair to give when it had been fully discussed by their Lordships and in the House of Commons—that a measure was necessary, and that it did all, if not more, than the law could usefully do at the present moment, he gave his cordial support to the second reading.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL*: It seems to be the general understanding of the House that this Bill is to receive a second reading at your Lordships' hands. According to Parliamentary usage, therefore, we are to be held as having assented to its principle. And to this I have no objection, provided it be a little more clearly understood what the principle is to which this assent is given. I confess I am not wholly satisfied with the explanations and definitions of principle which have been given, either to-night or on the former occasion when the Bill was first introduced by the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Richmond). Allow me then, my Lords, shortly to describe what I understand the Bill to be—what it says, and what it proposes to do. The Bill begins by laying down in the definition clause this sound principle—that the relation of landlord and tenant is simply a relation of contract; that however much, and however happily, in some respects, this relation may be modified and obscured by habit, and tradition, and hereditary feeling, yet at bottom, and in the eye of the law, the relation of owner and occupier is simply and purely one of mutual contract. But inasmuch as over a considerable part of England there seems to be hardly any distinct consciousness on either side that such is the nature of the relation—inasmuch as owner and occupier go on together, sometimes for generations, with no written contracts whatever, this Bill proposes that we—Parliament—shall suggest the substance of a contract which we consider to be equitable; which we will assume to be the contract between the parties where none other now exists; to which we shall give special advantages, in cheap and easy methods of enforcement; and on behalf of which we shall give special powers to limited owners. The Bill then goes on farther to say that when the two parties already have, or desire to have, a different contract of their own, we are not to interfere. Now, my Lords, on this description of the Bill, which I believe to be substantially accurate, and is stated without prejudice either one way or another, it is obvious that more than one important question of principle may be raised. In the first place, it may be asked whether any sufficient reason has been shown why Parliament should do for these particular contractors what it has not done, so far as I know, for any other contractors whatever; whether any necessity has been shown for our interference in the matter? I do not wish to debate this question now, because English landowners seem disposed to admit, and I am not disposed absolutely to deny, that in cases where there is no written contract, and where the parties hardly seem to be aware that their relation is one of contract at all, there may be points in which it may be wise to change or modify the presumptions of the law. So far, and so far only then, do I feel myself committed on this matter by assenting to the second reading of the Bill. Then there is another question raised in this Bill, which may well be considered a question of principle. Supposing it to be expedient that Parliament should suggest the terms of a contract in the absence of any other, are we so sure that this contract which we suggest is so certainly the best—still more, are we so certain that it is the only good one—that we are justified in withholding from every other the advantage of the new machinery which the Bill professes to provide? And if this be considered a question of principle, then I must at once say that I do not assent to the principle of the Bill. It appears to me that the object aimed at—of establishing some definite and equitable bargain on the subject of agricultural improvements—may be, and will be, attained in many different forms of contract—many of them quite as good, some of them, perhaps, greatly better, than the one you have suggested, and I see no reason whatever for confining the advantages of your cheap machinery to the particular form of bargain you have embodied in this Bill. Again, the same question arises in a still more important matter when we find that this Bill contemplates the same restriction on the new powers it proposes to confer on limited owners. This is a matter, clearly, on which law can operate with effect; one which is, beyond all question, within the legitimate province of legislation. I am disposed to think that, in all our legislation hitherto, we have been too careful of the interests of the “Remainder-man,” and too little careful of the interests of the existing holders of estates, and of their tenants. And if, as I believe, they will make, and ought to be free to make, other contracts quite as good as, or better, than that which you have drawn up, there is no sense or reason in so confining the powers which you are to give to limited owners that they shall not enjoy the benefits of the Act unless they adopt your particular form of contract. Again, then, I say that if this be in any respect a principle of the Bill, I do not assent to it in agreeing to pass the second reading. Lastly, my Lords, we come to the declaration in the Bill, that although one particular contract is suggested and recommended, it is not to be enforced; but owners and occupiers are to be free to make what bargains their mutual interests may dictate, whenever these are deliberately entered into and recorded. Of course, on this point the question has been raised whether if you recommend you ought not also to enforce—whether you ought not to compel owners and occupiers, whose relation you have declared to be one of contract, to make this particular contract whether they approve of it or not? My Lords, on this question I must at once declare that I think the Government are right in stopping short when they have established a change in those presumptions of the law which hold good in the absence of special contracts, and that any attempt at compulsion in such matters would be wrong in principle, and must be futile in practice. And yet, even in this matter, I cannot approve unreservedly of the Bill as it now stands. On the contrary, it appears to me that if it had been the aim of the promoters of the Bill to put freedom of contract in the form most obnoxious to popular prejudice, and most injurious to all concerned, they could not have devised a better form for the purpose than that which they have chosen; because it is a form which compels every owner to put himself in the invidious position of appearing to desire to evade the intentions of the Legislature, when in reality he may wish nothing more than to fulfil those intentions—or may have already done so—only in another and in a better way. But I will not dwell on this, because I cannot but believe that my noble Friend opposite will listen in Committee to any well-founded arguments against the particular form in which he has sought to give effect to the principle of free contract; and I will now, therefore, with the permission of the House, state rather more fully than has been done hitherto in this debate the grounds upon which, as it appears to me, it would be both wrong and useless to attempt compulsion in the matter of bargain or contract between the owner and occupier of land. Although this may not be the question raised seriously here, it is the question raised by many out-of-doors, and I think it well to discuss it carefully and respectfully to those whose opinions, or at least whose first impressions in favour of compulsion, are not much represented in this House.

My Lords, I hope your Lordships will not suppose that I am going to do anything so foolish as to waste the time of this House in discussing the abstract right of the State to do this, that, or the other. Such a question is more fit for a debating society, or a young man's club, than for either House of Parliament. I know of no abstract limitation on the ultimate right of the supreme power of the State in respect to legislation. I hold that even the right of religious liberty—perhaps the most sacred of all—cannot be affirmed without certain limitations; and it is really the idlest of all questions what, under supposed conditions, Parliament has or has not the right to do. Only this I will venture to lay down as a principle, or a practical rule never to be forgotten—that as individual freedom is the foundation of all liberty, a heavy—the very heaviest—burden of proof lies on all those who propose any new restraints upon it. Nothing short of the very strongest arguments of necessity ought to obtain a hearing in favour of such proposals, and the highest presumption must always be held against them.

I turn, therefore, my Lords, at once from the abstract question to those practical considerations which must really determine the action of Parliament in all such matters. I begin, then, by at once making two admissions to the advocates of compulsion. The first is, that the sort of contract which is suggested in this Bill in respect to improvements is equitable in its principle. I say the “sort of contract,” because I do not admit it to be the only good or the only equitable form of contract, or even in all cases the best. I mean simply that when a tenant not under lease, but sitting without other security of tenure than a yearly holding, and paying a full rent, executes improvements which add to the letting value, and is deprived of that holding before he has had time to recover by increased profits the cost of his outlay, that tenant ought to be compensated by the owner. I say I admit at once that this is only equitable. And the second admission I make is this—that the public have some interest in this equity being observed in the contracts between owners and occupiers of land. Now, my Lords, I know that there are many persons who will say, and who do say, that, these two admissions being made, the question is settled in favour of compulsory legislation. I never hear this conclusion urged—upon this ground alone—without wondering whether the method and the habits of political reasoning are not in as rude a condition as British agriculture is by some supposed to be. The public has an interest in equitable contracts being made in every trade and occupation whatever. The public has a deep interest in the equitable adjustment, for example, of such disputes as those now leading to disastrous results in South Wales. But it does not in the least follow that Parliament should interfere to enforce such adjustment. But, without going into the innumerable cases of the same kind which are connected with the relations between employer and employed, let me illustrate the question by reference to the public interest in the progress of agriculture. Those who have read the evidence taken before various Parliamentary Committees during the last 30 years know the quantity of that evidence which goes to prove that nothing so much hinders the progress of agriculture as the want of capital, and the want of knowledge among the occupying or cultivating class itself. The public has the deepest interest in these evils being remedied. But does it, therefore, follow that it would be wise or just to pass an Act of Parliament requiring, for example, that no farmer should hold land who cannot show that he has capital to the amount of, say £5 per acre? My noble Friend behind me (the Earl of Kimberley) says that this is far too little. Well, say £10 an acre. Are we compelled even to consider the expediency of such a law because we admit, as we may most fully do, that there would be a great increase of productive power if the poorer class of tenantry were replaced by a class of capitalists? And in like manner with regard to ignorance of even the rudiments of scientific agriculture, the public has a direct and immediate interest in the occupying class having greater intelligence and knowledge. There is at hand a popular and ready machinery—much admired by many—that of competitive examination. I have no doubt whatever that immense public benefit would arise if every farmer were required to have at least a certain minimum of knowledge in the art of agriculture. But does it therefore follow that it would be either just or possible to enact by law that no man should be allowed to take an agricultural holding who could not secure a certain number of marks in an examination before the Civil Service Commissioners? I need say no more, surely, on this head—that the two admissions I have made, the one that this sort of contract is equitable, the other that there is a public interest involved in the prevalence of some such bargain, do not in the least compel us to the conclusion that we should resort to compulsory legislation. I submit that something much more specific in the way of argument is required if this conclusion is to be established. But then it is further urged that Parliament has already interfered with the freedom of contract in other cases, and it is only adding one more case to a long and increasing list of compulsory enactments. In answer to this I might stand, in the first place, upon the principle that the burden of proof lies absolutely on those who propose any and every new restriction of personal freedom. But if the appeal be made to experience, and to the analogy and course of legislation in recent times, and if it could be shown that it would really be according to that analogy to impose by law this particular bargain upon owners and occupiers of the soil, I should be disposed to admit that it would be prima facie a ground for favourable consideration. But to this test I am not unwilling to appeal, and I think I can show to your Lordships that the teachings and experience, and the presumptions of analogy, are all against, and not in favour of the proposed compulsory legislation.

My Lords, I suppose there never has been in the history of the world a people or a Parliament so little governed by theoretical and abstract considerations as the people and Parliament of this country. They hardly ever legislate on any abstract principle whatever. It may be said with truth that they always legislate by rule of thumb—moving on in the paths of political progress as occasion and necessity may require. Is there some ancient liberty which has been found to lead to intolerable evil?—it is restrained. Is there, on the other hand, some restraint which has been found to be needless or injurious?—then freedom is restored. And so the Parliaments of this country have proceeded from time to time, never asking themselves any theoretical questions whatever as to what is and what is not the legitimate province of legislation. But although they have been singularly untheoretic, they have been endowed in the highest degree with the noble gifts of political instinct; and it will generally be found that some principle can be traced in what they do after it has been done—just as the unconscious growths of language are found to have arisen according to those mysterious laws which govern the development of human speech. Let us, then, look back to the course which legislation has now taken during the course of the last two or three generations, and let us see whether there is not some principle to be traced—and whether that principle is or is not in favour of this kind of interference with individual liberty which is now urged upon us. It is perfectly true that there has been a steady advance of compulsory legislation in one direction; but it is equally true that there has been as steady a retreat of such legislation in another direction. It is quite true that one great province has been more and more invaded; but it is equally true that another great province has been more and more vacated. It is perfectly true that a great number of restrictive laws have been enacted, but, concurrently with this legislation, another great series of restrictive statutes have been one by one repealed. And now, my Lords, I ask, can we trace no principle in this double movement? Can we, in looking back over its course, arrive at no general result in respect to the teachings of experience on the kinds of restraint which it has been found, wise or unwise, to lay on personal liberty? I venture to think that one great principle comes out as clear as day. We have found it wise to repeal all laws whose object it was to regulate the price of anything or to secure the remuneration of any class. First we repealed all laws which attempted to regulate the price of labour, whether with a view to cheapen or to enhance it; then we repealed all laws to regulate the price of manufactures; then all laws to regulate the price of food, or the price of money, or the price of ships, or the remuneration of the various classes who are concerned with the great interests which these laws affected. Now, my Lords, let us observe that the one common element in all these laws was that they all aimed at securing by legislation some purely economic result; and the great principle which lies at the root of their condemnation and abandonment is simply this—that individual men are always in the long run the best judges of their own pecuniary or economic interests, and that the interests of the public and of the State are best served, on the whole, when men are allowed in all such matters to pursue freely their own natural instincts and desires.

And now, my Lords, let us look for a moment, on the other hand, to the character of the restrictive laws which it has been found necessary to enact. We have placed restrictions on the hours of factory labour, because we found that a whole generation was growing up under conditions of the utmost moral and physical degeneration. We have put restrictions on labour in mines for the same reason. We have put other restraints on management of mines for the protection of human health and life. We have restrained individual freedom in the matter of education, to avoid, if it be possible, the dangers of ignorance. We have forbidden under the Truck Acts the payment of wages in kind, in order to prevent fraud and to secure that wages should be really equal in value to their nominal amount. At this very moment we are considering the necessity of further restrictions with a view to the saving of life at sea; and I, for one, honour the exertions of Mr. Plimsoll in a cause which is the cause of humanity and mercy. Now, my Lords, if we look back to this series of laws we shall see at once that one general character belongs to them all. They are all laws aiming at some moral, and not at any purely economic, result. And the great principle which underlies them all is this—that whilst economic benefits and results are not only sufficiently but are best provided for and secured by leaving men perfectly free, the very intensity and eagerness of this pursuit of wealth often lead them to sacrifice all moral considerations—considerations of health and of life itself; and this to such an extent that it becomes sometimes an absolute necessity to protect these highest interests of all by restrictive laws. This, then, is the double result of our experience as a nation and as a Parliament—that restrictive legislation for the attainment of purely economic ends is not only needless but injurious; and that it is the very power and efficiency of the motives which work for these results which compel us frequently to interfere for moral ends. Need I ask, my Lords, to which great class would belong a law forcing a particular bargain upon the owners and occupiers of land? Are British farmers starving? or are their children growing up a puny and almost imbecile race? So far as I have had occasion to observe, the ample presence and the prosperous outlines which belong to the typical English farmer have, as yet, suffered no serious diminution. The results we are invited to secure are all of the purely economic kind; and I venture to affirm, that so far from the course and analogy of our legislative experience leading in the direction of restraint on individual freedom in this matter, its teachings and its lessons are all condemnatory—loudly condemnatory—of any such attempt. I am not now saying, for a moment, that there can be no possible legislation which is not open to this objection. Changes in the presumptions of law in the absence of contract belong to a wholly different category; and I am not now arguing against the expediency, or even the necessity, of some changes of this kind. I am now arguing exclusively on the question, whether it is wise, or expedient, or legitimate, according to our well-established principles of legislation, to attempt to secure to the occupiers of land certain pecuniary terms in their contract for the hire of farms? And this, I venture to say, belongs to a class of legislation which Parliament has more and more found it wise, and even necessary, to abandon. But here we encounter, my Lords, a special plea—a plea for peculiar and exceptional treatment. In some Papers which have been circulated to hon. Members of the House by Mr.

Howard, the well-known advocate of compulsory legislation in this matter, I find it stated broadly that no freedom of contract really exists in the case of farmers; and the speech of one gentleman is quoted and re-quoted, with much approbation, in which it is said that—“He would be a bold man who would say that there was equal contracting power between an owner and an occupier of land.”

Now, my Lords, I do not wish to come under the condemnation of being a very rash, or even a very bold man, and therefore I will not now make any general assertion on the subject. But perhaps it may be permitted to me to undertake the humbler task of testing, by a little examination in detail, what is the meaning attached to the word freedom in such passages as these—What is the kind of restraint on freedom which is complained of in the case of the farmer? I will, therefore, take two cases, to one or other of which every offer of a farmer for a holding must belong. I will take, first, the case of a farm which is vacant, and which is in the market. For every farm so circumstanced there are generally some four, or five, or six competitors, sometimes many more. Well, we will suppose that one of these farmers says to the owner—“I will give you 30s. an acre for that farm, but on condition only that on the termination of the tenancy you agree to recognize my claim to such and such items of compensation.” To this offer we will suppose that the former replies—“Your offer, I dare say, is a very fair one from your own point of view; but there are five other men, all of whom have offered me the same rent, without those compensations at the end of the tenancy which you demand. This shows that the article I offer is worth the rent you offer, without the conditions you attach; and if those conditions be attached—it is worth more. Will you advance on your offer as to rent? and then I shall be disposed to agree to your other conditions.” The offerer replies, we will farther suppose, that he cannot advance on the rent of 30s. an acre, and that even this rent he will only give on the conditions referred to. Under these circumstances, he does not get the farm, and it is let to another, not subject to the compensation clauses. Now, where is the want of freedom in this transaction, as regards the disappointed offerer? Clearly his want of freedom consists in this—that some five or some dozen other men have the same freedom as he has, and they all consider it consistent with their interests to offer for the farm without the conditions on which he insists. And what is the demand now made on Parliament by the friends of this offerer? It is simply this—“We do not consider this man free so long as these dozen other men are allowed the same freedom. Deprive them of their liberty of contract, and then only will our friend's liberty be secured.” Is this a reasonable demand? and, if so, what will farmers say to an agricultural labourer who asks wages far higher than other men are willing to work at? Is this labourer not free to contract unless dozens of other men are in like manner to be deprived of the same liberty? Or when a labouring man goes to buy meat, and only offers 8*d.* a-pound, what is it that deprives him of his liberty to secure the meat at that price, except this, that hundreds of other people are willing to give 10*d.* or 1*s.*? Where is this argument to end which asserts that there is no freedom when the pressure of competition determines economic results?

Then, my Lords, let us look at the other supposed case—that of a farm which is not vacant, but occupied by a tenant who desires to hold under new conditions as to compensation on removal. What prevents him going to his landlord and saying—“I want to hold under new conditions?” What but this—that such new conditions will probably involve a re-valuation? He may very probably have been holding at a rent not revised for many years—possibly even for some generations; and the owner may very fairly say—“I have every reason to believe that scores of men would give the same rent, and even a much higher rent, for this farm, without any new conditions. You already have, in the lowness of your rent, an ample compensation for any improvements you may effect. But if you wish new conditions I have no objection, provided there be a new valuation corresponding to advantages you seek.” If the tenant declines these terms, and chooses rather to remain as he is, where, again, is the limitation of his freedom? Does it not consist entirely in this—that he knows he is sitting at a low rent, and that numbers of other persons would be willing to give as much, or more, on the same conditions? His want of freedom, therefore, in this case also, resolves itself into this—that others are not deprived of their freedom in order to enable him to enforce his own conditions. It is the old story. It is competition that is really complained of; and the demand for compulsion is simply the old demand of legislative protection against those results which are the natural effects of freedom in this as in every other trade. But the public have no interest in restraints being placed on the competition for farms. On the contrary, this competition is one of the essential conditions of an improving agriculture. To restrict competition has been the endeavour of every class and every interest in turn. Each in succession has had its plea for special treatment and exceptional laws. Each class-interest has urged these pleas with the most perfect sincerity and simplicity of heart—“We are a class specially circumstanced. Our industry is exceptionally important to the country.” And what, during recent years, has been the reply of Parliament to all such pleas? It has not been any denial of the importance of the classes concerned, or of the importance of their industries to the public interests. On the contrary, it has been substantially this—“We admit your importance. We admit the immense interest we have in the success of your industry. But argument and experience have at last taught us, that both you and your industries will flourish best in the atmosphere and under the stimulus of freedom.” And, my Lords, if it be against all principle, and all the analogy of our legislation, to attempt compulsion to attain purely economic results in the trade of farming, it is not less evident that any such attempt must fail. If it is competition, and nothing else, which prevents this desired bargain from becoming general except on advanced terms of rent, the same pressure of competition will prevent any compulsory law from securing to the farmer any pecuniary benefits, wherever these do not rest on the sound basis of intelligent contract, and are not guaranteed by the sense of mutual interest. You cannot prevent competition from determining rent; and whatever artificial statutory conditions you may attach to holdings will be discounted in the form of advanced rents.

Any attempt at compulsion must result in a general re-valuation of farms; and although there is certainly no public interest involved in rents being so low as to dispense with skill, and knowledge, and exertion—although, on the contrary, low rents mean simply bad and lazy farming—I should regard it as a great misfortune that any change of this kind should take place generally, suddenly, and under the antagonisms which must arise out of a desire to escape from the inevitable injustice of compulsory laws upon such a subject.

And here, my Lords, I cannot help asking, what ground of necessity has been laid for asking Parliament to pass a law so exceptional in principle, and sure to be so inconvenient in practice? Is it true that English farmers are, in any appreciable number of cases, suddenly deprived of their farms without compensation for any improvements they may have made? I do not see that even any allegation is made to this effect. No one feels more strongly than I do that tenancies at will, or yearly tenancies, without any written agreement on the subject of compensation in the event of removal, is the most unwise and unsatisfactory footing on which agricultural holdings can be placed. But it is a great mistake to suppose that under this system—bad and slovenly though it be—tenants do not generally enjoy a large, often a very large, pecuniary compensation in the shape of comparative lowness of rent. They may hardly be conscious of it; and, indeed, this is one of the greatest evils of the system. But where farms are rarely re-valued, and rents run on from year to year, and sometimes from generation to generation, those rents are almost always far below the market value. It is curious that the only specific case which is quoted by Mr. Howard as tending to show the necessity of legislation, confirms this fact in a remarkable degree. It is in the case of an estate which Mr. Howard tells us “belonged to a noble family, upon which the tenants had dwelt securely, but which came into the market and was bought by the Crown: even under the Crown the tenants were not safe; they had been paying the average rent of the neighbourhood, but had to submit to an enormous rise of rent, or to break up their homes and go.” Now what does this case prove, except that the tenants of this estate had been holding—how long I know not—at a rent “enormously” below the market rate; or in other words, that they had been enjoying in this form of a low preference rent an “enormous” compensation for whatever other disadvantages may have attached to their position? The allegation that the rents were equal to the average of the neighbourhood may be quite true, but this only proves that a very low rate of rent generally prevails wherever this system of tenure obtains, and farmers must remember that they cannot enjoy compensation in both ways—both in lowness of rent, and also in capital sums paid to them on termination of the tenancy. In this case the Crown, acting in the interests of the public, appears to have found that the tenants on this estate had been holding at rents “enormously” below those which other farmers were willing to give. And it must never be forgotten that this is the only test of value in farms, as in everything else. Rents, indeed, ought not to be regulated by the reckless acceptance of whatever sum anybody may promise to give; but they must—and in the public interests, they ought to be—ultimately regulated by what good and solvent men may be able and willing to pay; and this case quoted by Mr. Howard is an indication of what I believe to be the truth, that when there are no agreements for compensation, or no written contracts at all, farms in England are constantly and habitually let much below the market value; so that the tenants are, in fact, enjoying considerable annuities over and above the rate of profit on cultivation which would be sufficient to attract competent men. I have myself known of cases where, on the test of competition being applied, it was found that the tenants had been sitting at rents 50, 60, and even 70 per cent below the market value. These may be extreme cases; but the general prevalence of low rents in districts where there are no agreements is certain. And if this be true, and in exact proportion as it is true, the tenants are already in full enjoyment of compensation for any improvements they ever make—greater, probably far greater, than they could ever claim under any compulsory legislation.

Again, my Lords, I guard myself against saying that I look on this as a satisfactory system. Very far from it. But this brings me to another point of great importance. Legislation is urged upon us because it is alleged that "customs"—legal customs—protective of the tenant's interests, like those of Lincolnshire, are not extending. We are told that now it is some 30 years since Mr. Pusey's Committee sat, and that very little progress has been made in the spread of legal "customs." Even this does not appear to be strictly true. But if it were true it would be irrelevant. For the really important question is not whether these "customs" have extended, but whether reasonable private contracts have extended. "Customs" at the very best are nothing but bad and cumbrous substitutes for special contracts. They are always tending to abuse, always liable to become more and more onerous to incoming tenants, until in some counties they have become a serious obstruction to agriculture. The evidence on this head is conclusive. Nothing can be more mischievous than that farmers should be set to think, not how they can profit by good and careful husbandry, but how they can profit by making up a heavy book against those who are to succeed them. And even the best customs, such as that of Lincolnshire, are necessarily changing from time to time, as experience teaches, and as it requires modification of the rules. Moreover, it is the greatest mistake to suppose that even in Lincolnshire the custom has been the cause of the improvement of the county. On the contrary, it was the improvement of the county that gave rise to the custom. It arose simply from the example of a wise and successful private contract, which gave rise to others, and so gradually spread over that and some adjoining districts. But private contracts written and recorded are in all cases better than such customs, which are nothing but contracts erected on the vague basis of presumption. Other counties have improved quite as much without any such custom. Therefore I contend, that the non-extension of legal customs is of no consequence whatever, if it be true that private contracts have been, and are now, extending rapidly. Yet, strange to say, in the First Report of the Committee of the Central Chamber of Agriculture, I find that they have confined their inquiry to the extension of "customs," excluding altogether the far more important question of the extension of special contracts having the same end in view. Now, my Lords, I will venture to say that, without inquiry into this, the other inquiry is of very little value. "Customs" may not be extending, for the very reason that special contracts of a much better kind are being everywhere adopted. I have been lately making some inquiry into this point, and the result is, that from personal knowledge I can affirm that special contracts in respect to compensation for improvements are being adopted rapidly over numerous English counties. I have lately seen several of these contracts—and some of them have been drawn up within the last two or three years as nearly as possible in the very terms recommended by local Chambers of Agriculture. I do not say they are all perfect; but I do say, that the very worst of them are better than any general Parliamentary contract you can possibly impose. They will, and they ought to, vary with local circumstances—with the growing intelligence on the subject, both of owners and of occupiers of the soil. There is no root of bitterness in the relations between landlord and tenant in England—nothing to prevent those changes from taking place by mutual agreement in the forms of contract and of tenure which I heartily believe are often much required in the interests of both. But the worst lesson you could teach to the occupying class, is to lead them to believe that Parliament either can, or ought to, make their bargains for them.

For these reasons, my Lords, and for others with which I shall not now trouble the House, I hold that whatever legislative changes are made should be confined to changes simply in the presumption of the law, and that no attempt should be made to interfere with that complete freedom of contract which is the very breath of life in this, not less than in all other, industrial pursuits.

LORD WAVENEY supported the Bill, maintaining that a tenant was fairly entitled to compensation for any outlay he might have expended on his holding.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH said, that what the farmers or their friends demanded was not in itself unjust or immoderate, but he believed that in reality they possessed it already. He was not disposed to object to the general tone of the measure introduced by his noble Friend; but he was disposed to think that Her Majesty's Government had not sufficiently considered the difficulties which were innate in the subject. It seemed almost as if the Government had patched up a Bill anyhow from the several measures which had of late years been laid before Parliament and simply flung it upon the Table of the House; but he thought it would be found an extremely difficult measure to work. The Bill, which professed merely to deal with the relations between landlords and tenants, would, in fact, materially alter, if it would not absolutely destroy, the present law with respect to settled estates in this country. The 4th clause defined the word "landlord," as used in the Bill, as meaning "the person entitled to possession of land subject to a contract of tenancy, or entitled to receipt of rent reserved by a contract of tenancy whatever be the extent of his interest." This would include all persons sub-letting to under-tenants land which they held on lease, and would empower such persons to make charges upon such sub-let holdings in respect of compensation due, which charges could be made to extend over—say 20 years, notwithstanding the fact that the leases under which they held from the original owner had not more than a tenth part of that time to run. The noble Marquess proceeded to comment on some provisions of the Bill; and was understood to object to the clause providing that the landlord on paying to the tenant the amount of compensation found due to him under the Act might obtain a change on the holding in respect thereof; that in the case of limited owners it opened a door to collusion between the owner and tenant. With regard to the clauses relating to procedure in respect of claims for compensation—the Bill provided that where the parties did not agree upon the amount of compensation, the difference should be settled by a reference to a single referee or to two referees with an arbitrator, with a final appeal in cases over £50 to the Judge of the County Court, he thought an appeal to the Inclosure Commissioners or perhaps to a Superior Court, would be preferable. Although he thought these arbitration clauses might give rise to difficulties they did not extend beyond what might be amended in Committee; and as he approved of the general principles of the Bill he should give it his support.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, one point which has been brought out by the debate is that all the speakers with the exception of a noble Marquess (the Marquess of Huntly) have been in favour of freedom of contract: another is, that while the Government have been greatly complimented for having introduced the Bill, the clauses of it have been generally condemned. For myself, I am willing to give the Government credit for the best possible intentions in the matter; but I own I do not think they have acted wisely in bringing the present Bill before your Lordships at all. My Lords, the Government have been credited by the country with being a Government specially called upon to introduce, and with being in a most favourable position for passing, important questions of social reform—and they seem to have had that opinion of themselves, to judge from the very large group of Bills which they have either presented or promised. Their Bills appear to us to be all somewhat of one character. I do not know whether your Lordships have ever observed in the streets little boys carrying bunches of small balloons brightly and variously coloured, and looking light and graceful. I believe these balloons can be had for a penny a-piece, and that you can buy a whole bundle on very much reduced terms. They are very fine to look at, and their lightness makes them float easily; but when you come to examine them closely, you will find they have absolutely nothing in them. That, I believe, is the character of most of the measures which the Government have introduced. They deal with interesting subjects; they have very attractive titles; and when you examine them, either they have nothing at all in them, or they contain clauses by which no one need be bound. This description I think applies to the present Bill. The noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) grounded its introduction on two principles—first, that it would increase the producing power of the country of food for the people; and second, that it would meet the grievances of tenant-farmers, and place them in the position to obtain any compensation to which they might in equity be entitled. Upon the first point

I confess I am not competent to give an opinion whether the noble Earl's (the Earl of Derby's) dictum that the produce might be doubled is accurate or not, but I do not see how the present Bill can materially affect that increase. With regard to the second, I may say I have communicated with a good many landlords, both strong Liberals and strong Conservatives—all of them, I believe, wealthy, and all liberal in their dealings with their tenants—and with the result that this principle would seem to fail, for not one of them has told me that he intended to leave himself under the operation of the Bill. I will go so far as to say I have a very strong suspicion that the great majority of the landowners in your Lordships' House will follow the same course. Now, if this course be adopted by the wealthiest and most enlightened landlords of this country, how can you expect that the pauper landlords—the greedy landlords—those whose conduct furnishes the only ground for legislation of this sort—will leave themselves under the operation of this Bill? Without compulsion it is impossible for the Bill to have any effect. I cannot make out that in any case it would cause a large increase in the production of food; and, as regards the grievances it is intended to remedy, I have a very shrewd belief that the great majority of tenant-farmers do not care about it at all. I believe that, although some of them are discontented with the present state of things, they think it better for themselves, on the whole, not to screw up their relations with their landlords too tightly. Those who are contented with their landlords will not trouble themselves about the Bill; while those who have grievances, those who would make demands for compensation, would regard it as the merest mockery that ever was offered them. In giving a "presumption of law" as between landlord and tenant, the Bill may be useful; but that is the sole argument which can be urged in its favour, and I doubt very much whether this will prove of any value in the circumstances which I have described. The Bill, therefore, will fail in its two main principles. I believe, then, that the Government have acted unwisely in stirring up this question at all at the present time, and then in introducing a Bill which will prove inoperative. In my observations I have carefully abstained from going into matters of detail, because there is a unanimous agreement that the Bill should pass the second reading, and an opportunity will be afforded for fully discussing the various clauses in Committee.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: My Lords, I confess I felt some commiseration for my noble Friend (Earl Granville) when he approached that portion of the Bill which deals with the very important subject of freedom of contract; because he must have felt—and I think his remarks showed clearly that he did feel—the impossibility of answering the very cogent arguments urged by the noble Duke at his side (the Duke of Argyll) in its favour. My noble Friend, as he frequently does, addressed us in a most agreeable and pleasant manner, and likened some of the measures which the Government have brought in to those balloons which we see carried about the streets. This, I must say, seems a little premature, seeing that most of the measures alluded to have been introduced in the House of Commons, and have not yet come before us; and I venture to suggest that, until they do, we are not so competent to say what is inside of them as my noble Friend appears to think himself to be. The simile which my noble Friend has employed seems to be a favourite one on his side of the House. If I mistake not, your Lordships have been described by an eminent statesman as being "up in a balloon." It seems to me there must be something very fascinating to noble Lords opposite in that simile of a balloon. My noble Friend went on to say that I had stated, in the speech with which I introduced the Bill, that the two principles which had guided the Government in introducing the measure were, first, to increase the food-producing power of the country; and, secondly, that I expressed my belief that unless the tenant had security for the capital which he invested in the soil we could not expect our resources to increase to a very great extent. Now, my Lords, I adhere to every one of the statements to which the noble Earl has referred. It is, of course, a question of degree as to how far a measure of this kind will affect the object; but I lay down, without fear of contradiction, the principle that the greater the security which a tenant has for the money which he has expended on his farm, the more likely will he be to extract from that farm the greatest possible amount of produce. My noble Friend went on to argue that the Bill was really of no use without compulsion. On that point I entirely differ from him. He also made another assertion, from which I equally dissent. He said that the great majority of the landlords of this country would not allow themselves to be brought within the purview of the Bill, and that therefore, so far as they were concerned, it would be useless. I believe the exact contrary will be found to be the case. I am of opinion that if the Bill be a good one, if the compensation proposed to be given for unexhausted improvements is based on the fair and sound principle on which it is in this measure, then both the landlords and tenants of the country will be very glad to be brought within its operation. I will give my noble Friend an example of what I mean. We are told by those who are acquainted with the custom which prevails in Lincolnshire that it is one of the best which could be devised specially for that part of the country. We find, accordingly, that this custom meets with the general approval of both the owners and occupiers of land. But the custom was one which existed not by the intervention of Parliament, but simply because it was believed by both landlord and tenant to be good. The interference of the Legislature was not, therefore, required. And so it will be with regard to this Bill if the manner in which it deals with unexhausted improvements and the relations between the owners and occupiers of the soil are just, as in the case of the Lincolnshire custom. Then the owner and occupier having regard to their own interests will come within its operation—and that, I believe, will occur in the great bulk of instances. If the Bill is a good one, both parties will come under it, and if it be a bad one you have no right to pass it. If you look upon it as not, perhaps, bad altogether, but unjust in some of its details, then I will merely observe that no one will be entitled to compel a man to come under its provisions. My noble Friend then went on to say that it was unwise of the Government to stir up the question. My noble Friend seems to have a great knowledge of all agricultural pursuits, and I should like to know from him whether, if the Government had introduced no measure on this question, he would have said nothing on the adoption of such a course? This subject was brought under the consideration of the House of Commons two or three years ago. On this point, I may add, I must join issue with the noble Marquess who spoke early in the evening (the Marquess of Huntly). I beg to assure him that it was not in consequence of the noble Marquess's "attempt at legislation" towards the close of last Session that we took up the question. A Resolution on the subject had been proposed in the other House. It was opposed by the Government, and the Prime Minister said that the Government would look into the matter, and, if possible, come forward next Session with some measure dealing with it, seeing that it agitated so much the minds of the agriculturists throughout the country. It was in consequence of that statement, and not of my noble Friend's attempt at legislation, that the present measure was introduced. My noble Friend does not, perhaps, read the agricultural papers, but if he did he would find that the subject is one which has been discussed by almost every Agricultural Chamber during the last 18 months. The Government, therefore, I contend, could not have allowed the Session to pass over without taking some action on the question one way or the other, and they were, under these circumstances, of opinion that by introducing a Bill themselves they would be dealing with it in a more satisfactory manner than if they were to wait until a Bill had been brought in by some independent Member of either House, with the inevitable result that it would ultimately fall into the hands of the Government, who would then have to carry through Parliament provisions for which they were in no way originally responsible, and in which, probably, it would be necessary to make alterations which would be attended with a great degree of trouble. As to the provisions of the present measure I can assure the noble Marquess behind me (the Marquess of Bath) that he is in error as to the mode in which they have been prepared. The Government have given the subject the greatest consideration and have observed in dealing with it the utmost caution. He also says that we have picked out the Bill from somewhere—whence he did not distinctly indicate—and have flung it on the Table to be considered by your Lordships. But if the noble Marquess had been in the House when I moved the first reading he would be aware that I endeavoured to state the details of the measure as fully as was in my power. I must also notice some other observations which fell from the noble Marquess. He says the limited owner can enter into collusion with his tenant under that clause of the Bill which enables him to put up permanent and expensive buildings, and then under the Bill raise money and charge the estate with the money so expended. I beg, however, to assure my noble Friend that nothing of the kind can be done under this measure. In the first place, if a tenant puts up a building with the consent of the landlord, then when he goes out the compensation to be awarded him is to be paid by the landlord in hard cash out of his pocket, and then only will he be able to get the money made a charge on the estate. There can, therefore, be no possible collusion. Besides, I do not think that it ought to go forth to the country that landlords and tenants are likely to combine together in so very doubtful a proceeding as that to which the noble Marquess has called attention. The noble Marquess next seems to be very much alarmed at the idea of the appeal being made to the County Court Judge, and to prefer the Inclosure Commissioners. Now, I have the greatest respect for the Inclosure Commissioners, but I venture to suggest that the County Court Judge would be likely to have more experience of the locality in which he was living. Then the noble Marquess made some remarks about the appeal to the Judge from a referee appointed by himself. The noble Marquess loses sight of the fact that when the County Court Judge is asked to appoint an umpire he will do so without inquiry as to the facts to be brought before the umpire. All he will have to do will be, with the advantage of a knowledge of the people in the locality, to select an impartial and competent man. I will now touch one or two remarks made by the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Somerset)—and in regard not only to them but to other remarks that have been made I wish to say that it will be my duty to consider them carefully, not with the view of objecting to them, but for the purpose of making the measure as satisfactory as possible. There is some force in the criticism of the noble Duke as to the importance of requiring that notice should be given to the landlord of an improvement for which it is intended to claim compensation, and I think that a provision in accordance with that suggestion may with advantage be inserted in the Bill. In regard to other observations of the noble Duke, I would say that I think it has not been sufficiently borne in mind that the key-note of the Bill is the principle that the improvement for which the tenant seeks compensation must be an improvement which has added to the letting value of the holding. Clause 14, which deals with what is called "compensation for waste," has been condemned as an unfair clause framed too much in the interest of the landlords. I may say with regard to it that it was borrowed from a measure framed by the Chambers of Agriculture, and therefore has the approval of that body. A difference between the provisions as to waste and those as to improvements was also commented on; but it must be borne in mind that you can define an improvement, but cannot define a waste. With regard to the classes of improvements specified in the Bill, we were desirous, on the one hand, not to restrict them to too small a number, and, on the other hand, not to include a great variety of minor improvements; and we believe that what we have put down will really meet the requirements of the case. As to the principle of freedom of contract, about which something has been said, I will content myself with declaring on behalf of the Government that we hold that principle to be one of paramount importance. I would never have put my hand to the measure if I had thought it interfered with that freedom; and if a provision interfering with it should be inserted by this House or "elsewhere," it will be tantamount to throwing out the Bill, for I, for one, would not be a party to any such measure. In the provisions as they stand, there is, I believe, no such interference. As to Clause 38, I intend to propose in Committee that it be struck out, and that the following be inserted in its place:—

"This Act, in the absence of or subject to any contract in writing between the landlord and tenant, shall apply to all contracts of tenancy taking effect after the commencement of this Act."

"For the purposes of this section, a contract of tenancy from year to year, current at the commencement of this Act, shall be deemed to take effect from and after the end of the first year of tenancy begun and completed after the commencement of this Act."

"Except as aforesaid, this Act shall not apply to any contract of tenancy current at the commencement of this Act."

The Act will come into operation on the 1st of January, 1876. The end of the first year of tenancy began and completed after the commencement of the Act will, in the case of Lady Day entries, be Lady Day, 1877, and in the case of Michaelmas entries, Michaelmas, 1877; and therefore in cases where, at Lady Day or Michaelmas, 1877, there is no contract in writing between the landlord and the tenant, the Act will begin to apply. There would thus be ample time given to persons interested to study the provisions of the measure. I am speaking now of year-to-year holdings—not of leases. What I have indicated will, I think, be a satisfactory way of dealing with the matter, and it seems to me that with such a provision all parties would, so to speak, slide easily into the operation of the measure. It was the intention and desire of Her Majesty's Government that the Bill should become law this Session. I hope that your Lordships will be able to agree to the details in Committee, and that the Bill will be sent down in time for the House of Commons to pass it into law this Session if they think fit to do so. I can conceive nothing more unsatisfactory than that a question of this sort, which touches the relations between landlord and tenant, should remain open and in a state of uncertainty.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY desired to make some remarks in support of the Bill on political grounds. It could not be said that this Bill was necessary on agricultural grounds, for, on the one hand, the greater part of England was governed by customs of the country, fulfilling all the objects of this Bill—customs which were gradually extending themselves to those places which did not yet possess them; and, on the other hand, the Bill was unnecessary on the noble Duke's own showing, since, as he said on the first reading, the small holders did not require it, because they had no money to lay out on what were called improvements; and the larger tenants, who had money to lay out, were perfectly well able to protect themselves by covenants and leases. It must, however, be admitted that this Bill had become necessary on political grounds, and in order to meet a factitious demand, caused by the agitation of a mixed body, composed of enthusiasts, sciolists, vendors of artificial manures, essayists, and political speculators. The greater part of these writers had more acquaintance with the theory than with the practice of farming; but it was not possible to blame them, when it was remembered that the principal impulse had been given to this school by a leading Member of Her Majesty's Government, who laying aside, or deserted, by his habitual caution, stated ex cathedra that the produce of England might be doubled by better farming. Now, when it was remembered that the agricultural produce of England was higher than that of any country on the Continent of Europe, it might be assumed that if the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) had been speaking of Foreign instead of Home Affairs, he would have been careful to state that the produce of England might be quadrupled or quintupled, so as to make it more abundantly clear that he was merely making things pleasant for his Lancashire entertainers; and it might be safely asserted that outside of the Island of Laputa there was no place except the towns of Lancashire where it would be believed that a farmer could obtain any quantity of produce by any amount of reckless expenditure, or that the moderate increase of yield which might be obtained by high farming could be indefinitely sustained, without the soil being exhausted, since it was impossible to force nature. The aims and objects of that portion of the agitators for high farming enforced by legislation were entirely opposed to the interests of the small holders, and to the aims of the political advocates of legislative interference with farming, since they would have the effect of driving out all the small holders. The enemies of the landed interest, who just now, for the purposes of this Bill, affected an earnest desire for increase of production of food, were very inconsistent; for they were the same men who prevented the Government from taking efficient precautions to prevent the entrance of diseased cattle into the country, and the contamination of the herds of the country, which they hastened to say were of small importance as compared with the quantity of imported cattle. In the same way, and owing to the outcry which would be raised by these same men, however great might be the danger to be apprehended from the Colorado beetle, Her Majesty's Government would not venture to prohibit the importation of American potatoes, even though all the potatoes of this country should be lost by their not doing so. The objection which had been made in some quarters to this Bill, because it was not compulsory, was based on theory only, and made in ignorance of the facts of the case. In the first place, it would be unnecessary to substitute the provisions of this Bill for the various customs of the country, each best suited for its own district, and which need not be abolished for the sake of uniformity; and, secondly, the hardship of allowing a landlord to notify that he would not abide by this Bill was a purely imaginary hardship, since after it had become law it would be impossible for any landlord to refuse the provisions of this Bill, unless some equivalent custom already existed, or unless he was prepared to offer his tenant some equivalent arrangement. With regard to the clauses of the Bill which provided for compensation to be paid by a tenant for deterioration of the farm, he regarded all such provisions as entirely valueless and illusory, except, possibly, as a set-off against tenants who, besides ruining their farms and themselves, might be tempted by this Bill to claim compensation for doing so. As the noble Duke was not of this opinion, he hoped he would give their Lordships some information on this point derived from his personal experience. According to his own experience and that of all his acquaintances, when a tenant got in a bad way a landlord was fortunate if he got rid of him, even at a loss, and he did not believe that these provisions of the Bill would be of much use south of the Tweed. With regard to the objections to the clauses extending the powers of limited owners, made by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Bath), he disagreed with them entirely, and it seemed to him that anyone who heard that noble Marquess' speech would suppose that he was a believer in the doctrine of metempsychosis, and expected to return to this world as his own remainderman.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House, on Thursday next.

COUNTY COURTS BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the Acts relating to the County Courts—Was presented by The LORD CHANCELLOR; read 1st. (No. 57.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 15th April, 1875.

MINUTES.]—WAYS AND MEANS—considered in Committee.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Metaliferous Mines * [120]; Falsification of Accounts * [121].

SELECT COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN [LOANS—LETTER OF M. HERRAN.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

MR. DISRAELI: I wish to give Notice, that on the Order of the Day to-morrow I shall move this Resolution—

"It having been stated in 'The Times' and 'Daily News' newspapers of the 9th instant, referred to in the Order of the House of the 13th instant, that a letter, professing to be written by M. Victor Herran, Honduras Minister in Paris, and addressed to the Right honorable Robert Lowe, Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Loans, was read and made part of the proceedings before the Select Committee on Foreign Loans on the 8th instant, that it be referred to the said Committee to report to the House whether such letter was produced and read before the said Committee and under what circumstances, and whether any copy of the said letter was communicated by or on behalf of the said Committee to the said newspapers or either of them."

DOMINION OF CANADA—NEWFOUNDLAND.—QUESTION.

MR. W. JOHNSTON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether any negotiations are, or have been, in progress for the admission of Newfoundland into the Dominion of Canada, in accordance with provision made in "The British North America Act, 1867?"

MR. J. LOWTHER: Since 1869, when proposals for the admission of Newfoundland into the Dominion failed to obtain the sanction of the constituencies of that island, no fresh negotiations have been entered into. The question is, of course, one of undiminished interest to Her Majesty's Government, and to the Governments of the Dominion, and of the colony concerned; but it is understood that public feeling in Newfoundland is not at present distinctly expressed in favour of this step.

VALUATION BILL—TITHE ASSESSMENT.—QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN asked the President of the Local Government Board, If the Government propose to introduce in this Session a Valuation Bill; and, if so, whether, in the assessment of tithe, not the property of laymen, an allowance will be made by way of deduction from the gross assessable value for the outlay incurred in the employment of curates?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: I prepared a Valuation Bill in the Recess, and should be happy to introduce it, if there appeared any reasonable probability that it could be passed into law within the present Session. It would not be convenient that I should state by anticipation any of its provisions; but I may say that the subject of the hon. Gentleman's inquiry was fully considered in framing the measure.

IMPORTATION OF FOREIGN ANIMALS—THE REGULATIONS.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the President of the Local Government Board, When the regulations framed by the local authority in London under the 37 and 38 Vic. c. 67 will be ready for issue; whether in the regulations as submitted to the Local Government Board for confirmation provision has been made for the temporary detention of animals intended for slaughter; and, whether it would be possible to lay the regulations upon the Table of the House before they are finally confirmed and issued?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: I cannot say when these Regulations will be ready for issue. They were submitted to the Local Government Board some time since, and have been returned to the Metropolitan Board of Works, with certain amendments for their consideration. There was no provision in the Regulations for the temporary detention of animals intended for slaughter; but I am aware that a suggestion to that effect has been submitted. I do not doubt it would be possible to lay the Regulations on the Table, though I think such a course might be inconvenient as a precedent; but my hon. and gallant Friend the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works (Sir James Hogg) which is the local authority in question, would be better able to answer that inquiry.

ARMY—ADJUTANTS OF MILITIA. QUESTION.

MR. WAIT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether an Adjutant of Militia, who on retiring from the adjutantcy has accepted a commission as Major in the regiment, would, on the command of that regiment becoming vacant, be eligible for promotion to that rank and command; or whether, as heretofore, the vacancy would be filled by a half-pay Field Officer from the regular forces; and, whether he would be willing in any cases to commute for cash the pensions to which adjutants may be entitled?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, the adjutants would be eligible in the same way as lieutenant colonels, and each case would have to be decided on its merits. He had already stated that the Commissioners had already commuted for cash the pensions to which adjutants were entitled, and he had no reason to doubt that they would continue to act on that principle.

FACTORY AND WORKSHOP REGULATION ACTS—THE ROYAL COMMISSION—WOMEN IN FACTORIES.

QUESTION.

MR. WILLIAM HOLMS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, as no reference is made to adult women in the Royal Commission issued to inquire into the working of the Factory and Workshop Regulation Acts, it is intended to exclude their case either from the proposed inquity or from the recommendations to be made by the Commissioners in respect to the alteration and amendment of these Acts; and, if so, will he be good enough to inform the House how he proposes to meet the case of adult women who, under existing Acts, may be employed in bleach-works, print-works, finishing-works, and other branches of industry for sixty (and under certain circumstances for sixty-three) hours per week, while women employed under much more favourable conditions to health in textile factories are restricted to fifty-six hours and a half per week by the Factory Act of 1874?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, it was not the intention of the Government to control in any way the inquiry of the Royal Commission. Neither was there any wish to impose, as a general rule, any restrictions on the labour of adult persons. But, no doubt, the case of adult women might be made a subject of special provision in special cases. Where the Factory and Workshop Regulation Acts were not in operation, that would be a subject for consideration.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT, 1870—VOLUNTARY SCHOOLS.—QUESTION.

MR. MUNDELLA asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether he can state to the House the effect of the Education Act of 1870 on voluntary schools, in the following respects: 1. The attendance of scholars; 2. The fees of scholars; 3. The amount of the voluntary contributions; 4. The Government grants?

VISCOUNT SANDON: In reply to the Question of the hon. Gentleman it will, of course, be understood that the only answer I can give will be respecting those voluntary schools which receive a Government grant. Respecting the numerous voluntary schools which do not receive a Government grant, I am not able to give the information required. 1. In 1870 the average attendance in all public elementary schools, which were then all voluntary, was 1,226,034, of which 1,152,389 was in day schools. In 1874 the average attendance in voluntary public elementary schools alone was 1,585,372, of which 1,540,466 was in day schools. 2. The fees paid in 1870 in day and in night schools were £502,022, or 8s. 8d. per head on the average attendance. In 1874 the fees amounted to £762,184, or 9s. 10d. per head. 3. The voluntary subscriptions to day and night schools in 1870 amounted to £418,839, or to 7s. 3d. per head on the average attendance. In 1874 they amounted to £601,172, or to 7s. 9d. per head. 4. In 1870, before the new Code came into operation, the Government grant to day schools was £562,611, or 9s. 9d. per head on the average attendance. In 1874 the day voluntary schools received under the new Code £956,347, or 12s. 5d. per head. The grant to night schools in 1870 was £24,879, or 6s. 9d. per head. In 1874 it was £17,178, or 7s. 6d. per head. In addition to the Question put on the Paper by the hon. Gentleman, I may add that the night schools in 1870 were 24,000, and in 1874, 17,000.

INDIA—BANDA AND KIRWEE PRIZE MONEY.—QUESTION.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether there is any portion of the Banda and Kirwee prize money in the hands of the Government; and, if so, will he inform the House when it will be paid to those entitled to it?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: A complete account of the prize has not yet been received from India; but it is believed that about £30,000 of that booty is still in the possession of the Government. It is probable that this will not be more than sufficient to meet the outstanding claims arising on the distributions already authorized. It is therefore not likely that any further distribution will be made to those whose authorized claims have been already satisfied.

INDIA—VISIT OF THE PRINCE OF WALES TO INDIA. QUESTION.

MR. HANKEY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is intended by the Government, in the event of the Prince of Wales visiting India, to propose to Parliament to make such provision as will enable His Royal Highness to discharge such duties as may be considered befitting his position as the representative of Her Majesty with becoming dignity?

Mr. William Holmes

MR. DISRAELI: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Gentleman, in his hypothetical Question, makes an inquiry of a somewhat ambiguous nature. The hon. Gentleman inquires—

“Whether it is intended by the Government, in the event of the Prince of Wales visiting India, to propose to Parliament to make such provision as will enable His Royal Highness to discharge such duties as may be considered befitting his position as the representative of Her Majesty.”

I apprehend that in the event of His Royal Highness visiting India he would not visit it as the representative of Her Majesty. The Viceroy would continue to fulfil the duties which are attendant on that office. But I may say generally to the hon. Gentleman, that in the event of the Prince of Wales visiting India, and in the event of Her Majesty's Government having to make any public communication on the subject, the House of Commons will be the first body in the country to whom that communication will be made.

TWEED FISHERIES ACTS—REPORT OF THE SPECIAL COMMISSIONERS.

QUESTION.

MR. TREVELYAN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the note appended to the Report of the Special Commission on the Tweed Fisheries Acts, at page 201 of the Index, in which the Commissioners state that—“They are satisfied that the additional constables engaged in the protection of the river may be supplemented, and, in point of fact, are supplemented, by the county police, who are so far liable to be withdrawn from their special duties;”

whether he has noticed the evidence given before that Commission by the Sheriff Substitute of Roxburghshire, to the effect that “the efficiency of the police is considerably injured” by their employment as water bailiffs; and, whether he is prepared henceforward to permit that members of the regular county police should assist the constables paid from the funds of the Tweed Commissioners in their duties as water bailiffs?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, his attention had been called to the Report to which his hon. Friend alluded; but he had not yet been able to give it that attention which it deserved. He might say, however, with respect to the supplementary force for the protection of rivers, that before the presentation of this Report he had been in communication with the Inspectors of Police in England on the subject, and the attention of the Government was directed to it.

WATER SUPPLY.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, having in view the inadequate supply of water for drinking and other purposes in many towns, rural villages, and districts throughout the Country, Her Majesty's Government are prepared during the present Session with any measure to remedy this evil; and, if not, whether the Government will consent to an inquiry into the subject by a Royal Commission, for the purpose of ascertaining the wants of various rural districts, and the best method of storing water where needed?

MR. SCLATER-BOOOTH: I stated very recently, in reply to a Question addressed to me in this House, what new powers and facilities in respect of water supply were proposed to be conferred by the Public Health Bill of this Session. The Government have no further legislation to propose on the subject at present. In reply to my hon. Friend's further Question as to a Royal Commission, the Government have not yet had time for its consideration. In considering it their object would be to adopt such a course as might lead to a practical conclusion with the least delay.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS)

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON asked the Vice President of the Privy Council, Whether, in the monthly return published by the Veterinary Department of the Privy Council Office, under section 22 of “The Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1869,”—he would state in addition—(1.) Whether the foreign ports from which the animals are brought are in scheduled or unscheduled countries; (2.) The number of the healthy animals brought in the same vessel with the diseased animals, and the mode in which such healthy animals have been disposed of, whether by slaughter or otherwise?

VISCOUNT SANDON: In answer to my hon. Friend, I beg to say that the matters he has referred to do not come within my Department. I, however, brought the subject before the Lord President, and he has authorized me to say that he will be happy to direct the additions to be made to the monthly Return which my hon. Friend desires, and, if possible, will have them added to that of next month.

INDIA—THE BENGAL FAMINE.

QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If it is intended to bestow any honours or rewards on any of those who fought the Indian famine for us, or if there is any regulation limiting such honours and rewards to strictly military services?

MR. DISRAELI: The hon. Gentleman apparently assumes in his Question that the honours and rewards conferred by Her Majesty are conferred only for military services; but that is not the case. On the contrary, many honours and rewards have been conferred, even recently, by Her Majesty for services which are strictly civil. There were, I think, three Knights Commanderships of the Bath conferred for Civil services even in this year, besides several Commanderships and Knights Commanderships of the Order of St. Michael and St. George, and many Knighthoods for Civil services, or for distinction in science and otherwise, by which public respect is gained. There have also been some hereditary honours conferred for Civil services; and therefore I do not think the hon. Gentleman right in his assumption that the honours and rewards conferred by Her Majesty are strictly for military services. With respect to the great labours of those who successfully contended with the Indian Famine, I may say it is but very recently that their success has been attained. On all these occasions—I am not now speaking with reference peculiarly to the labours connected with the Indian Famine, but to labours of this character when the conduct is performed in a distant country and the exertions have been shared by many individuals—it is of great importance that the utmost care should be taken that no mistake is committed—that you should not, for instance, reward the wrong people—a mistake that is sometimes made and not easily remedied. I may also say to the hon. Gentleman that when you are considering such circumstances it should be remembered that all honours, excepting hereditary honours, are with very slight exceptions limited in number. It is not sufficiently known by the country—and, if I might presume to say so, even by the Houses of Parliament—that there is no Order of Knighthood which is not limited in its numbers, and vacancies may not occur for some time. The hon. Gentleman will see, therefore, that there are a great many considerations which have to be taken into account when the distribution of honours or rewards for services of the kind referred to has to be made; and I would say humbly to the hon. Gentleman that, on the whole, considering the difficulties attendant on a satisfactory distribution of such honours and rewards, it is best to leave the exercise of that Prerogative to Her Majesty and her responsible Advisers.

FRANCE—DECLARATION OF PARIS, 1856.—EXPLANATION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE: I have to ask the House to allow me to offer an explanation in respect to the vote taken on the Previous Question, moved by the hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Cartwright), when I brought under notice the Declaration of Paris, on Tuesday evening. It has been suggested to me that I acted disrespectfully to the House in leaving the House when the Question was about to be put to a division taken upon it. I wish, therefore, to explain that I had stated that I wished to withdraw the Notice I had given, but was not prepared to divide upon the Previous Question, which did not meet the merits of the case. I venture to think that if the division had been taken upon my own Motion, instead of upon the Previous Question, the result would have been very different.

PRIVILEGE—THE QUEEN v. CASTRO—THE PRITTLEWELL PETITION.

SPECIAL REPORT OF THE PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE.

Order for Consideration of Special Report read.

MR. DISRAELI: It becomes my duty to ask the House to consider this Report of the Committee, and to suggest the course which, on reflection and due investigation of the circumstances, I think it is for the public interest and the honour of the House they should follow. I will not move that the Petition be read at the Table. If hon. Gentlemen wish it, it may be done; but by taking that course, we should really give that stimulus to improper addresses to this House which is obtained by notoriety. I think I can accurately and impartially convey the contents of this Petition to the House without reproducing all those expressions and that tone of feeling which has arrested the attention of our careful Committee on Petitions. Now, Sir, this Petition has one remarkable characteristic. It is really two Petitions in one—that is to say, there are two prayers. Not that there are really two prayers conjointly at the end, but after a certain statement of facts is made, a prayer to the House is introduced; then follows a new statement of facts, and the Petitioners again address a prayer to the House upon that point. It cannot be said to be wholly unconnected with the previous prayer; but still it is a distinct and independent one. The Petition itself is a Petition which impugns the conduct of the three Judges who presided over the Trial at Bar of the convict Orton. It believes that there was not a fair trial; it gives, under three heads, the feeling, or the reasoning, if by courtesy it may be so called, by which the Petitioners have arrived at that conclusion. They state that the three Judges had prejudged the case—that by the expression of their opinion before the trial they had shown that they were hostile to the Claimant or Defendant. In the second place, they state that, in consequence of conducting the trial with this foregone conclusion, witnesses were brow-beaten, the jury prejudiced, and at times coerced; the Defendant's Counsel insulted, and interfered with, so that he could not do his duty to his client; and, thirdly, they declare that the summing-up was dishonest and corrupt, and they impute in some detail corrupt motives throughout to the Judges in this transaction. This part of the Petition concludes with a prayer that this House would address Her Majesty to remove—these three Judges from the Bench. Well, now, so far as we have proceeded, I do not think this House will have any difficulty as to the course it should adopt. This is not the first Petition in the records of Parliament—of this House—which has been addressed to it, and in which the conduct of the Judges has been impugned. I felt it my duty to search the Journals of the House in order that the House might have information as to precedents at its command; and I think it more convenient and more likely to lead to an earlier completion of the business if I place this information at once as briefly as I can before the House, that the House shall have at once in its possession all the information which will enable it to arrive at the conclusion which I wish to propose that the House shall adopt. The precedents to which I refer commence in the year 1816. On the 8th of May there was a Petition of Mr. Taaffe, complaining that the President of the Court of Session had been guilty of various acts of malversation in the administration of justice. The Motion that the Petition do lie on the Table was negatived. On the 11th of July, 1817, a Petition was offered to be presented complaining of the conduct of Mr. Justice Day. A Motion was made that the Petition should be brought up, but it was, by leave, withdrawn. On the 22nd of December, 1819, a Petition was presented complaining of the conduct of magistrates, and praying for inquiry, and it was rejected. That instance is memorable, because Mr. Huskisson took part in the debate; and he said—

“The House could not think of entertaining and retrying a case which had been already disposed of in a Court of Justice.”—[1 Hansard, xli. 1447.]

On the 23rd of February, 1821, there was a Petition of Mr. Thomas Davison, complaining of the conduct of Mr. Justice Best in fining him while he was on his defence. That was offered to be presented. There was a division on the Motion, and the presentation was negatived. It may be said that these instances occurred in somewhat hard times, when there was not that sympathy with popular rights and popular sentiments which, at present, happily exists in this country; but it was necessary I should place them before the House; and the precedents which I will now quote are of sufficiently modern date.

On the 28th of July, 1870, the House was moved—

“That a Petition having been presented to this House upon the 10th day of June last, from certain inhabitants of the city of Waterford, containing grave charges against Baron Hughes, one of the Judges of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, in respect of his judicial conduct upon the trial of the late Election Petition in that city, and praying for inquiry, and no action having been taken thereon by any Member of this House, order made on the 10th day of June last that the said Petition do lie on the Table might be read; and, the same being read: Ordered that the said Order be discharged;”

and it was further ordered that so much of the Appendix to the Report of the Select Committee on Petitions as contained the Petition should be cancelled. On the 3rd of July, 1874, notice having been taken that a Petition of the Rev. James Thwaytes, rector of Caldbeck, in the county of Cumberland, which was presented on the 22nd of June last, contained imputations on the conduct of certain of the Judges, and also statements affecting the social and legal position of individuals, the Order made on the 22nd of June last “That the Petition do lie on the Table” was read, and discharged, and it was Ordered, “That the Petition, as printed in the Appendix to the Seventeenth Report on Public Petitions, be cancelled, and that the Petition be withdrawn.” These are precedents which completely apply to the present case. I am bound to say for myself, and for my Colleagues—whose advice I have had the advantage of obtaining—that we are not at all inclined to put a strict interpretation upon the language used in the Petitions which complain of the conduct of Judges of the Realm. We should pass over much violent and coarse language if an accusation were distinct and not vague, and if the Member who presented the Petition gave security for its authenticity by announcing to the House that he intended to proceed upon it. The administration of justice—the just administration of the law, I would rather say—is, I believe, one of the sources of the great content which prevails, and has long prevailed, in this country. It is one of those blessings that every Englishman duly feels, and of which he is proud; and I am of opinion that we should not too severely scrutinize the language of Petitions which refer to the conduct of the Judges of the land, and impute to them an improper and corrupt motive, provided the charges are distinct and not vague, and that the Member who presents these Petitions announces to the House that he intends to take immediate steps to ask the opinion of the House upon the subject. Therefore, so far as this Petition impugns the conduct of the Judges in the particular case concerned, I have nothing further to say, except that if the Gentleman who presented the Petition, who, I believe, is my hon. Friend the Member for the county of Essex (Colonel Makins), announces that he is prepared, having presented that Petition, to ask the opinion of the House upon its contents, I should not, so far as I have gone, oppose the receipt of that Petition. The next point to which I have to call the attention of the House is, in my opinion, of a much more serious character. I refer to the second portion and the second prayer of this Petition. Having concluded their prayer that this House would interfere for the removal of the three Judges, this Petition proceeds to announce that the Petitioners have heard with alarm and surprise that no less a personage than you, Sir, the most eminent Member of this House, had announced that Petitions complaining of unfair trial cannot be received. It is not necessary for me to say that no such opinion was given by you. I am not at all wishing to influence the House in the course I am recommending to them, nor to aggravate the case before us, by showing that it touches so exalted a personage as the right hon. Gentleman who presides over our deliberations, and appealing—as I know I should successfully do—to their conviction that the best feelings and highest interests of this House are involved in maintaining the authority of the Chair. It is certainly not necessary for me to refer at all to this point with the view of ensuring its due influence on our deliberations. Having made the statement that they have heard with astonishment, alarm, and surprise that this expression of opinion has been made by Mr. Speaker, they proceed in a style of invective on the subject, and they end by a prayer that the House of Commons will take measures for the impeachment of Mr. Speaker. I would have the House to observe that in the second part of this Petition there is involved a violation of our most import and cherished privilege. It is not a question of Breach of Privilege, like that which we may unfortunately have to discuss to-morrow, and in which we are obliged, on the whole, deeming it for the public advantage, to expedite the course of fair play and justice by referring to the obsolete, yet necessary, machinery; but it involves a Breach of the highest Privilege of the Members of this House—namely, that they should not be called in question by persons out of this House for words which they have used in this House. That, indeed, is the only security we have for free discussion and freedom of debate, and that has always been looked upon as the most precious privilege of Members of the House of Commons. They cannot be impugned; they cannot be proceeded against on account of words which are used in this House. Now here is a distinct and gross violation of that Privilege of the House, for the words of a Member of this House, uttered in it, are impugned and threatened by those out of the House, and that in regard to a Member, the most eminent in position, whom the House of Commons are called upon to visit with the penalties of impeachment in consequence of those words. The House will see in a moment—it is not necessary for me to dwell upon it—that if this privilege of free speech is not most rigidly and sacredly guarded in this House, opportunities may be taken by persons of authority and power—whether they be Monarchs or Mobs—the difference would not be great—to crush the freedom of discussion in this House, upon which the liberties of the people and the welfare of this Realm mainly depend. Therefore, as this Petition contains a gross violation of the Privileges of this House by calling into question words used in this House by a Member, I move that the Order for this Petition lying on the Table be rescinded.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

COLONEL MAKINS: As I am the Member who presented this Petition, the House will, perhaps, allow me to say a few words in explanation. I believe the best course which any Member of this House can adopt when he finds that he has by inadvertence or carelessness committed an error, is frankly to avow it, and throw himself on the indulgence of the House. That, Sir, is my case. The history of this Petition, so far as I am concerned, is very short and simple, and if the House will allow me I will relate it. I received a letter from a constituent living at Prittlewell, a day or two before the Easter Recess, asking me whether I would present a Petition for the release, as he termed it in his letter, of “that unhappy nobleman now languishing in prison.” Secondly, I was asked whether I would support the prayer of the Petition; and, lastly, whether I would give the hon. Member for Stoke a patient hearing when he brought his Motion before the House. I replied to those Questions categorically, that I would present the Petition; that I could not support its prayer; and that I would not interrupt the hon. Member for Stoke. On my return to town after Easter I found the Petition; and I am sorry to say, without carefully looking at it, or making myself fully acquainted with the contents or the nature of the language in which it was couched, I presented that Petition. I have nothing more to say. I do not intend to take any course with regard to the Petition; I leave the matter entirely in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman, except that I only wish to say this—that there is no Member of this House who would feel more regret than I do at having inadvertently become the means of conveying through the Forms of this House an unmerited censure upon the Bench and upon you, Sir. There is no Member of this House who has a greater admiration for the diligence and the ability with which Her Majesty’s Judges discharge the most sacred duty of administering justice in England. There is no one who has a profounder faith in the impartiality and integrity with which those duties are discharged. And I am sorry to say there is no one who has a profounder—I was going to say, contempt, but I would rather use the word pity, than I have for the victims of that monstrous delusion, of the existence of which this Petition is evidence—I mean the delusion that the person referred to in the Petition has been the victim of a persecuting conspiracy, whether aristocratic or Jesuitical, and that he has not had a fair trial. Thanking the House for having listened to my explanation, I beg to express my regret that I should have presented the Petition.

SIR CHARLES FORSTER said, that as Chairman of the Public Petitions Committee his duty in this matter was simply a Ministerial duty, and must be held to have been discharged with the presentation of the Report, which at the request of the Committee he had laid on the Table on Monday last. The matter then passed from their hands to those of the Government and the House. He wished to correct a misapprehension which prevailed as to the functions of the Public Petitions Committee. He was asked why some of the Petitions on the Tichborne Case were not summarily rejected by the Committee. They had, however, no power to reject any Petition which had once been received by the House except on the ground of informality; and therefore it was most desirable that Members undertaking the presentation of doubtful Petitions should, at the time of their presentation, call the attention of the House to the subject-matter, in order that when the Question was put from the Chair that the Petition should lie upon the Table, the House might, if it thought fit, give a negative vote, and thus obviate the necessity and trouble of a proceeding like the present. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman and the House that in the case of the Petition complaining of the conduct of Baron Hughes, to which allusion had been made, the ground there given for discharging the Order was that no action had been taken since the presentation of it. Speaking for himself, he might say that, notwithstanding the strong language of the Petition under discussion, he could not have voted for the discharge of the Order if the hon. Member for South Essex (Colonel Makins) had stated in his place that it was his intention to follow up that Petition by a Motion. The right of Petitioners to approach that House was an ancient and constitutional right, which did not admit of question. But while the House was always prepared to give every facility for the exercise of that right, it had ever shown a disinclination to allow its Forms to be made use of for the purpose of circulating charges and attacks which it was not intended seriously to follow up. It was scarcely necessary for him, on the part either of himself or of his Colleagues, to disclaim the slightest animus in the Tichborne Case. In the discharge of their functions the Committee had but one wish, and that was to discharge their duties in strict accordance with the regulations and practice of Parliament as they understood them, and to mete out to all Petitions that came before them equal justice and courtesy.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR: I venture, Sir, to differ from the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, though I cannot conceal from myself that the right hon. Gentleman's opinion is shared by a large majority of the House. A Petition which prayed for the release of the prisoner in question has been adopted by a large majority of the inhabitants of Leicester, and has the signature of 15,000 persons. Here I wish to say that in their views I have no sympathy or belief whatever; but the right of Petition is an ancient and sacred right. It is much more than a right; it is a duty which it is eminently for the interest of the House to cherish and encourage as much as we can, and to hinder and relax it as little as possible by the suggestion of technical difficulties. It is important in the interests of good order that the people of this country should feel that the House of Commons is the Great Inquest of the Nation, before whom they can bring complaints and demand inquiry or redress. It is therefore most important that the right of Petition should be preserved and encouraged, and this is the natural result of free discussion. Now, Sir, it is said that this Petition contains gross libels against the Judges, and against many other individuals. I believe it with all my heart. But what then? All charges against public functionaries must contain libels. The question of acting upon these Petitions, or of receiving them, is, I submit, an entirely different thing. If the hon. Member for Stoke (Dr. Kenealy) or the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) founded a Motion on these Petitions, I should unhesitatingly give my vote against them. But that is no reason why great masses of the people should be cut off from petitioning. I believe that this Petition contains libels; but it is not impossible to conceive that there might be such things—indeed, there have been such things—as corrupt and unjust Judges; and, that being so, to whom did the people come but to this House to protest, and to seek their removal. I believe I am right in saying that for a period of 200 years—from the time of William and Mary—the Judges have not held their offices according to the pleasure of the Crown, but quamdiu se bene gesserint; and therefore to whom are the people of England to come but to this House, to say that they believe injustice has been done and to ask their Representatives to join and assist them in presenting an Address to the Crown? The right hon. Gentleman says he would not have moved that this Petition should not be received had the hon. Member who presented it (Colonel Makins) declared his willingness to bring forward in this House a Motion in accordance with its prayer. I consider that in that the right hon. Gentleman is proposing to do great injustice to the Members of this House as well as to the people who send Petitions here. We have heard of a Petition signed by 15,000 infatuated people at Leicester, but it would be gross injustice to compel the hon. Member for Leicester to bring forward a Motion in accordance with it. The strongest part of the case of the right hon. Gentleman is undoubtedly the unwise, foolish, and even insulting observations upon yourself, Sir. I shall not show any disrespect for you, Sir, because here, in your presence, I do not lavish terms of laudation. I will only say that your position is such as to enable you to pass by such folly without a word. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) made a great deal more of this matter than he need have done, because he admitted that the words used in the Petition, and attributed to the Speaker, were not used by him, and therefore the rudeness towards you, Sir, was but an hypothetical rudeness. Sir, I give an emphatic “No” to the Motion.

MR. HOPWOOD: Sir, I assure you it is with great reluctance that I address the House upon this question, and I do so, I hope, with a sense of the responsibility due to the position which I assume. Although I have been sitting by the side of my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor), my resolve in this matter has been come to without any sort of concert with him. I think we had better look at this matter before it grows to larger dimensions, and before it becomes a question which may very much trouble us, as it has already troubled the constituencies of the country. I am in the same position as the hon. Member for Leicester in this respect, that I am threatened with a Petition to present in the same interest, worded exactly as this is, and founded upon the same delusions. I disclaim any sort of belief in any part of the Petition; but how is the mischief to be cured? What is the mischief that is proceeding? I beg the House to beware of it. It is this—that for nearly a year past the foulest slanders have been allowed to be published, and there has been no hand raised, no Ministerial voice expressed upon this matter; and with the exception of the rejection, Sir, by you, in your capacity of Speaker of this House, of a Petition last year, I do not suppose there has been the slightest notice taken of that which is fermenting in the country. Now, if these slanders are allowed to be stated, what must be the inference in the minds of men who read them daily or weekly? It must be this—first, they are in print, and that to comparatively uneducated minds may give them an authenticity that they would otherwise want; and when they read them, as they do, they must arrive at this conclusion, that if not true, those who disseminate them should be at once prosecuted. But if they are true, is it because you are afraid to prosecute that you do not proceed? Then, if such is not the case, how can you complain of the constituencies believing these statements to be true? If they are true, then I say it is noble and generous of the people to believe them, and they do right to come here to this House and present Petitions, couched although they may be in terms which we might take exception to, but certainly conveying specific charges with which it is for this House to deal. Now, what does this Petition do? It states certain matters which might be inquired into. Where can they be inquired into? Where so fittingly as in this House? A verdict given by a Committee upon these charges would yield comfort to this country. One of the precedents adduced by the Prime Minister was when the House refused to try a criminal over again, and I quite agree with such a precedent as that, but it does not govern this case. In this case it is charged that certain persons in high

had a fair trial. Thanking the House for having listened to my explanation, I beg to express my regret that I should have presented the Petition.

SIR CHARLES FORSTER said, that as Chairman of the Public Petitions Committee his duty in this matter was simply a Ministerial duty, and must be held to have been discharged with the presentation of the Report, which at the request of the Committee he had laid on the Table on Monday last. The matter then passed from their hands to those of the Government and the House. He wished to correct a misapprehension which prevailed as to the functions of the Public Petitions Committee. He was asked why some of the Petitions on the Tichborne Case were not summarily rejected by the Committee. They had, however, no power to reject any Petition which had once been received by the House except on the ground of informality; and therefore it was most desirable that Members undertaking the presentation of doubtful Petitions should, at the time of their presentation, call the attention of the House to the subject-matter, in order that when the Question was put from the Chair that the Petition should lie upon the Table, the House might, if it thought fit, give a negative vote, and thus obviate the necessity and trouble of a proceeding like the present. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman and the House that in the case of the Petition complaining of the conduct of Baron Hughes, to which allusion had been made, the ground there given for discharging the Order was that no action had been taken since the presentation of it. One of the precedents adduced by the Prime Minister was when the House refused to try a criminal over again, and I quite agree with such a precedent as that, but it does not govern this case. In this case it is charged that certain persons in high office exhibited misconduct in the course of a certain trial, and four instances of similar charges have been enumerated. But the question is, are the charges true or not? I submit that this House is the only tribunal which can set this ferment at rest, and it can only do so by referring this question to a Committee. These matters should be inquired into. I have only further to say, Sir, with regard to the reflection upon the office which you hold, I really think that that has been brought into too much prominence. The only thing to be done is to deal with this matter in the manner suggested. Nothing else will give peace, or put a stop to that with which we are threatened—namely, a continuance of that which is generous on the part of those who believe it, but which is in the highest degree evidence of their credulity.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: There are lawyers in this House, perhaps, who are not unfamiliar with the precedents which have been brought forward by the Prime Minister, and I venture to think that any who have examined the precedents bearing on this case, even though they should be, like myself, humble and unlearned Members of this House, must nevertheless have grave doubts as to the applicability of those precedents to this matter. And one cannot but discover that if there are some precedents which are in favour of the rejection of this Petition there are others which go the other way. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) has pointed out that one of the precedents quoted by the Prime Minister has no bearing upon this case, inasmuch as it was a Petition praying for the retrial of a case which had been already decided in the Courts of Law. But there is another precedent which was brought forward by the Prime Minister, which also, I think, has little bearing on this case. He quoted the precedent of a Petition against Justice Best in 1821; and he said that that Petition was rejected after coming to a Party division upon it. But he did not point out that in the same year other Petitions were rejected by this House also upon Party divisions, in which the conduct of Ministers alone was called in question. It is quite clear that in that year, and also in 1819 and 1820, it was by no means uncommon for this House to reject, on Party divisions, Petitions which would be received at the present time. Another precedent was that of 1870, four years ago, when a Petition was presented on the 10th of June against the conduct of Baron Hughes, and the reason stated in the Journals for the rejection of that Petition was, that no Member had made any Motion about it in support of the charges which it contained. We are not at the present moment aware whether it is not the intention of some Member to make a Motion upon the subject which this Petition does contain. When the Prime Minister asks the hon. and gallant Member for Essex (Colonel Makins) whether it is his intention to make a Motion founded upon this Petition, I ask the great Constitutional authorities of this House, whether it is or is not the case that any other Member has just as much right to make a Motion founded on these charges as the hon. Gentleman who presented the Petition? There are one or two precedents which bear strongly in favour of this Petition. On the 23rd of May, 1689, a Petition, alleging the most grossly unfair treatment of a prisoner by the Judges, was received by this House. In 1701 the famous Kentish Petition was presented. It was unconstitutional, because it prayed for war, and was rejected; but a great storm was created about it, and it was afterwards held that it was unwise to reject it, rather than by a Resolution to declare it frivolous and unconstitutional; and in a note appended to the passage in Hansard it is stated that—"The same privileges by which the Members in Parliament claim to speak, gives every commoner the right to speak to this House."—[Hansard, Parl. History, 5.]

In 1725 a Petition was presented to this House from Lords Oxford and Morpeth alleging gross injustice against a Master in Chancery; and there is also the case of the famous Wilkes Petition, in 1768. Mr. Wilkes was, at the time, a Member of this House, and, having consulted Constitutional authorities on this point, I believe I am justified in saying that it was held that the fact of his being a Member of this House made no difference in his position. The Petition brought a charge of subornation of perjury against Mr. Secretary West, and it was received by the House; and many weeks afterwards, on a Resolution being submitted to the House declaring that Petition to be frivolous, the Resolution was adopted. On the 10th of December, 1779, at the time that Lord North was Chancellor of the Exchequer, a Petition of the freeholders of Middlesex was not rejected, although it preferred a formal charge against Lord North of the most wanton and arbitrary use of his power, to the utter subversion of the free election of Members to the House of Commons. That Petition, also, was received. In 1804 there was a Petition impugning the conduct of Mr. Justice Fox, who was then a Judge of the Court of Common Pleas, in Ireland. That Petition charged Mr. Fox with the most gross and wilful violation of the rights of the subject, and in this respect it was entirely on all fours with the allegation of the present Petition against the Lord Chief Justice, and that Petition also was received. I think, therefore, the right course to pursue on this occasion ought to be pointed out to us, not only by the Prime Minister, but by those to whom we are expected to look for guidance upon all Constitutional questions. I cannot but perceive from the tone of the Prime Minister that there is some doubt as to the line which ought to be taken; and I should not have presented myself before the House had the Constitutional authorities informed us what was our duty on this occasion.

Mr. HERSCHELL: As a lawyer, I desire to say a few words on this question. No one in this House more than myself feels that it is of the utmost possible importance that freedom of Petition should remain to the people of this country. I feel that it would be utterly impossible to do anything more calculated to produce mischief hereafter than to throw any doubt upon the right of the subject to petition this House in a matter that concerns the administration of justice in this country. I cannot doubt, therefore, that it is within the province of any subject of Her Majesty to petition this House, that an Address may be presented to the Crown for the removal of any of the Judges who, it is alleged, have acted improperly or corruptly; and I cannot doubt that the Petition in question ought to be received, if the language used in it be not disrespectful to this House, and if the facts stated in it be germane to the prayer of the Petition. That seems to me to be the essence of the case. I can understand its being said that the Petition, containing scandalous charges against the Judges, concluded with a prayer to which these charges had no sort of reference, and that, therefore, the Forms of this House were being made a mere vehicle for abuse. But when the allegations in the Petition are germane to the prayer of the Petition, and when the prayer is one which may be legitimately addressed to the House, I do not see how the House can take exception to the Petition; because they may disagree, as I utterly do, with the charges contained in it, or because they may have the deepest and best founded belief that those who are presenting the Petition really are not bringing forward the facts of the case. Nobody can doubt that the charges made in the Petition have the strictest reference to the prayer with which it ends, so far as that prayer relates to the removal of the Judges; and I feel an indignation which it is difficult to repress at hearing the scandalous charges which are scattered broadcast throughout the country against those for whom I have, from almost daily contact and experience, learnt to respect and honour. It is difficult under such circumstances to keep one's judgment calm and restrain one's indignation so as to keep within the legitimate constitutional course. I agree with the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), that it may be desirable at some time or other to deal with and settle this question once for all. It is a matter which, if fairly discussed in the light of day, need not be afraid of that discussion, and it will be a far better course to have these charges dragged into the day-light than left to simmer as they do now. But I cannot agree that the proper course would be to refer this Petition to a Select Committee. As far as I can see there is one way, and only one legitimate way, by which this question can be set at rest for ever, and that is, by moving an Address to Her Majesty for the removal of the Judges whose conduct is impugned. And then comes the question, what should be done with this Petition? I do not understand that the Prime Minister, in his Motion, has in any way disputed the propositions I have laid down as to the first part of the Petition, neither do I think that they will be contested by the hon. Members for Leicester and Stockport. I understand the Prime Minister to acknowledge, in the fullest way, that there is a right to petition with reference to the removal of the Judges, even though the statements referring to the subject might be offensively worded. I do hope, therefore, that we shall clearly know what we are proceeding upon. The right hon. Gentleman asks the House to discharge the Order for this Petition on different grounds, which I think bear upon the point upon which I have been addressing the House. It is said that this Petition contains charges against a totally different person, to whom the prayer does not apply, and that it is a Breach of the Privilege of this House, that any hon. Member should have scandalous accusations made against him by reason of his conduct or speech as a Member of this House. The right hon. Gentleman who occupies the Chair as the Speaker is not less entitled to protection than other Members are, and surely there is no danger whatever in laying down this proposition—that if a Petition presented to this House infringes against that rule and attacks a Member of this House, that is a Petition which ought not to be received by this House. The hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) says that, after all, the charges made against the Speaker are not very grave. Be it so. But then are we to overlook them? By rejecting them we shall not be limiting the right of the people to petition this House, and to state the grounds on which they petition it, however vague the charge which they may convey against the persons attacked. I trust, therefore, that it may be possible for the House to come to a unanimous decision on the question before it.

MR. STAVELEY HILL: I quite agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Durham (Mr. Herschell) there is no point in the Petition which could quite properly come before this House. I fully agree in all that has been said as to the manner in which it violates all the Rules of the House. If a Petition is laid before the House praying for the removal of the Judges, it ought to set forth distinctly the grounds on which such removal is prayed for, in the same way as in any Petition presented in the Court of Chancery. Now, I had an opportunity of carefully reading this Petition, and after a careful perusal, without any bias whatever, I venture to say that no person can read it without coming to the conclusion that there is no ground on which this House can act. The allegations in the Petition are such as would be rejected in the Court of Chancery as scandalous and irrelevant. The language used is coarse, low, vulgar, scurrilous, and libellous against some of the most eminent persons in this country. I regret that the Petition has been allowed to be presented, and its rejection by the House may at least have some effect in stopping the progress of this wretched business, and dispel delusion. My creed is that of Dean Milman, who said, "I believe in the immortality of humbug;" but the proceedings of this House have had—and I hope always will have—a considerable effect upon public opinion, and we may do something to stop the spread of the delusion, though we cannot entirely put it down.

MR. WHITBREAD suggested that they ought to consider what should be the position of the House with regard to the reception of Petitions similar to the present one, but making no reference to the Speaker. He thought such Petitions ought to be received, and that hon. Members presenting them ought not to be required to bring the charges they contained under the special notice of the House. At the same time, it would be unjust to the Judges and undignified on the part of the House to allow these Petitions to remain indefinitely upon the Table. If there was any Member of the House ready to substantiate the charges, let him name an early day and bring his charge; but if, after a Petition had been for some reasonable, and not long, time upon the Table, nobody was found ready to bring its allegations to the test, then it should be the duty of the Prime Minister, as Leader of the House, to move that the charges appeared to be without foundation, and that the Petition be rejected.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: The speech which we have just heard confirms me in the belief that the Motion which I am about to submit is a proper one. I venture to propose what may be called a middle course—which is, perhaps, not a course I often take. I have a difficulty in making up my mind upon this subject, for the advice we have received has been so various that, while we well know that doctors differ, we have equal reason to say that lawyers differ. But we have had a want of advice from one quarter. I want to have some advice from my natural Leader. I have seldom this Session seen the front Opposition bench so well filled as it is to-night, but its occupants all sit silent; not a word of advice do we get from them. Yet they are not always silent. My noble Friend the Leader of the Opposition dined out last night with the Fish-mongers. I read his speech this morning, and I was very much impressed by the manner in which he expressed his sense of the excellent and admirable qualities of Her Majesty's Government. Now, does he think they are so excellent in the course they take that they are able to carry on the affairs of this House without any assistance at all from the Opposition? I hope he will get up and give us a word or two. We ought to be told what is the policy of the Liberal Party on this question. I do not want and certainly do not mean to discuss this question as a lawyer. It appears to me to have a wider aspect than the legal aspect. We ought, I think, to consider what will be the effect of the proceedings of this House upon public opinion out-of-doors, especially with regard to the monstrous and, I am afraid, spreading delusion about the Tichborne Case. I do not believe for a moment that any Resolution we can pass or any step we can take in this House would effectually quell that delusion, because my creed is the same as that expressed by Dean Milman when he said—"I believe in the immortality of humbug." But the proceedings of this House have, as I think they always will have, a considerable influence upon public opinion, and we may do something to check the delusion, though we cannot entirely put it down. I do not think we are at present taking the right way to do that. I think I could see all through the speech of the Prime Minister that he felt he had put his foot in it. He saw that the proceedings to-night would do nothing to quell the Tichborne demonstrations. Now, if these charges against Judges and other men high in authority which are going about are not true, I say let those people come out and prosecute the libellers. That is the proper thing to do. So far as we are concerned, if they are not true, as I believe they are not, let us treat them with utter and complete contempt. The charges consist partly of attacks on juries. I see before me the hon. Member for Louth (Mr.

Sullivan). He has been in prison—like most of the Irish Members. I do not—and I say it candidly—I do not honour my hon. Friend a bit the less for his having been in prison. I am, on the contrary, glad to see him here. But why was he put in prison? It was because in a time of very great political excitement he wrote an article in his paper condemning the finding of a jury with regard to the Fenians who were subsequently hanged at Manchester. But he did nothing half so strong as has been done by the hon. Member for Stoke and his friends. He alleged no corruption against anybody. He simply said that the jury had acted under a panic. We have got wiser now, and do not imprison people for writing all this rubbish. In those days Sullivan was sent to prison; in these, Kenealy is sent to Parliament. Now, let us treat all this matter with the contempt it deserves. Sir, I only wish to make one more remark by way of justifying the Motion with which I am going to conclude. The strong point in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was that which had reference to the insulting imputation cast by the Petition upon you. I am not going to make a speech in your favour. As the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) has said, that is entirely a work of supererogation. But I do wish to say that a requisition in a Petition to this House that we should impeach you is so utterly outrageous and absurd, that, as sensible men, we ought not to consider it for a moment. Let us go to the Budget, which we are all anxious to hear, and let us dismiss from our minds all this contemptible rubbish, which has been occupying our attention for the last hour and a half. For the purpose of facilitating that step, I beg respectfully to move the Previous Question.

MR. POTTER seconded the Motion.

Previous Question proposed, "That that Question be now put." — (Sir Wilfrid Lawson.)

MR. DILLWYN said, he could not vote for the Previous Question, but must vote with the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) for a direct negative. It ought not to be allowed to go forth to the public that the House of Commons would in any way permit the right of Petition to be questioned. Though those who signed this Petition had made a mistake and done wrong in the allusion to the Speaker, yet it could not be denied that a feeling had become very general that there had been corrupt conduct on the part of the Judges. It ought not to be allowed to go forth that when the people complained of unjust conduct on the part of the Judges, the House would not allow it that consideration which it ought to have. He wished to correct a false impression which the Prime Minister's speech—although, of course, unintentionally—might give rise to. The Petition did not pray that the Speaker should be impeached. It was simply a hypothetical statement that if the Speaker had used words which he did not use he ought to be impeached. The prayer of the Petition, as he understood it, was the legitimate opinion of the people who signed it. Therefore, in defence of the right of Petition, he should vote with the hon. Member for Leicester against the rejection.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Mr. Speaker, my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) has appealed to me in order that he may know what is the opinion of Gentlemen who sit on this bench. I do not know that I can give him any assurance of absolute unanimity here any more than among his friends the doctors or lawyers; but on one subject I am sure I can give him the unanimous opinion of this bench, and that is that this question ought not to be treated in any sense as a Party question. I can assure him that his allegiance as a Party follower will not be tested on this occasion by any appeal to him in that capacity. Sir, I do not suppose that any Member of this House—certainly no Member who sits on this side of the House—would wish in any degree whatever to restrict the undoubted right of Petition. Various precedents and authorities of great weight have been urged in the course of this debate. There are, however, two Resolutions of the House which appear to be so apposite to this question that I will call attention to them. In 1669 two Resolutions were passed by the House. The first declared—

"That it is an inherent right of every commoner in England to prepare and present Petitions to the House of Commons in case of grievance, and the House of Commons to receive the same."

And the second declared—

"That it is the undoubted right and privilege of the Commons to judge and determine concerning the nature and matter of such Petitions, how far they are fit or unfit to be received."

Now, these Resolutions maintained in the widest possible way the right of every subject to Petition, and the equal right of the House of Commons to consider, discuss, and decide how far such a Petition was fit to be received. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House has stated, in general terms, the grounds on which he thinks that this Petition is unfit to be received, and I certainly am not going to take any exception to the general conclusion at which he has arrived; but I must say that upon some grounds I regret that the right hon. Gentleman should have thought it inexpedient that the Petition should be read from the Table. I admit the force of the objection that it would probably have been some satisfaction to the persons who prepared this Petition that their libellous charges against the Judges and the Speaker of this House should obtain the notoriety of having been read publicly here and subsequently printed. At the same time, I do think that there is no very great advantage in being so extremely punctilious. I feel that the character of the Judges who administer justice in the Courts of Law, and the character of the right hon. Gentleman who presides over our deliberations, and the character of this House, are such that no harm whatever can have resulted from the widest publication of this Petition and the libels it contains. I think the course suggested to us may be open to the objection that it should go forth to the world to-morrow that the House of Commons refused to entertain a Petition, without having it read at the Table, upon the mere statement of its contents by the Leader of the House. I think my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) was right in his criticism upon one part of the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. As far as my recollection of the Petition goes I do not think that the second part of it concluded with any prayer for the impeachment of the Speaker. On the contrary, it appears to be open to a charge of informality on the ground that it makes an assertion about the right hon. Gentleman without making any prayer. The right hon. Gentleman stated that the Petition is divided into two parts. As to the first, which relates to the Judges, I have had an opportunity of perusing it and forming my own opinion. The Petition contains language of a character which renders it unfit to be received by this House. It does not contain definite charges supported by statements as to facts within the knowledge of the Petitioners, and it appears to me that the charges, such as they are, are couched in very violent terms of an insulting character; therefore, I have formed the opinion that the Petition on this ground is one that ought not to be received. At the same time, I must admit that, in the unfortunate state of feeling of a certain section of the population with regard to what they may believe to have been a failure of justice in the Tichborne trial, I think there is a certain danger in allowing this Petition to be rejected without its being very clearly understood that it is rejected on account of the exception taken to the mode and manner of the statements, and not on account of the statements themselves so far as the alleged misconduct on the part of the Judges goes. I think it should be distinctly understood that Petitions have been already received imputing misconduct, and that no Petition will be refused by this House, although making grave and serious charges against Judges, so long as it is couched in temperate language. The right hon. Gentleman lays down that no Petition even couched in proper and respectful language ought to be received unless the Member who presents it is prepared to take action on it; but I do not understand that any Constitutional authority supports that view. Certainly, some of the precedents he referred to do not apply. He mentioned the case of Baron Hughes, but there the Petition was presented and lay upon the Table for six weeks, and at the expiration of that time it was moved that the Order be discharged, not because the Members present did not vote upon it, but because no Member founded any Motion upon it. That I take to be the proper and usual practice of this House; and if a Petition were presented which contained offensive allusions to the Speaker, that would be quite sufficient ground for rejecting it; but I do not think we need trouble ourselves with a hypothetical case. There can be no doubt whatever that the way in which the Speaker is referred to affords ample grounds for the discharge of the Order. When a Petition is presented which does not contain these expressions of disrespect, and when the charges are framed in a proper and temperate manner, then it seems to me it will be time enough for the House to consider it. We are dealing at present with this Petition, and with this Petition alone. After spending so much time as we have devoted to the consideration of this question, it would be subject of regret if we were to postpone decision upon it; and if I may give advice to the hon. Baronet, I hope he will be induced to withdraw his Motion.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I would only remind the noble Lord of the fact that we are not moving on this Petition without having our attention called to it by the Committee on Petitions, and the reason why my right hon. Friend did not call for it to be read, was that the substance of it was read in the Report of the Committee. But of course it is perfectly competent for any Member to ask that the Petition be read, although my right hon. Friend did not counsel such a course. It is true that the Petition does not contain a prayer that the Speaker be impeached; but its words and its character have exactly that bearing. The Petitioners state, first of all, that they have heard that the Speaker has made use of certain expressions, and that if he did so it was an act of high treason against the Constitution which deserves the most severe reprobation of the people's Representatives in the House of Commons and calls for their immediate action, by impeachment or otherwise, as the House may deem expedient.

MR. MUNDELLA said, the right hon. Gentleman had confirmed the opinion held by many Members that the words of the Petition which referred to the Speaker were based on a hypothetical case. He (Mr. Mundella) hoped the House would not reject the Petition merely because of the foolish and absurd hypothesis contained in its last two lines.

MR. MACDONALD felt that this was a very grave question. He had the most perfect confidence in the purity of our Judges, and, as a rule, in the decisions of our juries; but he could not fail to see that statements were circulated which were calculated to bring both the Judges and juries of the land into contempt. Those who were giving currency to those statements had an opportunity now, on the floor of the House, of vindicating their conduct. Statements which could not be defended in that House were unworthy of the consideration of the British public outside. Now was the time, and that was the place when those charges which had been sown broadcast should be defended if they could be, and as the hon. Member for Stoke was now within that House, he called upon him to rise and support his statements. He hoped, however, the House would not press the Motion to a division, as that House was the place for the meanest in the land to come for redress.

DR. KENEALY: The hon. Member for Stoke did not intend to present himself at this period of the debate. He was waiting to hear some of the statesmen of this House take something like a statesmanlike view of the question at issue. He did not intend to enter upon the question of miserable legal technicalities; but he wanted to be guided in his observations to the House by those high authorities to whom this country had long been accustomed to look, and who were not only the guardians of the Constitutional Law of this country, but who were also supposed to be the guardians of the Constitutional liberties of the people. I must say that it is with the greatest possible regret I find that none of the Gentlemen on the front benches beneath me have condescended to favour the House with their opinions on this great question, because a great question it is, and a great question, I can tell the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, the people of this country are determined to make it. Sir, I know very well the utter disdain of the language which has been addressed to a large number of the people because they are of the humbler classes. ["No, no!"] I should like to know why, then, except that they were of the humbler classes? I have heard no reasons given by those Representatives of the people who have presumed to talk of the millions of our countrymen as acting under a delusion. I know the character of my countrymen well, and I have never been able to see the great universal common sense of the English people converted into delusions, as we are told to-night it has been. Surely it was quite enough that they should have been grossly insulted as fools and fanatics, without these men—who could have no interest in the case whatever, except that of sturdy Englishmen anxious to see justice done, and who assembled in hundreds of thousands in Hyde Park to protest against what they considered the injustice of the great trial—being again branded as an ignorant, deluded, and infatuated multitude. We have heard a great deal of the bad language used on the Tichborne side; but it appears to me that the language used on the other side, both in this House and elsewhere, is quite as bad. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, if he will give me leave to say so, seems to be leading the House, if not into a ditch, at least into a dilemma. He wants this particular Petition to be rejected because the hon. Member for South Essex (Colonel Makins) is not prepared to support a Motion founded upon it; but that might occur with regard to many similar Petitions, and in what position would the House then be placed under such circumstances? One hundred Gentlemen might present such Petitions in the course of the Session. As to the precedents which the right hon. Gentleman quoted, the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke) had shown they were nothing but cobwebs and delusions. I speak under correction, not having had the advantage of looking into the four precedents which the right hon. Gentleman has cited; but I believe there is not a single instance to be found where a prayer for the removal of a Judge on grounds set forth in a Petition has ever been rejected by the House. I think it a very great pity that it seemed expedient to the right hon. Gentleman to discuss a Petition of which the House was actually in ignorance. ["No!"] Some Gentlemen profess to have read portions or the whole of the Petition; but the great majority of the House, as it appears to me, were ignorant of the language and the complaints of this Petition. Why has it not been read at the Table? Does the right hon. Gentleman want to shield any persons mentioned in it? The right hon. Gentleman knows that there are statements in this Petition said to have been made by right hon. and hon. Members of this House. I do not know whether they are present; but, if so, and if the First

Mr. Macdonald

Lord of the Treasury had that Petition read, they would have had an opportunity of stating on their honour as Gentlemen, in the presence of Parliament, whether they were true or not. It seems to me that the Petition, not having been read, an injustice has been done to the Judges in whose interest he is acting. If I, for my own part, had the honour of being one of those Judges—[Laughter]—perhaps I should rather say if I had the misfortune—I would have challenged, in defence of my own honour, the reading of this Petition, and an examination of the allegations which it contains. It was thought one of the greatest things, said Cæsar, and I agree with him, that Cæsar's wife should not be suspected of dishonour; and I say a British Judge should not allow himself to remain under charges such as alleged against those Judges. I am glad to observe the altered tone of this debate as regards the right of persons petitioning Parliament. It is notorious that in the last Session of Parliament statements were made in this House challenging the right of Petition because the petitioners complained of injustice and unfairness in a trial, and I say those statements deserved impeachment because they were in violation of the law of England and the Constitutional right of every Englishman. There are two statutes which guarantee the right to the removal of Judges for misbehaviour on an Address from the Houses of Parliament. But how is the misbehaviour of Judges to be brought to the knowledge of this House except by Petition? I want to know before whom a complaint of corruption or dishonesty on the part of a Judge can be brought if not before the Grand Inquest of the Nation? Such a position as that maintained by the right hon. Gentleman would not bear examination for a moment. The right hon. Gentleman hardly ventured to grapple with any of the difficulties of the question, which is entering very deeply into the English heart and soul, and if by the result of a division it shall appear that, acting on the advice of the right hon. Gentleman, this House is prepared to refuse to entertain a Petition complaining of the conduct of Judges, it will raise a tempest in this country which it will not easily allay. I will not criticize the language of the noble Marquess who followed suit to a great many other hon. Gentlemen. The noble Marquess seems to have arrived in his own mind at some peculiar knowledge that the allegations of this Petition are false and scandalous. Why are they not proved to be false and scandalous? I hear no reply to that. I hear no cheer—no assenting voice. Is it that both sides of the House have made up their minds that the Judges acted fairly in that trial, and that the Claimant is Orton beyond all possibility of doubt? ["Hear, hear!"] Gentlemen, I do not envy you your judgment. ["Order, order!"] I am committing no disorder. ["Order!" and "Chair!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Member that it is one of the Rules of this House that every hon. Member should address himself to the Chair.

DR. KENEALY: Sir, I beg pardon if I addressed the House by the name of gentlemen. I understand that is the breach of Order I have committed, and will take care not to do it again. I was remarking that I did not envy hon. Members the judgment they have arrived at in that most wonderful and mysterious case. They probably imagine that they have better grounds of forming an opinion, and pronouncing that opinion here, than I have, and declaring every allegation in this Petition to be false because they do not happen to coincide with it. Sir, as far as I have had an opportunity of forming an opinion on that complicated case, full of doubts and mysteries, I have formed a very different conclusion from that which prevails in the minds of hon. Members. I was referring just now to the noble Marquess. He read the two Resolutions passed in the House in the year 1669; but, not being a very sound Constitutional lawyer, he omitted to notice that the second of these Resolutions had nothing to do with pretending to impose restrictions on the language of petitions: it simply guarded the House against the claim set up by the House of Lords to criticize the conduct of petitioners who presented Petitions here, and it had nothing whatever to do with the question of limiting the language of Petitions. I do not profess to be a very profound student in Constitutional Law or in the Usages of this House; but I have always understood it to be in accordance with Constitutional Law and the Usages of this House that Parliament requires all Petitions presented to it to be couched in language respectful to itself; and that is the only limit imposed. I may be wrong; and, if so, I shall be glad to be corrected by any high Constitutional authority in the House, but I believe what I have said to be both law and usage. I have really heard no language cited by the right hon. Gentleman, or by the noble Marquess—and that is another reason why the course he has adopted of not having the Petition read is extremely inconvenient—I have heard no language cited from the Petition which comes properly under the designation of slander. If a man is complaining of corrupt, bad, dishonest conduct, he must use words to convey the idea of corruptness, badness, and dishonesty. With some mealy-mouthed individuals, no doubt, language of that kind is slander; but that is not the true interpretation, because slander implies falsehood. Slander can never be supposed to be involved in truth; and if the right hon. Gentleman or the noble Marquess say there are any falsehoods in these Petitions, they ought to call on the House to investigate those falsehoods and trace them to their source; but they have made no such proposition. I do not know that I have anything further to say. If any such Petition as that should be forwarded to me—I never yet had one—I shall be perfectly prepared to present it to this House, to have it read at that Table, and to demand an inquiry into the conduct of the persons it impugns. The House would reject it, of course—that I can easily see from the temper prevailing on both sides; but let the House settle that with the country outside. I shall have performed my duty when I have done what I have said, and shall have liberated my conscience. If the House grants an inquiry, it will have an opportunity of learning for itself whether the accusations against the three Judges are true or false. In justice to those Judges, they ought to have an opportunity of showing whether the accusations against them are true or false; but if this House says—“We will have no inquiry, because we have made up our minds beforehand,” I can only say, with the greatest possible deference to this House, that such a course is not calculated to elevate it very highly in the opinion of the English people.

Dr. Kenealy

MR. BRIGHT: On this occasion we are discussing a rather complicated question. Some hon. Members are discussing one-half of it, and others the other half. Some naturally address themselves to the position taken by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. I do not complain of that, for I think it arose out of the form and wording of the Petition. One question is about the freedom—I will not say permitted but existing—with regard to petitioning this House, and the other is to the language of the Petition with regard to the Speaker. Now, it is obvious from the discussion, beginning with the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, and from what has fallen from every hon. Member who spoke, that everybody in this House is in favour of the unlimited right of Petition, of such right of Petition as the people of England have ever demanded. As far as I can judge, the speeches of the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor), and the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) tend to the same thing. Whatever may be the result of this debate, there is no man in England, in the United Kingdom, or in the world who can charge this House with wishing to limit the right of Petition. But if we think it necessary to support the right of Petition, this House is acting just as much in the interest of petitioners and of the nation itself, when it insists on maintaining its own rights and the rights of the eminent Gentleman who fills the Chair. There can be no manner of doubt why the House, if it feels itself at liberty to discharge the Order, should do so. If it be discharged, what harm is it to the petitioners? They are not barred from approaching the House again in favour of any propositions which they have to submit, or any charges which they have to make, or any demands that the House should make any inquiry which they think for the public service. Therefore, if this Petition for the time be discharged the same petitioners may come to the House again leaving out that portion of the Petition which the House unanimously condemns, although by its vote it may not unanimously condemn it. I will undertake to say there is no hon. Member of this House, not even the hon. Member for Stoke himself—[Dr. KENEALY: Hear, hear!]
—who would, in the presence of this House, or in the presence of any body of his countrymen, declare that it was for the interest of the people of England that any petitioner, by making gross and groundless insinuations, should bring a charge against the President and Speaker of the House of Commons. Then the House is agreed, I think, upon two things—that it will support the right of Petition; that it will support its own rights; and that it will support the rights of the Gentleman who presides over its deliberations; and I think all this can be done consistently with following the course which the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government has proposed. Now, when my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall (Sir Charles Forster), the Chairman of the Committee on Public Petitions, spoke to me about this matter some days ago, I took the trouble to read the Petition over very carefully, and I gave my opinion then, as I have given it from that moment to this without change, that as far as the complaints of the Petition with respect to the late trial and the Judges were concerned, I thought there were no serious grounds which would justify me in voting for its rejection. But I said that the statements with regard to the Speaker of this House were of so important, so serious, and so gross a character, that if it were proposed by the head of the Government to reject the Petition on that ground I should find it extremely difficult to resist. Therefore, I am quite ready to vote for discharging the Order, limiting myself to the ground of the base and baseless insinuations with regard to the Speaker. On that ground I can vote with a clear conscience for discharging the Order. I should like to say a word on the case which the right hon. Gentleman brought before us of a Petition presented five years ago, complaining of the conduct of an Irish Judge. I asked the right hon. Gentleman what was the date when the Order was discharged, and he said it was about seven weeks after it was presented. Now, if this Petition had no reference to the Speaker of the House I should not be able, because the Petition attacked the Judges, to agree to discharge the Order within 10 days of the time when the Petition was presented; because 10 days is scarcely sufficient time to ascertain whether any person holding the views of the Petitioners would bring the subject before the House. It seems to me that we are not only guardians of the character of the Bench, but the guardians of that large interest which the people have in possessing and believing that they possess an incorrupt administration of the law. Now, Sir, the hon. Member for Stoke has just spoken, and I listened as attentively as I could to all he said—perhaps he may have been confused in one or two of his last sentences—but he does not appear to me to have taken the position which the House had a right to expect on this occasion. I do not object to anything he said, or to anything that he has said since he came into this House. All I say is, he has not been here often enough, and has not proceeded with the proposition which he undertook to submit to the House on the second night after he entered it. At that very early period he gave Notice that he would bring the case of a recent remarkable trial in which he was engaged as counsel, before the House, and that he would move a Resolution. I believe there is a Notice of that kind on the Paper now—Dr. Kenealy—The Queen v. Castro—

“To call attention to the Government Prosecution of the Queen v. Castro, and the conduct of the Trial at Bar and the incidents connected therewith, and also to certain incidents of the said trial which have occurred subsequently thereto; and to move a Resolution.”

Now, judging from the publication with which the hon. Member for Stoke is connected, and judging from what we hear everywhere, and from speeches made by him and by his friends, the House is forced to the conclusion that one great object of that Resolution would be to impugn the conduct of the Judges. This Petition impugns the conduct of the Judges. The hon. Member, I think I may assume, is the Member of the House who, above all others, is called upon, if anybody is called upon, and should be willing, if anybody is willing, to move a Resolution in support of the prayer of the Petition. I came down here on the night when the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) asked some questions in regard to Judges and juries—I came down to the House specially early that I might see if the hon. Member for Stoke was in his place; and I intended on that occasion to ask him distinctly when he proposed to fix a day for the Motion of which he had given Notice. I say the hon. Gentleman has no right to come down to the House and give a Notice of this character, to remove it to some other day, then to some other day, and after that to let it remain on the Paper without any day being fixed, and then to leave London to visit towns and other parts of the country, and there to make his statement of the question—I will not say to inflame the minds of the people of this country, I will not say to make charges which are false—I will say rather to make statements which he believes it his duty to make. It is not right to make such statements, I will not say to defame, but to charge eminent Judges, and to create in the mind of the people a belief that men upon their trial before the Judges and a jury of this country cannot hope for fair, open, and complete justice. I say he has no right to do that, and leave a Notice of that kind on the Paper week after week and month after month; and I think the House ought to insist that a question of this nature, upon which so much hangs—a question as to the judgment of the House upon the character of eminent Judges—that this question ought not to be left undecided. The House ought to take some steps by which it shall either be adjudged or got rid of for ever. I think the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) made a manly declaration. He made an appeal to the hon. Member for Stoke which he cannot disregard. That hon. Gentleman knows that I am not one of those who, in private or public, defame him, or object to his sitting in this House, or show by what I shall say contempt for the constituency which has sent him here. I respect the great constituency which has sent him here. That constituency acted, perhaps, in great ignorance, but, I believe, thoroughly upon generous and honourable principles. But the hon. Member for Stoke, being the Representative of that constituency in this House, ought to feel that he is the one above all other—and this is the place above all others—in which he should bring to the adjudication of the House the serious charges he is constantly making against the Judges. He will have a fair hearing. I can sit from 5 till 12, if necessary, to hear the whole case. I have read some hundreds of columns of it during the time when he was so much before the country in connection with it; and if I have read so many hundreds of columns of print I can listen, and listen with attention, and probably with interest to the speech which he will make. But I protest against this question being left over. If the hon. Member had given Notice that he was about to bring a Vote of Censure against a Member of the Government, the First Minister would say—"This cannot be allowed to remain week after week. It must be decided. The Government enjoys the confidence of the House, or it does not." But it seems to me even more important if you have three of the most eminent Judges of the land, and heap upon them charges of the most grave character. I say that the man who makes those charges, and who hesitates to come forward and, to the best of his power, to substantiate them, at any rate will have no right to say anything against the Judges, for however evil may be their character, I suspect his will not bear examination. I conclude by saying—and I say it with no unfriendliness to the hon. Member for Stoke—I think I have a fair right to appeal to him to answer my question, and to state to the House whether it is his intention immediately, or on the first convenient day—and I hope the House will be ready to make any way for him—to bring this matter before the House, so that it may be fairly discussed, for I am, at least, as anxious as he is that justice should be done, and that the great mass of the people of this country, whether they take his view or the view of the majority of this House, should have another opportunity of correcting their opinion, and of coming, it may be, to a just decision upon a question which has excited so many of them. Upon the ground that we are to vote for the discharge of this Order, because of the attack that it has made upon the Privileges of the House, and the insinuations against the character and the conduct of the President and Speaker of the House, and upon that ground only, I shall give my vote with the right hon. Gentleman.

DR. KENEALY: I think, Sir, you will allow me to say—"Order, order!"

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member desires to make an explanation I have no doubt that this House will hear him; but he is not entitled to make a second speech on the question before the House.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: I wish to ask a question. I rise to Order—["Order!"]

DR. KENEALY: I wish to make an explanation. It is quite true, as the right hon. Gentleman has stated to the House, that on the second night I entered it I gave Notice of my intention to bring forward the question of the "Queen v. Castro," and move a Resolution. At that time I had every reason to believe that I should be supported by floods of Petitions to this House; but I very soon learned that, although Petitions had been sent to hon. Members, they were informed on the authority of high functionaries here that it would be illegal and irregular to present them. ["Name, name!"] I therefore, in the full exercise of my right of discretion, postponed that Motion until I should be supported by numbers of Petitions. I beg leave to inform the right hon. Gentleman that until I see myself properly supported by Petitions sent into this House I shall not bring forward the Motion. If hon. Members want to have the matter brought before the House, let them not refuse to present the Petitions from their constituents of which I have spoken.

MR. DISRAELI: Some hon. Gentlemen and the Member for Stoke have argued this question to-night as if there were some Government measure before the House, and as if the Government had shown a want of policy or discretion in calling on the House to decide the question; but I should hope the vast majority of Gentlemen in the House are perfectly aware that in calling on the House to come to a decision on this Motion I am only acting in conformity with the regulations of the House. It is in consequence of a Report prepared and submitted to the House by one of the most influential permanent Committees of the House—the Committee on Public Petitions—that I have been obliged to call upon the House to consider that Report and to state to the House what I believe the right course and the right view for them to adopt. I should not have ventured to take that course on my own responsibility. I took occasion to request the assistance and advice of my Colleagues on a point of this nature, and we arrived, after due consideration and investigation, at a conclusion which I may state in few words. It was our opinion that had the Petition been confined to impugning the conduct of the Judges, though we might regret that a Petition should be expressed in such language, still, considering that it was signed by a considerable number of persons, who, we doubt not, sincerely believed they had formed a correct opinion, it was not for the public interest that such a Petition should be rejected; and I, therefore, should not have hesitated, had this Petition been one which simply impugned the conduct of the Judges, feeling how important it is that the right of Petition should always be respected in this House, and that on no subject more important than the administration of justice can Petitions be presented, to recommend, and we should have recommended, the House, however much we might have regretted the language in which the Petition was couched, to have accepted the Petition; but, on examining that Petition, we found other matter than that which is alluded to in the Report of the Committee on Petitions; and we believed that matter to be not only most offensive to the House, but matter which, if it passed unnoticed, would be of an injurious character, for it violated, in our opinion, the most precious Privilege of the House in making an attack upon the character of one whom we respect above all others. It also invaded that liberty of speech which is the privilege of individual Members, and the most valuable privilege of the House, and which we have guarded by our Orders and by our traditionary and constant respect from being challenged and assailed by those out of this House, so that the privilege of freedom of discussion may be protected. Upon that ground, and that ground alone, I recommend the House to agree that the Order for this Petition to lie on the Table should be discharged. I must say, notwithstanding the jesting philosophy of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), who, in idiomatic phrase, informed the House of the position in which I had placed myself to-night, that I think the consequence of this discussion has been to justify the course I have pursued, and there is a universal concurrence that the advice I have given to the House is the correct one. I hope, therefore, the hon.

Baronet will make some compensation for his too hasty criticism on my course by withdrawing the awkward Motion that he has made, and not prevent us still further from listening to a discussion more interesting, I believe, to the English people than even the Trial at Bar. A division may then take place; but I hope, on reflection, that the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke) may be inclined not to break the unanimity which we all so much desire. We need again have no discussion on this issue respecting the precedents with regard to the conduct of former Judges to which we have referred. I did not bring them forward to confirm the opinion which I had myself formed of the advice which I intended to give to the House. It was my duty to give the House as much information as I could upon the points connected with the Report of the Committee on Petitions. I do not lay any stress upon them; but I believe they perfectly apply to the portion of the Petition which was under the review of the Committee. I think the hon. Baronet and the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) will also agree that it is expedient, after expression has been given to so general a feeling in the House, which did not surprise me, that it is not to the honour or interest of the House of Commons to offer obstacles to the right of Petition because Petitions do impugn the conduct of Judges; and, however much we may disapprove of the language in which Petitions are expressed, the matter is of too grave a character for us to allow our conduct in any way to excuse the fostering of that suspicion by which the public mind may be possessed if we refuse investigation or inquiry into any subject, save upon such a ground as that on which I am now asking the decision of the House. The violation of our Privilege in the language used is aggravated when we remember to whom it is applied; and, discarding, as I am sure every candid man will, the trivial defence offered by the fanciful hypothesis upon which the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) chose to rest his argument, I hope the House will agree with me in the Motion I have made. If you sanction for a moment on such a ground the circulation of any calumnies which may be invented of any individual, and then say afterwards that they were only hypothetical, that nothing was meant against him if he really was not a robber and a murderer, but being a robber and murderer he is to be denounced to public indignation and punishment, I think we will soon find that all the Orders that we have constructed, and all the Privileges we have hitherto maintained to sustain our freedom of discussion, and to guard our free Parliamentary life, will soon be found to be endangered. I therefore appeal with confidence to the House—and I hope an unanimous House—to support me in the Motion that I have made.

MR. WHALLEY: I must request, Sir, that this Petition be read. The right hon. Gentleman, although he thought fit to close this debate by speaking, did not state correctly that part of the Petition which he considered to be the most important, and upon which it was almost entirely that he made his appeal. As I have a Notice on the Paper for to-morrow night I should not have presumed to address the House on this occasion, but for the remarkable omission to which I have referred. The hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) stated distinctly that we have been misled by the right hon. Gentleman in saying that you, Sir, were insulted, and that your conduct had been impeached. Why, this House to impeach you! This House to impeach itself! As it came from the lips of the right hon. Gentleman the thing sounded ridiculous and absurd. I say again that the hon. Member for Sheffield did charge the right hon. Gentleman with having stated deliberately that the Petition contained as its most obnoxious portion that which it does not contain. There is another point. ["Oh, oh!"] The right hon. Gentleman did not allow me to address the House before he replied. He himself, if any man in this House, is responsible to this House and the country for what is obnoxious in that Petition. ["Divide!"] I will explain if the House will patiently listen. Why these very charges against the Judges were brought forward by me before the Committee, of which the right hon. Gentleman was a Member, and I had a Petition in my hand from my constituents, signed by more than half of the electors, charging these Judges with distinct partiality and substantial corruption, but the right hon. Gentleman said,

"We will not inquire into that, we will not go further," although he it was who appointed the Committee. Then, Sir, how could these Petitioners from Prittlewell, in Essex, and all over the country, amounting to hundreds of thousands, suppose they were offending against the Privileges of this House in appealing to the House to investigate charges against Judges which have been brought in terms quite as strong in other Petitions. During last Session I was rebuffed and snubbed and treated with obloquy in language which, as the hon. Member for Stoke has asserted, was equal to any that has been used in the Petitions in favour of this unfortunate convict. I brought a distinct charge against the Judges, and they knew it well. And what was the result? ["Divide!"] Let the House consider that they are not justified in shouting down the question, and saying that it was a delusion because they have prejudged the question. They, in spite of my protest, and the protest of others, found the money for the prosecution of this man, and you exonerate the Attorney General from responsibility in doing that which no Attorney General ever did before. When I ventured to bring this question before the House I was interrupted and shouted down continually until I was almost exhausted. And what was the result? The whips on both sides of the House laid their heads together, and counted out the House. I distinctly challenged those proceedings not only in the country, but in this House, in the name of my constituents. But the House took no notice of the matter, though I presented many Petitions upon the subject. Now comes this Petition, one of a vast number signed, I am told, by hundreds of thousands throughout the country, but which we are not allowed to present simply because it complains of the conduct of the Judges. Surely this must give strength and additional grounds for such complaints as were extended to the conduct of the Speaker in rejecting these Petitions unless by some means or other inquiry is conceded. That is all the petitioners want, and all that I now urge upon the Government. I ask, on behalf of the petitioners, that the Petition shall not be rejected. I say they were fully justified in supposing that their charges would not be suppressed, especially when they declared that they were prepared to support those charges either at the Bar of the House or any other tribunal that might be appointed. Under any circumstances, before the Petition is rejected I think we ought to take time for further consideration, and in order that that may be given I hope the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) will press his Amendment of the Previous Question, for which I shall vote. Meantime, before a vote is taken, I think the least that can be asked is that the House should know what the Petition is which they are called upon to reject, and I therefore move that it be read by the Clerk at the Table.

MR. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the Petition be read?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I think it would be better that the Petition should be read. Earlier in the evening I gave reasons why I thought it would not be desirable to read the Petition, and we have also had before us the Report of the Public Petitions Committee, calling our attention to the language of the Petition. I believe, however, that it is in the power of any hon. Gentleman to have it read, and as an hon. Member has moved that it be now read, I shall support the Motion.

Petition read.

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY, amid cries of "Divide!" said, he had only a few words to say, which the House would, he hoped, deem to be not altogether out of place. The Select Committee on Public Petitions had thought it their duty to bring to the notice of the House an objectionable Petition, which commented in an unbecoming manner on the Speaker, and on the proceedings of that House. Now, it was well-known that there was at the present moment a regularly organized machinery, directed by a Member of that House, whose object and business it was to get up and promote the signing of these objectionable Petitions. An important part of this machinery consisted of a newspaper, edited by the Member for Stoke-upon-Trent, and so long as that paper was allowed free licence to tell week after week the most abominable and palpable lies in its leading articles, he did not see how hon. Members could lay much blame upon the poor people who, by thousands and thousands, read those articles, and somewhat naturally believed them to be true, because they were left uncontradicted. He had in his hand an article of this description, which he would back against almost anything written. It was from The Englishman newspaper—

“The Ministry, Parliament, and the Press are living in the most serene Fools’ Paradise, and apparently are no more aware of what is going on in the actual world than if they were the Seven Sleepers. Hardly a day passes that some dirty dog of a Member, who would be a fitter tenant of a pig-sty than of a seat in the House of Commons, does not get up, and in a drunken, after-dinner speech, without any provocation, assail Dr. Kenealy in the most loathsome language of scurrilous abuse. Some have the fatuity to write of him to their constituents in terms of reproach and insult, and in this they manifest their low and mongrel nature, which inclines them to bark though they dare not bite; for we need hardly say not one of these ‘curs of low degree’ would dare to face Dr. Kenealy from the House of Commons’ benches. But at their drunken dinner tables, surrounded by persons who are as drunk, or ignorant, or foolish as themselves, or in their counting-houses, where they concoct the frauds by which ships are lost and sailors are drowned and insurance offices pillaged, and creditors are defrauded, they are as valiant as ancient Pistol; and when the hour comes, as threatened by their papers, when Dr. Kenealy is to be hissed and hunted down, we have no doubt that they will play their parts in that ignoble species of attack with the most absolute perfection. Amen! So be it. If the Speaker allows the House of Commons to be disgraced and degraded, as it will be before the world should this take place, it will be no affair of ours.”

He would not have brought that extract before the House if it had not been that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) called upon the Member for Stoke to bring on his Motion without delay. The Member for Stoke replied that he should wait until the House had a number of such Petitions as the present before it. Now, he wished to point out to the House that the Member for Stoke was going about trading upon the ignorance of those poor people, and telling them palpable lies. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham said that the Member for Stoke was returned by the generous and honourable convictions—

MR. SPEAKER: If I caught the observation of the hon. and gallant Member correctly, he said of the hon. Member for Stoke that he went about the country telling palpable lies. I must remind the hon. and gallant Member that such remarks are not Parliamentary.

Colonel Loyd Lindsay

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY said, he was afraid he had confounded what he had intended to say with the article in the paper for which the Member for Stoke was responsible as editor. He intended to have said that that paper put forth those falsehoods, and he withdrew the words imputing the language to the Member for Stoke directly. He was at a loss to suggest any mode by which the editor or the printer of this paper could be called to account for his unprincipled conduct; but if any Member would suggest a way he should be happy to co-operate with him in bringing the law to bear upon the offender. He thought forbearance for insults might be carried too far, both by private individuals and by private bodies, and that a public contradiction of such lies as those he had read rested as a duty on some Member of the House.

MR. FAWCETT said, that when he came up to the House he had not made up his mind as to the way in which he should vote, though he thought it most probable he should vote for the reception of the Petition. But without in the slightest degree wishing to infringe the freedom of petitioning or denying the undoubted right of the people to petition, he intended, having heard the debate, to vote for the proposition of the Government. He thought that if a division could be avoided, a certain amount of painful feeling in the country might also be avoided; and on that ground he would appeal to the hon. Member for Carlisle to withdraw his Motion. Something had been said in palliation of that part of the Petition which referred to the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair of the House. It had been said that the charge was only made by implication. The fact that the charge was only made by implication made it only the more cowardly. He believed that the hon. Member for Stoke would soon find that, although he might have a certain following now and receive cheers at public meetings, there was nothing that the English people liked so much as a man to have the courage of his opinions. Sooner or later he would find that those who crowded round him now would be the first to denounce his conduct if, feeling half what he had said he felt about three of the Judges of the land and other distinguished people, he lost a single day—nay, a single hour—in bringing forward those charges in the best of all tribunals, where they could be supported or refuted—the House of Commons.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON observed, that if he withdrew his Amendment he would not thereby save the House the trouble of dividing, as his hon. Friend the Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) was determined to divide the House.

MR. SPEAKER: It is for the House, and not for me, to judge and determine whether the Petition now under the consideration of the House should lie upon the Table, and thus become one of the permanent records of the House. The House has always maintained the undoubted Constitutional right of the people to complain of grievances, and to pray for their redress; but that right may be abused, and the question for the consideration of the House now is whether the petitioners in the present case have or have not abused the right of petitioning which they undoubtedly possess. With respect to the Petition, so far as it relates to myself, with the permission of the House, I decline to take any notice of it, because I am wholly indifferent to such attacks so long as I enjoy the confidence and approval of this House.

WAYS AND MEANS—FINANCIAL STATEMENT.—COMMITTEE.

WAYS AND MEANS considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am afraid, Mr. Raikes, that the exciting overture which has just concluded is not a very encouraging one for the tame speech and uninteresting details to which I shall have to invite the attention of the Committee. But I have at least this consolation—that the state of our finances in the present year is, happily, not such as to cause any great anxiety, or to occasion much alarm, in the mind of the House; and although I hope that I may be favoured with the attention of hon. Members for the few remarks which I shall have to make upon the condition and prospects of the Revenue, and the arrangements which I shall invite the Committee to co-operate in, still, there will be nothing which is likely to cause any very considerable excitement.

Sir, the income of the year 1874-5, which has just terminated, was estimated by me, when I brought forward the Budget last year, at £74,425,000, and it has proved in the result to be £74,921,873, showing a surplus—an increase of Revenue beyond the estimate—of £496,873. The Expenditure Estimate in the Budget was £73,958,000. The Estimate as it stood in the Appropriation Act passed at the close of the Session, was £74,083,527, and the expenditure in the result was £74,328,040, exceeding, as a result, the Budget Estimate by £370,040, and the Appropriation Act Estimate by £244,513. The surplus, which in the Budget Estimate I took at £467,000, and at the time of the Appropriation Act at £342,000, has proved to be £593,833, being more than the Budget Estimate by £126,000, and more than the Appropriation Estimate by £251,000.

Now, Sir, I think that this is a statement which, upon the whole, may fairly be described as a satisfactory result of the year. I am aware that in some quarters criticisms have been passed, and dissatisfaction has been expressed; but I hope I am not wrong in attributing that to the proverbial love of grumbling which prevails among Englishmen, and to some natural feeling in a few quarters, perhaps, of disappointment—agreeable disappointment, of course, I mean—of many of the predictions which were freely indulged in in the course of the year. I have been told that my Estimates last year were exceedingly over sanguine—that the position into which I led the House and the country in the matter of finance was a perilous one, and that if it had not been for the happy accident, or, as I should rather say, the happy Providence of an exceedingly good harvest, we might have found ourselves landed in a most terrible and disastrous deficiency. I think it will be seen that these complaints have been somewhat exaggerated. I cannot say that there were no mistakes in the Estimates of last year, no mistakes in details. I admit there were some mistakes; and I suppose there never was a Budget in which some mistakes were not made—some errors on one side or the other. But I think those who candidly consider the general results of the Budget will admit that the errors on the present occasion were not of a very serious or dangerous character; and I must frankly say that, as to the idea of there having been any danger of a serious deficiency, such an idea was something in the nature of a delusion. It is said that we should be in a more comfortable position at the present time if we had taken a less sanguine Estimate last year. If by that it is meant that we should be in a more pleasant and comfortable position if we had kept the Income Tax at 3*d.* instead of 2*d.*, and extracted something like £2,000,000 more than was required from the pockets of the people in order to show a great surplus now of between £2,000,000 and £3,000,000, and so have the pleasure of taking off taxation, I must say that is a view I do not concur in. I am better pleased to think that the money has been left in the pockets of the people, than that I should have to come forward on this occasion and parade before the House a very large and handsome surplus. I would rather stand in a reverse position to that of a gentleman we read of, who was believed to be distinguished at Athens, but who, being a miser, was despised. He found himself unpopular with the people, and when he ventured abroad he was hissed; but he used to console himself when he went home by looking at the huge sums of money in his cash-box. I, on the other hand, console myself—whatever may be the hisses of a few instructors of public opinion—with the reflection that the money is not in my cash-box, but in the pockets of the people.

Sir, I am told that the Estimates, though they have in the gross been fairly justified, were in detail very erroneous. I should like just to say a word on that subject. The Customs Estimate has very considerably exceeded my expectation; and the Excise Estimate has by a less considerable amount fallen short of my Estimate. But I think I did on one occasion last year say that which I know has been frequently and justly said by other Chancellors of the Exchequer, that in estimating your Revenue you ought to take, in practice, Customs and Excise together. Because your Estimate is founded very much upon a calculation of the power and ability of the people to consume taxable articles, and those articles are to be found not under the head of Excise alone, but under the head of Customs also; and I certainly myself expected that if there should be any deficiency on one of these heads, it would probably be made up by a surplus on the other. And so it has proved, and very naturally proved. In the first place, let me ask where has the deficiency been? There has been a deficiency, and a considerable one, in the result of the Estimate for Spirits in the Excise Revenue. But, on the other hand, there is a remarkable excess in Customs, also under the head of Spirits; and if we carefully look into the peculiar circumstances of the case, you will find that that is owing to a rather remarkable cause. There was a very good potato harvest in this country last year; there was also a good potato harvest in Germany. When there is a deficient potato harvest in this country, large quantities of potatoes are imported from abroad, but there happening to be a large potato harvest here, that quantity of potatoes was not needed in the form of vegetables. The consequence was that a very large quantity of potato spirit was made in Germany and sent into this country; that potato spirit is used for various purposes—very much of it, I believe, for methylation; whatever purposes it was used for, it took the place of a large quantity of British spirit; and my friends at the Board of Inland Revenue are a little jealous at finding that their Estimate has fallen short by something like the same amount as that by which the Customs Revenue has exceeded the Customs Estimates; and they say you ought to give us, and not the Customs, credit for this excess of Revenue from rum and from the German spirits. I do not go into this question. I do not think it is worth going into. But there is another consideration, and one which, I think, is so curious that I should like to call the attention of the Committee to it. It is not only the competition of one class of spirits with another, but it is the competition of those articles which pay duty under Customs with those articles which pay duty under Excise to which I wish to call attention. The Revenue from spirits has somewhat disappointed calculations, but the Revenue from tea has very largely exceeded expectations; and it occurred to me that it would be interesting to have a comparison made in order to see whether we had misjudged the consuming power of the people—to have a comparison made of the amount which the public must have been expending in the purchase of tea, which produced a large Revenue this year, with what they must have expended to produce a corresponding amount of Revenue from spirits. I find these remarkable results. The duty on tea produced last year £320,000 more than the year before. That represents an additional consumption of 12,800,000lb. of tea, at 1s. 11d., the average market price in bond in 1874, including the duty, which would cost £1,226,750. If the consumers, instead of spending that £1,226,750 on tea, had spent it on British spirits at 13s. 3d. a gallon, which was the average price for the same period, it would have represented 1,851,700 gallons, and produced an increased Revenue of £925,000. Thus, instead of a Revenue of £320,000 from tea, we should have got, at the same cost to ourselves, £925,000 from the people on spirits. That is remarkably satisfactory. It is satisfactory, in the first place, as showing that tea is to some extent, perhaps, taking the place of spirits; and, secondly, as showing—as I hope we may infer—that the relief given last year by the reduction of taxation was relief that was especially valuable to that class of the community who are consumers of tea rather than of spirits. I can hardly venture to think that this curious result can be taken as evidence that the great masses of the people who are spirit drinkers have to any great extent given up spirits in favour of tea. But it may be taken as evidence that the class of people who, with their families, are habitually consumers of tea to a much greater extent than of spirits—that is, probably, the lower class which pays income tax, the house duty, and the charges upon persons possessing incomes from £100 to £300 or £400 a-year—were so much relieved by the remissions of last year that they have increased their expenditure in a direction which has led to the result we have witnessed. When I consider how much relief was given by the abolition of the sugar duty, the reduction of the income tax, and in the form of subventions to the rates last year, I cannot help hoping that some cause like that may have been at work, and may have produced the remarkable result to which I have referred.

I am anxious not to detain the Committee by going into figures, although I have them in my hand, which might be interesting as showing what the present condition of the people is. ["Go on!"] If I were not afraid of being wearisome I could read them. ["Go on!"] Well, if the Committee are patient I will quote some of the figures. In the first place, I would observe, in regard to the consumption per head of the population, that, taking the article of tea, in 1872 the consumption per head was 4 lb.; in 1873, it was 4 lb. 1 oz.; in 1874, it was 4 lb. 4 oz. Of malt the consumption per head in 1872 was 1·93 bushel; in 1873, it had risen to 1·97 bushel; and in 1874, it dropped again to 1·93 bushel. But although the consumption of malt has fallen off this year, the consumption of sugar used for brewing has considerably increased, sugar having, to a considerable extent, come into competition with malt. That may be due partly to the cheapness of sugar, and partly to the high price of barley; for, although last year there was a very abundant wheat harvest, yet the barley harvest, though good in quality, was not abundant in quantity; and the price of barley has, I think, been higher in proportion to that of wheat than it has been known to be for many years. That circumstance has, doubtless, had some effect. Again, the consumption per head of tobacco has a little increased. In 1872, it was 1 lb. 6 oz; in 1873, it was 1 lb. 7 oz; and last year it was also 1 lb. 7 oz. Taking spirits, the increased consumption of which is not, perhaps, an advantage, except financially, the increase has continued, though not at so great a rate as before. In 1872, the consumption per head was 1.14 gallon; in 1873, it was 1.23 gallon; and last year 1.26 gallon. Then I take the Savings Banks. The excess of deposits over withdrawals for the year has been £1,398,000. That is not quite so high an excess as there was in the year before, when it amounted to £1,566,000; still less was it equal to the year 1872, which was £2,470,000. Although there has been a decrease in the rate of the excess, the excess has continued, and the people have apparently been able to deposit their savings in the savings banks. With regard to the number of paupers, I am happy to be able to give a good account. The total number both of indoor and outdoor paupers in England and Scotland last year was 937,000, against 999,000 in the year before. I have not got the return for Ireland upon the whole of these points. I do not know that there are any other figures with which I need trouble the Committee; but, looking at these points, I think that, on the whole, we may say that the condition of the people is fairly satisfactory, and that, although there may be nothing that should be depicted in very glowing colours, yet there is nothing that need cause us any present uneasiness.

As to another head of Revenue, on which there has been a falling off—namely, Stamps—I must freely confess that there was an error in the Estimate. We were, perhaps, too sanguine as to the revival of trade which we hoped for last year; and when I say that on almost every head of Stamps there has been a disappointment in the rather sanguine Estimate of last year—which principally shows itself in Bills of Exchange, on which there has been a loss of £75,000—I admit frankly that the anticipations of last year's Budget were higher than circumstances have justified. At the same time, although Stamps have fallen nominally £10,000 below the receipts of the previous year, yet that is a small sum in comparison with the size of the Revenue; and when we remember that last year was a peculiar one, because there were two Easters in it, and therefore there was a great number of holidays, when no business was done, I think we may regard the Stamp Revenue as showing something like an equilibrium.

The next item is the Post Office. The Budget Estimate was £5,300,000. The receipts were £5,670,000, or £370,000 over the Estimate. The Committee will bear in mind that all these accounts are accounts not so much of receipts as of Exchequer payments; that they do not represent the exact amount received by any Department of Revenue, but the amount which that Department is able to pay into the Exchequer. That is a distinction with which right hon. Gentlemen and a few others who have studied these subjects are conversant, but I very much doubt whether the general public are always alive to this fact; and that explains some of the wild and altogether unsound conclusions which were occasionally drawn in the course of last year from the statements showing the Exchequer receipts from week to week, because persons would look on them as if they represented the receipt of the Revenue, which was not the case. Many circumstances would make a difference between the two. Undoubtedly, surprise has been expressed that there has been irregularity in the progress of the Revenue from the Post Office. But that is not due to any irregularity in the net receipts, but from the mode in which the Exchequer payments were made. A year or two ago a good many remarks were made as to irregularities in the way in which the Post Office revenues were dealt with, and several rectifications had to be effected in order to bring the Exchequer payments into proper relation with the receipts week by week. I am happy to say those rectifications have now been satisfactorily made, and we may rely upon the payments from the Exchequer to the Post Office, fairly representing the net receipts of that Department. I have here a statement for a good many years past of the Exchequer payments and the net receipts of the Post Office. I will not trouble the Committee with the figures; but they may take it on my authority that the net receipts represent, on the whole, a very fair and steady rate of progress, much more than is indicated by the Exchequer payments, which have been fluctuating from the cause I have stated. The Committee may also take this on my authority—that the receipt which has been carried to our credit in the present Budget, £5,670,000, represents payments into the Exchequer duly proportioned to the bond fide net receipts of the Post Office for the year. The net receipts of 1872 were £5,212,000; in 1873, £5,481,000; and in 1874-5, they are estimated at £5,750,000.

As regards the Telegraph Revenue, I am sorry to say there has been a falling off; and it is of a character which I can only present as illustrating the difficulties of that undertaking. Undoubtedly, the Telegraph Service has not as yet been brought into a remunerative condition. We are not, as yet, really paying our way, or paying anything towards the interest even, of the debt which was incurred for the purchase. And we can only hope that, by exertions that are being made to improve the service and bring it into a more economical state, we may by-and-by set that matter right. The difficulties under which we have to administer a service of that kind—a service which interests everybody, and which leads to demands being made in all directions—are very great indeed. I know well that hon. Members are continually pressed by their constituents to make complaints that proper telegraphic communication is not afforded to this part of the country, or another part, and hon. Gentlemen are very reluctant to accept the answer that the Government cannot afford to deal with the matter. There is a feeling that the Government ought to be able to deal with it, and Government cannot give the answer that private companies could and I am sure did give. This is a point worthy of consideration, not so much in regard to the Telegraph Service itself, in which we are now fairly embarked, and of which we must make the best we can, as in reference to suggestions of acquisitions of other forms of property, and the conduct of other kinds of business, in which I hope the House will never be led to embark without very carefully weighing the results of this remarkable experiment.

I do not know that there is any other head of Revenue with respect to which I need say anything, except that which is called by the mysterious word “Miscellaneous.” The Committee have observed, no doubt, that the Revenue from “Miscellaneous” has fallen below the Estimate. But I think it right, in perfect frankness, to say that this is not an accident. It was owing to my having given instructions that there should be no haste in calling in certain receipts which might have been paid in before the 31st of March, but which it did not appear necessary to call in, and which it would be better to leave for this year. They amount to something like £300,000. The reason for that step, as I think it is only candid to mention, was this:—Last year we made considerable reductions in taxation. Those reductions were intended to affect the finances, not only of last year, but of this, and among those reductions were considerable subventions to local rates. At the time I brought forward the Budget last year, I over-estimated the proportion of those subventions which would have to be paid within the last financial year. When I found that a great proportion of them would not come in course of payment last year, it appeared to me that we should have for that year a larger surplus than would be necessary, and that the finances of this year might be somewhat embarrassed. I thought, therefore, that it was fair, regarding the two years as one, to give instructions that certain payments which might have come into the Exchequer before the 31st of March should be made afterwards. If those receipts had been called in at the usual time we should have had a surplus of nearly £1,000,000. As it is, the finances of the present year benefit by that arrangement.

Having gone over the Revenue of last year, I do not know that there is anything in the Expenditure which calls for special remark except the point to which I have just referred—namely, the difference between the amount paid for the subventions to different local taxes which were promised last year and were not paid. The total amount on account of local expenditure last year was £512,000, and the amount which stands over for this year will be an addition of £642,000, making a total for the two years of £1,154,000. One of the items was the subvention or contribution made by decision of this House in aid of the rates on places where the Government has property. I think it right to inform the Committee that the process of ascertaining the amount to be paid for those subventions has been carried on under the immediate direction of the Treasury through one of its officers, Mr. Vincent Griffiths, who has discharged his duty with the greatest care and ability. Very satisfactory settlements have been arrived at with the greater part of the places concerned; with Chatham, where we have a dockyard, arsenal, and barracks; Rochester, Woolwich, Plumstead, Portsmouth, Portsea, Plymouth, Greenwich, Deptford, Sheerness, and, in short, a large number of places which I need not enumerate. The arrangements have been made in a manner which has satisfied the Treasury and has also obtained the assent of the local authorities. I think we may arrive at a very fair and reasonable basis for the settlement of this difficult question by the course adopted. The general feeling of the persons interested in the receipt of those contributions has been consulted, and, at the same time, the Treasury have kept a vigilant eye on the bargain made with a view to the interest of the public. I may mention that the expenditure on the Ashantee Expedition has been closed, and it has been found that the total is only £933,544. It is right that the fact should be put upon record, for it is very much to the credit of the Government which conducted the Expedition.

With respect to the expenditure of the coming year, there will be an increase. I will give the items in the usual manner. The Estimate for the interest of the Debt is £27,215,000. That is £70,000 more than last year, owing partly to the effect of the arrangement made with regard to the Terminable Annuities. The Consolidated Fund Charges will be £1,590,000. And here I ought to apologize to the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) for not having this year done what he asked us to do—namely, to lay a statement of the Consolidated Fund Charges on the Table, but before I conclude he will see why I have not done so. The Estimate for the Army is £14,678,000, and for the Army Purchase Commission, £638,000. The Estimate for the Navy is £10,785,000. For the Civil Service it is £12,656,000. I can hardly mention the Civil Service without expressing my thanks to my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) for the very great pains he has taken in keeping down, as far as possible, the Estimates for the various branches of the Services. The Estimate for the Post Office is £3,036,000; collection of Revenue—Customs and Inland Revenue, £2,694,000; and collection for the Telegraph Service, £1,098,000. The Packet Service Estimate is £878,000, and the total estimated expenditure of the year, £75,268,000. The increase in the Post Office is due to the very considerable advance in the salaries, amounting, since the Estimates of the last Budget were presented, to £117,000 a year. The Packet Service has a decrease of £121,000, which is mainly due to a reduction of subsidies.

I now come to the estimated Revenue of the year. I may say in approaching the Estimates of Revenue, that I propose to build them upon as safe and cautious a principle as I can. I do not think it right altogether to disregard the undoubted fact of the normal growth of Revenue. It is quite certain that for many years past there has been—good years and bad years taken together—a very considerable and, upon the whole, a very steady growth of Revenue. But it should also be borne in mind that although the result of a series of years may be drawn to an average, the results undoubtedly fluctuate from year to year, and therefore it is always necessary for a Chancellor of the Exchequer in reference to the immediate arrangements for a Parliamentary year, to look to the particular circumstances of the moment at which he stands. He may feel confident that any causes which may prejudicially affect the progress of the Revenue will be only of a temporary character, but still he is bound to look to both the present and the future; and although at the present time there is, as I have said, a very fair and reasonable ground for being satisfied with the general condition of the people, still there are causes for prudence and caution. We have not yet seen that revival in trade which we are looking for; and some of the figures I read to the Committee earlier in my Statement, I think show that we must not look on this year as one likely to be very remarkable for a great advance of the Revenue. At all events, it would not be wise to treat it so. At the same time, I must remind the Committee that this will be in some respects a favourable year. It is Leap Year, which gives us a day more, and makes a considerable addition to the Revenue; and, in the second place, it is a year in which there is no Easter or Good Friday, and therefore it is a model year for the financier.

I have gone very carefully, with the heads of Departments, through the Estimates I am about to submit to the Committee, and I submit them with confidence that they are reasonable Estimates, and such as the Committee may fairly accept, as being neither deliberately too cautious, nor, on the other hand, over-sanguine. I take the Revenue of the Customs, which last year produced £19,289,000, at £19,500,000. I take the Excise at £27,800,000. That is an addition to the Revenue of last year, which was £27,395,000; but it is an addition which has been very carefully calculated, and by which I think we may fairly undertake to stand. Stamps I take at £10,600,000. Last year they produced £10,540,000; but with an extra day this year and the absence of holidays, I think I may take them at £10,600,000 as an equilibrium. The Land Tax and House Duty, which last year produced £2,440,000, I take substantially at the same figure—£2,450,000. The next item is the Income Tax, which produced last year £4,306,000. It has been growing very steadily, and there has been a remarkable increase in the produce of the penny per pound. It is customary to compare the present yield of the penny with what it was when Sir Robert Peel first imposed the tax; but that is not altogether fair, for the tax has since been extended to Ireland, and there have been other changes. Still the growth of the yield has been very remarkable. In the early years of the Income Tax, from 1842 to 1852, when the rate of the tax stood at 7*d.* in the pound, there were fluctuations from year to year, and the progress of the yield was very small. The yield per penny, which was £800,000 in the first year, had only risen to £847,000 in the last. In the next period, from 1853 to 1862, when Great Britain and Ireland were included and certain other changes in the assessment were made, the rate rose to £1,030,000 in the first year, and £1,249,000 in the last. In the years since 1863-4, when there have been constant fluctuations in the rate of the tax, as indeed was the case in the preceding period also, there was a steady rise in the value per penny, rising from £1,249,000 in 1862-3 to upwards of £1,900,000 in the year last passed. The explanation of the Income Tax receipt is shortly this:—It was estimated last year upon a scale in which I took the penny as yielding £1,840,000. The tax produced £4,306,000. Undoubtedly the arrears were under-estimated. But the produce of the penny, instead of £1,840,000, was more than £1,900,000; and we take it this year at £1,950,000. The estimate of the assessment at 2*d.* I take at £3,900,000. I have a statement showing the amount of arrears actually now due and in hand, and I can give to the House the amount outstanding. It was about £800,000 at the beginning of this year, which will be brought in. The sum received from the 1st of April is £319,000. The Post Office I take at £5,750,000, being a moderate increase over the receipts of last year, which were £5,670,000, and fully justified, I think, by the experience we have had. The Telegraph Service I take at £1,200,000; last year it produced £1,120,000. Crown Lands I take at £385,000, the same as last year. The Miscellaneous Estimates I take at £4,100,000, and this will produce a total Revenue of £75,685,000, as against an estimated Expenditure of £75,268,000. We have, therefore, a prospect, on these figures, of a surplus of £417,000. I am bound, however, to say that although the surplus may be estimated at that amount, there will still be some Supplementary Estimates, especially for Irish Education, the precise amount of which I cannot now state, and this must be taken into consideration in deciding on the arrangements for the year. Well, Sir, that may appear a very small and unsatisfactory surplus; but I must remind the Committee that the remissions of taxation made last year were made not for one year but for two, and that a considerable proportion of them are due this year. The total amount of remissions of Imperial taxation last year may be stated at £3,830,000, and there will be some £490,000 due to this year. A great part of that is due to the balance of the remission of the penny of Income Tax, and a certain portion to the balance of the remission of the Sugar Duties. I forgot to mention that last year we received as the balance of Sugar Duty £68,000; we also received as part of the Horse Tax, in operation in the early part of the year, about £25,000. Something like £90,000 is due to these two heads, and about £400,000 of Income Tax makes a remission for the two years of £4,321,000. With regard to local taxes, the subventions, which are, in fact, remissions of taxation in the form of rates, amounted last year to £512,000, and this year they will be £642,000, making together £1,154,000. The total relief of taxation, Imperial and local, in the two years will thus amount to £5,476,000, of which £1,133,000 will become due in the present year. We must not, therefore, consider that we begin with a surplus of only £417,000; we may rather look at it as though we were beginning the year with a surplus of £1,500,000, and were proposing to give £1,100,000 in remission of taxation. It was pledged beforehand; it comes, nevertheless, out of the finances of the present year. We thus arrive at a surplus of £417,000, subject to some deductions in the way of Supplementary Estimates. Every pains will be taken to keep them low, and I have no reason to suppose they will be of great consequence. Even if the surplus could be taken at the full amount of £417,000, the House and the country would be satisfied it was not a case in which we ought to think of any reductions or remissions of taxation. I must mention two small re-adjustments which we propose to make. The most important is what I practically promised last week in the discussion upon Brewers' Licences. I have carefully re-considered the scale of those licences, and I am satisfied that the scale as it at present stands is not fair to the small brewer, and that it weighs heavily upon him in comparison with large brewers. I therefore propose that the present scale shall be superseded by a scale of a uniform character, in which the charge shall be at the rate of 12s. 6d. for every 50 barrels brewed. The effect will be that nobody will be a loser, and the small brewers will be gainers. The result to the Revenue will be a loss of £60,000. With regard to any other remission, and especially with regard to the suggestion which was made, and which I said I would consider, without pledging myself on the subject—namely, the postponement of the payment of any portion of the duty—I find myself unable financially to attempt such a thing: and, after all, it is clear it would be a mere gift to the brewers, and that those who would profit by it most would be the large, and not the small brewers. I therefore consider it will not be in my power to make any offer of the kind. I content myself with remedying what appears to me to be a decided injustice in the scale. This is the only re-adjustment which will cost anything to the Exchequer. There is another small re-adjustment which I propose to make, and which, so far as I can judge, will produce no financial effect—it relates to one of the Stamp Duties. As the Committee will remember, last year attention was called to the heavy Stamp Duty which the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and other officers were called upon to pay in respect of their appointments; and it was then stated that the Government were looking into this question of the Stamp Duties. They are in a very unsatisfactory position. The present state of the law is that a duty of £5 per cent, with smaller ratios upon small incomes, is charged upon the first year's value of every appointment made in writing; while appointments which are not made in writing pay nothing. That applies not only to the public service, but also to all private employments; and, although I do not suppose the Stamp Duty is always rigorously paid, it is certain that, under the regulations, all such persons as secretaries of railway companies, clerks in banks, and persons accepting any kind of private appointments made in writing would have to pay a duty of £5 per cent upon the first year's income. In the public service that operates in a most extraordinary and unequal manner. There are certain appointments which must be made in writing, and which are so taxed. There are certain others of equal or higher value not made in writing, and which escape being taxed. I am speaking not only of political appointments, but of appointments in the permanent Civil Service. The Controller of the National Debt Office has been challenged by the Auditor General, and has been told he is liable to stamp duty on his appointment. The permanent Assistant Secretary to the Treasury, who receives a higher salary, is not appointed by writing, and he pays nothing. This uncertainty is very inconvenient, and I propose we should solve the difficulty by largely reducing the amount of the tax, which is really unreasonable, by making it uniform, and, so far as relates to the Civil Service, making it a rule that all appointments shall be made in writing. The proposal, therefore, is that the charge, instead of £5, be 5s. per £100 of the first year's salary. That will be a very moderate tax on first appointments, which those who are appointed will generally be willing to pay. This arrangement will have an incidental effect upon Civil Service appointments in this wise. We now appoint young men upon probation, and the understanding of that probationary employment is that if the person is found after 6 or 12 months to be unfit for the employment he is to be told that he cannot have the office and that he must look out elsewhere. This is a very invidious duty for the head of an office to perform, and it is very often not performed. Now, if the rule is made that every man upon his appointment should receive a writing, and pay a small stamp duty on it, it would be easy to see that a person would not pay upon an appointment on probation. This is an incidental advantage; but the object of the proposal is to get rid of the inconvenience to which I have referred. [An hon. MEMBER: Will it apply to the Chancellor of the Exchequer?] It will; but it is not to be retrospective. We have thus reduced the moderate surplus of £417,000 to £357,000. As I said, looking to our general position, further remissions are impossible. Although there are no remissions, I may be asked whether there are any re-adjustments. I really do not think it would be agreeable to the Committee, to Parliament, or to the country that in the present state of our finances and of our taxation, we should attempt to revise the system under which we find ourselves—that being, as I may say in general terms, pretty well off, we should attempt to make revisions, in the hope of finding ourselves in a better position, but with the chance of finding ourselves in a worse position in the end. I do not mean to say that the present financial arrangements of the country and our fiscal system are absolutely without blot; I do not mean to say that our system is ideally the best that could be proposed. I am not prepared to say that in the years before us there may not arise cases for modifications and improvements in our system; but I do think we may fairly hold up our heads and say that there is no great cry or urgent necessity for any great reform or re-adjustment in our system of taxation. Looking back for a considerable period of time, we have seen how one tax after another which pressed upon national industry has been removed, and how in one way or another great relief has been given to the public. I do not say that there are not taxes that are disagreeable to those who pay them; but I doubt whether there are any that can be fairly said to be injurious to the public interests of the country. There is, no doubt, a good deal of feeling which exists in reference to one tax. It is one that the Committee have heard a good deal of for many years, and it is, perhaps, one upon which my Estimate of our financial condition might by some be challenged—I refer to the Income Tax. Last year we claimed that, considering how recently we had acceded to office, and considering the position of the finances, we might reserve our opinions with regard to this tax. I do not think that it would be candid to attempt to make a case with regard to that tax in exactly the same spirit now. Of course, we have been obliged to consider it, and whether it would be desirable to do that which it is quite possible to do—to make arrangements and re-adjustments by which we may dispense with it, or materially modify it. The Income Tax has its merits and demerits. It has merits as a war tax, for it raises enormously the power of the country, with reference to any strain upon our military resources. We all know, also, that it has merits as an engine for effecting great reforms in our system of taxation, and that what has been done with its assistance during the last 30 years has been work of a very important character. This could not have been carried out if it had not been for the assistance derived from the Income Tax.

On the other hand, I admit the objections which are raised against it and against the inequality in its incidence. It is, no doubt, a tax unequal in its incidence, and with all respect for my right hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Mr. Hubbard), who has hopes of getting rid of these inequalities and of making it fair for everyone, I must say I am afraid that those inequalities are inherent in the nature of the tax, and that it is impossible to do more than shift the inequality from one quarter to another. There are also other objections to it which are undoubtedly patent, as, for example, the disagreeable manner in which it presses upon certain classes of people, and especially upon those who have to undergo what they call an inquisitorial examination of their affairs. But I am afraid that if you are to keep the tax at all, it will be exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, to divest it of this inquisitorial character. Something might be done to mitigate it, and, undoubtedly, whatever can be done, it is our wish to do. Anything we can do to mitigate these objections, and to make the pressure less felt, it will be our duty to do; but I cannot hold out any glowing hope of our being able to remove all such objections. These objections against the tax, however, press a great deal more against the tax when it is high than when it is low. Certainly, if we look at the tax with reference to its inequality, there is no doubt that this objection fades almost into insignificance when you keep the tax at a low rate; because though it might be exceedingly unfair if you raised the whole or the greater part of your Revenue by it, the unfairness on particular persons is very much less when you are only raising an insignificant proportion of your Revenue by it. I may also say that there is another objection which has been felt against the Income Tax, and that is the uncertainty which has attended for many years the use to which it was put and the rate at which it was likely to be levied from year to year. When a man was unable to say whether the Income Tax of the coming year would be 8*d.* or 10*d.* or 1*s.* in the pound—when the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whatever the state of the finances of the year, might come down and say he had great reforms to propose and great experiments to make, and when he might propose, at a moment's notice, to double the Income Tax—then, undoubtedly, the tax was much harder and more oppressive than it could be if it were kept low, uniform, and, as far as possible, steady. Now, if we have not made our fiscal system perfect, we have gone so far in that direction that with a prospect before us of a fair annual growth of the Revenue and a reasonable hope and trust in the prosperity of the country, we may say that this use of the Income Tax may be considered to be at an end. We may, in asking you to renew the Income Tax at 2*d.* in the pound, do so with the hope and belief that it may be regarded as a tax useful in point of amount, but as held in abeyance—ready only for some great emergency, and not to be called upon for trivial occasions.

That being the state of the finances generally, there is one subject to which I should like to invite the attention of the Committee. The total amount of the National Debt on the 31st of March, 1874, was £779,283,245. On the 31st of March, 1875, it was £775,553,577, showing a diminution of £3,729,668 in the course of a year. But not only has there been this alteration in the total figures of the Debt; there has also been another alteration to which I wish to call attention—that is, as to the form in which the Debt now exists. On the 31st of March, 1874, the Debt was thus composed:—The Funded Debt was £723,514,005; the Terminable Annuities valued in Three per Cent Stock were £51,289,640; and the Unfunded Debt was £4,479,600. On the 31st of March, 1875, that Debt was diminished from £723,514,000 to £714,000,000, or nearly £715,000,000; while the Terminable Annuities valued in Three per Cent Stock had risen from £51,289,640 to £55,358,722. The Unfunded Debt had also risen to £5,239,300. It is obvious that that change involves a reduction of the Funded Debt, and the increase as represented by Terminable Annuities is due mainly, if not entirely—is due in great part at least—to the new Annuities which we set up last year, and by which we cancelled £7,000,000 Stock on account of the Post Office Savings Banks, and created Annuities of between £400,000 and £500,000. The operations on the Debt during the year were as follows:—We have in the course of the year

increased the Funded Debt by the creation of Terminable Annuities by an amount equivalent in Stock to £7,000,000. We have increased it by Terminable Annuities on account of Fortifications and Local Barracks, equivalent in Stock to £750,000, and in Exchequer Bonds, issued for local loans, by £1,000,000. I can hardly pass by the subject of Terminable Annuities for Fortifications without saying that the expenditure on that head is practically closed. I am not sure that it is quite closed; but it is very much to the credit of General Sir William Jervois, whose original estimate was rather more than £7,000,000, to state that the amount required has been within that estimate. So much for the increase of the Debt. On the other hand, the Debt was diminished—1, by Stock cancelled by means of Sinking Fund, £831,000; 2, by Stock cancelled in exchange for Savings Banks, amounting to £7,000,000; 3, by Stock cancelled on account of Life, &c., Annuities, £767,000; 4, by equivalent in Stock of capital paid off by Terminable Annuities, about £3,640,000; and 5, by Exchequer Bills paid off, £240,600. The condition of the National Debt is a subject to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has very frequently addressed the attention of the House of Commons, and it is one upon which I myself made some remarks last year. I am no enthusiast on the subject. I do not take either the extreme view of those who think that everything ought to be sacrificed to the diminution of the Debt, nor of those who represent it as merely a question of buying Consols at 92. I think we ought to make continuous and steady efforts for the reduction of the National Debt, and that our efforts ought not to be violent and spasmodic. They ought to have reference to the general condition of the country and of its taxation. If you are in a state of circumstances in which taxation bears very heavily indeed upon the interests of the country, no doubt it would be a great deal better to devote your energies to reducing taxation instead of devoting them to reducing Debt. But where, on the other hand, our taxation is in a tolerably fair condition, we certainly ought to be doing something in the other direction. I am bound to say that I do not think that this House or that Parliament has any great reason to be proud of the amount we have expended in the past year in the payment and reduction of Debt. We are doing a good deal, but we are far from doing all that we might do. I take the Estimate for the Debt. We are paying this year £27,200,000 for the Debt; but let us remember that up to the year 1860, our ancestors from the time of the Peace, and ourselves in our earlier days, never paid less than £28,000,000, and often very much more, per annum as a charge for the Debt.

Now, let me turn to a comparison between what we were doing in 1859 and at the present time. In 1859 we were paying £28,673,381 interest on the Debt, while in the year 1874 we paid only £27,094,480, being less by £1,578,000 than we were paying in 1859. But what has happened since 1859? I do not much like the system on which calculations are made as to the net amount of taxes imposed and repealed. There is a good deal of fallacy in that mode of stating the question. But it may be well to remember the remissions in taxation made since that time. The duties have been entirely remitted on the following articles:—Paper, sugar, corn, butter, cheese, eggs, leather, tallow, silk manufactures, rice, wood and timber, and various other articles of less importance. Besides these, the duties have been reduced on various articles. The duty on tea has been reduced from 1*s.* 5*d.* to 6*d.*; on wine from 5*s.* 5*d.* to 2*s.*, and a considerable reduction has been made on the duties on coffee, currants, raisins, and so forth. We must remember that this was when we were paying 5*d.* in the pound on the Income Tax, while we are now only paying 2*d.* If you look at the comparison of the wealth of the country as tested by the yield of the Income Tax, I find that a penny Income Tax in 1859 gave only £1,150,000; whereas in 1874 it gave £1,900,000, or an increase of 65 per cent. There has thus been a decrease of 5 per cent in what we are paying for the reduction of the Debt, and an increase of 65 per cent in the wealth of the country, as measured by the produce of the Income Tax. Well, now, I admit we are doing and have done a good deal in the way of paying off Debt; but I will ask the Committee to recollect what are the different forms in which we have been dealing with the Debt. In the early years after the war there was a system of Sinking Fund which was established on false principles, and which, although it showed very considerable energy and patriotism on the part of those who bore it, yet, being conducted and supported by loans, it was impossible for us economically to approve. Since 1829 we have acted upon the Debt partly by the present system of Sinking Fund and the application of casual surpluses, and partly by the system of Terminable Annuities and the creation of new Terminable Annuities, which has reduced the Debt at the rate of £800,000 a-year. Now, what has been the effect of the Sinking Fund? It has redeemed about £40,000,000 of Stock, but in the course of years we have added to our Debt for the Irish Famine Loan £8,000,000; for the Crimean War about £35,000,000; for the Slave Compensation £20,000,000; and for the purchase of the Telegraphs £10,000,000; making a total of £73,000,000, against which the Sinking Fund has only provided us with a reduction of £40,000,000. If, therefore, we only had the Sinking Fund and the casual surpluses to trust to we should not have been very successful in our operation upon the Debt. But we have in the same period paid off by the action of Terminable Annuities about £120,000,000, showing the superiority of a regular system of proceeding. Now, I have heard it said that we ought to maintain the principle of the Sinking Fund of 1821, and that anything we may do which differs from the Sinking Fund of 1829 is false in principle. We are continually told, and it is quite true—indeed, an axiom in finance—that the only way of relief is by the surplus of Revenue over Expenditure. Nobody since the Finance Committee of 1828, at all events, or for several years before, has doubted the absolute truth of that axiom that we can only redeem Debt by the surplus of Revenue over Expenditure. But it does not follow that you can do that only by those casual surpluses. Well, Terminable Annuities are, no doubt, very useful and very advantageous; but there are drawbacks to that system. In the first place, we know quite well that if you went into the open market and attempted to redeem any considerable amount of Debt by creating Terminable Annuities, you would not find them taken up, or, at all events, not upon terms which would satisfactorily carry through the operation. You are therefore obliged to have recourse to money which is under your own control—money which comes from the Savings Banks, and to invest that in Terminable Annuities, and so cancel your Stock. Well, prima facie, one would say that you are making use of money which is national money, entrusted to you for the purpose of making a proper use of it and of paying the depositors interest for it—at first sight one would say you are not as a Government making the best possible use of those deposits, for you invest them largely in what would be in the open market an unprofitable security. There is, of course, no doubt Terminable Annuities are a less disadvantageous investment for those Savings Bank monies than if they were offered in the open market. But I have another objection and a more serious one to the operation of Terminable Annuities, and it is, that they produce a kind of spasmodic action. You are paying a large sum in the shape of Annuities which in 10 years hence will suddenly fall in, and you will be relieved of the payment of about £5,000,000 a-year, which will come into the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the day, who must consider what he will do with it. Well, now, Sir, we have had experience on this subject. I refer, first of all, to the Long Annuities which fell in in 1860, and which amounted to £2,000,000 a-year. On that occasion my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) brought forward a new Budget, with an entirely new plan of finance, involving very large remissions of taxation, against which I do not wish to say a word. They were large remissions—boons to the taxpayer which my right hon. Friend was able to give to a great extent by the reduction of the interest charged upon the Debt from above £28,000,000 to a little more than £26,000,000, and it has taken us all this time to get the charge up again to £27,000,000. Well, the same thing, but on a larger scale, will happen in 1885, and not only will there be a great temptation to make use of the windfall, as I may call it, in the same way; but you will find, if you attempt to set up a large amount of fresh Annuities, a great difficulty in obtaining stock enough to cancel at once by means of the creation of such Annuities. Therefore, I wish the Committee to consider whether it is not possible to devise some plan which might put us upon a way of securing a more regular, more constant, and more stable action upon the National Debt. Sir, the proposal I have to make is this—I propose that we should set before us an object to be accomplished. It cannot be done this year; but it may be done by two steps that we should arrive at a point of making the charge for our Debt the same amount which it was before 1860—that is to say, bringing it up to £28,000,000 a-year—I say what I propose is that, instead of applying our surplus simply to redeem the Debt, and giving ourselves the advantage of the saving of interest on the Debt so redeemed, we should keep the charge at the fixed amount of £28,000,000 a-year permanently, by Act of Parliament; that we should pay £28,000,000 a-year to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, and that they should apply the balance above what was required for payment of the Debt in the year to the redemption of stock. The rate at which I should propose to proceed would be this—I should propose to fix the amount that we should charge for the present year at £27,400,000: I think our finances will bear that. For the next year, 1876-7, I propose to fix it at £27,700,000, and for the year 1877-8 at £28,000,000. I have no doubt, under ordinary circumstances and with the ordinary growth of Revenue, we shall be very easily able, without any distress to the country, to bring up the charge for Debt to that amount. Well, I shall be asked what would be the operation of that plan, and I may say that though I use these figures with some little hesitation, yet they are figures which I think the Committee will accept with the understanding that they must not be taken as being absolutely certain, for the reason that if you were to continue to operate largely upon your Debt for a considerable number of years, you would probably affect the rate of interest and the operations in the Funds; and these calculations are made upon the assumption that the price of Funds shall continue stationary throughout the operation. Well, assuming that, you would, taking the price of Funds at the average of the last 30 years, have reduced by the end of the year 1885 £6,800,000 of Stock, and in 30 years you would have reduced £162,000,000 of Stock. But, assuming besides that, as I think we fairly may, the surplus Revenue would keep at the average of £500,000, assuming also that Stock cancelled by Life Annuities and Land Tax redemption continue at their present rate, about £770,000 a-year, the following amounts of Stock will be cancelled:—By 1885 you will have cancelled £21,000,000, and in 30 years from this time you will have cancelled no less than £213,000,000. Well, Sir, these are large figures, which appeal a good deal to the imagination, and which, I fear, although they might in former times have had an effect favourable to my proposal, may, at the present time, have a somewhat contrary bearing. I am quite aware, when I make a proposal which involves something which looks like the principle of the old Sinking Fund, although under very different circumstances, that I shall waken up old prejudices which have prevailed for many years against that principle. But, Sir, I wish most distinctly to remind the Committee that the proposal which I make is one wholly and entirely free from the evils which attach to the Sinking Fund of Dr. Price. I will take the liberty of reading a very short extract from one of Dr. Price's works, which will show the absurdity of the calculations on which his scheme was founded. He said—

“Let a State be supposed to run in debt £2,000,000 annually, for which it pays 4 per cent interest, in 70 years a debt of £140,000,000 would be incurred, but an appropriation of £400,000 per annum, employed in manner of a Sinking Fund, at compound interest, would, at the end of this term, leave the nation beforehand £6,000,000.”

So that, while the nation was supposed to be borrowing £2,000,000 a-year, it would, in fact, at the end of 70 years, have £6,000,000 in place of this liability by the operation of this marvellous Sinking Fund. But when that was submitted to a proper arithmetical test, it broke down at once. I will now quote from a very different authority. One of the last and heaviest blows which was struck at the old Sinking Fund was struck by Lord Grenville, in a pamphlet written in 1826 or 1827. Disagreeing as he did with the views of Dr. Price, he made this important admission, that—at compound interest without resorting to still further taxation. The fixed allowance and the successively redeemed Annuities which compose the Fund will severally continue to be defrayed from the same revenues as before, and by the progressive addition of those Annuities to the fund itself, it may ultimately be carried to any extent not exceeding their amount."

That is a description of a Sinking Fund such as I propose to establish. Lord Grenville did not advocate its establishment at the time he was speaking, because he considered that the pressure of taxation was then so great that he desired to devote the first energies of the Government and of Parliament to the reduction of taxation, with the view of setting free our various industries. Our position at the present moment is very different. We hope that we have attained such a position where we may consider that we have an effective and permanent surplus, which we may fairly ask the House to devote in the manner I have proposed to the reduction of our Debt. I may, of course, be met by a different kind of objection. I may be told—"Do this, if you please; but you will never be able to bind future Parliaments, and the very first time that a Chancellor of the Exchequer wants to raise an additional Revenue without increasing taxation he will put an end to your Sinking Fund, and will shatter all your dreams of reducing the National Debt by some hundreds of millions." That may be perfectly true; and I say that, under circumstances different from the present, it would be a very reasonable thing for a Chancellor of the Exchequer to do. If the circumstances of the country should materially alter, it would only be right that we should take steps to take off that which we now propose to put on, in view of the present and the probable immediate future of the country. One thing is quite clear—that if we do not put it on, it will certainly come to nothing, and that we shall be in the position of the gentleman who would never wind up his watch because if he did not wind it up it would never stop. Notwithstanding all the objections to the scheme, however, I still think that the experiment is worth making; because few Chancellors of the Exchequer would like to come down to this House and propose the repeal of an Act of Parliament establishing a Sinking Fund of this character, on the plea that they did not like to increase the taxation of the country, unless they had very good reasons for making such a proposition. But we do not argue a priori only; we have experience to guide us. What I am asking you to do is not to do a new thing, but to continue that of which we have experience. We have the Terminable Annuities, and if there are Gentlemen who say that these Terminable Annuities are excellent things, and that it would be a pity to disturb them, my reply is that we do not wish to disturb them. Within the limit of our £28,000,000 a-year we shall be able to create as many Terminable Annuities as we please, by means of turning so much Stock into them. On the whole, therefore, I submit that there are really no practical objections to our undertaking these good and beneficial operations in the present state of our finances. I must, however, further explain that there are two classes of Debt which I wish to keep outside of this fixed sum of £28,000,000. The first of those two classes of Debt comprises our temporary loans. For instance, in the event of the House being disposed to go further in the course that they followed in the case of the building of our fortifications and of our local barracks, and to borrow the sum required for such works for a short period upon Annuities, I propose that such a transaction shall be outside the £28,000,000 in question, so that the operation may be marked, and the House and the country may know what we were doing; for if you did not adopt that course I admit there would be danger, and that you might be disposed to throw the services at large upon this fund, in order to get the money and avoid increasing the taxation. Thus, assuming that the amount of interest payable upon the Debt and upon the Sinking Fund is £28,000,000 a-year, and that the interest payable upon the temporary loan is £50,000, we should put the charge for interest for the year at £28,050,000. Another class of loans which I propose to keep outside of this arrangement are those which we contract for the purpose of lending again to the various local authorities. To some extent such loans involve a mere book-keeping account, because while, on the one hand, we have to pay interest upon them out of the National Exchequer, on the other we receive interest on them, which goes into the Exchequer again under the head of Miscellaneous Revenue, according to the arrangement of last year. I should, therefore, propose that under the heading of Debt we should bring separately to account the interest upon these local loans. Thus, for the present year, our charge for Debt will stand thus—for Debt, £27,400,000, and for local loans £70,000. I must say a word or two respecting these local loans. For the last two years we have advanced somewhere about £3,000,000 for these purposes, £2,000,000 of which we have paid out of the balances, and £1,000,000 we have raised by means of Exchequer Bonds. Now, we pay $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent interest upon these Exchequer Bonds, and as we only receive the same interest for the money we so lend, on the whole we are, at all events, not gainers by the transactions. Large and increasing demands under this head are being constantly made upon us, and we shall have in the future to meet the demands for local loans for the purposes of the school boards and under the Artizans Dwellings Bill of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. We must, therefore, be prepared to meet demands of this character to the extent of £2,000,000 or £3,000,000 a-year for the next two or three years. I need scarcely say that this is a very unsatisfactory arrangement for the Exchequer, because we only get $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent, and have to pay $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. These, however, are not the only contracts which press hardly upon the Exchequer. In the course of the present Session, and at other times, a remark has been made as to the growing Savings Banks deficiency, and that is, no doubt, a matter which ought to receive consideration. The state of the case with regard to the Savings Banks is this. In November of last year, when the accounts were made up, the amount due to the Trustees of the old Savings Banks was £41,826,000, as against £38,463,000 in hand. You will find, therefore, that there was a deficiency of £3,363,000. I have not got the Returns for the Post Office Savings Banks, because they are not yet made up; but, generally speaking, they do not show any deficiency; on the contrary, they show a considerable surplus. The deficiency on the old Savings Banks account arose from our paying those banks a higher rate of interest than we were earning, and that deficiency has accumulated until it has reached its present proportions. At present we do not pay the Savings Banks a larger rate of interest than we are earning, and if we could once get rid of the deficiency we should be able to pay our way. But, as it is, the interest on the old deficiency goes on accumulating, and the result is that that deficiency increases year by year. It might be got rid of either by issuing Stock equal to its amount, or by placing it upon the Consolidated Fund; or we might reduce the rate of interest to depositors in the Savings Banks. I should, however, be very sorry to reduce the amount of interest paid to the depositors in such banks. Two other courses, however, may be taken which would materially aid us in getting rid of the deficiency in question. One would be to amalgamate the accounts of the old Savings Banks with those of the Post Office Savings Banks, and the other, to give greater facilities for investment. Such facilities for better investments may, I think, easily be found, in connection with local loans. Returning from this digression to the subject of the local loans, I wish to say that, without reference to the question of the interests of the Exchequer in the matter, the system under which the local authorities are borrowing money requires to be very carefully looked into. The total amount of local indebtedness in England at the present time is about £80,000,000; in fact, taking the School Board loans into consideration, it amounts to somewhere about £84,000,000, and it is rapidly increasing, with very little check or control. This is an unsatisfactory state of affairs, and some check ought to be placed upon the further extension of the system. No doubt, Parliament has given authority to these local bodies to borrow money up to a certain extent, and has laid down regulations under which before they are permitted to borrow, they must obtain the sanction of the Treasury, or of the Home Office, or of the Local Government Board, by whom the amount of the loans and the period of repayment are fixed. But, in point of fact, these regulations are most unsatisfactory; and, although a great deal of trouble is given to the local bodies when they wish to borrow, yet when they have once succeeded in borrowing the money nobody looks after what they are doing in the matter. But not only is the present system objectionable as regards the local bodies, it is still more so as regards those who lend their money to such bodies. The lenders of the money have obligations placed upon them which it is scarcely possible they can fulfil; and therefore they are often in peril of losing their money in consequence of some non-compliance with statutory regulations on the part of the borrowers. The hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) has taken a great deal of pains in obtaining for the information of the House a very interesting Return, showing the amounts which have been borrowed by these local bodies and the rate of interest which they pay. Taking the Returns together, we find that out of a sum of £93,000,000 which has been borrowed, and which is represented in those two sets of Returns, only £18,500,000 have been raised at and under 4 per cent; and more than £12,000,000 at above 5 per cent and running up to 6½ per cent. That is a considerable burden upon those localities. I will just state what the proposal is that we have to make with regard to this matter. It is intended to simplify the system under which these local debts are contracted. We propose to introduce a Bill which will have the effect of providing in future that all debt which may be contracted by local authorities shall be in the form of debentures. We propose that those debentures—for which we have the precedent of the Debenture Act passed a few years ago, though not much use has been made of it, and several local Acts—shall be registered at a Government office and authenticated by a stamp, proving that the borrowing power has not been exceeded and that the statutory provisions have been complied with. This will secure a registration of loans that may be contracted hereafter. We desire to bring about a complete system of registration, also, of past indebtedness; but that cannot be done at once. We hope by-and-by to effect that, and ultimately to put the local debt of the country into a state in which it will be freed from many of the inconveniences and complications by which it is now surrounded. There will thus be a simpler mode of borrowing, and the debentures will be of such a character as will make them more popular than the present form of mortgage. You cannot now lend money to a Corporation without having a cumbrous mortgage, which involves considerable legal expenditure, difficulty of transfer from hand to hand, and additional cost on every fresh loan. Then we have an interesting and important element in the Local Budgets, which we hope in future years to bring in. I will say only one word before I conclude on that question of Local Budgets. In the present year, of course, we are not in a position to give anything in the nature of an elaborate Local Budget; but I may state that the rates in England and Wales, exclusive of tolls, dues, and duties, amounted in 1870-71 to £17,817,000; in 1871-2 they advanced to £18,035,000; in 1872-3 they advanced further to £18,572,000. The Returns for 1873-4 are not yet complete; but we have every reason to suppose there has been a still further advance; and we may assume without much doubt that if no further subvention had been given from Imperial funds, the present amount of rates, exclusive of tolls and dues, would not be less than £19,000,000. But the additional grants in aid, which come to something like £1,000,000, bring down the amount for the present year to £18,000,000. The grants in England are £2,250,000; the amount raised by rates and dues is £22,000,000, making together a total of £24,250,000. That is exclusive of Scotland and Ireland. We think that the whole system requires more care and attention than it has hitherto received. We desire to extend the annual Returns that are required, so as to make them include loans; we propose to have them sent in before the 25th of March, so as to be in time for the Budget; and we shall also require them to show—what they do not show now—the distribution of the grants in aid. Another point that we aim at is that it is only fair and reasonable, considering the assistance which is now directly given by the Government, and which will be given by the system of registered debentures, that we should insist on introducing an efficient system of audit. We have been accused of doing nothing in the manner of Local Taxation. No doubt we are still a little short of the magnificent promises held out by the noble Lord opposite (the Marquess of Hartington), who promised a relief of £1,200,000; but we have given

£1,154,000, and that is something better than talking about doing so. And although we are not proceeding by leaps and bounds, we are still advancing steadily and safely, and are not losing sight of the question. Last year we introduced the principle of an Imperial subvention for purposes fairly requiring it. We also extended the area of rating by abolishing certain classes of exemptions. This year we are taking a step towards improving the system on which local loans are contracted, giving greater security and greater advantages to the investor; and we are endeavouring to bring about a system which shall be the foundation of a Local Budget. Next year, if not this year, I hope we may be able to take a step further, and that the promise given earlier in the evening by my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board may be redeemed by the introduction of a Valuation Bill that will improve the system of assessment and remove some of the anomalies that now exist. We cannot do more than we have done; but we are honest in our attempts, and we have endeavoured to deal with the subject in the best way we can. If we have not made strides sufficient to satisfy the impatience sometimes manifested on the other side of the House, I hope our friends will believe that we are doing what in us lies, and that what we have done is only an earnest of what we hope in future to do. I must now thank the Committee for the kindness with which they have listened to my rather wearisome statement. I have endeavoured to make our proposals clear. I can only say that if we have aimed at no ambitious re-construction of our fiscal policy, our object has been to consolidate and add stability to our financial system; and we trust that the proposals we have made after careful deliberation will be received with candour and consideration by Parliament and by the country. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the first Resolution.

MR. CHILDERS: I am quite sure that the concluding words of the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be re-echoed through all parts of the House—that is to say, that his very interesting statement to-night, which was not more long than interesting, will receive the most candid consideration from every part of the House. Of that statement I hardly know which part was the more interesting. My right hon. Friend gave us very tersely the figures which have appeared in different places, by no means so clearly, as to the progressive advance of the country and the condition of the people, particularly as illustrated by their powers of consumption, so far as those powers can be tested by the Returns of the Customs Department. And that statement must be very re-assuring to many hon. Members and persons outside of this House, who some time ago had doubts whether, in this respect, the condition of the people was so improving as it evidently is. My right hon. Friend, in the latter part of his speech, gave us very clear information as to local taxation, pointing out in what respects the old and cumbrous arrangements for raising money have imposed serious burdens on the people, and showing, I think, to the House excellent remedies—namely, first, that of granting to local bodies those powers of raising money on debenture which are now employed by all bodies requiring loans; and, secondly, that of requiring that the accounts of these bodies should be submitted first of all to public audit and then to public notice, in a manner which will certainly have the effect of greatly improving the financial condition of those bodies and bringing them under the view of Parliament. In all these respects, I do not think any one can have heard my right hon. Friend without receiving very great instruction, and feeling that if this is not a very magnificent Budget, at least it is one which will be of value to all who take a general interest in financial affairs. Now, after stating very candidly—to use my right hon. Friend's words—what appear to me to be the great merits of his statement, I will venture to speak in detail on one or two of the pro-

owing to the improved means of communication with foreign countries, and the reduction of our Army in the Colonies, to employ so large a capital; and an Act was passed reducing the amount of the capital of the Treasury Chest to £1,000,000. This sum of £300,000 which, strictly speaking, formed part of the capital of the country, and should, therefore, have contributed to the reduction of the Debt, has been actually treated as if it were ordinary revenue, so that, in fact, adding this amount to the £6,000 already mentioned by me, the actual deficit on the operations of last year was £306,000. My right hon. Friend has stated that there were £300,000 of miscellaneous revenue which might have been paid in just before the end of the last; but the receipt of which he postponed until the beginning of the present, financial year. My right hon. Friend took credit to himself for having done this, on the ground that the reductions of taxation agreed to in the last Session affected not only 1874-5, but also 1875-6. This is true; but I am not quite sure that it is desirable that such a licence as to the time of paying in Revenue should remain in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. On the other hand, my right hon. Friend admits that he has received a sum of about £300,000 from the Post Office Department beyond the nominal Revenue of the year, this being due, no doubt, to the better arrangements which have been made in the Department in question. These two sums balance each other, so that the real result on the basis established by the Act of George IV. is, as I said before, £300,000 on the wrong side. I now proceed to the Estimate for 1875-6. My right hon. Friend anticipates that, including the £300,000, payment of which was postponed from 1874-5, the receipts for the year will be £75,685,000, and the expenditure £75,268,000, which leave a balance on the credit side of £417,000. In stating the details of estimated expenditure to the House, my right hon. Friend did full justice, which I am very anxious to endorse, to the Secretary of the Treasury, who has exercised his powers with great skill and success in keeping down the expenditure. In some respects he has been fortunate—for instance, during this year some 12 great public buildings, the erection of which had been carried on at a great expense for four or five previous years, will have been completed, and the commencement of other new buildings has been stopped. What I wish, however, to impress upon my right hon. Friend and the Committee is that, taking everything into consideration, the estimated expenditure of the coming year is £1,330,000 in excess of that which, this time last year, was estimated to be necessary for the year which has just closed. But it will be said, "You have not included the Supplementary Estimates." My answer is they cannot be included now; the only comparison you can make with the Budget Estimate of one year is the Budget Estimate of the preceding year. Now, let us see what the result of my right hon. Friend's proposals will be in actual figures with reference to the surplus of the year. I may say, in passing, that I doubt whether, on the Revenue side, he has not over estimated the Miscellaneous receipts and those of the Post Office. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: The Post Office is under estimated.] Well, I will accept the statement. First of all, the Estimates omit a large item in the Vote for Irish education, which was stated last year at £118,000. We are told on high authority that it will be more this year, but I leave it at that, though I am sure in that respect I am doing my right hon. Friend more than justice. Then there is the loss of £60,000 on brewers' licences; there is to be an additional charge of £185,000 in connection with the National Debt, and this is not to include £70,000 a-year for interest on advances for local purposes. Now, the four sums added together make £433,000, and the surplus estimated is £417,000, so that my right hon. Friend deliberately proposes to Parliament that this year shall end with a deficit of £16,000. In my Parliamentary experience of 16 years I have known the same thing to be done only once, and in such a humdrum year as the present, it seems to me quite unjustifiable. I have no particular remarks to make at present on the modification of the Brewers' Licences, or the alteration of the fee on appointments, though these questions might, I think, have been dealt with in a bolder manner; but I confess I do not at all like the tendency of the National Debt plan. Careful as my right hon. Friend was to consultation with him, but that he had neither offered nor been asked for any advice on the subject. He would not detain their Lordships by following the matter up step by step. It would suffice to say that in the result Gardiner was released on the condition which he had already stated. In consequence of what had passed in the Colonial Parliament, on the occasion to which he had just referred, and of some Correspondence with the Colonial Office which begun during his own administration in New South Wales, it was decided by the Governor and his Council that a change should be made in the mode of dealing with the exercise of the Prerogative of mercy by the Governor. In his (the Earl of Belmore's) time the mode was this—capital cases were always dealt with by the Governor in Council, in accordance with fixed Instructions; the presiding Judge reported to the Governor and was summoned to attend the Council; the Judge did so, and his report having been read, he retired after making any necessary explanations; the Governor then ascertained the views of the Members of the Council and then announced his own decision. Similar Instructions, he believed, applied to all Colonies. No alteration was proposed by Sir Hercules Robinson as regarded that class of cases. But in other cases, a memorial for remission would be sent to the Governor or to the Colonial Secretary; it would be referred for report to the Judge or magistrate who had dealt with the case, and the Colonial Secretary would then send it to the Governor with his initials—generally, without remark, but sometimes with a recommendation. Such was the practice in his time: and on the receipt of the report from the Colonial Secretary, he would have dealt with it on his own judgment—of course, carefully considering any advice offered by the Ministry, but still acting on his own responsibility, and not merely, as in nearly all civil business—in all except where a special duty was imposed by law—ministerially. Now, as he understood the proposed change, it was intended that in future the Governor of New South Wales was in such cases to act merely ministerially. Why was this? The practice which he had explained to their Lordships as having prevailed in his time had worked exceedingly well. In a community among whom political changes were frequent, it ensured that an experienced person should deal finally with that class of business for a lengthened period, and it relieved the Minister from a great deal of outside pressure. Something had been made of an expression in a despatch written by his noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Kimberley) to him, in which the noble Earl said he recognised the right of the Minister to give "effective advice." No doubt he did, and very properly; but his noble Friend did not mean, as he understood him, that the advice so given was to override the deliberate judgment of the Governor, or that the latter was not to exercise his own judgment. It might be that in other Colonies all the criminal business was dealt with in Council; but, even if so, he did not think that the Governor was really relieved from a personal responsibility in each case; and he expected to hear from his noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon) that he had not sanctioned any such doctrine. The Governor had hitherto stood in the position of the Home Secretary, and the effect of the change proposed would be to transfer the Home Secretary's position to a Colonial Minister. It was to be observed that such an exercise of a personal responsibility by the Government as that which he had explained to their Lordships was quite consistent with a rule that he should never pardon without first having received the advice of his Ministers; but it certainly was opposed to the practice which he had to-day found prevailed in South Australia—namely, that no remission should be given to a prisoner without the assent of the Minister, who accepted the responsibility in the local Parliament. He might mention that having had the opportunity of knowing how the business of the Home Office was conducted, he used to consider that the system at that office was less lenient than that which was practised in New South Wales. He would now put the Question of his noble Friend, and move the Address to Her Majesty of which he had given Notice.

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copies or extracts of as much of the commissions and instructions to the Governor-General of Canada and the Governor of New South Wales respectively, as relate to the exercise of the Royal Prerogative of Mercy; and also, Copies or extracts of the correspondence le Earl, therefore, held that e Ministers were responsible for the Governor, the latter could est himself of the personal re- lity which was specially entrusted

He concurred in that view; ainly in reference to New South he quite agreed with Mr. Parkes, nial Secretary, when he stated, the close of his Minute, grounds ition to Mr. Robertson's view, hat which he himself seemed to t forward partially at least. Mr. remarked—

"That he entertained grave doubts whether any change at present from the system which had hitherto prevailed would be beneficial to the colony. In a community so small as theirs the distinctions between classes were very slight; the persons entrusted with authority and the relatives and friends of prisoners move closely together; the means of political pressure were easily accessible, and, therefore, a larger share by the Minister in the exercise of the prerogative of pardon would not, in his judgment, be more satisfactory to the public."

He could not indeed say that society as it presented itself to him in Sydney bore out in his opinion the description given by Mr. Parkes, or that he could recognize in the wealthy, educated, and fashionably attired companies with which he had mixed, the friends of convicts. Still he knew that "the means of political pressure were easily accessible" and only too frequently resorted to. When he took up the Government of New South Wales he learnt that under the Governorship of Sir William Denison during the previous four years, at the commencement of which the free Constitution came into play, and during which free representative institutions were in their infancy the pressure for the remission of sentences brought to bear on the new Members of Parliament was well nigh intolerable; during the seven years that he himself was Governor of New South Wales he had not, in any one case, as far as he could now recollect, omitted to avail himself of the advice of the Colonial Secretary or the Attorney General, and he did not find any difficulty to arise from that practice; but he was not prepared to take the view of Sir Hercules Robinson that the responsibility might be left to devolve upon the Colonial Secretary. Sir Hercules Robinson thought that abuses would speedily pass away after the Colonial Secretary had been invested with that responsibility. He could not concur in that opinion. Undoubtedly, with the formation of a sound public opinion abuses would rapidly cease, but he doubted much whether, if the proposed system were adopted in New South Wales, that colony would not have to pass through the ordeal which the United States had been experiencing for 70 years past, and from which it had not yet emerged. In the United States scarcely one-third of the sentences pronounced were carried out by the authorities, and he ventured to say that the most thinking people in that country would prefer to have the prerogative of mercy exercised as it was in the British Colonies, if only they could have it so by some independent impartial authority like a British Colonial Governor, who would prefer the interests of justice and the security of property to the fancied advancement of party or political influences. As to the case of Lepine he differed from the noble Earl opposite, and thought that Lord Dufferin was deserving of high praise. He had come forward at the right time and in the right spirit, and by his mode of action put an end to what had threatened at one time to be an acrimonious and interminable quarrel between the French-speaking and the English-speaking population of the Dominion.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, I am glad the noble Lord opposite (Lord Lisgar) interposed his observations between the speech of my noble Friend and the reply I have to make to the inquiries which he made of Her Majesty's Government, because his doing so enabled him to express that well-deserved praise which he bestowed on my noble Friend the Governor of Canada. I shall say as little as possible on the question of Lepine, because I agree with those who think that it touches on most delicate ground, and that any imprudence with respect to it here might conjure up a good deal of the bad feeling which existed in Canada, and which the discretion and prudence and wisdom of my noble Friend Lord Dufferin had succeeded in allaying. My noble Friend found himself in a most difficult position, and he has conducted himself with a tact, ability, and judgment which entitle him to, and have procured for him, general approval. As to the question raised by my noble Friend (the Earl of Belmore), I will refrain from entering upon local matters and local complaints—the matter excited great attention, led to passionate debates, and terminated in the fall of a strong Ministry; but, divested of local details, it is one of considerable importance, if—as I understand it—that question is how the Prerogative of mercy is to be exercised in the larger Colonies. The question may be thus presented—first, whether the Prerogative is to be exercised by the Governor himself; or, next, whether it is to be exercised by the Colonial Minister; or, lastly, whether it is to be exercised by the Governor with the concurrence of the Minister. There is at the present some little difference in the practice as between the Australian Colonies. It is not apparently very great, but it is of more importance than appears on the face of it. In three of them—Queensland, South Australia, and Tasmania—the Governor decides in Executive Council—that is, the decision is called the decision of the Colonial Government. In three others—New South Wales, Victoria, and New Zealand—the Governor decides out of Council, but decides after having heard the opinion of the Ministers. The first of these practices makes the decision much more that of the Colonial Government than of the Governor; the second makes it that of the Governor. As to New South Wales, it appears that when Sir Hercules Robinson assumed the office of Governor he found some difference of opinion to exist as to the practice there. There had been considerable Correspondence between his Predecessor and my noble Friend; but Sir Hercules Robinson adopted the practice—as he states in these Papers—of consulting his Ministers, and he states that he did so on a Circular written by my noble Friend opposite (Earl Granville). My Lords, I think if you study those Papers carefully you will find that in reality there is very little difference among those who have held the Seals of the Colonial Office with respect to the responsibility in the exercise of the Prerogative of mercy. In a despatch written by my noble Friend opposite (Earl Granville) on the 4th October, 1869, when he filled the office of Colonial Secretary, writing to the Governor of New South Wales, he says—

“The responsibility of deciding upon such applications rests with the Governor, and he has undoubtedly a right to act upon his own independent judgment. But unless any Imperial interest or policy is involved, as might be the case in a matter of treason or slave-trading, or in matters in which foreigners might be concerned, the Governor would be bound to attach great weight to the recommendation of his Ministry.”

On the 1st November, 1871, my noble Friend (the Earl of Kimberley) who succeeded my noble Friend (Earl Granville) wrote thus—

“The Governor, as invested with a portion of the Queen's Prerogative, is bound to examine personally each case in which he is called upon to exercise the power entrusted to him, although in a Colony under responsible Government he will of course pay due regard to the advice of evening; and he should like to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when a general discussion of the financial policy of the Government could take place, as it was then too late to enter into anything like a discussion on such a subject.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he quite recognized the importance of the suggestion to set apart some convenient time for the discussion now raised by the Budget proposals. He was not able at that moment to name a day, but would take care in conference with his Colleagues that a convenient time should be fixed for that purpose. He did not think that much had been said upon which he need now trouble the Committee. The principal criticisms which had been made were criticisms for which he was not altogether unprepared. His right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) and the hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Laing) had taken very much the same line with regard to the proposals he had submitted. They certainly pointed out that the Budget could hardly be said to show a surplus Estimate for the year, taking into account the probable Supplementary Estimates. At the present moment, there was a very small surplus left; but, in the first place, he believed that the Estimates had been taken at a very moderate and reasonable figure; and, in the second place, he was not proposing to sacrifice the surplus by the remission of taxation, but by appropriating a larger amount to the payment of Debt. It was not therefore a case in which there was so much imprudence in running rather close to the wind as it would be if he were proposing to give away £200,000 or £300,000 in remission of taxation. His right hon. Friend had called attention to the Post Office, and spoke as if he thought they were making an imprudent Estimate; but he did not seem quite to understand the figures. In 1872-3 the net receipts for the year were £5,212,000, and the Exchequer receipts for the following year were £5,792,000; more than £500,000 over the net receipts of the year before. In 1873-4 the net receipts were £5,481,000, and the Exchequer receipts of the following year were £5,670,000, or nearly £200,000 in excess of the former year. Last year the net receipts, so far as they had at present been made up, were estimated to produce £5,750,000, so that, according to the law which prevailed, he might take the Exchequer payments next year at a much higher sum; but instead of doing that he had made no advance whatever upon the Post Office receipts. There would be some small sum required for Supplementary Estimates, as, for example, in the Irish Estimates. The Committee must not take the Supplementary Estimates of last year as a guide for the present year. The present Government did not hold themselves responsible for the Supplementary Estimates of last year, since they did not prepare the original Estimates. Immediately after the Budget, his right hon. Friend (Mr. Hunt) found he must have a Supplementary Estimate for the Navy. The Government accordingly were called upon to provide £240,000 for the Navy, and another sum of £150,000 for the Telegraph Service. Last year was altogether an exceptional year. This year the present Government were responsible for the Estimates, and he hoped that the Supplementary Estimates would not be on the same scale as those which were necessary last year. He had been told that he was rather strange in the field of prospective finance, and that he was binding future Parliaments. His proposal, on the contrary, was one which any Chancellor of the Exchequer would be in a position to set aside. It was remarkable that while the right hon. Gentleman disapproved his proposal, he approved the creation of Terminable Annuities. If, however, his proposal bound future Chancellors of the Exchequer, they would be still more bound by the creation of Terminable Annuities. There had been one omission in his Statement which, in justice to his right hon. Friend at the head of the Local Government Board, he wished to supply. There would be in this year's Estimates a sum voted towards the expenses of the Registration Bill. The Government promised last year to pay a portion of these expenses, and they had determined to pay a fourth.

Resolution agreed to.

ROYAL PREROGATIVE OF MERCY — COLONIAL PARDONS.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF BELMORE rose, according to Notice, to put a Question to the Secretary of State for the Colonies as to the conditions under which the power of granting pardons is in future to be exercised by the Governors of those Colonies which have responsible government, and to move an Address. The noble Earl said, that the subject to which he was about to refer was one of, perhaps, not very great interest for their Lordships' House, but it was one, not only of interest, but of very great importance to the Colonies. He would have to refer to both Canada and New South Wales, but he did not mean to express any opinion on the merits of the case of Lepine, and still less was it his intention to criticize the conduct of the Governor General of Canada. He was merely going to show what had been done by that noble Earl, and what had been done by the Governor of New South Wales in respect of the remission of sentences, and he proposed to do this because he thought there was a Constitutional question of considerable importance involved in the contrast between the mode of procedure in the two cases. The Canadian case was shortly this—Mr. Lepine was convicted about November last of having been accessory to the murder of Thomas Scott during the insurrection at Fort Garry some time before, and was sentenced to be hanged. Circumstances caused a good deal of excitement of a party nature, and there was great difference of opinion as to whether that sentence should be carried out. Finally, his noble Friend Lord Dufferin solved the difficulty by commuting the sentence to two years' imprisonment. It appeared that the noble Lord had taken that course on his own responsibility. Now, if Lord Dufferin had remitted the sentence after consulting his Council, he was no doubt doing what every Governor had a right to do in capital cases, even where responsible government existed: but if, as implied by The Times' correspondent, in a letter published on the 5th of November, he had acted as he had done in order to relieve his Ministry of the responsibility of offering advice, either the noble Earl's commission must give him greater powers than his (the Earl of Belmore's) had given him as Governor of New South Wales, or else he (Lord Dufferin) must take a much more extended view of his powers than he (the Earl of Belmore) had done. Their Lordships would observe that there was a marked distinction between a Governor acting without the advice of his Council, and a Governor, after having received such advice, exercising his own judgment upon it, though that judgment might be contrary to it. The latter was all that, when Governor of New South Wales, he supposed it to be in his power, or that of any other Governor in similar circumstances, to do. But it would appear that Lord Dufferin claimed the power of acting on his own judgment in cases of supreme importance. He (the Earl of Belmore) was not aware whether that power was disputed, and he thought it was much better that the Prerogative should be exercised in that way than that the contrary practice should prevail of the Governor deferring in all cases to the judgment of the Colonial Ministry—which, he understood, it was proposed should be the rule in future in New South Wales. The Australian case arose in this way. There was a notorious bushranger named Gardiner there, who, a good many years ago, was tried and sentenced, he believed, to a term of 32 years' imprisonment. Soon after Sir Hercules Robinson arrived in the colony he received a memorial for a mitigation of that man's sentence; and having considered the matter, he directed that after a limited period Gardiner should be released on condition of exiling himself from the Australian Colonies during the remainder of his term. That was a very common form of commutation, and one which in New South Wales was regarded as perfectly legal. He deprecated the idea of making any attack on Sir Hercules Robinson, though he could not agree in the decision that Governor had arrived at. When the time approached there was an intense feeling in the Colony against Gardiner's release: the matter of the remission was discussed in the Colonial Parliament, and the Prime Minister explained that the Governor having already some time before promised the man's release, could not then retract his promise. That was quite right. The Prime Minister further explained that Sir Hercules Robinson had acted on his own responsibility after positions which he has stated to the Committee. I will point out in which respects I think the proposals of my right hon. Friend should receive that deliberate consideration which proposals of that kind deserve at our hands. And I have risen immediately after my right hon. Friend because I ventured late in the past Session to doubt whether, unless there was a greater improvement in the state of the finances, especially in the state of trade then exhibited in the country, the proposals which my right hon. Friend made last Session could be accepted as perfectly safe. In the criticism I made on the proposals of my right hon. Friend, I specially guarded myself by the remark that if the country enjoyed, what then was doubtful, a good harvest, I thought the Estimates of my right hon. Friend would come up to the mark which he had given to the House. Now, having stated that, let me first call the attention of the House to the results of the finances of the last year, 1874-5, as stated by my right hon. Friend, and as they appear by the accounts which were given to us a few days ago. My right hon. Friend has said, and said correctly, that the Revenue has exceeded the Estimate which he placed before the House by £496,000; that the Expenditure has exceeded the Expenditure which he proposed by a small amount, an amount less than the excess of the Revenue; and he has stated that the result has been a surplus of £594,000. My right hon. Friend said he thought that, at any rate, was a satisfactory result. Now, I do not think that it can be deemed altogether a satisfactory result, and I will give one or two qualifications of the statement of my right hon. Friend. In the first place, he has been satisfied by an increase of receipt over his estimated receipt. It is perfectly true that the increase is £496,000; but when we come to look more narrowly into it, we find that three items of receipts which it has always been the practice to watch, and which indicate, above all, the progress of the prosperity of the country, and are tests of its financial advance—I mean Customs, Excise, and Stamps—for the first time since the year 1868 show a deficit when compared with the amounts estimated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The deficit is, indeed, small—only £6,000—still it is a deficit. That,

Mr. Childers

I think, is not altogether satisfactory. Again, I do not think you can find an instance during a long series of years—except in times of war, or apprehension of war—in which the Treasury has allowed the ordinary expenditure of the country to exceed the Budget Estimates of expenditure, unless in a year when the receipts have very greatly exceeded the Budget Estimates of receipts. Such a year was 1863-4, when the Revenue Estimates were some millions below the result. But what is the case as to the present year. I find that my right hon. Friend estimated the payments for the year charged on Supply Votes—not including payments in relief of local taxation—at £44,223,000. The actual expenditure has been £45,649,000, of which sum he just now told us that £512,000 had been paid in relief of local taxation. This leaves the expenditure of the year out of Supply Votes at £45,137,000. It thus appears that my right hon. Friend has expended during the year on the Army, Navy, and Civil Services £914,000 more than he estimated at this time last year. I can hardly regard this as a satisfactory state of finance in a year in which the Customs, Excise, and Stamps produced not more but less than the original Estimate. Let me carry the matter of surplus a little further with reference to the reduction of the National Debt. My right hon. Friend stated that the surplus of last year was £593,000, but as the amount necessary to be paid on account of Fortifications and Army Localization for the year was £600,000, and as this has to be taken into account before the final balance is struck, instead of their remaining a surplus to be paid to the National Debt Commissioners in reduction of the Debt, there was, in fact, a deficiency of over £6,000. This, again, can scarcely be regarded as a satisfactory state of things. But this is not all. In the miscellaneous receipts of last year there is a very remarkable and unusual item of £300,000, which arises in the following way:—The Treasury, in addition to its other functions, carries on a very large business as managers of an exchange bank, having transactions with all quarters of the globe. The name of that bank is the Treasury Chest, and up to two years ago the working capital assigned to it was £1,300,000. Two years ago it was found unnecessary, owing to the improved means of communication with foreign countries, and the reduction of our Army in the Colonies, to employ so large a capital; and an Act was passed reducing the amount of the capital of the Treasury Chest to £1,000,000. This sum of £300,000 which, strictly speaking, formed part of the capital of the country, and should, therefore, have contributed to the reduction of the Debt, has been actually treated as if it were ordinary revenue, so that, in fact, adding this amount to the £6,000 already mentioned by me, the actual deficit on the operations of last year was £306,000. My right hon. Friend has stated that there were £300,000 of miscellaneous revenue which might have been paid in just before the end of the last; but the receipt of which he postponed until the beginning of the present, financial year. My right hon. Friend took credit to himself for having done this, on the ground that the reductions of taxation agreed to in the last Session affected not only 1874-5, but also 1875-6. This is true; but I am not quite sure that it is desirable that such a licence as to the time of paying in Revenue should remain in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. On the other hand, my right hon. Friend admits that he has received a sum of about £300,000 from the Post Office Department beyond the nominal Revenue of the year, this being due, no doubt, to the better arrangements which have been made in the Department in question. These two sums balance each other, so that the real result on the basis established by the Act of George IV. is, as I said before, £300,000 on the wrong side. I now proceed to the Estimate for 1875-6. My right hon. Friend anticipates that, including the £300,000, payment of which was postponed from 1874-5, the receipts for the year will be £75,685,000, and the expenditure £75,268,000, which leave a balance on the credit side of £417,000. In stating the details of estimated expenditure to the House, my right hon. Friend did full justice, which I am very anxious to endorse, to the Secretary of the Treasury, who has exercised his powers with great skill and success in keeping down the expenditure. In some respects he has been fortunate—for instance, during this year some 12 great public buildings, the erection of which had been carried on at a great expense for four or five previous years, will have been completed, and the commencement of other new buildings has been stopped. What I wish, however, to impress upon my right hon. Friend and the Committee is that, taking everything into consideration, the estimated expenditure of the coming year is £1,330,000 in excess of that which, this time last year, was estimated to be necessary for the year which has just closed. But it will be said, "You have not included the Supplementary Estimates." My answer is they cannot be included now; the only comparison you can make with the Budget Estimate of one year is the Budget Estimate of the preceding year. Now, let us see what the result of my right hon. Friend's proposals will be in actual figures with reference to the surplus of the year. I may say, in passing, that I doubt whether, on the Revenue side, he has not over estimated the Miscellaneous receipts and those of the Post Office. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: The Post Office is under estimated.] Well, I will accept the statement. First of all, the Estimates omit a large item in the Vote for Irish education, which was stated last year at £118,000. We are told on high authority that it will be more this year, but I leave it at that, though I am sure in that respect I am doing my right hon. Friend more than justice. Then there is the loss of £60,000 on brewers' licences; there is to be an additional charge of £185,000 in connection with the National Debt, and this is not to include £70,000 a-year for interest on advances for local purposes. Now, the four sums added together make £433,000, and the surplus estimated is £417,000, so that my right hon. Friend deliberately proposes to Parliament that this year shall end with a deficit of £16,000. In my Parliamentary experience of 16 years I have known the same thing to be done only once, and in such a humdrum year as the present, it seems to me quite unjustifiable. I have no particular remarks to make at present on the modification of the Brewers' Licences, or the alteration of the fee on appointments, though these questions might, I think, have been dealt with in a bolder manner; but I confess I do not at all like the tendency of the National Debt plan. Careful as my right hon. Friend was to distinguish it from the Sinking Fund, in operation before 1829, it is, I think, open to the objections which led them to the abolition of that fund. My right hon. Friend has changed his mind since last year as to the great merits of Terminable Annuities; but I think he has underrated—at any rate, he has not alluded to one great advantage which that system possesses. His remarks were to the effect that if you left the Savings Banks Commissioners in possession of large securities in the shape of Terminable Annuities, a time might come when you might want money, and they would not be very convertible. Now, under the Terminable Annuity system there is paid to the Savings Banks Commissioners every year a much larger sum out of the Revenue than they require, and a constant purchase of Consols and other stock goes on out of the difference between what 3 per cent upon their capital would have been, and what Terminable Annuities bring. That very process keeps passing into your hands every year a large amount of precisely the same securities which would have had to be sold or converted in case of pressure under the former system. I gather from what has fallen from my right hon. Friend that he does not propose to dispense with the system of Terminable Annuities altogether; but he proposes a new scheme by which the interest on the Public Debt is to be fixed at £28,000,000, besides whatever sum may be necessary in the way of interest on special loans, or loans raised for the purpose of advancing money to a public body. Now, whatever the merits of this plan may be—and I do not intend to enter into the discussion of them on the present occasion—it possesses, at all events, this great advantage to my right hon. Friend, that it enables him to propose a scheme, in a year when there is no surplus, for the reduction of the National Debt at, it may be considerable cost, to future Chancellors of the Exchequer. This plan requires, in my opinion, very deep and careful consideration. It is simply a plan to secure to my right hon. Friend credit for a very large reduction of the National Debt by applying for the next 10 years far less than the average sum applied by the late Government; and then 10 years hence and for the following 20 years nearly £10,000,000 a-year; averaging thus £7,000,000 a-year with next to nothing at first. These are the only observations which I now wish to make. I do not find fault with my right hon. Friend for having made so little change as he has done by his financial proposals. There is nothing, in my opinion, more objectionable than the constant shifting of taxation, and I think the most prudent course to pursue is that which was adopted by my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone)—to wait till the time arrives when a great blow can be struck. I will only say, in conclusion, that I am sure my right hon. Friend's statement will be received with all the consideration which it deserves.

MR. PELL could not say that the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was a very cheering one in regard to the subject which he and other hon. Members had at heart. He should like to know whether, when the right hon. Gentleman spoke of a system of audit in the case of the accounts of local authorities, he meant that the whole of those accounts were to be submitted to audit, or only those portions of them which happened to be connected with the loans which they received? Nothing, he was sure, would tend so much to the diminution of any waste of money there might be as a proper system of audit. It would also be desirable that they should know whether the financial supervision of local taxation was to be carried on by the Chancellor of the Exchequer or by the President of the Local Government Board? Since 1869 up to 1874-5, there had been a remission of Imperial taxation to the amount of £20,000,000, or, making allowance for the addition to taxation of some £3,000,000 in the time he had selected, a reduction of over £17,000,000. That was certainly a cheering state of things. In the course of eight years there had been an increase of local rates to the extent of £2,500,000, and he did not think this fact had been fully realized. The amount of indebtedness in respect of loans to local authorities was also a matter for very serious consideration. It was now £84,000,000, of which only £24,000,000 was under audit. If, however, audit was carried out to the extent he had been led to understand, his mind would be relieved of a great anxiety. Another cause of increase latterly was the establishment of school boards, which had swallowed up no less than £3,000,000 since the system came into operation. He was thankful most heartily for the splendid harvest they had had, to which so much of the financial success of the Government might be attributed, but he warned them not to rely too much upon such a precarious contingency. It was not often they had two good harvests in succession.

MR. LAING said, unless in case of war, or some other extraordinary contingency, there should be no reasonable apprehension under a Budget that there would be a deficit. Can anyone say that of this Budget? When the Irish schools were provided for, and other expenses incurred in connection with the National Debt, what became of the right hon. Gentleman's surplus? No allowance was made for Supplementary Estimates, and there were other contingencies for which no provision had been made. What if they were to have a bad state of trade, an alarm as to European politics, or bad harvests? Could they then rely on these Estimates being realized? They could not, and the result would be they would be landed in a deficit. Could anyone say there would be no Supplementary Estimates of considerable magnitude in the course of the present financial year? There was the visit of the Prince of Wales to India. The information they had on that matter was not very explicit. They were told by the right hon. Gentleman that if the illustrious Prince went to India, the House of Commons would be the first to hear of it. But, seriously, if the visit was to be made, its political value would depend on the business being well done, and the bill being paid by the people of England. Considerable Supplementary Estimates must be the result. This was a Budget which did not show a surplus; on the contrary, it might show a deficit. What was the promise and performance with regard to the National Debt? They were promised a scheme by which, in the course of 30 years, they were to get rid of £200,000,000 of National Debt, and the performance was in two years of peace and prosperity they had no surplus at all. Previous to last year the practice had been to keep the Estimates always on the safe side. They were sure of having a surplus. Now they were reduced to the critical condition of depending on a good harvest. This state of uncertainty inflicted a great deal of mischief on trade, and if last year the right hon. Gentleman had maintained the income tax at 3*d.*, and not reduced it to 2*d.* in the pound, there would have been no danger of a deficit. If, again, the right hon. Gentleman, instead of taking off a penny from the income tax, had taken off only a halfpenny, he (Mr. Laing) would have felt greater confidence in the soundness of his finance. He concurred with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) that the plan of the present Budget was open to the suspicion of a seeking for popularity at the expense of future Chancellors of the Exchequer.

MR. SCOURFIELD regretted that no attempt was made to reduce our National Debt. As long as we had a National Debt, no matter how large our surplus might be, we should have no embarras de richesses. If we did not reduce the Debt now how could we expect to reduce it in times of difficulty? He would like to see an attempt made to put local taxation which at present fell on one description of property, on the same footing as Imperial taxation. In Liverpool 1*d.* in the pound on the property and income schedules would produce as much as 6*d.* on assessable property, and the right hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) had stated that 4*d.* in the pound on the poor rate assessment would yield a sum equal to 1*d.* in the pound on the property and Income Tax schedules. The whole expense of education fell upon local taxation, and there was a growing feeling in the country that local burdens had been most unfairly increased, and were likely to be increased still further.

MR. TILLET thanked Her Majesty's Government, as representative of a great commercial community (Norwich), for the Financial Statement made that evening by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He also thanked the right hon. Gentleman for the promise he had given to do all in his power to diminish taxation. He might, however, state that he concurred with the hon. Member (Mr. Scourfield) that there was a feeling of great dissatisfaction arising out of the manner in which local taxation was increasing. With regard to the heavy and disastrous taxation which the industrious classes suffered owing to the absence of reliable security, he submitted that it was desirable to adopt some measure that would give them confidence, and his impression was that if the right hon. Gentleman were to issue bonds and debentures, the effect would be that they might be saleable and accessible as security for their money, which they were now afraid to deposit. With regard to the local burdens upon one description of property, they now amounted to the enormous sum of £20,000,000.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE said, he had listened with great attention to the important statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he congratulated him and Her Majesty's Government on that statement. If the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Childers) had any complaint to make, it was that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had spoiled the future surplus of the Gentleman who might take his place. He never ceased to regret one tax which had been taken off in a former Budget, and that was the 1s. duty on corn. That 1s. duty would enable a Chancellor of the Exchequer to do a great deal of good; but when taken off it was done as a sop to sentiment. He appreciated the right hon. Gentleman's idea of establishing an efficient system of audit, which, if adopted, could not fail to prove of great importance and give great satisfaction. With regard to the claims upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer, they were very large, and the expenditure, it should be borne in mind, was very large. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would meet with a strong hand the demands which were made upon him, and in this respect he was to be congratulated upon not having a large surplus, as the effect of that was that there was no encouragement to every particular interest to put in its claim for exemption. He hoped his right hon. Friend would be Chancellor of the Exchequer till 1885, in order that he might realize all the anticipations he had formed of that happy era.

MR. HANKEY said, he thought it would be absolutely necessary that some Supplementary Estimates should be presented. It would be much better that the Prince of Wales should not visit India at all if he went there as a private individual. He felt satisfied there would be considerable expenses attending that visit, and he believed there would be a strong feeling throughout this country against that expenditure being treated as if it were merely an expenditure to be properly paid out of the revenues of India. He understood the determination of the Government was to throw the expenses as far as Suez on England, and the remainder on the revenues of India.

MR. WHALLEY protested against Imperial taxation being applied to local purposes by way of loans, because it tended to destroy the principle of local government by which people were enabled to tax themselves. He also objected to the continuance of the Income Tax. All fixed property depended for its value upon muscle, brain, and energy; and therefore it was for the interest of that property that Schedule D should be abolished, and that the revenue derived under that Schedule should be levied upon real property.

MR. MUNDELLA objected to the country losing £60,000 a-year from the sale of intoxicating drinks, particularly as the vexatious interference with trade, which was so much complained of—namely, private brewing—was to be left untouched, and very small beer would pay the same duty as the strongest and the best. The £60,000 might have been saved by raising the malt tax from 21s. 8d. to 22s. 6d., and in that way every glass of beer would have been dealt with in proportion to its strength. The time had probably come when spirits would again bear an increase of duty. With respect to the Income Tax, he believed that if all incomes under £300 had been exempted, it would have been very acceptable to the country. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had adduced the funds deposited in savings banks as a criterion of the condition of the working classes; but that was no safe criterion, because they now found more profitable modes of investment for their savings in the shape of building societies and co-operative industries.

SIR HENRY PEEK observed, that if the Excise, and Customs Departments were fused the saving would, he believed, be sufficient to enable the Chancellor of the Exchequer to remit the smaller duties now levied.

MR. FAWCETT remarked that the Budget had been brought before the House at an unusually late hour that evening; and he should like to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when a general discussion of the financial policy of the Government could take place, as it was then too late to enter into anything like a discussion on such a subject.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he quite recognized the importance of the suggestion to set apart some convenient time for the discussion now raised by the Budget proposals. He was not able at that moment to name a day, but would take care in conference with his Colleagues that a convenient time should be fixed for that purpose. He did not think that much had been said upon which he need now trouble the Committee. The principal criticisms which had been made were criticisms for which he was not altogether unprepared. His right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) and the hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Laing) had taken very much the same line with regard to the proposals he had submitted. They certainly pointed out that the Budget could hardly be said to show a surplus Estimate for the year, taking into account the probable Supplementary Estimates. At the present moment, there was a very small surplus left; but, in the first place, he believed that the Estimates had been taken at a very moderate and reasonable figure; and, in the second place, he was not proposing to sacrifice the surplus by the remission of taxation, but by appropriating a larger amount to the payment of Debt. It was not therefore a case in which there was so much imprudence in running rather close to the wind as it would be if he were proposing to give away £200,000 or £300,000 in remission of taxation. His right hon. Friend had called attention to the Post Office, and spoke as if he thought they were making an imprudent Estimate; but he did not seem quite to understand the figures. In 1872-3 the net receipts for the year were £5,212,000, and the Exchequer receipts for the following year were £5,792,000; more than £500,000 over the net receipts of the year before. In 1873-4 the net receipts were £5,481,000, and the Exchequer receipts of the following year were £5,670,000, or nearly £200,000 in excess of the former year. Last year the net receipts, so far as they had at present been made up, were estimated to produce £5,750,000, so that, according to the law which prevailed, he might take the Exchequer payments next year at a much higher sum; but instead of doing that he had made no advance whatever upon the Post Office receipts. There would be some small sum required for Supplementary Estimates, as, for example, in the Irish Estimates. The Committee must not take the Supplementary Estimates of last year as a guide for the present year. The present Government did not hold themselves responsible for the Supplementary Estimates of last year, since they did not prepare the original Estimates. Immediately after the Budget, his right hon. Friend (Mr. Hunt) found he must have a Supplementary Estimate for the Navy. The Government accordingly were called upon to provide £240,000 for the Navy, and another sum of £150,000 for the Telegraph Service. Last year was altogether an exceptional year. This year the present Government were responsible for the Estimates, and he hoped that the Supplementary Estimates would not be on the same scale as those which were necessary last year. He had been told that he was rather strange in the field of prospective finance, and that he was binding future Parliaments. His proposal, on the contrary, was one which any Chancellor of the Exchequer would be in a position to set aside. It was remarkable that while the right hon. Gentleman disapproved his proposal, he approved the creation of Terminable Annuities. If, however, his proposal bound future Chancellors of the Exchequer, they would be still more bound by the creation of Terminable Annuities. There had been one omission in his Statement which, in justice to his right hon. Friend at the head of the Local Government Board, he wished to supply. There would be in this year's Estimates a sum voted towards the expenses of the Registration Bill. The Government promised last year to pay a portion of these expenses, and they had determined to pay a fourth.

ROYAL PREROGATIVE OF MERCY —
COLONIAL PARDONS.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF BELMORE rose, according to Notice, to put a Question to the Secretary of State for the Colonies as to the conditions under which the power of granting pardons is in future to be exercised by the Governors of those Colonies which have responsible government, and to move an Address. The noble Earl said, that the subject to which he was about to refer was one of, perhaps, not very great interest for their Lordships' House, but it was one, not only of interest, but of very great importance to the Colonies. He would have to refer to both Canada and New South Wales, but he did not mean to express any opinion on the merits of the case of Lepine, and still less was it his intention to criticize the conduct of the Governor General of Canada. He was merely going to show what had been done by that noble Earl, and what had been done by the Governor of New South Wales in respect of the remission of sentences, and he proposed to do this because he thought there was a Constitutional question of considerable importance involved in the contrast between the mode of procedure in the two cases. The Canadian case was shortly this—Mr. Lepine was convicted about November last of having been accessory to the murder of Thomas Scott during the insurrection at Fort Garry some time before, and was sentenced to be hanged. Circumstances caused a good deal of excitement of a party nature, and there was great difference of opinion as to whether that sentence should be carried out. Finally, his noble Friend Lord Dufferin solved the difficulty by commuting the sentence to two years' imprisonment. It appeared that the noble Lord had taken that course on his own responsibility. Now, if Lord Dufferin had remitted the sentence after consulting his Council, he was no doubt doing what every Governor had a right to do in capital cases, even where responsible government existed: but if, as implied by The Times' correspondent, in a letter published on the 5th of November, he had acted as he had done in order to relieve his Ministry of the responsibility of offering advice, either the noble Earl's commission must give him greater powers than his (the Earl of Belmore's) had given him as Governor of New South Wales, or else he (Lord Dufferin) must take a much more extended view of his powers than he (the Earl of Belmore) had done. Their Lordships would observe that there was a marked distinction between a Governor acting without the advice of his Council, and a Governor, after having received such advice, exercising his own judgment upon it, though that judgment might be contrary to it. The latter was all that, when Governor of New South Wales, he supposed it to be in his power, or that of any other Governor in similar circumstances, to do. But it would appear that Lord Dufferin claimed the power of acting on his own judgment in cases of supreme importance. He (the Earl of Belmore) was not aware whether that power was disputed, and he thought it was much better that the Prerogative should be exercised in that way than that the contrary practice should prevail of the Governor deferring in all cases to the judgment of the Colonial Ministry—which, he understood, it was proposed should be the rule in future in New South Wales. The Australian case arose in this way. There was a notorious bushranger named Gardiner there, who, a good many years ago, was tried and sentenced, he believed, to a term of 32 years' imprisonment. Soon after Sir Hercules Robinson arrived in the colony he received a memorial for a mitigation of that man's sentence; and having considered the matter, he directed that after a limited period Gardiner should be released on condition of exiling himself from the Australian Colonies during the remainder of his term. That was a very common form of commutation, and one which in New South Wales was regarded as perfectly legal. He deprecated the idea of making any attack on Sir Hercules Robinson, though he could not agree in the decision that Governor had arrived at. When the time approached there was an intense feeling in the Colony against Gardiner's release: the matter of the remission was discussed in the Colonial Parliament, and the Prime Minister explained that the Governor having already some time before promised the man's release, could not then retract his promise. That was quite right. The Prime Minister further explained that Sir Hercules Robinson had acted on his own responsibility after consultation with him, but that he had neither offered nor been asked for any advice on the subject. He would not detain their Lordships by following the matter up step by step. It would suffice to say that in the result Gardiner was released on the condition which he had already stated. In consequence of what had passed in the Colonial Parliament, on the occasion to which he had just referred, and of some Correspondence with the Colonial Office which begun during his own administration in New South Wales, it was decided by the Governor and his Council that a change should be made in the mode of dealing with the exercise of the Prerogative of mercy by the Governor. In his (the Earl of Belmore's) time the mode was this—capital cases were always dealt with by the Governor in Council, in accordance with fixed Instructions; the presiding Judge reported to the Governor and was summoned to attend the Council; the Judge did so, and his report having been read, he retired after making any necessary explanations; the Governor then ascertained the views of the Members of the Council and then announced his own decision. Similar Instructions, he believed, applied to all Colonies. No alteration was proposed by Sir Hercules Robinson as regarded that class of cases. But in other cases, a memorial for remission would be sent to the Governor or to the Colonial Secretary; it would be referred for report to the Judge or magistrate who had dealt with the case, and the Colonial Secretary would then send it to the Governor with his initials—generally, without remark, but sometimes with a recommendation. Such was the practice in his time: and on the receipt of the report from the Colonial Secretary, he would have dealt with it on his own judgment—of course, carefully considering any advice offered by the Ministry, but still acting on his own responsibility, and not merely, as in nearly all civil business—in all except where a special duty was imposed by law—ministerially. Now, as he understood the proposed change, it was intended that in future the Governor of New South Wales was in such cases to act merely ministerially. Why was this? The practice which he had explained to their Lordships as having prevailed in his time had worked exceedingly well. In a community among whom political changes were frequent, it ensured that an experienced person should deal finally with that class of business for a lengthened period, and it relieved the Minister from a great deal of outside pressure. Something had been made of an expression in a despatch written by his noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Kimberley) to him, in which the noble Earl said he recognized the right of the Minister to give "effective advice." No doubt he did, and very properly; but his noble Friend did not mean, as he understood him, that the advice so given was to override the deliberate judgment of the Governor, or that the latter was not to exercise his own judgment. It might be that in other Colonies all the criminal business was dealt with in Council; but, even if so, he did not think that the Governor was really relieved from a personal responsibility in each case; and he expected to hear from his noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon) that he had not sanctioned any such doctrine. The Governor had hitherto stood in the position of the Home Secretary, and the effect of the change proposed would be to transfer the Home Secretary's position to a Colonial Minister. It was to be observed that such an exercise of a personal responsibility by the Government as that which he had explained to their Lordships was quite consistent with a rule that he should never pardon without first having received the advice of his Ministers; but it certainly was opposed to the practice which he had to-day learnt prevailed in South Australia—namely, that no remission should be given to a prisoner without the assent of the Minister, who accepted the responsibility in the local Parliament. He might mention that having had the opportunity of knowing how the business of the Home Office was conducted, he used to consider that the system at that office leant less to leniency than that which was practised in New South Wales. He would now put the Question of his noble Friend, and move the Address to Her Majesty of which he had given Notice.

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copies or extracts of so much of the commissions and instructions to the Governor-General of Canada and the Governor of New South Wales respectively, as relate to the exercise of the Royal Prerogative of Mercy; and also, Copies or extracts of the correspondence (if any) with the Secretary of State bearing upon this subject in connexion with the commutation of the respective sentences upon Lepine in Canada and Gardiner in New South Wales.—(The Earl of Belmore.)

LORD LISGAR trusted that their Lordships would favour him with their indulgence for a few remarks, inasmuch as in the Correspondence which had been laid on the Table, in connection with "The Exercise of the Prerogative of Pardon in New South Wales," his own name as a former Governor of that Colony was mentioned more than once, and it so happened that he was engaged in the administration of affairs when Gardiner, one of the convicts mentioned in the noble Earl's Notice, was brought to trial; and in Canada when the unfortunate man Scott was put to death, for which atrocious cruelty Lepine, the other convict named in the Notice, was afterwards made amenable and convicted of murder. He was very glad to gather from that Correspondence that the great concurrence of opinion, the vast weight of authority—namely, that of the two noble Earls (Earls Granville and Kimberley) who had held the Seals of the Colonial Office, as that of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Carnarvon) who succeeded them and was now in power, was in favour of maintaining the responsibility of the Governor with respect to the Prerogative of mercy. In the Papers on their Lordships' Table the noble Earl the present Secretary of State for the Colonies laid down the doctrine by stating that—

"The Governor, like the Home Secretary, is personally selected by the Sovereign as the depository of this Prerogative, which was not alienated from the Crown by any general delegation, but only confided as a matter of high trust to those individuals whom the Crown commissions for that purpose."

The noble Earl, therefore, held that while the Ministers were responsible for advising the Governor, the latter could not divest himself of the personal responsibility which was specially entrusted to him. He concurred in that view; and certainly in reference to New South Wales, he quite agreed with Mr. Parkes, the Colonial Secretary, when he stated, towards the close of his Minute, grounds in opposition to Mr. Robertson's view, and to that which he himself seemed to have put forward partially at least. Mr. Parkes remarked—

"That he entertained grave doubts whether any change at present from the system which had hitherto prevailed would be beneficial to the colony. In a community so small as theirs the distinctions between classes were very slight; the persons entrusted with authority and the relatives and friends of prisoners move closely together; the means of political pressure were easily accessible, and, therefore, a larger share by the Minister in the exercise of the prerogative of pardon would not, in his judgment, be more satisfactory to the public."

He could not indeed say that society as it presented itself to him in Sydney bore out in his opinion the description given by Mr. Parkes, or that he could recognize in the wealthy, educated, and fashionably attired companies with which he had mixed, the friends of convicts. Still he knew that "the means of political pressure were easily accessible" and only too frequently resorted to. When he took up the Government of New South Wales he learnt that under the Governorship of Sir William Denison during the previous four years, at the commencement of which the free Constitution came into play, and during which free representative institutions were in their infancy the pressure for the remission of sentences brought to bear on the new Members of Parliament was well nigh intolerable; during the seven years that he himself was Governor of New South Wales he had not, in any one case, as far as he could now recollect, omitted to avail himself of the advice of the Colonial Secretary or the Attorney General, and he did not find any difficulty to arise from that practice; but he was not prepared to take the view of Sir Hercules Robinson that the responsibility might be left to devolve upon the Colonial Secretary. Sir Hercules Robinson thought that abuses would speedily pass away after the Colonial Secretary had been invested with that responsibility. He could not concur in that opinion. Undoubtedly, with the formation of a sound public opinion abuses would rapidly cease, but he doubted much whether, if the proposed system were adopted in New South Wales, that colony would not have to pass through the ordeal which the United States had been experiencing for 70 years past, and from which it had not yet emerged. In the United States scarcely one-third of the sentences pronounced were carried out by the authorities, and he ventured to say that the most thinking people in that country would prefer to have the prerogative of mercy exercised as it was in the British Colonies, if only they could have it so by some independent impartial authority like a British Colonial Governor, who would prefer the interests of justice and the security of property to the fancied advancement of party or political influences. As to the case of Lepine he differed from the noble Earl opposite, and thought that Lord Dufferin was deserving of high praise. He had come forward at the right time and in the right spirit, and by his mode of action put an end to what had threatened at one time to be an acrimonious and interminable quarrel between the French-speaking and the English-speaking population of the Dominion.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, I am glad the noble Lord opposite (Lord Lisgar) interposed his observations between the speech of my noble Friend and the reply I have to make to the inquiries which he made of Her Majesty's Government, because his doing so enabled him to express that well-deserved praise which he bestowed on my noble Friend the Governor of Canada. I shall say as little as possible on the question of Lepine, because I agree with those who think that it touches on most delicate ground, and that any imprudence with respect to it here might conjure up a good deal of the bad feeling which existed in Canada, and which the discretion and prudence and wisdom of my noble Friend Lord Dufferin had succeeded in allaying. My noble Friend found himself in a most difficult position, and he has conducted himself with a tact, ability, and judgment which entitle him to, and have procured for him, general approval. As to the question raised by my noble Friend (the Earl of Belmore), I will refrain from entering upon local matters and local complaints—the matter excited great attention, led to passionate debates, and terminated in the fall of a strong Ministry; but, divested of local details, it is one of considerable importance, if—as I understand it—that question is how the Prerogative of mercy is to be exercised in the larger Colonies. The question may be thus presented—first, whether the Prerogative is to be exercised by the Governor himself; or, next, whether it is to be exercised by the Colonial Minister; or, lastly, whether it is to be exercised by the Governor with the concurrence of the Minister. There is at the present some little difference on the practice as between the Australian Colonies. It is not apparently very great, but it is of more importance than appears on the face of it. In three of them—Queensland, South Australia, and Tasmania—the Governor decides in Executive Council—that is, the decision is called the decision of the Colonial Government. In three others—New South Wales, Victoria, and New Zealand—the Governor decides out of Council, but decides after having heard the opinion of the Ministers. The first of those practices makes the decision much more that of the Colonial Government than of the Governor; the second makes it that of the Governor. As to New South Wales, it appears that when Sir Hercules Robinson assumed the office of Governor he found some difference of opinion to exist as to the practice there. There had been considerable Correspondence between his Predecessor and my noble Friend; but Sir Hercules Robinson adopted the practice—as he states in these Papers—of consulting his Ministers, and he states that he did so on a Circular written by my noble Friend opposite (Earl Granville). My Lords, I think if you study those Papers carefully you will find that in reality there is very little difference among those who have held the Seals of the Colonial Office with respect to the responsibility in the exercise of the Prerogative of mercy. In a despatch written by my noble Friend opposite (Earl Granville) on the 4th October, 1869, when he filled the office of Colonial Secretary, writing to the Governor of New South Wales, he says—

“The responsibility of deciding upon such applications rests with the Governor, and he has undoubtedly a right to act upon his own independent judgment. But unless any Imperial interest or policy is involved, as might be the case in a matter of treason or slave-trading, or in matters in which foreigners might be concerned, the Governor would be bound to allow great weight to the recommendation of his Ministry.”

On the 1st November, 1871, my noble Friend (the Earl of Kimberley) who succeeded my noble Friend (Earl Granville) wrote thus—

“The Governor, as invested with a portion of the Queen's Prerogative, is bound to examine personally each case in which he is called upon to exercise the power entrusted to him, although, in a Colony under responsible Government, he will of course pay due regard to the advice of his Ministers, who are responsible to the Colony for the proper administration of justice, and the prevention of crime, and will not grant any pardon without receiving their advice thereupon."

In the Instructions relating to this matter, which I think have undergone no change during a great many years, three things are required—first, that the report of the Judge be taken into consideration; next, that the Executive Council should give advice; and next, that the decision will be regarded as that of the Governor. The noble Lord (Lord Lisgar) has quoted a passage from my despatch of the 7th of October, 1874, which is quite in accordance with what is laid down by my two noble Friends in the extracts I have just quoted; and as a further proof of the concurrence on the part of myself and my noble Friends, perhaps I may be allowed to read a passage in another despatch of mine to Sir Hercules Robinson written on the same day—

"You will, I apprehend, have no difficulty in conforming to the clear rule laid down in your instructions, which is based on this principle—namely, that on the one hand, the Governor to whom personally the Queen delegates a very high Prerogative, cannot in any way be relieved from the duty of judging for himself in every case in which that Prerogative is proposed to be exercised; while, on the other hand, he is bound, before deciding, to pay the most careful attention to the advice of his Ministers, or that one of them who, in the matter under consideration, may be selected to represent his colleagues."

My Lords, I quite admit that at times the exercise of the Prerogative of mercy may be one of great difficulty. Difficulties will arise in its exercise on the responsibility of the Governor; but, on the other hand, one very great advantage of making him the depository of the Crown in this respect is that he stands apart and is not subject to those influences which have been referred to by my noble Friend who last addressed your Lordships. In the larger Colonies where there is the fullest freedom of political government, nice distinctions will have to be drawn; but I believe that the men who are appointed Governors of those Colonies will be competent to draw those distinctions. No doubt, it may be objected to the system of the Governor consulting the Minister, and still acting on his own judgment, that it sets up a double responsibility. In reply, I submit that in this case a concurrent responsibility is better. On the one hand, the Governor will not be relieved of his responsibility to the Crown, and on the other hand the local Government will not be relieved of its responsibility to its own Parliament; so that while the Colonial Parliament may punish the Minister for improper advice, the Crown may punish the Governor for an improper decision. The fact is that, in these matters, we cannot be too logical. In the way I have just indicated, you may reconcile differences and overcome difficulties which cannot be counteracted by logical means. As to the banishment to which the sentence in New South Wales was remitted, I cannot concur with my noble Friend (the Earl of Belmore) in what he said as to that. The Colony, as a part of the British Empire, had no right to transport a criminal to another part of the Empire. The fact, however, is, that, in this instance, action was taken under an existing law which had been sanctioned many years ago; but, at that time, the circumstances were very different. That might have done very well when criminals sent out of a colony were turned like a scape-goat into the wilderness, and nobody was much the worse; but now things are different; flourishing communities have sprung up all around, and the Australian Colonies must find means of detaining their own criminals. I am able to say that the Colonies of New South Wales and Australia have expressed their willingness to repeal this law. As to the Australian case, I shall have no difficulty in producing the Papers asked for by my noble Friend—in fact, I believe those Papers are already before your Lordships. I am not aware of anything that can add to the information already before the House with respect to the case of Gardiner. As to the Canadian case, I am not at present prepared to lay the Papers referring to it on the Table of your Lordships' House. I may remind your Lordships that Lepine was concerned as principal in the murder of a man named Scott, was brought to trial, convicted, and had sentence of death passed upon him. It was a political murder, and Lord Dufferin very wisely commuted the sentence into 10 years imprisonment. My noble Friend (the Earl of Belmore) had observed that Lord Dufferin, in this case, acted without the advice of his Ministers. But, having to deal with that sentence, Lord

Dufferin found himself on an entirely different footing from that occupied by Sir Hercules Robinson in the case of Gardiner. The case of Lepine rested on wholly exceptional grounds. Those of your Lordships who are acquainted with the facts will remember that the circumstances arose in a particular part of the North-west, which is not a portion of the Canadian Territory. That of itself would have been a distinction. But there was more than that. Everyone is aware of the passionate feelings which the case excited. The case of Gardiner is one which has happened over and over again, and which, in all probability, will happen over and over again; but the case of Lepine is one which has not happened before, and is not likely to happen again in the lifetime of any one of us. But I may go one step further, and say that though, on the other hand, there may not be any formal record in the shape of a Minute of the Colonial Government of any communications between Lord Dufferin and the Colonial Government in reference to the remission of the sentence; on the other hand, full and ample communication did pass between them on the subject. He was perfectly aware of all the information the Colonial Government could give him, and of the opinion which they entertained, just as much as if all this had been embodied in a formal shape. In conclusion, I have only to say that I think my noble Friend Lord Dufferin was fully justified in the course he took, and that I am fully prepared to give him all the support in my power.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I concur with what my noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies has said as to the inexpediency of producing the Papers on the Lepine case, and I am glad that my noble Friend (the Earl of Belmore) does not intend to press for those documents. I have heard with pleasure the testimony of my noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Carnarvon) as to the way in which my noble Friend Lord Dufferin dealt with this extremely difficult matter. I think that no more difficult question has ever arisen in Canada, or none more trying to the firmness, patience, and discretion of the Governor General. It is gratifying to find that, so far as we can learn from the public sources of information, his action appears to have given satisfaction in Canada; and if that be so, he deserves the credit of having relieved Canada from a serious difficulty. I concur with everything said by my noble Friend as to the exceptional nature of this Lepine case. It is so exceptional in its character that no can suppose any general principle will be affected by the action of the Governor General. As regards the general question of the exercise of the Prerogative of mercy by Colonial Governors, that certainly does involve the exercise of one of the most delicate functions of the machinery of Colonial Government, and the noble Earl opposite was quite right in saying that, in matters of this kind, we ought not to be too logical. Constitutional Government in this country has not grown up by means of a rigorous application of the principles of logic, but rather by a happy application of good sense on the part of men who proved themselves equal to deal with emergencies. I think my noble Friend the Secretary for the Colonies has laid down the rule quite correctly in his final despatch. I am glad that he does not differ in any way from my noble Friend (Earl Granville) and myself, and I am happy to express my opinion that the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) has dealt with it in the right spirit.

THE EARL OF BELMORE, in reply, said, his noble Friend opposite (Lord Lisgar) was mistaken in supposing that he differed from Lord Dufferin in respect to the Lepine case. From his limited knowledge of the case, he was led to believe that Lord Dufferin had acted quite rightly, and had only done what the noble Lord (Lord Lisgar) would have done had he still been Governor-General, and what he himself might probably have done had it been his lot to fill that position. As to what his noble Friend the Secretary of State had said about his (the Earl of Belmore's) misunderstanding his decision as to the course to be pursued in future, that was not so. The fact was, that he did not understand, before his noble Friend's speech, that the Papers had already been presented. He (the Earl of Carnarvon) had been kind enough to send him a copy of them privately, but he did not, when he was speaking, know that he was at liberty to refer to them. As to Gardiner's punishment, there was a difference between exile and transportation. Nobody in New South Wales ever supposed that a Governor could transport, but he could pardon on condition of a prisoner's exiling himself for remainder of the term of his sentence. He did not wish to persevere with his Motion, as he understood from his noble Friend that the Papers which were already on the Table would give him all the information that was material.

Motion (by leave of the House), withdrawn.

THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH OF SCOTLAND—THE TEIND SYSTEM. QUESTION.

THE EARL OF MINTO, in asking Her Majesty's Government, Whether they intend to introduce a Bill or to propose the appointment of a Commission or Committee of Inquiry, or to adopt any other means for ascertaining, adjusting, and fixing with greater precision than the existing law admits of, the pecuniary liability of the lands in the various parishes of Scotland for the maintenance of the Established Church, said, that the subject was one of considerable importance. In the matter of tithes, to which his Question related, Scotland had anticipated England by nearly two centuries and a-half, for in the time of Charles the First a measure was passed for the commutation of tithes in that country, which had operated with much greater benefit than people were aware of. Only a few days ago he had read in the columns of The Times a letter from Mr. Clare Sewell Read on the subject of agricultural legislation, in which he stated that no Act of Parliament had been so beneficial to agriculture as the Tithe Commutation Act passed for England some 30 years ago; and he (the Earl of Minto) believed that Scotland was equally indebted to an Act passed more than 200 years earlier for the commutation of tithes in Scotland—based upon the same statesmanlike views that produced the Tithe Commutation Act for England—for the present flourishing condition of agriculture in Scotland. The great principle of the Scotch Act was to abolish the system of exacting tithes from the cultivation of the soil in proportion to the amount of his produce, which checked in a greater or less degree the increase of the production of the land; and it enacted that tithes should be commuted in Scotland at a fixed amount, on the principle of assuming that one-tenth of the produce was represented by one-fifth of the rent. Further, it enacted that all landed proprietors might redeem the tithes on their land by the payment of a sum of money fixed at a certain number of years' purchase. From a very early date this power was largely taken advantage of in Scotland, and in due course in Scotland all the tithes were commuted, and a great and undoubted improvement took place in agriculture in consequence. It was, however, unavoidable in the nature of things that in the long course of years which had since elapsed many defects and abuses should have crept in which it was desirable to remedy. Among other defects, were those relating to the stipend of the ministers. The parochial ministers of the Church of Scotland were to have a stipend of a fixed and moderate amount allotted to them out of the tithes, and they were now entitled to an augmentation periodically of stipend in the event of any fresh tithes being discovered which were not exhausted by the existing amount of the stipend. He (the Earl of Minto) did not deny that this might be a proper provision to make for the clergy; but he could not conceal the fact that it led to a great deal of heartburnings, and to many of the difficulties which had occurred in recent years. In Scotland, as their Lordships were aware, when this Act was passed about 200 years ago, land was worth comparatively little. Since then there had been an enormous increase in its value, and land which was then valued at a sum which would bring in £200 a-year would now bring in at least £2,000. But nevertheless it would be burdened to no greater extent than was imposed by the old Act or one-fifth of the then rental—that was to say that land that was rented at £200 a-year at that time and produced £2,000 a-year now, would be valued for tithe purposes at no more than £40. The result was an enormous inequality in the burdens thrown upon the land, and very much litigation was caused. Those who were interested in discovering that the tithes of parishes had not been exhausted had frequently made out their case, and so invalidated the valuation that had been hitherto in force. In many cases this pressed most cruelly and unjustly. They might easily conceive a case of this kind, where a minister making an investigation into the state of the tithes, with a view to claim an augmentation, might fail in the case of nine out of ten proprietors, and succeed in the tenth: the result would be that the one individual whom he succeeded against would have to bear the whole cost of the augmentation of the stipend. Could anything be more unjust or more likely to lead to litigation? The expense incurred in making the investigation was something beyond conception, and he had known cases where the augmentation was only £60, and the agent's charges amounted to between £300 and £400. Sometimes the records of the valuation of a parish were destroyed through accident or otherwise, and then no one could tell with any certainty what the value of the parish in respect to tithes was. A remedy ought to be found for this state of things. He would not trouble their Lordships with details, but would just state some extracts from the evidence which was taken before the Courts of Law Commission upon the subject of the teinds in Scotland. Mr. Logan, Clerk of Teinds, said—

“Some of our old valuations are in a very bad state. Some of the frailest I do not allow to be inspected except under my own eye . . . they are like tinder; the very air that blows upon them carries off bits of them, and very often very essential pieces. Of late a kind of crusade against the validity of valuations has been made.”

Mr. Clarke Brodie—

“Thinks it a great discredit on our system that we have questions depending on what has taken place more than two centuries ago, ending, as they not unfrequently do, in the inversion of a possession which has existed during all that period.”

Mr. J. M. Duncan—

“Litigation is increased of late. Questions in connection with valuations, which for a long time lay dormant, have been stirred—questions as to whether in the old valuations the minister had been called, as to the identity of the lands, and whether certain names applied to certain lands known formerly by other names.”

Seventy years' litigation had taken place for an augmentation of stipend of £40 or £50. In Haddington parish an interim apportionment of the burden of stipend was declared by the Teind Court, and was acted upon for a couple of generations, until 1868, when the Court decided that the following proprietors had been overcharged, and must be repaid by those who had been undercharged:—Sir Robert Stephenson got back £1,804, the Earl of Hopetoun £2,630, Lady Susan Bourke £1,481, Sir T. B. Hepburn £1,103, and the North British Railway £3,003. The following having been undercharged had to refund:—Lord Blantyre had to refund £5,197, the Earl of Wemyss £7,466, the Estate of Monrig £4,018, &c., &c. In a certain parish there were five proprietors whose burdens were as follow:—No. 1 property, valuation £2,038, stipend £65—£1 for each £30 rental. No. 2 property, valuation £1,784, stipend £127—£1 for each £14 rental. No. 3 property, valuation £1,050, stipend £19—£1 for each £52 rental. No. 4 property, valuation £927, stipend £14—£1 for each £61 rental. No. 5 property, valuation £652, stipend 15s.—£1 for each £870 rental. In Auchterarder parish six large proprietors, having a joint rental of £8,075, paid £140 stipend, being £1 for every £57 rental. Six small proprietors, with a rental of £90, paid £22 stipend, being £1 for every £4 rental. Common agent's expenses for an augmentation of £56 were £344, being at the rate of £6 of expenses for every £1 of augmentation. These cases would show how urgently the law required amendment, and he trusted that answer which he should receive from the noble Duke would be such as to lead him to hope that the subject would be dealt with this Session.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND, in reply, said, that the noble Earl had entered so fully into the history of the question of teinds in Scotland that it was not necessary for him to add anything to it. No doubt there was a great deal in the arguments which he had brought forward to show that a necessity existed for the revision of the existing system. He had also shown conclusively that a good deal of inconvenience and possible injury was occasioned by the mode of procedure in the Teind Courts of Scotland. These matters were very distinctly brought forward in the Report of the Law Commission of Scotland of 1870. His right hon. Friend the Lord Advocate had at that moment under consideration the question as to whether he could adopt any improved mode of procedure in the Teind Courts so as to do away to a certain extent with the grievances which the noble Earl complained of. At the present moment, however, he was unable to say that any Bill was in contemplation on the subject, nor could he hold out any hope that the Government would be able at any early period to bring a measure on the subject before Parliament.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE
ACT (1873) AMENDMENT (No. 2) BILL.

(The Lord Chancellor.)

(No. 48.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

EARL GRANVILLE hoped their Lordships would not think it presumptuous in him to take part in the discussion of this Bill the subject-matter of which was so important to the House. Some years ago he spoke in that House of his despair at seeing any great measures of Law reform pass. As long as general principles were talked of there seemed a general agreement; but as soon as one learned Lord embodied those principles in a Bill, all the other Law Lords pulled it to pieces. In 1873, however, he received a practical reproof—the noble and learned Lord behind him, profiting by his own labours, and by those of others, introduced a Bill on the subject of Final Appeals to that House. The Bill was not the same as his immediate Predecessor's (Lord Hatherley's); but it received the complete adhesion of a noble and learned Lord who was not now in the House, and in whose bereavement all must deeply sympathize—he meant Lord Chelmsford—and who stated that he had long been of opinion that it would be impossible long to maintain Final Appeals to that House. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack gave a most important support to that Bill, and he (Earl Granville) believed the whole country appreciated the entire absence of Party feeling, or anything like personal or professional jealousy, with which the noble and learned Lord gave his whole heart and soul to the measure of his noble and learned Friend. That Bill passed their Lordships' House with not much opposition. It went down to "another place," where it also passed. On its passing, the Prime Minister acknowledged with regret that it had not been found possible to make a satisfactory arrangement with regard to Final Appeal in that House. He, however, supported the Bill strongly, and boasted of the efficient aid the noble and learned Lord had given it, and it ultimately became law. In the following year another measure was introduced for the purpose of continuing and completing the work which had been already done, and that Bill was supported by his noble and learned Friend near him (Lord Selborne), although he was not sure that he approved the whole of its provisions. It was again opposed by the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees, of whom he (Earl Granville) made no complaint, for if—as he undoubtedly did—he considered the best Court of Appeal to be the present one, with or without some little modifications, it was highly creditable to him to do his utmost to maintain the privileges of that House. It was opposed by a noble and learned Lord (Lord Penzance) than whom no one stood higher as a barrister or a Judge, but who would be the first to acknowledge that his experience of the practice in the House of Lords was very small indeed compared with that of the four Chancellors whom he had mentioned—by the Lord Justice Clerk, who certainly represented with great authority the opinions of the legal profession, although he had subsequently somewhat modified that statement—the opinion of the suitors was not so clear, as the able newspaper The Scotsman, with its great circulation, had taken the opposite view. The Bill was also opposed by the late Lord Chancellor for Ireland, who had given his reasons for a vote which had surprised the House, and had based his argument a good deal on the unanimous opinion of the Bench, the Bar, and the solicitors in Ireland. It might, however, be observed that within the last fortnight the statement as to the Irish Bench had been contradicted by an eminent Judge. Notwithstanding that opposition the Bill was easily carried, and went down to the House of Commons, but was not passed for reasons which Her Majesty's Government had stated. It was re-introduced into this House this year. Some proposals of a dilatory character were warmly and properly opposed by the noble and learned Lord. The second reading was passed; but a Notice was given by a noble Duke (the Duke of Buccleuch) on going into Committee. It was impossible for him (Earl Granville) to know previously whether any change had been made in the opinions of some of his political Friends by the canvass in and out of the House, but it was agreeable to him to find that that summons to oppose was numerously responded to by them, and though he could not assert that some of them might have voted with the noble Duke, he was not aware of any one who had done so, excepting those who had voted in the same sense last year. The Motion of the noble Duke was, however, postponed, and on the memorable Monday when the noble and learned Lord, without any Notice to the House, came down, and with an emotion which was easily understood on the part of a strong man, who had worked so hard and with such ability for the attainment of an object of the greatest public importance, he made a statement expressing with great regret his intention to withdraw the Bill. Which he did, although an unprecedented act with regard to a most important measure, at an early period of the Session, and without any adverse vote of Parliament. The Secretary for Foreign Affairs followed, and with unusual warmth, expressed his deep regret, and the noble Duke justly found fault with him (Earl Granville) supposing that he did not feel equal regret with his two Friends. The House knew what was then the opinion of three of the most important Members of Her Majesty's Government. What might be their present opinion was a secret. He trusted that the course which Her Majesty's Government had followed would not be taken as a precedent, for it was most inconvenient that a Bill should be thus withdrawn without Notice, and without the House having the opportunity of showing by their debates and their votes what their opinion was. The responsibility for the action taken rested entirely upon the Government, and could not be laid in any sense upon the House as a body. The subject was one in regard to which the country was most anxious, and he hoped there would be no drawing back on the present occasion. A few days ago in the House of Commons he heard a story told as to the opinion which Mr. Canning held in reference to the veracity of people who said they preferred dry to sweet champagne. With the permission of the House he would repeat to their Lordships a story which, as a boy, he himself had heard from the lips of Mr. Canning. It was the story of a sick man who complained to his doctor of being unwell, and being asked to describe his symptoms, said, "I feel so very empty before my dinner and so very full after it." This story somewhat explained the position of the public in reference to the question of legal reform. They felt empty now, but he would not venture to say that they would feel full when, at the end of the present Session, after their appetites had been so long tantalized by these great law reforms, they found that one had been passed with the substance taken out, as in the case of the omission of the compulsory character of the Transfer of Land Bill, and the other, the subject of the present discussion, from which the provision which formed the very key-stone of such reform, rightly viewed, had been omitted, or at any rate postponed. When the present Government was formed, a person of great Parliamentary experience stated his opinion that its principal characteristic would be timidity. He would not venture upon any such prophecy. The Government was young and strong, and the Prime Minister upon one occasion, when charged with having done little for the public good, replied that the country would see what he would do when he had a majority at his back. The country had waited patiently for the measure, and was waiting still. But an eminent Member of the Government in the other House had told his constituents in the last fortnight that in his opinion the principal business of Parliament was not to legislate, but to vote the Supplies and listen to the grievances of the people. If this was the only answer which could be given to the complaints so generally made as to the want of earnestness and energy on the part of the Government, he was afraid they were departing from their traditions of Parliamentary Government. But he would not dwell on that subject. His object in rising had simply been to take off the shoulders of the House in general and to fix upon the Government the responsibility for the very abnormal position in which they found themselves with regard to the measure now before the House.

LORD REDESDALE said, that no blame whatever could attach to the Government for withdrawing the Bill introduced at the beginning of the Session. But he rose to rebut the aspersions cast upon the Committee which was formed last year for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the Legal Profession in England with regard to the Judicature Bill. He could fearlessly assert that there was nothing in its formation or its action that was improper or objectionable; but on the contrary it had performed most useful service both to Parliament and the country: and so far from being of a party character, the Committee included gentlemen who belonged to the Liberal as well as the Conservative side in politics. He himself when asked to join it had refused to do so, lest his connection with it might lend it an air of political partizanship. In fact, the Profession in Scotland and Ireland having spoken out against the abolition of the Appellate Jurisdiction of their Lordships' House, this Committee—which at first consisted exclusively of professional men—was self-constituted. The only thing he regretted in regard to the Committee was, that its Memorial to the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack was presented too late:—had the Committee's opinion been expressed before the introduction of the Bill, it might have been attended with more advantage than was actually the case. The Government had been condemned because they had not carried out the Bill of 1873. But that Bill was not theirs at all. Its main feature was that there should be a High Court from which no appeal could be made. Now, this point was one which the noble and learned Lord now on the Woolsack himself pointed out on its first reading that the want of a Second Appeal was a serious drawback to its value; but said that inasmuch as it carried out the great principle of the fusion of Law and Equity he would support it. In the next year a change of Government took place, the noble and learned Lord (Lord Cairns) took his seat on the Woolsack, and at once proposed an intermediate Court of Appeal. Therefore he (Lord Redesdale) contended that the Government had not acted inconsistently in the matter. That they should have proposed to restore the second appeal was perfectly reasonable and only what might have been expected. It was true that nothing had yet been said as to where the second appeal was to go to when the jurisdiction of the House of Lords passed away next year; but it was perfectly obvious that if the present Bill passed, steps must be taken either to continue the jurisdiction of that House, or to constitute an entirely new Court of Final Appeal, for by this Bill the action of the Act of 1873, in respect of appeals was suspended until next year, when it would have to be determined whether the ultimate appeal should continue to be made to this House, or transferred to some other Court not yet heard of. He altogether denied that the country had shown a desire to have the jurisdiction of the House of Lords abolished. On the contrary, he believed not a single public Petition had been presented with that object. Nearly everybody in the country seemed to be satisfied with the manner in which the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House had been carried into effect, and he saw, therefore, no good reason why it should not be continued. Now came the question, what was to be the course of proceeding on the subject next Session. He was glad to think that the view which he took with respect to it was one which was gradually gaining ground in public opinion. He had had his attention recently directed to a statute to which he thought it right on the present occasion to refer. One of the most important alterations required with regard to the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords was that it should be available during the Recess, when Parliament was not sitting; and he found that more than 400 years ago, in the reign of Edward III., when Parliament used not to sit regularly from year to year, measures were taken in order that there might not in consequence be inconvenient delay in obtaining justice. A statute was accordingly passed—the 14th of Edward III. Stat. 1, cap. 5—to prevent such delay, by which it was enacted that at every Parliament a Prelate, two Earls, and two Barons should be chosen, who were to form a commission to hear and determine causes during the time Parliament was not sitting, with authority to call to their aid the Chancellor, the Justices of the Bench, and others of the King's Council. And to show how distinctly the Parliamentary character of that tribunal was kept up, it was provided that if it seemed to them that the difficulty in any case was so great that it could not well be determined without assent of the Parliament, it was to be brought by the said Prelate, Earls, and Barons to the next Parliament. Here was, he thought, another of those instances in which we would do well to be guided by the wisdom of our ancestors. It was true there were now no arrears, and the work was done satisfactorily; but it might be well to adopt a similar Commission to sit when the Courts were sitting and Parliament was not. He did not know that he had much more to add beyond expressing a wish that no undue pressure should be put on the Government as to the course which they might deem it right to take next Session. He believed the maintenance of the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House to be of the greatest importance. It had a prestige which no other Court of Appeal could possess, and had its duties not been discharged with advantage to the public that prestige could never have been secured. The manner in which appeals had been disposed of late years was entirely free from objection. No complaint could be urged as to the mode in which the business had been attended to, or as to the accumulation of arrears. Not only, he might add, had Scotland and Ireland a right to protest against the jurisdiction of the House being done away with on the score of its efficiency, but because it was a thing to which they were entitled by their several Acts of Union. Was it fair, he would ask, that a solemn covenant should be set aside in opposition to the feelings of those whom it mainly affected? The only remaining question was, why should not England be placed in the same category? Under all the circumstances of the case, he hoped the second reading of the present Bill would be assented to, leaving it to the Government, availing themselves of matured public opinion on the subject, to consider what course they would take next Session.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, the debate seemed to have fallen into some confusion—their Lordships seemed to have forgotten that this was an inconvenient time to enter into the question of the retention of the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords, seeing that there was a clause in the Bill under discussion which proposed to reserve the decision of that question until next year. He wished also to correct what appeared to him to be one or two errors of fact in the philosophic history of the question in which the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) had indulged. The noble Earl was pleased to credit the Government with having created a new precedent in the present instance. He was kind enough to hint that the withdrawal of a measure which was not likely to have the general support of their own Friends in Parliament was a thing wholly unknown in our Parliamentary annals. He was, however, surprised to find that the noble Earl's memory was so bad—he should have thought the noble Earl's own experience would have furnished him with abundance of examples. If he could only carry his memory back to some parts of his own political career, or that of those with whom he acted, he might have been able to recollect that some analogous cases of similar misfortune had befallen a Government which possessed a large majority. These cases were abundant enough; but the most remarkable was one in which he believed the noble Earl was himself interested. It happened during the Government of Lord Aberdeen in 1854. A Reform Bill was then introduced with a great flourish of trumpets; but before the date fixed for the second reading it was suddenly and without Notice withdrawn—and precisely for the reason—he was speaking from recollection—that the Government of the day found it would not be supported in adequate numbers by their ordinary followers. It was no doubt a great misfortune and a great source of annoyance to a Ministry to find themselves in such a position, and Her Majesty's Government did not conceal from themselves that that was so in the present instance; but when that not only in one, but in both Houses of Parliament, there was no probability that a measure which they had introduced could be passed into law, it was, he thought, their duty rather to withdraw it than by pressing it on amid a conflict of opinion which might lead to the inconvenient result, that either House might find itself pledged to a course from which it might afterwards find it difficult to retreat. The great danger was that if this Bill had passed, and it should ultimately result in the Appellate Jurisdiction of this House being retained, it might be retained in a form which might make it a weak and inefficient Court of Appeal. The great object had been, and still was, that whatever Court of Appeal Parliament decided upon having should be a Court that would satisfy the profession and the public, and be as strong as they could well make it. What particular form that Court of Appeal should assume they reserved for the decision of Parliament next year, and he certainly should not now enter into that question. He acknowledged the vexation to which a Government was subject when such a hindrance to its legislation presented itself; but he did not complain of those by whose action that had been produced, because there had undoubtedly been a remarkable modification of opinion out-of-doors on that matter, and he was not the least surprised that persons who in 1873 thought the retention of their Lordships' jurisdiction was hopeless now entertained a more sanguine expectation. The noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) had referred to a point to which he was fond of adverting in his addresses to the House; contending—namely, that the measures of the Government were all of them feeble, unsatisfactory, and empty. The noble Earl seemed to think that the public stomach should be entirely fed on violent and compulsory legislation, and that it would suffer considerable disappointment, and its appetite would not be satiated by the legislative food supplied by Her Majesty's Government. When the noble Earl asserted that any Member of the present Government had led the public to believe that when they came into office they would introduce measures of the strong and violent kind proposed by the late Ministry he was under a total misapprehension. "Worrying legislation," "harassing legislation," "heroic measures" had been denounced by those who formerly sat on the Opposition benches in either House of Parliament with perhaps wearisome pertinacity; and if any one assurance had been given by those who sat on his side of the House more than another, it was that they would avoid worrying and harassing legislation. If, therefore, after those announcements the noble Earl opposite had really expected such measures from the present Government, he had certainly been building his hopes on a false basis. Violent legislation had always been alien to the spirit of the Conservative Party. Compulsion, on the other hand, was dear to the Liberal Party. Their only freedom was freedom for the majority to coerce the minority. That was not his notion of the legislation that would be either acceptable or useful to the country. Those who sat on his side believed that persuasion was the best and most useful instrument which Parliament could wield, and that compulsion should be adopted only with reluctance and as a last resort. The measures of the Government that were usually referred to by speakers of the school of the noble Earl opposite, who desired to show them that their legislation was feeble, were such measures as the Land Transfer Bill of his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, and the Artizans Dwellings Bill, which was now passing through the other House. It was complained that in the one case they did not force the landowners to register their titles, and that in the other they did not force the vestries to rebuild on the sites they required to be cleared; but that in each instance they placed before them the advantages of the course they recommended, gave them every facility for pursuing it, and then left them to be guided by their sagacity and public spirit. The Government believed that that method was more in accordance with the traditions of the country and more consonant with the present feelings of the people than the hasty and violent adoption of compulsory measures before they had ascertained that compulsion was necessary. Of course it might turn out that any persuasive measures which they might adopt might ultimately be insufficient; that they might be unable to persuade those whose feelings they desired to alter and whose course they wished to modify; and that at last there might remain an impracticable minority to whom it might be necessary to apply compulsory measures. But that was an alternative which they ought to put off till the furthest possible time, and if they were driven to adopt it at last, compulsory measures would then be submitted to all the more willingly, because it would be felt that they had not been resorted to until every other method had failed.

EARL GREY said, he wished to recall the attention of the House from the abstract question of whether legislation should be compulsory or permissive to the real point which his noble Friend (Earl Granville) had raised. His noble Friend complained—he thought most justly—of the course adopted by Her Majesty's Government with reference to a Bill lately before their Lordships. His noble Friend said, the country had an earnest desire for the reform of their Judicature; that the Government had proposed a measure to meet that desire; that both last year and in the present Session they had taken steps for that purpose; but that when a measure for carrying out their deliberately adopted views had been read the second time in that House, and was about to go into Committee, their Lordships were suddenly informed, without any Notice, that the Government, in deference to objections brought before them privately and not in that House, intended to withdraw the Bill. The Bill was withdrawn accordingly, and noble Lords who might have objected to its withdrawal were prevented from doing so, through having been taken by surprise. That, he thought, was an unfortunate course for the Government to have pursued. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) had referred to the abandonment of the Reform Bill of 1854; but no two cases could be imagined more unlike than that of that measure and the present one. He spoke from recollection, but he believed that his noble Friend (Lord Russell) who had charge of the Reform Bill of 1854 in the other House, was strongly urged not to proceed with it in the then political situation of the country, a war with Russia then being on the point of breaking out. He had himself in that House then pressed the Government of the day not to go on with the measure under the circumstances; and, in subsequently withdrawing it, Lord Russell complied with the general desire of the majority on both sides in both Houses of Parliament. On the other hand, the Bill so lately withdrawn by the present Government was deliberately brought in to amend and complete a measure originally passed in 1873. Yet, without any public expression in either House of Parliament, or without any objection being taken to the Bill as a whole, the Government suddenly abandoned their measure. From all he could gather, he was persuaded that if the Government had only persevered with the Bill, they had a very fair prospect of carrying it. If the great bulk of the Members on that (the Opposition) side of the House adhered, as he believed they did, to their former opinion, and Her Majesty's Government had continued firm, it was beyond a doubt that sufficient support could have been commanded on the other side of the House to secure the passing of the Bill; and he could not think it right that a measure of so much importance should have been set aside on the plea that they were unable to do so. It seemed to him that the manner in which the Bill had been withdrawn was most unfair.

LORD DENMAN said, the present measure could not be too soon sent to "another place," where it could be considered by members of the Bar and many others interested in the administration of the law. With regard to the Intermediate Court of Appeal proposed by the Bill, he did not think it so strong as the Exchequer Chamber, and he believed that by extending the principle of the Exchequer Chamber to Courts of Equity, and by admitting Vice Chancellors as well as the Lords Justices of Appeal to a Chamber which might hear appeals in causes not originated in the Rolls Court, or other Courts of Equity, by those who had not heard the original causes, an uniform system might be adopted. He might remind their Lordships that the Court of the Lords Justices and the Exchequer Chamber had been condemned by a single witness (Mr. Farrer), before the Select Committee of this House—because he wished to skip over all intermediate appeals—but it had always been considered advisable by Law Reformers, including Lord (of Session) Cockburn, to strengthen intermediate Courts of Appeal, in order that the Court of Ultimate Appeal might be relieved. The late Lord Westbury, with the approbation of Lord Colonsay, carried a Bill through their Lordships' House to reduce the amount at which appeals from Scotland might be submitted to it, always excepting questions of right. With regard to the Appellate Jurisdiction, it had formed a separate subject for a Bill in 1870; and he (Lord Denman) ventured to think that the portion of the Judicature Bill (1873) ought not only to be suspended, but to be entirely repealed; if not entirely, at least until the whole question of a Court of Appeal for the Three Kingdoms might have been considered.

LORD PENZANCE wished to say a word or two as to the manner in which they had got into their present unpleasant situation, from which he did not believe they would be extricated by the present measure. Beyond doubt, the Act of 1873 dealt in an imperfect manner with a question of great and general importance. Whatever might have been the opinions entertained as to the best Ultimate Court of Appeal, there seemed to have been unanimity in the view that it ought to be a Court of Appeal for the Three Kingdoms. But the provisions of the Act of 1873 applied to only one of the three. His noble and learned Friend the late Lord Chancellor (Lord Selborne) in addressing the House the other night, candidly gave his reason for proceeding in that way. He said that Scotland and Ireland were contented with the House of Lords as a Court of Appeal; that he would have been told this if he had proposed to make the measure apply to them; that he would further have been told the proposal was at variance with the Acts of Union; and under all the circumstances there would have been no hope of success; but while entertaining that view, the noble and learned Lord fully anticipated that before long Scotland and Ireland would seek of their own motion to have the measure extended to them; and in that way an ultimate Court of Appeal for the Three Kingdoms would, he believed, be obtained. Perhaps this was a very adroit plan; but it had always struck him (Lord Penzance) as being a mode of dealing with the subject which prevented it from being fairly discussed. If, when the measure of 1873 was before the House, any Member had introduced the question as to Scotland and Ireland, he would have been immediately told they had nothing at that time to do with these parts of the United Kingdom; and then next Session, when the subsidiary Bill to include Scotland and Ireland was brought forward, Parliament was told—"It is too late to raise the question of the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords—that jurisdiction has been given up." Was that a fair and reasonable mode of dealing with the subject? The Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords had existed time out of mind, and was generally supposed to have been a benefit to the public. He was sure no one would deny that the moment their Lordships were satisfied that that jurisdiction could not be exercised for the benefit of the public there would be no desire on their part to retain it. But under the actual circumstances, their Lordships—who were merely the guardians of that jurisdiction—were bound in duty to retain it, until they saw good reason to abandon it; and when a question as to its abolition arose, it ought to be fully discussed in all its bearings. The omission of Scotland and Ireland from the Bill of 1873 had led, in his opinion, to all the difficulty which had followed. When the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack came to consider what ought to be done, he must have seen that he was obliged to take either a step forward or a step backwards. He had either to recede from the legislation of 1873, or seek to bring Scotland and Ireland under the proposed new Court of Ultimate Appeal. Under the circumstances the decision come to by the noble and learned Lord and Her Majesty's Government was not at all surprising. A step which had been taken by a part of the legal profession with regard to this question had been severely criticized. The Committee which had been formed had for its simple object to ascertain the opinion of the profession, and it was the means of demonstrating that an opinion which had been supposed to be that of but few persons was in reality very generally entertained. The Memorial which was got up was signed, he believed, by about 400 barristers, including a majority of Her Majesty's Counsel. What there had been amiss in these proceedings, he was at a loss to conceive. He regretted to learn, from the report of a speech delivered at the Fishmongers Hall the other night, that his noble and learned Friend (Lord Selborne) had selected this somewhat dull subject for an after-dinner speech, and indulging in a certain festive breadth of expression, had spoken of "cliques and intrigues" when commenting on the opposition to his views. He hoped that, in his matutinal moments, his noble Friend would hardly approve of this language. For whatever else he might think on the subject, he did not believe his noble and learned Friend really imagined there was anything underhand in the conduct of those who objected to the abolition of the Appellate Jurisdiction of their Lordships' House.

LORD SELBORNE said, he thought that at some stage or other of the measure now under consideration it would not be improper for him to state the reasons why he still adhered to the belief that the arrangement of 1873 was altogether better than any which could be substituted for it, and also the difficulties which occurred to his mind in regard to everyone of the alternative schemes which had been suggested. The course of the debate had, however, been such as to make him think that the present would not be the most fitting opportunity for entering into those points. He wished to defer to the general feeling of their Lordships; but, probably, on the Report or the third reading he might have an opportunity of stating his views on the general subject. Indeed, he should not have troubled their Lordships at all on the present occasion but for some remarks made by his noble and learned Friend who had just sat down (Lord Penzance) and by his noble Friend the Chairman of Committees. His noble and learned Friend had alluded to the terms in which he (Lord Selborne) had elsewhere expressed his view of the nature of the external organization and influence brought to bear on their Lordships with reference to this matter. In the first place, he must disclaim the notion that he intended to impute to the persons concerned anything that was dishonourable or inconsistent with the most perfect purity of motive. His words might possibly not have been the best which could be selected, and one word in particular — "intrigue" — he would rather not have used. But with regard to the rest of the language he employed he would remark that he was entitled to his own opinion. As one who was responsible for endeavouring, solely in what he believed to be the public interest, to assist their Lordships in their deliberations on these important subjects, he thought it would not have become him to try to counteract by similar means the influence of the external organization to which he had referred. What would their Lordships have thought if Members of this House, enjoying the consideration which was undoubtedly and justly enjoyed by some of those to whom he alluded, were to go out-of-doors and canvass for a show of professional or public opinion adverse to the retention by their Lordships of the Appellate Jurisdiction? Such, he thought, would have been the most improper course he could possibly himself have taken. So far from being willing to use such means, he had never sought to bring personal influence to bear even on his nearest and dearest friends in regard to their conduct on these questions. They all knew what could be done by means of associations, and how fictitious and valueless was much of the so-called opinion which in that manner was organized. He thought it far from improbable, that as many as 400 barristers, including not a few Queen's Counsel, could have been got to sign a Petition that the Judicature Act might be altogether repealed if they had thought the change in the House of Commons afforded them an opportunity of carrying that point. He did not mean to say that an external organization which endeavoured to enlighten the minds of the people at large on legal or other reforms was not perfectly legitimate; but here, after two Sessions of legislation by their Lordships, this organization was got up in the autumn and was suddenly brought to bear on this matter in an unusual and extraordinary manner, and in a manner which had the effect of removing from Parliament the voice and influence it ought to have in determining the course which Her Majesty's Government should pursue. Then his noble and learned Friend (Lord Penzance) had spoken of the adroit mode of dealing with the subject which had been adopted by him in 1873, in then excepting Scotland and Ireland, and proposing to deal with England only. Now, nothing could be more distinct or direct than the language he used in introducing that measure to their Lordships. He said—

"I now come to the subject of the Appellate Jurisdiction. I do not propose to deal by this Bill with the appeals from Scotland or Ireland. Those countries have each their own system of jurisprudence and judicature, with which, so far as their original jurisdiction is concerned, this Bill does not in any way deal. Furthermore, the evidence given before your Lordships' Committee last year by gentlemen conversant with the practice of appeals from Scotland was to the effect that no change was desired in that country. I think the views entertained by the people of Scotland on this subject are entitled to very great respect; it would be an unwise and unnecessary thing to propose changes applicable to that country which the public opinion of that country does not require. As to Ireland, there was also no evidence that any change was wanted. I do not, of course, conceal from myself that if you establish in England a thoroughly good appellate jurisdiction, and find that it works as we hope it will work, opinion both in Scotland and Ireland may probably hereafter trust to the application and adoption of the same system in those countries. But I am perfectly content to wait and not to anticipate the time. All I propose is that, in the constitution of the Court of Appellate Jurisdiction, we may make it possible to have the services of eminent Judges who have served in Scotland and Ireland."—[3 Hansard, ccxiv. 348-9.]

He did not think he could have stated more clearly both the reasons of his abstaining at that time from proposing anything about Scotland and Ireland, and also his expectation that what he then proposed would lead finally to the inclusion of Scotland and Ireland in the plan which he proposed for dealing with final appeals. His noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack then approved the course which he (Lord Selborne) took. He was sure that nothing would have been more absurd than any shortsighted dexterity on his part, for in a very short time it would necessarily have been found out. But the truth was that any of their Lordships who heard that statement must just as easily at that time as at any other time have discussed the question, whether it was right and convenient to make an arrangement as to a Court of Final Appeal for England, which could not at once be extended to the other parts of the United Kingdom; and those who thought it improper and inconvenient to do so, whether Members or not Members of this House, could not excuse their silence during the whole of that Session by any pretence that they were misled. Indeed, what then took place, both in Scotland and in Ireland, most clearly proved that the attention of the legal profession, in both those countries, was distinctly directed to this point. He still thought it would be a very good thing to try the best scheme they could devise for England, even though it might be necessary to postpone its application to Scotland and Ireland; and he had no doubt that in the end Scotland and Ireland would wish that scheme extended to them. He wholly denied that any difficulty was created by any adroit dealing with the subject on his part, with reference to Scotland and Ireland. If there was to be any responsibility in the matter he was quite willing to bear it, and he should rejoice that at the end of his life he had the responsibility of having recommended that measure to the adoption of their Lordships and the other House of Parliament.

LORD O'HAGAN said, he was glad that the noble Earl (Earl Granville) had raised the present discussion, for it afforded him an opportunity of explaining the course he had taken with regard to the Bill of 1873, and that before the House. On a former occasion, when he was not present, the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Richmond) stated that he (Lord O'Hagan) had supported and voted for the Bill of 1873. That was an absolute mistake. That Bill, as their Lordships fully understood, was applicable to England only. It did not propose to include Ireland in any of its provisions; and he did not take part in the legislation of their Lordships upon it. He never advised that Bill; he never expressed approval of it or voted for it; nor, so far as he remembered, was he ever present when there was any discussion with reference to it. So far as his own country was concerned, he had always been of opinion that this House ought to remain the tribunal of Ultimate Appeal. That opinion was never concealed from anyone with whom he had to deal on the subject. When the Bill of last year was introduced, he had a different state of things to consider. The Bill of 1873 applied to England only; but the Bill proposed by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack last Session applied to Ireland. Moreover, it was a different Bill from that of 1873. If the Act of 1873 had not been materially altered, it would have been impossible to maintain that the final Appellate Jurisdiction should remain with that House; and for the plain reason that, if there was to be only one appeal, it would have been wholly beyond the power of the House to dispose of the 400 or 500 cases which would necessarily have come before them. He had acted with perfect consistency throughout, and it was only fair that that should be understood. It should, also, be understood that the adoption by their Lordships of the Bill of 1873 in no way precluded them from dealing, in a different way, with the essentially different measure of 1875. At that hour he would not go into the general question. As to the conduct of the Government, they were perfectly competent to defend themselves. It was notorious that they succumbed to an opinion which was irresistible. Right or wrong, he believed the Government had no alternative, and they could not be blamed for giving way to the feeling which had been developed in every district of the United Kingdom, and which they could neither ignore nor control. He did not attribute to his noble and learned Friend near him (Lord Selborne) any blameable "adroitness;" but he thought it would have been much better if a measure embracing all the Three Kingdoms had been introduced in the first instance. Their Lordships would then have stood in a more satisfactory position. He never for a moment imagined that the noble and learned Lord had anything but the purest and highest motives in bringing in his measure. But when his noble and learned Friend, in an after-dinner speech at a City banquet, spoke of the Government having "succumbed to a coterie," and having been "subdued by a clique," he used language which he (Lord O'Hagan) thought was not applicable to the situation at all. His noble and learned Friend should have remembered that the whole of the Irish Bar approved of the course which the Government had now taken: that the Solicitors of Ireland, represented by the Incorporated Society, had petitioned their Lordships against the application of the measure of 1873 to Ireland; and that, as regarded the Bench of Ireland, although if a Final Court of Appeal outside of that House were established for England, they thought that Court should hear appeals from the Three Kingdoms, they preferred that the existing Appellate Jurisdiction should not be interfered with. As to Scotland, the Lord Justice Clerk—who, he was sorry, was not now present—informed their Lordships last Session that the Scotch Bar was opposed to the measure of his noble and learned Friend: the Writers to the Signet had lately presented a Petition in the strongest terms, imploring their Lordships not to abandon their jurisdiction: and the Bench of Scotland was equally opposed to the change. Surely all these adversaries of the measure were not to be flouted as mere cliques and coteries? It was a gross misuse of terms which should never have been applied to eminent persons and important bodies in England, Ireland, and Scotland, combining, with clear right and honest purpose, to champion the time-honoured jurisdiction of the House. The question was a great one, and ought to be settled without regard to Party considerations. All should unite in trying to constitute a good Court of Final Appeal, during the interval of the suspension of the Bill until the next Session. He was himself strongly of opinion that, though it was not advisable to maintain the House of Lords in its present form, and without such changes as he had indicated at large in a former debate, as an Appellate tribunal, they might easily, by adopting such changes, approved alike by ancient tradition and modern authority, preserve to the House its constitutional Prerogative, and provide a perfectly efficient and satisfactory Court.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: The noble and learned Lord who has just addressed you has referred to the banquet at Fishmongers' Hall, at which the speakers were in a more favourable position than your Lordships—for they had dined. Notwithstanding, however, the position in which we find ourselves, I think your Lordships will not deem it unnatural that I should be unwilling to allow this conversation to close without making a few observations. I only regret that the noble Earl (Earl Granville) after introducing this subject in a speech of great interest, and having made some criticisms upon myself which he could hardly think would be altogether unnoticed, should have succumbed to the emergency of the situation, and having quarrelled with the Government for withdrawing their former Bill, should have taken what seems to me the still more unusual course of withdrawing himself. I must accept the conversation that has occurred as being in one respect highly complimentary to the present Bill—because I have not heard an observation from the beginning of the evening to the present moment in which has been expressed disapproval of any provision contained in the measure. I hail that as, at all events, an expression of opinion by this House that, whatever may have been said as to the withdrawal of the former Bill, the measure which has replaced it meets with general assent. I listened with great interest to the speech of the noble Earl (Earl Granville); but the interest did not arise from the charm of novelty, because I happened to have heard just the same speech from him last night. It was the speech on the Agricultural Holdings Bill adapted to the Judicature Bill. My interest in the speech was derived from a different source. It has been a fancy of mine—looking as I do with considerable wonder and admiration at the productions of the Press of this country—to conjecture from what quarters the various extremely clever and pointed articles constantly found in the Press may be supposed to come. They are anonymous, but now and then we are enabled to trace the authors. I read the speech of the noble Marquess the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons at Fishmongers' Hall, and when I had done so I said—"Why, this is the article I read a few days ago in the columns of a very interesting weekly paper, commenting upon the course taken by the Government." "Of course," I said, "it is impossible that the Leader of Her Majesty's Opposition in the House of Commons could have derived his speech from an article in a newspaper, and it must be that he was the author of the article. This is one of the cases I have always been anxious to find out." But fancy my disappointment when, on hearing the speech delivered by the noble Earl (Earl Granville) last night, I was surprised to find the article again. I asked myself—"Is this the author of the article, or is it the case that this is an article composed after the fashion of some modern French novels, where the authors write in couples and both are responsible for the ideas conveyed in them?" I am, however, ready to accept the view that this is so good a criticism that it cannot be pronounced too often. We have had it last night, again to-night, and I dare say before the Session is over we shall have it again. But, in the prospect of that repetition, it is desirable to have it as accurate as possible, and I will, therefore, correct one mistake it contained. The noble Earl said—

"Look at the Land Transfer Bill. If there has been a cardinal principle in the measure for the transfer of land, it is that it should be compulsory; but the Government abandons that principle altogether."

I should like to know where my noble Friend finds any measure on the subject which has either become law, or has reached the stage at which it was on the point of becoming law, and which contains the principle of compulsion. We were in Committee on the Land Transfer Bill not long ago in this House, when my noble and learned Friend (Lord Selborne) advocated a proposal to make it compulsory in a most effective speech. I endeavoured to state my objections to the proposal; and, as well as I remember, the noble Earl (Earl Granville) did not favour us on that occasion with a single argument in favour of compulsion. I never heard of the principle until, in 1872, my noble and learned Friend introduced it into a measure which never proceeded even to a second reading. Following his example, and endeavouring to give effect to it, I, in the first instance, introduced it into the Bill of last year; but before the Bill left this House I found the arguments against it so strong, and the legitimate opposition to it throughout the country so great, that I was obliged to introduce into the measure a qualification limiting the compulsory registration of titles to properties of the value of over £200; and this, practically, was fatal to the principle of compulsion. Compulsion was not in the Bills of 1859; it was not in Lord Westbury's Act; it was not recommended by the Royal Commission of 1868. But the noble Earl (Earl Grey)—who has also withdrawn—demurs entirely to the assertion of my noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury), that the withdrawal of the Judicature Bill was in pursuance of the precedent which the noble Marquess mentioned. I endeavoured to appreciate the distinction between the two cases, but the only difference I can find is that in the first instance the noble Earl (Earl Grey) himself advised the withdrawal of the measure, and in the second he did not. I agree that this may probably make a great difference in the mind of the noble Earl, but that is all the difference I am able to discover. Both the noble Earls have given us comfortable assurance that if the Government had gone on with the former Bill and supported it with all their power in both Houses the measure would have been passed. It is very difficult to test what would have been done if something had occurred which did not occur, and I should be the last person to speculate upon what the result of the division might have been. But I cannot help referring to something which occurred before my eyes, and of which your Lordships were witnesses, in connection with the former Bill. Notice had been given of an Amendment for the Committee on the Bill in connection with the appeal to the Supreme Tribunal. There was a considerable attendance here to discuss that question, but by mere accident the discussion and division upon the Amendment were postponed. Well, I looked at the assemblage on the side of the House which was understood to be prepared to support the Bill in its original form. I have a most lively recollection of the appearance it presented. Where were the hosts and battalions which we were assured were at the beck and call of my noble Friend (Lord Granville) to support the Bill of the Government? They certainly did not make their appearance in this House. I cannot charge my memory with having seen upon those benches behind the front seats 10 men upon whose support, in the way of voting for the Bill, the Government could have relied. I must now say a word with regard to the withdrawal of the Bill. The noble Earl (Earl Grey) said it was quite contrary to precedent and rule to withdraw a Bill which was fixed for a particular day without giving Notice of its withdrawal beforehand. Now, I should be the last person to maintain any point which was not entirely in accordance with the Orders of this House; and I quite agree that it is not according to the practice of this House to withdraw a Bill without Notice. But I must remind your Lordships of what occurred on the occasion in question. I came down to the House—I believe it was on a Monday—to state the course which the Government meant to pursue. The Bill had been fixed for a later day in the week—at all events, it was to come on some days afterwards; and I made my statement beforehand simply in order that your Lordships might be aware of what was going to be done. Well, several speeches were made, and my statement was perfectly appreciated—whether it was approved is another matter—on all sides of the House. I recollect that the Clerk at the Table came to me and said—“Do you move the withdrawal of the Bill?” It was open to any Member to object on the point of form. I paused and looked around to see if any objection was to be made—but there was none; and the Question having been put, it was taken as a case of withdrawal, no person objecting. If an objection to such a course is made, by even one person, it is fatal; but if no objection is made, the assent of the House is taken for granted. That is the whole history of the proceeding, which has been described as something like treachery on the part of the Government, with regard to the withdrawal of the Bill. There are only one or two other points to which I wish to refer. The late Lord Chancellor of Ireland (Lord O’Hagan) misunderstood entirely the Lord President if he thought reference was made to any vote given by him in connection with the measure of 1873. The whole intention of the noble Duke was to observe that the Government of that time were the authors of the Bill. Nothing more was meant than that. With regard to the Memorial which has been spoken of once or twice, I may say I would much rather that it had not been addressed to me, because it is inconvenient for Memorials to be addressed to Members of the Government. I could do nothing with it but keep it, which I may say I have done to this day. What I have more particularly to say, however, is that I do not think the general feeling of the Bar is for the repeal of the Judicature Act. So far as my observation has gone, I think the Bar are entirely in favour of its continuance, and I must say every communication I have had on the present measure approves it. Of the Committee—or, as they style themselves, the League—for the maintenance of the Appellate Jurisdiction of this House, no person has greater cause to speak with asperity than myself; because undoubtedly the whole action of that body has been directed to defeating the measure for which I was responsible. Well, I am bound to say I have never looked with the slightest degree of asperity upon that Committee, and I have never joined in the observations made that they have done anything at all open to reproach. There have been instances in which similar organizations have been directed to good objects—witness the Corn Law League, and the League for the Repeal of the Paper and Insurance Duty. I do not speak of organizations of this kind with sympathy, because they are not to my taste, and I think Members of the Legislature have higher functions to perform than joining them. But they are perfectly legal and ought not to be condemned as improper. These are all the observations I have to trouble your Lordships with. I regret they have extended to such length, but I thought it would be unbecoming in me under the circumstances not to make them.

LORD WAVENEY said, he would not enter into a criticism of the opinions of those noble Lords who had that evening spoken against the Bill; but he fully appreciated the regret which the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack must experience in witnessing the virtual destruction of the magnificent system of jurisprudence inaugurated by the Act of 1873—which seemed to him (Lord Waveney) elaborated with so much care and so great perfection. As to the present Bill, he was prepared to support the second reading.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House, on Friday next.

ARMY—THE MERTHYR VOLUNTEER RIFLES.—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it be true that the locks have all been taken off the rifles which are in the armoury for the use of the Volunteers of the Merthyr district, county Glamorgan, South Wales; whether they have been removed out of the county; and, whether he will state by whose orders the locks were removed from the rifles and carried away, if it has been done?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, the General Officer commanding the Western District, acting on his own discretion, but according to the precedent authorized in 1873 by the War Department, ordered the locks to be removed from the rifles of the Merthyr and Dowlais Volunteers, and to be placed in security at a certain distance from the arms.

MR. MACDONALD: I beg to give Notice that on Tuesday next I will ask the Secretary of State for War on whose representations he gave the orders—

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I gave no orders, Sir; the General commanding the district gave the orders on his own responsibility.

THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION—APPOINTMENT OF CHAPLAINS.—QUESTION.

MR. MARK STEWART asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he will reconsider the arrangements for the Arctic voyage of discovery, with a view of appointing a chaplain to accompany the expedition?

MR. HUNT: Sir, I stated to the House, a few days ago, the very great difficulty there would be in providing a chaplain for the Arctic Expedition, in consequence of the want of accommodation. Since then I have very carefully reconsidered the matter, and I found that no such appointment could be made without displacing one of the officers from the establishment who has been already approved. Considering that that establishment was settled by a Committee of very experienced Arctic officers, I have taken upon myself great responsibility in disturbing the arrangement. After much deliberation, however, I have determined to cancel the appointment of two assistant paymasters who were going as acting paymasters, and to appoint a chaplain to each ship in their place. I will make the best arrangements I can for the fulfilment of the very important duties which were to have been discharged by the officers who are now displaced.

METROPOLIS — CAB LAW.—QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a case recently before Mr. Arnold, the police magistrate, wherein it appeared that though the hirer of a cab, in case of dispute, can by 16 and 17 Vic. c. 33, s. 18, require the driver to drive to the nearest police court, if sitting, when the complaint may be determined by the magistrate without summons, or if no police court be open, then to the nearest police station, where the complaint shall be entered and tried by the magistrate at his next sitting, yet that, if the hirer do not wish to go to a station, the driver cannot complain, nor the police detain him, though he refuse to pay any fare or give his name and address; and whether, if such be the state of the law, he will take it into his consideration with a view to amendment?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he believed the hon. Member had stated the law of the case to which he referred correctly; but he had not informed the House that there were provisions which gave strong powers to the drivers of cabs to summon, and, if necessary, to issue a warrant, against any persons who had not paid their fares. Of course, it was a question whether the law as it stood was sufficient for the protection of drivers; but that was a point which should receive consideration.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS—LICHFIELD CATHEDRAL.

QUESTION.

MR. A. BASS asked the hon. Member for West Surrey, Whether the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have, in pursuance of the power given them by the Ecclesiastical Commission Act of 1868, entered into a provisional agreement with the Dean and Chapter of Lichfield Cathedral for the transfer to the Commissioners of the corporate property of such Dean and Chapter; whether the said Dean and Chapter are prevented from carrying such agreement into effect by their Visitor, the "Bishop of Lichfield," refusing his assent thereto; and, whether any reason which, in the opinion of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, constitutes a legitimate ground for such refusal has been assigned by the Visitor, or is it understood by the Commissioners to exist; and, if so, what is the nature of the same?

MR. CUBITT, in reply, said, the facts were correct as stated by the hon. Member in his two first Questions. The right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Lichfield), however, had given Notice in the other House of Parliament that he would move for Copies of the Correspondence on the subject, and that Correspondence, when presented, would give all the information which the hon. Member asked for in his third Question in a more complete form than the limits of an answer would allow.

IRELAND—THE ISLANDS OF BOFFIN. QUESTION.

CAPTAIN NOLAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If any steps have been taken to re-transfer for fiscal purposes the Islands of Boffin from the county of Galway to that of Mayo, as suggested by a letter of the late Chief Secretary for Ireland, dated 10th July 1873; and, if not, can any proceedings be instituted by the Lord Lieutenant in Council to remedy the difficulties which the original transfer of the Islands has occasioned in the repair of the roads of these places?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that in October, 1873, the question whether these islands could be re-transferred to the County of Mayo for fiscal purposes only was referred to the late Law Officers of the Crown, and they were of opinion that this could not be done. Further inquiries had been made, but he feared no proceedings could be instituted by the Lord Lieutenant in Council to remedy the difficulties.

THE SURVEYOR TO THE OFFICE OF WORKS.—QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the Surveyor to the Office of Works, in addition to his salary, is allowed a commission on all purchases of land made for the Department; whether he is also allowed to take private business; and, whether, if he transfers any of his work for the Department to his partner, that gentleman is paid for doing it?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: Sir, the position and emoluments of the Surveyor of Works were laid down and determined in a Treasury Letter dated March 18, 1869. The gentleman in question attends at the office once a-week, and whenever the First Commissioner requires his attendance, and he receives a commission on whatever purchase of land he may make for the Government. Being a member of a private firm, it is of course understood he takes part in the business of that firm. With regard to the last part of the Question of the hon. Gentleman, whether he transfers work for the Department to his partner, who is paid for it, I have to say that I believe such a thing is impossible, unless it is done with the knowledge of the First Commissioner and the sanction of the Treasury.

THE METROPOLITAN GAS COMPANIES.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the President of the Local Government Board, When the annual Accounts of the Metropolitan Gas Companies will be presented?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, when the gas companies' accounts have been received, they shall at once be presented. The Metropolis Gas Act, 1860, does not require those companies that are still under its provisions to send in their accounts until two months after their general meeting. It is not probable, therefore, that all these accounts will be received at the Board of Trade until the middle of June.

ARMY—DEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE ON RECRUITING, &c.

QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK, asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he would (excluding the parts that are Departmental and therefore confidential) lay upon the Table of the House the Statistical Tables and Numerical Returns attached to the Report of the late Committee on Recruiting, so as to enable the valuable information contained therein to be considered by honourable Members previously to Tuesday, the 20th instant, on which day an important Motion regarding the recruiting and efficiency of the Army will be brought forward for consideration?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that he had that afternoon received the Appendices to the Report of the late Committee on Recruiting, and had gone through them as rapidly as he could. He had given directions that the tables to which the hon. and gallant Baronet had referred should be printed and given as quickly as possible to the House; but he could not state that they would be ready in time for the debate on the subject.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS.

QUESTION.

MR. GOLDSMID asked the Postmaster General, as he is unable to lay the Papers upon the Table, If he will state to the House what is the substance of the Report he has received on the Savings Bank Department; what steps he proposes to take in consequence of that Report; and, whether, the suspension of promotion inflicted by him as a punishment on the Department has been removed?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, that the substance of the Report of the Committee on this subject was contained in 101 paragraphs, extending over 12 closely-printed pages, and therefore it would be impossible, in answer to a Question, to give the substance of that Report to the House. One of the principle recommendations was, that an inquiry should be made into the practicability of simplifying the transaction of business in the Department, with a view to preventing the large additional cost with respect to the staff now thought necessary. That inquiry was now in progress, and other recommendations of the Committee were also under consideration. The Report was presented on the 18th of March, and on the following day the suspension of promotion was removed.

QUESTION.

COLONEL BERESFORD asked the President of the Board of Trade, Why, under the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, those naval officers who had passed their examination for Lieutenant and Navy Lieutenant should only be entitled to a certificate of service as Master Mariner, which certificate is exceedingly disadvantageous to them when in merchant employ, as it prevents them commanding emigrant ships, and in many cases keeps them out of valuable employment; and, whether there would be any objection to granting such officers who have passed the requisite examination to qualify themselves for the higher position in Her Majesty's Navy a certificate of competency as Master Mariner on producing such certificate of examination?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in reply, said, certificates of service were given as stated in the Question, under the 135th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, of 1854. Examinations for certificates of competency under the 134th section were examinations specially directed to the requirements of the Merchant Service, and it appeared to him to be necessary that naval officers who wished for certificates of that description should pass that examination.

ARMY—MILITARY DRILL IN SCHOOLS. QUESTION.

MR. O'BYRNE asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is his intention to recommend the adoption of military drill as a compulsory feature of education in all schools; and if so, whether, with the view of attaching soldiers more permanently to the service by improving their professional prospects, it is intended to reserve the lucrative appointment of Drill Instructor for non-commissioned officers of good character on discharge?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that military drill in schools would, no doubt, be a very useful thing to be adopted as a part of public education. He would consult his noble Friend the Lord President of the Council on the subject, because, as teachers would be necessary, they would not be paid by the War Office, but the Education Department. That Department, moreover, being responsible for their payment, it naturally followed would select them.

PARLIAMENT — PUBLIC BUSINESS — DR. KENEALY AND "THE QUEEN v. CASTRO.—QUESTION.

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY asked the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent, To name a day for proceeding with the Notice of Motion which stands in his name, but for which no day has been fixed, "to call attention to the Government prosecution of 'the Queen v. Castro' and to the conduct of the trial at bar?"

DR. KENEALY: Sir, after the language addressed to me last night by the hon. and gallant Member, I will not deign to answer any Question put to me by him.

MR. MACDONALD: Then, Sir, I beg to give Notice that on Monday next I will repeat the Question of the hon. and gallant Gentleman. ["Go on!" "Do it now!"] Then, Sir, if I am in Order, I will put the Question now.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member would be in Order in putting his Question.

MR. MACDONALD: As the Forms of the House allow me, Sir, I will ask him now to name a day for proceeding with the Notice to call attention to the Government prosecution of the Queen v. Castro, and to the conduct of the trial at bar.

DR. KENEALY: Sir, I shall bring on the Motion at the time when it seems to me most likely to advance the liberation of Sir Roger Tichborne, and not before.

COLONEL LOYD-LINDSAY: Sir, I beg to give Notice that, as the hon. Member for Stoke has declined to name a day, I shall on Monday move that his Notice be expunged from the Notice Book.

ARMY—NEW BARRACKS AT GALWAY. QUESTION.

MR. MORRIS asked the Secretary of State for War, When it is likely the building of the new Barracks at Galway will be commenced, which, in reply to a similar Question put on the 24th March 1874, he stated would be commenced about the 1st June, 1874?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that tenders were received for these barracks last July, instead of June, as he expected, but being excessively high as compared with careful estimates were declined. It was then determined to reconsider the plans with a view to economy. New plans had been prepared and were now with the proper authorities in Ireland for report as to their suiting the site which was available for the barracks. He could not, therefore, name a time for the commencement of the building.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT — INEFFICIENT PRIVATE SCHOOLS.

QUESTION.

MR. NORWOOD asked the Vice President of the Council, What are the steps, if any, which the Government intend taking to give effect to the suggestions made by a deputation from several large towns, introduced to him in January last, with respect to the obstacles presented by inefficient private schools to the enforcing of attendance at Board Schools?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, this subject is a large and a difficult one, and has for some time engaged the attention of the Government. These private adventure schools—that is, schools frequented by the same classes as attend the public elementary schools, but kept by private individuals for their own profit and receiving no public money—are numerous, and are said to be increasing in towns where direct compulsion is in force. Though some are held to be fairly good, many are reported to be very bad as respects teaching, and to be wretched and unhealthy in their accommodation for the children. The question was well brought before us some two or three months ago by an influential and able deputation of leading members of school boards, who stated that these schools were more and more used as a means of evading the operations of the compulsory bye-laws, as they are not open to inspection and need not keep any register of attendance. We have been asked by means of new legislation to secure the regular inspection of all these private schools, and to treat attendance at an uncertified private adventure school as absence from school and therefore as a punishable offence. The House will at once see from this that the subject is a very serious one, and I am bound to say that many authorities on education matters on school boards and elsewhere consider that premature interference with these schools and additional interference with the choice and school by a parent would largely increase the difficulties of carrying out the bye-laws for compulsory school attendance. Anyhow, before any decision is adopted by Government, either in favour of or against legislative dealing with private adventure schools, we are of opinion that most careful inquiries must be made respecting the matter in all parts of the country, and we are taking and shall take all necessary steps to inform ourselves thoroughly respecting it. But we do not consider that during this Session we shall be in a position to state what course we think it will be desirable to adopt.

PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

QUESTION.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, it may be for the convenience of the House that I should state the course of Business proposed for next week and the week after. We propose on Monday next to take the Artizans Dwellings Bill. On Thursday, the 22nd, we propose to take the Peace Preservation Bill, and continue it till we have concluded our labours on it, and on Thursday, the 29th, we propose to consider the Budget Resolutions. The Friendly Societies Bill will be proceeded with the same night, if an opportunity presents itself.

LOANS TO FOREIGN STATES COMMITTEE.—BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.

Order for the attendance of Mr. Goodlake and Mr. Hales, read.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS: Sir, I rise in accordance with the usual practice of this House to move that Mr. Goodlake be called in; and I trust that I may look for the indulgence of the House for a very few minutes. With reference to the part which I have taken on this question, and especially to endeavour to justify myself in the eyes of hon. and right hon. Members who were not present on previous occasions when this matter has been discussed, I wish to recall the recollection of the House to the fact that on the 9th April there appeared in The Times and The Daily News a letter signed "Victor M. Herran," which was dated the 7th of April, and was addressed to the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Foreign Loans Committee. That letter was, in no respect, verified or identified as having been written by M. Herran; and it was full of libels of the most serious character against a Gentleman who had been examined on oath before the Committee, and who has the distinction of enjoying a seat in this House. It is only fair to the House to say that this Gentleman had been a perfect stranger to me. I had no personal acquaintance with him, and even that ordinary acquaintance which one Member has with another was very restricted indeed; but when I read the letter knowing that the very nature of the inquiry would ensure its publicity, I thought it was most unfair that, in the course of an inquiry affecting great public interests and a large number of people, a letter should be communicated to the public Press which would be read, not only by the individuals who were interested in the question, but also by a far wider range of persons. I felt oppressed by the reflection that libels of the most severe character upon a Member of this House, contained in an unverified document, such as it is, would not only tend very much to injure the position—I will not say the character—of the hon. Member for Gravesend, but would also tend very much to discredit the proceedings of this House, and of the Select Committee in the course of whose proceedings the letter was published. What I ventured to do I did without conference with Her Majesty's Government. It was, perhaps, a mistake; but I felt I should be better justified, in the position I might take as an individual and an independent Member, if I did not in any way mix the Government up in the matter. Accordingly, being advised that the letter was of a peculiar description, and its results were likely to be injurious, not only to the hon. Member for Gravesend, but also to the House and the Committee themselves, I ventured to take the course which I did, of calling the attention of the House to the breach of Privilege which had undoubtedly been committed. But, Sir, having taken that course, and the House having unanimously resolved that a breach of Privilege had been committed, and having subsequently, by considerable and substantial majorities, resolved that the printers of The Times and The Daily News should attend at the Bar of this House this evening, it seems to me, although I do not, at the present moment, withdraw the Motion which I think it my duty to make, I cannot, at all events, do a better thing under the circumstances than to promise, as no doubt the House will hear the best arguments from the right hon. Gentleman for adopting the Amendment which he has suggested, having, I think, performed my duty by laying this Motion formally before the House, to leave the question in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman to whom it more properly belongs. I will only say this—that while the House will ever, under the guidance of its Leaders, be disposed to protect its privileges, it will always be disposed also to protect the liberty of the Press, and do strict justice to hon. Members who, by chance and accident, have their characters improperly attacked. I now beg leave to leave the matter in the hands of the House by moving, in conclusion, that Mr. Francis Goodlake be called in.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Francis Goodlake, the printer of 'The Times' newspaper, be called in."—(Mr. Charles Lewis.)

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I am going to move an Amendment to the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry. The House is aware of the origin of the circumstances under which the matter is brought under their consideration. It appears that a Committee was appointed to consider the manner in which certain loans had been raised by Foreign States in this country, and that Committee, when it met, thought fit—and I have no doubt showed a wise and conscientious discretion in coming to that resolution—to avail themselves of a modern privilege of the Committees of the House of Commons, and take evidence on oath upon the important and delicate affairs they were investigating. It appears that a Member of this House was summoned to give his evidence, of course upon oath. Shortly afterwards a letter arrived by a foreign post, addressed to the Chairman of the Committee, contradicting the evidence given by the Member of this House, and imputing to him conduct most discreditable and infamous. What occurred in the Committee is, of course, what the House would like accurately to ascertain; and under ordinary circumstances, so far as my knowledge of the practice of Committees of this House can guide me, the course would be this—If under such circumstances the Chairman received a letter by post from the Continent, and addressed to him by a person of whom he had no knowledge, he would hardly think it evidence; if he thought it trivial, he could, on his own responsibility, put it into his waste-paper basket; if he thought it weighty and important, he would order the room to be cleared; and then he would take the opinion of his Colleagues upon the merits of the communication, and, if they followed the course which, generally speaking, would be considered a wise one, they would come to a resolution that the letter should not be published. I cannot pretend to inform the House what was the course taken by the Committee; but apparently it was not the course which I have indicated to the House, and which, so far as my experience would guide me, is the usual course, for the letter appeared in the report of the proceedings of the Committee which had been published for some days without any objection being taken. It was said the other night that this letter, though published in the proceedings of the Committee, formed no part of the evidence before the Committee, because the Committee had come to a resolution to take evidence on oath, and of course this—not anonymous letter, but a letter from a stranger in a foreign country, having arrived by post, was not evidence on oath. I really cannot pretend to presume to offer an opinion on such a point—I will not call it a quibble, because many Gentlemen of the long robe might take a different view of its importance; but the vast majority of the House, who, like myself, must be guided on the subject by such share of common sense as they have, would not, in considering a question like the present, enter into a consideration of so technical a point. Whatever may be the case, this letter appeared and was published in the proceedings of this Committee. It is not at all wonderful that either the hon. Gentleman whose conduct is impugned, or his Friends, or any Gentleman influenced by a sense of what is due to the House and by what is for the general interest of the House in which he has a share, should have felt, as the hon. and learned

Member for Londonderry did, that something should be done to vindicate the character of the individual Member, and give him that opportunity of vindicating his honour and character which we all desire he should have. Having arrived at that resolution, they would, and they did, naturally avail themselves of a Privilege of the House which cannot be impugned, and which the highest authority has pronounced to be violated in the present instance; and, though it is one that has been fortunately in desuetude, still it is not an obsolete one, and I must remind the House there are many which are seldom had recourse to, which are often referred to in debate and described as obsolete, but which the House has steadily and studiously refrained from abolishing, in order that they may on occasions guard the House and its Members from abuse. That I am sure the House will take into its consideration. Accordingly, last Tuesday the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry brought the question before the House as a breach of Privilege, which it cannot be said it is not. I had occasion to address the House after the hon. and learned Gentleman, and being myself very adverse to having recourse to this Privilege, except it is unavoidable, I indicated to the House, in observations I made with little preparation, as the matter had come suddenly upon us, a course which I thought would save us from the painful one of asserting this ancient Privilege, and that was that some Member of the Committee, or its most important Member, should place the matter clearly before the House, without at all entering into the merits of the case which was before the Committee. That suggestion was received by the House with favour, but it was not productive of success in the quarter to which it was addressed, and we were informed subsequently in the debate by the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition, that the Chairman of the Committee declined to assist the House in the manner I had suggested because it was a Rule of the House that transactions of a Committee should not be discussed while it was sitting upstairs. That is an excellent rule as a general rule, and I trust it will always be observed. It, however, appeared to me on Tuesday night that it would not have been difficult for the Chairman or any Member of the Committee, without in any way introducing the matters then before the Committee, to give the House, in a few words, clearly expressed and courteously received, information which might save it from taking the course it was forced to take. It is under these circumstances that the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry proposes his Motion that the printers of these newspapers should be summoned before the House. It was said on Tuesday night by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Horsman), a high authority in this House, especially on the subject of procedure, though he did not act on his own suggestion, that we should have met this matter by the Previous Question.

MR. HORSMAN: I beg pardon. What I said was that I expected some of the opponents of the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry would have moved it. I did not say that I should have done so or that I should support it.

MR. DISRAELI: I, too, beg pardon; there was, at all events, a suggestion of the Previous Question. But I do not believe myself in a too liberal use of "the Previous Question." It is a convenient and valuable instrument, no doubt, on occasions; but if by carrying it we should indirectly deprive any Member of a privilege which he believes is necessary to the vindication of his character, we should not be justified in moving the Previous Question. We have now had some time to consider our position. After reflection, I have recurred again to those views and conclusions which I less formally expressed to the House on Tuesday, and I have explained the course which I would recommend the House to take in the Amendment which is on the Table. Admitting fully, as I do, and thinking it to be an admirable rule that no debate should be held in this House upon affairs which are being investigated by any Committee upstairs, I am still of opinion that there is a power in this House—and it is a most valuable and salutary power—which will direct the Committee upstairs to report to this House specially upon any point on which information is required by this House, and of that power I recommend the House now to avail itself. Therefore, I have proposed that—

"It be referred to the Select Committee to report to the House whether such letter was produced and read before the said Committee and under what circumstances, and whether any copy of the said letter was communicated by or on behalf of the said Committee to the said newspapers or either of them."

I may be asked why I did not propose this Amendment on Tuesday. Well, there is an excellent reason why I did not propose it on Tuesday. It did not occur to me. I do not pretend for a moment to be an infallible Leader of this House. The duties I have to perform are difficult and delicate in regulating the Business of the House, and I do not pretend that I could discharge them, unless I was supported by the sympathy and indulgence of both sides of the House. Well, thinking over this question, it occurred to me that a recurrence to this power of the House of referring to a Committee on some specific point on which they desire information would prevent us from the necessity of following up the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry, and would supply this House in a legitimate and unobjectionable manner with the information we desire, and which would, I believe, lead to a general conclusion of this business that will be satisfactory to the House, satisfactory even to the dignity of the Committee, and satisfactory to the hon. Member of the House who believes that by circumstances, which are to him perplexing, he has been assailed in a manner not warranted by our Parliamentary practice. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it being stated in 'The Times' and 'Daily News' newspapers of the 9th instant, referred to in the Order of the House of the 13th instant, that a letter, professing to be written by M. Victor Herran, Honduras Minister in Paris, and addressed to the Right honourable Robert Lowe, Chairman of the Committee on Loans to Foreign States, was read and made part of the proceedings before the Select Committee on Loans to Foreign States on the 8th instant, it be referred to the said Committee to report to the House whether such letter was produced and read before the said Committee and under what circumstances, and whether any copy of the said letter was communicated by or on behalf of the said Committee to the said newspapers, or either of them,"—(Mr. Disraeli),

—instead thereof.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, it is a somewhat singular but irregular Motion that the Leader of the House has submitted to our notice. It is an attempt with which, I take it for granted, we should all sympathize to extricate this House from what I may venture to call the somewhat undignified mess which has been the result of the combined action of the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry and the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government. Now, those distinguished personages do not always act together. We have sometimes seen them in collision; but the result of their combination is more serious and unfortunate for this House even than their antagonism. It was said of two great characters of antiquity that they were two bright stars whose conjunction was more fatal than their opposition, and I think that may be said of the two Members of this House who have brought us into this difficulty—they are the Cæsar and the Pompey of above and below the Ministerial Gangway. But, Sir, the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry told us a short time ago that it is the great merit of the Conservative Party that they act en bloc. Now an example that we have of their so acting occurred on Tuesday last. It, however, can hardly be said that they are acting en bloc to-day, because the hon. and learned Member, having succeeded to his heart's desire in bringing the printers of The Times and The Daily News to the doors of this House, and having proposed a Motion which he succeeded in carrying by the assistance of the First Minister of the Crown the other night, the First Minister now moves an Amendment on the joint Resolution which they carried, and therefore the en bloc system of the Conservative Party may be said to be in abeyance. Well, Sir, I myself am not an admirer of the en bloc system, and I am surprised that the hon. and learned Member, who is never wanting in the resources of the English vocabulary, should have found it necessary to define the fundamental principles of the great historical Party to which he belongs by resorting to a foreign tongue. If I had been in his place and been asked I should have used the good old Saxon English, and called it the block-headed party. A very distinguished authority has said that the reason why a dog wags his tail is because the tail cannot wag the dog. ["Oh, oh!"] All rules have an exception, and I should be very sorry if I have said anything to give offence to hon. Members opposite. In our school days we have all read the story of an impatient and ambitious young man who thought he would like to conduct the chariot of the sun. It sometimes happens that fond parents indulge their children too much, and I cannot help thinking that the right hon. Gentleman on the Treasury bench has allowed Phaeton to drive the chariot, and that the consequences have been disastrous both to himself and those to whom the fortunes of the chariot of the State were confided. The hon. and learned Member for Londonderry told us in language upon which I cannot improve that he should not think of mixing himself up with Her Majesty's Government. Now, when an hon. Member belonging to a Party which acts en bloc is going to bring forward a Motion of Privilege in this House, I should have thought that he might at least have condescended to "mix himself up" with the Leader of the House in considering as to whether that was the proper course to take upon a question affecting the dignity of the House and the liberty of the Press. However, he obtained possession of the chariot for the day, and he will excuse me for saying that I think he rather made a mess of it. Now, let us see what is the situation we are in. On Tuesday last the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry came forward and made a Motion which he succeeded in carrying unanimously that the publication in The Times and The Daily News of the 9th of April instant of the proceedings and evidence taken before the Select Committee on Foreign Loans of the 8th instant was in each case a breach of Privilege. Now that Motion asserts distinctly, and the House has voted it, that what appeared in The Times and The Daily News is considered as part of the proceedings of the Committee. I have seen it stated, with surprise, elsewhere, that there was confusion, and that people thought it was not part of those proceedings; but the House was asked by the hon. and learned Member, and did vote that these transactions were part of those proceedings. That is absolutely essential to the Motion, because if it were not a part of those proceedings there was no breach of Privilege at all, and the hon. and learned Member said this in introducing his Motion. He said The Times and The Daily News published—what?—the proceedings of the Committee on the previous day, and it was stated that Mr. Lowe had received a letter from a person in Paris which was read in English by a Member of the Committee. Therefore the hon. and learned Member knew, everybody knew, and the House of Commons knew that this was a letter read before the Committee, and that it was part of its proceedings. The hon. and learned Member for Londonderry proceeded—

“He had drawn the attention of the House to the fact that the proceedings of the Committee had been printed in The Times and The Daily News, and he would now read to the House that which was the point of the charge—namely, that, under cover of publishing an inchoate and incomplete account of the proceedings of the Committee, that document had been published.”

Therefore he said, and it was the basis of his case, that the publication was part of the proceedings of the Committee, and therefore he moved that the Papers which I hold in my hand should be read at the Table of the House, and he particularly asked that the beginning should be read—namely, that Mr. Lowe had received a letter in French from M. Herran, Honduras Minister in Paris, which was read to the Committee in English by Mr. Kirkman Hodgson. Therefore, as I said, everybody knew when that appeared on Tuesday that the letter was—professed to be and was—a part of the proceedings of the Committee, and thereupon he made the Motion to which I have referred, in which the House declared that that was a publication of the proceedings of the Committee. It is necessary that he should have done that, because the Resolution of 1837 which he had read was this—

“That according to the undoubted privilege of this House and for the due protection of the public interest, the evidence taken by any Select Committee of this House, and documents presented”—not only the evidence but the documents presented—“ought not to be published by any Member of such Committee, nor by any other person.”

Very well, that is the Resolution. He affirms that this letter was read as part of the proceedings of the Committee, and thereupon he asked the House to declare that this was a breach of Privilege, and the Leader of the House acquiesced in the course of declaring that a publication of part of the proceedings was a breach of Privilege. But that is not all. The right hon. Gentleman has objected that we ought to have had some information from the Chairman of the Committee. Now, Sir, I am informed, and you will correct me if I am wrong, that a Notice was actually put on the Paper by the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry of his intention to ask the Chairman of the Committee a Question with reference to this very matter, and that you, Sir, caused that Question to be removed from the Paper on the ground of its irregularity. Well, the Speaker having declared that the Question ought to be removed from the Paper, the Prime Minister repeats a Question to the same effect, and expects to receive an answer; but the Chairman of the Committee could not answer it. He had received the ruling of the highest authority that it would be improper to answer the Question, and accordingly he did not. But, Sir, that is not the only authority on this matter. Though the mouth of the Chairman of the Committee was sealed, another Member of the Committee, who is also a Member of the Government, thought himself entitled, in consequence of the imputations that had been made, to get up. I allude to one of the most respected Members of the Government—the right hon. Gentleman the Judge Advocate General; and he said that this letter was tendered to the Committee in evidence, and I understood and still understand that, in common with the rest of the evidence, it was taken down by the reporters in the room. Therefore, Sir, the House had full knowledge at the time the Prime Minister supported the Motion that this was a breach of Privilege and that the printers should be called to the Bar, of the very facts which the right hon. Gentleman has stated to-day. Well, but on the very same day that this transaction was happening here, the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry was giving evidence in a room upstairs upon corrupt practices at elections; and the next morning there appeared in the papers—not in The Times, but in The Daily News and in The Standard—his evidence, in which he severely criticized the conduct of the Election Judges. He said that the decisions of the Judges are by no means satisfactory. That is reported in those papers, and why have we not had a Motion upon the subject? [Mr. CHARLES LEWIS: I beg the hon. and learned Gentleman's pardon. I never said anything of the sort.] Well, then, why does not the hon. and learned Gentleman, or the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), who seconded the Motion the other day, seek to bring the printer of The Standard to the Bar for publishing a garbled and false report of his evidence? I took down the words myself from the newspaper—"that the decisions of the Election Judges are by no means satisfactory." I do not complain of the hon. and learned Gentleman saying so, or of his entertaining that opinion if he does. If he did not use the words, I am sorry for having mentioned them; but I found them in the newspapers, and the remarkable part of it is, the Chairman of that Committee is also Chairman of the Foreign Loans Committee—my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe). Why does he not, in this case, make a Motion to call the printers of both these papers to the Bar for having published an incorrect and incomplete report of the evidence, as he did in the other? Well, Sir, that being the fact, and with a full knowledge of the case, we have voted that the publication here complained of was a publication of part of the proceedings of the Committee, and the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government comes down and says—"Let us now on Friday inquire whether that was a fact which on Tuesday we unanimously declared was a fact." On Tuesday we declared that the reading of the letter was a part of the proceedings of the Committee, and now the right hon. Gentleman proposes that the House should—I do not like to use so strong a word as stultify itself—but, at all events, commit itself to inquire whether that is true which we unanimously declared to be true on Tuesday last. A more Rhadamanthine proceeding I cannot conceive. Castigatus auditque. We have summoned the printers to the Bar, and now we are going to inquire whether there was any reason for summoning them at all. It is quite clear that if we refer this matter to the Committee, and the right hon. Gentleman gets the answer he wants—namely, that this letter was part of the proceedings of the Committee, we must summon the printers to the Bar, because we have already declared that if this letter were part of the proceedings, the papers, in having published it, committed a breach of Privilege. I venture to press upon the House this consideration, and that what is proposed to-day is a mere postponement. But then the question is—a more serious one than that—is this a question of the printers at all? Was it ever meant to be a question of the printers at all? Does not this Resolution reveal clearly, and does not the speech of the right hon. Gentleman reveal more clearly still, that this is meant to be an attack upon the Committee on Foreign Loans, and upon its Chairman more especially? We had a faint indication the other day that not the printer, but a very different person, was intended to be affected. Sir, there is an old text about those who have dug a pit falling into it themselves. We heard a great deal not long ago about the necessity of supporting constituted authorities, and that if you want to impeach them you must do it directly and not indirectly. I venture to say that what is true of Her Majesty's Judges is not less true of Committees of this House. If Committees of this House have misconducted themselves, if Chairmen of Committees have acted improperly, they can be called to account by this House. But they ought to be called to account directly upon specific charges, upon intelligible questions. You may censure their conduct, and put an end to the Committee; but in these indirect methods, through printers and by suggestions, a course has been taken that ought not to be adopted, a proceeding, I venture to say, which will not tend to support the authority of Committees, and I venture to think that if Committees are so treated, you will not get Gentlemen to sit upon them. And what is this Committee? It does not wholly consist of my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London. Upon it sit two of the most respected Members of Her Majesty's Government—the Judge Advocate General and the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and as I remember, too, Her Majesty's Solicitor General. So that they have the advice of one of the Law Officers of the Crown as to their proceedings, and now you are asked, in this indirect method, practically to impeach their conduct on a matter which specifically affects a legal question. I cannot but think that if so grave a course as that be taken, it ought not to be taken upon an Amendment to the Motion to summon the printers to the Bar. If this is intended as a direct attack upon the Committee; if the Committee has been wrongly conducted; if you think, as a great many people think, that it ought never to have been appointed, why, then, do you not come forward and make a Motion saying so? You can stop its Report now—you can suspend its proceedings; but let it be done, if it ought to be done, in a straightforward and direct manner, and not by a proceeding of this kind. There are many people who think it would have been better if this Committee had never sat; but it is too late now to repudiate their position, even on the part of the Government, who have placed three of their own Members upon it. Therefore, I venture to say that to question the conduct of that Committee without bringing forward some direct charge by Motion is a course which ought not to be taken. Well, Sir, in that case, I venture to think that we ought to dispose of the question of the printers at once, and that we ought not to bring up this Order. If we have made an error in this case, why, we ought to correct it in a straightforward and manly way. Do not let us go through the farce of pretending that we do not know what we all know perfectly well, or that we want some information upon the subject whether this was or was not a part of the proceedings of the Committee. It was so stated. We have so voted unanimously. It was because we knew and said it was that the printers were summoned to the Bar. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government said he doubted whether the letter was properly admitted. Indeed, he seems to think that it was improperly admitted, and he has practically censured the Committee by the remarks he has made. Now, what took place, according to the reports which are impeached? The hon. Member for Gravesend (Captain Pim) made an attack in his evidence upon an individual abroad. That individual claimed to be, and for all I know is, a foreign Minister. He says that his character was attacked by the hon. Member for Gravesend. He wrote an answer to that attack, and the Committee, I suppose, from what appears, believed he was entitled to make an answer. He was a person who could not be summoned on account of his diplomatic character, and the Committee took the course with respect to him which they had already taken with respect to another foreigner who was actually in England, Senor Don Carlos Gutierrez. They received from him and his secretary written statements, without exception, as they afterwards received the letter of M. Herran, and that course was taken by a Committee of which Her Majesty's Solicitor General is a Member. That is the case that is brought before the House. I venture to think that what we might do to-day is either to bring those printers to the Bar or to dismiss them, for we heard from the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry a great deal about the liberty of the Press. Well, I will give him an opportunity of separating this question from that of the liberty of the Press. Let him deal, and let the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government deal, with their own Committee. That I can quite understand. But do not let us hang it on the peg of the printers, whom I do not desire to see hung up under the ban of this Resolution to be called up at some future time when we have settled our quarrels with our Committee. Let us get rid of the question of the printers to-day, and for that purpose, when the Motion of the hon. and learned Member has been, as no doubt it will be, negatived, and the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government becomes a substantive Motion, I shall then move in place of it these words—

“That it being inexpedient to proceed further in the matter of the Order made on Tuesday 13th April that Mr. Francis Goodlake, the printer of ‘The Times’ newspaper, and Mr. William King Hales, the printer of ‘The Daily News’ newspaper, do attend at the Bar of this House, the said Order be now read, and discharged.”

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the City of Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), with his usual and elaborate humour, has thought proper to cast considerable obloquy upon my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government and upon those who supported him upon a recent occasion; but perhaps I may be allowed to say that my right hon. Friend, with the good humour which characterizes him, has acknowledged that the reason why he did not adopt the course he has taken to-day on the former occasion was, because it had not occurred to him to do so. Under these circumstances, therefore, a good deal of the humour of the hon. and learned Gentleman has been altogether thrown away, because my right hon. Friend admits that the course he has now taken is the better one. My right hon. Friend has further stated that he is most reluctant, even in cases of breach of Privilege, to bring up persons to the Bar of this House, who are themselves perfectly innocent, in order that they may be used as a means of our obtaining information with regard to the matter in dispute. The hon. and learned Gentleman has told us that he is very much afraid that we are going to keep these two gentlemen, the printers of the newspapers, in a perpetual state of suspense as to what we intend to do with them. Let me relieve the hon. and learned Gentleman's mind on the subject at once by stating that my right Friend, after communicating with the highest authority in this House, will be prepared, if this Resolution is carried, to follow it up immediately by a Motion that the Order requiring the appearance of these gentlemen at the Bar should be discharged. In taking that step we should be adopting a course which would relieve the Committee from all embarrassment in the matter. What was the state of things on Tuesday last? The reports in the newspapers were brought before us by the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis) as containing what professed to be an account of proceedings before the Committee on Foreign Loans, and I presume that they were as much reports of the proceedings of that Committee as were those of the Committee on the Corrupt Practices Act, which the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry has informed us are incorrect. We ought, therefore, to be informed whether the report in question is correct or incorrect, for no one has told us the state of the case. The right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Committee, I am quite sure, acting upon his views of what he deemed to be the principles and the Rules of the House, refused to get up and explain the matter, and I quite agree with him that, looking at the matter from a strict and technical point of view, he was merely doing his duty in declining to explain the matter. But, seeing that this letter had appeared in the newspapers as part of the proceedings of the Committee, had the right hon. Gentleman risen in his place and said that, with the leave of the House, he would tell us how the letter had got into the newspapers, no objection would have been made to his doing so, the whole thing would have been over in five minutes, and we should not have been led into all these difficulties and trouble in which we now find ourselves. I quite agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir William Harcourt) that we have got into difficulties in this matter, and for this reason—that if we call these gentlemen to the Bar of the House, and examine them, they will probably only refer us to somebody else, and then if we call those to whom they refer us before us they again will refer us to some other persons. Still, however, the course we have taken is the form that has always been adopted by the House, and it is the only way in which we can come eventually at the truth of these transactions. On behalf of myself and of my right hon. Friend I wish to state most distinctly that in bringing forward this Motion there is neither desire nor intention on our part to attack either the Committee or the right hon. Gentleman who presides over it. All we want is that the Committee shall give us some explanation as to how this letter reached the newspapers—whether by inadvertence or by any other means, and if it should turn out that the newspapers are not in fault, we should have no desire to inflict any vengeance upon them, and most certainly not upon their printers. [“Oh, oh!”] The hon. and learned Gentleman says that that statement is absurd; but what object can we have in punishing the newspaper printers for what is practically no concern of theirs? When this question was before us on a former occasion, the hon. and learned Gentleman says an explanation was given of these transactions before we voted a breach of Privilege; but he is mistaken on that point. No Member of the Committee rose before the vote on the point was taken, and the discussion which took place was upon the Motion by which, in accordance with the ordinary practice on such occasions, the first Resolution was followed up. Assuming that the technical objection taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Committee to his offering any explanation of the circumstances under which this letter found its way into the newspapers is a good one—and I do not say that technically it is not—the course we have now adopted of enabling the Committee to report upon the matter is certainly free from all technical objection and is strictly in accordance with precedent, for Select Committees can, and often do, present successive Reports of their proceedings. Therefore, it is, in this instance, with the view of relieving the Committee from any embarrassment, and to set ourselves free from all difficulties, that my right hon. Friend has moved his Amendment to the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry. I repeat on behalf of my right hon. Friend and of myself that this Motion is not intended to operate as a Vote of Censure on the Committee and upon its Chairman, but to afford an opportunity of explanation that will bring this matter to a satisfactory conclusion.

MR. GOLDSMID said, that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had stated to the House, with the candour that always marked his utterances, that he had been caught napping on Tuesday last. To his (Mr. Goldsmid's) mind it was a great pity that the right hon. Gentleman had not continued napping to-day, because the course that he asked the House to adopt that evening was contrary to all precedent, and would be most dangerous in its results. The hon. and learned Member for Londonderry had told the House that he had initiated these proceedings for the purpose of vindicating what he was pleased to call the honour of the hon. Member for Gravesend (Captain Pim); but he (Mr. Goldsmid) should like to know how the hon. Member for Gravesend could for a moment suppose that the course that had been taken by the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry was calculated to effect that object. If the hon. Member was ready to vindicate his honour, why did he not ask the Committee to permit him to be re-examined, in order that he might contradict the statements made by M.

Herran in the letter in question. Calling two printers of newspapers to the Bar of the House could not be said in any way to be a proceeding by which it would be possible to vindicate his honour. He denied that there was any precedent for the House requiring a Committee to report upon its own proceedings, without their having expressed a desire to do so; and, if the Motion were carried, it would, in his opinion, serve as a warning to all Members of the House not to consent to sit upon Committees the independence of whose action was thus interfered with. The whole action appeared to him to have been exceedingly irregular on the part of the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Charles Lewis), who, if he had objected to the proceedings of the Committee being reported, should at once have brought the matter before the House, and not have waited until a letter attacking a Member of the House had been published as part of its proceedings. Numbers of letters which, under the circumstances of the case, necessarily affected the regulation of individuals, had been previously read without any notice being taken, and it was not until the letter of M. Herran was published that these proceedings had been initiated. The object for which "privilege" was established, was to maintain the rights of the people against the Crown, and not to vindicate the honour of any individual Member who might be attacked. In this case, if the hon. Member for Gravesend felt that his honour had been unjustly assailed, he could appeal to the legal tribunals of the country. The hon. and learned Member opposite said that the object which he had in view was not an overt object. He stated that he was well aware how this letter got into the papers; that reporters were by permission of the Committee reporting the evidence, and that among other things they took down this letter which was read to the Committee. Yet it was now proposed to ask whether the letter was or was not read. Surely the proper and consistent course, after what had taken place, would be to call the printers to the Bar and ask them how they obtained the letter. Probably they would say that they received them from the reporters, and then, so far as the printers were concerned, the matter would be at an end. If it should be then thought fit, it would be open to the right hon. Gentleman to suggest such further proceedings with regard to the Committee as he thought proper. That would be a better course than letting the printers remain outside with the probability of being censured for doing that which he (Mr. Goldsmid) thought that it was right and proper for them to do—namely, report correctly the proceedings of this Committee. The reason why the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry had, in the case which had just been mentioned by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford, not been reported correctly was because The Standard only gave a summary of the proceedings; and, therefore, it was far better that the evidence should be reported exactly as it was given. No Member of that House would desire for a moment to check the reporting of their proceedings. The country owed so much to the Press that they could not be justified in any proceedings having that object. He hoped, therefore, that the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman would not be adopted; but that they would carry the original substantive Motion and have the pleasure of seeing the two gentlemen at the Bar of the House. They would after that be able to vindicate the honour of the House much better by attending to its proper business than by going further into this inquiry, which could only lead to futile results.

MR. REPTON said, that some years ago a question of Privilege arose which excited considerable public attention at the time. A Select Committee, of which he (Mr. Repton) was a Member, was appointed to ascertain what would be the best means of communication between London and Paris. In connection with the proceedings of that Committee, a paragraph appeared in The Times stating that some of its Members who had a personal interest in the success of a French railway—the Great Northern of France—were actuated by pecuniary motives. That paragraph being obnoxious to the Committee, its Chairman consulted the then Speaker, now Lord Eversley, as to what ought to be done in regard to it, and the Speaker strongly advised that the manager of the newspaper should be called before the Committee. That was done, Mr. Mowbray Morris appeared, and nothing could have been more frank and candid than his statement. He was asked—"From whom did you receive this libellous paragraph?" and his answer was—"From The Globe of the preceding evening." The Chairman then went again to the Speaker, and the result was, that the manager of The Globe was summoned. In the most simple and natural manner that gentleman told the Committee, in answer to a similar question to the one put to Mr. Mowbray Morris—"A communication was put into our letter-box and we inserted it in our paper. If it has given pain to any member of the Committee I am very sorry for it." Under the circumstances, the Committee thought it the most dignified course to say nothing more about it. He had a notion that if the House summoned Mr. Goodlake and the printer of The Daily News to the Bar they would get very little more satisfaction. It would be an awkward position to be placed in, and he hoped they would succeed in avoiding it; and for that reason, it would be best to adopt the course proposed by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he was far from wishing to blame the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry for the course he had taken in this matter, as he had no doubt acted from plausible motives. He believed himself that the unfortunate predicament in which they found themselves was the almost necessary result of embarking upon such an inquiry as that which the Foreign Loans Committee had been appointed to carry out. When the Committee was proposed he entertained the gravest doubts as to the propriety of appointing it. Notwithstanding its great merits as a deliberative Assembly, he had every day become more and more convinced that the House of Commons was utterly unfit to undertake a judicial inquiry. And this was a judicial inquiry. ["Question!"]

MR. SPEAKER said, he must remind the hon. and learned Member that he could not enter upon the merits of the inquiry before the Select Committee. That question was not at present under the consideration of the House.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he was not going to do so; he had simply referred to the original Resolution for the purpose of pointing out that it was the real cause of the present difficulty. The House of Commons had done what it had not done for 200 years—it had usurped the functions of a Court of Justice. In the course of the proceedings of the Committee a letter containing a gross libel upon a Member of the House was addressed to the Chairman. How would that letter have been treated if it had been addressed to a Judge or Vice Chancellor conducting a judicial inquiry? He had had the curiosity to ask a Judge the question that morning, and the answer he got was—"If I could not have committed the writer for contempt of Court, I should simply have thrown the letter into the fire, or if I had referred to it, it would only have been to express my strong disapproval of the writer's conduct in sending it to me." He looked upon the admission of that letter as a most improper proceeding. Well, copies of it got into two newspapers. Either the letter was or was not a part of the proceedings of the Committee; if not, the publication of it was in no way privileged, and the hon. Member for Gravesend had his remedy in an action at law, just as much as he would have had if the letter had been addressed to the Editor of The Times or the Editor of The Daily News. But if, on the other hand, the letter was really a part of the proceedings of the Committee, as they all believed it was, where was the offence in publishing it? He was perfectly well aware that, according to the Standing Order, technically, it was a breach of Privilege to publish the proceedings of the Committee. It was similarly a breach of Privilege to publish the evidence of the hon. Member for Gravesend, to which the letter was a reply, and it would be a breach of Privilege to publish the speeches delivered in the course of the present debate. But publicity was the life and soul of their being as an Assembly, and the consequence was the Standing Order was one which was "more honoured in the breach than the observance." Moreover, they could not permit the public to be present at their proceedings and refuse that permission to reporters, and, this being so, it was surely desirable to have correct reports of what passed? The report which had been complained of appeared to be a correct and not a garbled report, and he wanted, therefore, to know what offence had been committed by the newspapers. If no offence had been committed, what was the object of the present Motion? There might, of course, be some ulterior object. Perhaps, as had been suggested by the hon. and learned Member for the City of Oxford, the disguised object of the Motion was to attack the Committee, and in particular the Chairman of the Committee. He did not say that such an attack was not within the power of the House; but he ventured to submit that it would be an exercise of power which would set a very dangerous precedent. A Committee was appointed, great powers were delegated to it, and in the middle of its proceedings a check was suddenly to be put upon its action. That was a course unworthy of this House, unworthy of any Government; and he, for one, would certainly oppose the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. BENTINCK said, he greatly regretted that the debate had taken what was called a Party turn. During the many years he had sat in that House he had always disclaimed Party ties and obligations, and had always claimed the right to give, to the best of his ability, an independent vote. This right he claimed equally upon the present occasion, and if hon. Gentlemen opposite had put forward arguments which proved the correctness of their views, he would not have hesitated to give them his support; but it seemed to him the House somewhat misunderstood its position. The House had got into a difficulty by the step it took on a previous occasion. It had been admitted by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government that the course then adopted was not the best which was open to them, and he accordingly proposed what he deemed to be a better plan. It seemed to him (Mr. Bentinck) that the course suggested by the right hon. Gentleman was the right one. The object of all this debate had been to find out whether the Privileges of the House had been violated, and if they had, by whom the wrong had been done. A proper and practicable means of attaining this object had now been proposed by the right hon. Gentlemen. No doubt a mistake had been committed in resolving that the printers of the two newspapers should be called to the Bar, but it was a mistake for which a majority of the House was responsible. With great deference to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the City of Oxford, he ventured to think that the course recommended to them by the right hon. Gentleman was that which ought to be adopted in order to extricate themselves from the difficult position in which they were placed, and he hoped the Committee would at once proceed to put the House in possession of the information which it asked for. They ought to have from the Committee an official statement as to the line they had taken in the matter, and as to the grounds on which they justified the policy they had adopted, and then it would be for the House to decide what they thought proper to do under the circumstances. In voting for the Motion, he wished it to be understood that he was by no means attacking, or suggesting any impropriety of conduct on the part of the Committee, who, he believed, had acted to the best of their judgment under the circumstances. He, however, should support the Motion, as he considered that was the only mode of extrication. At the same time, he wished the Committee to continue their investigation, in the belief that the result of their labours would be valuable.

MR. DODSON said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had recommended them to vote for the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, because, he said, it was one of two ways to dispose of the matter—namely, that they might either have those printers up at the Bar, or extract from the Committee the circumstances under which they had acted. He (Mr. Dodson) ventured to point out to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War that there was a third way by which they might arrive at the truth, and that was by waiting patiently until the Committee had finished its business, and reported in the ordinary course. They were told the character of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Gravesend (Captain Pim) had been impugned and involved in this question; but it appeared to him (Mr. Dodson) that they had altogether lost sight of the position of the hon. Member for Gravesend. How would the position of the hon. Member be affected by calling the reporters or publishers to the bar of the House? In what way would that proceeding remove or alter the aspersions that had been cast upon him? If the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckingham-shire were carried, and the Committee called upon to give the information concerning the appearance of this letter in The Times and The Daily News, how would the position of the hon. Member for Gravesend be bettered? The fact was, if the hon. Member felt himself injured, he had two very plain courses open to him. The letter in question appeared in the newspapers. The hon. Member might therefore have addressed a letter to the editors which would have been published in the same sheets; or he might have asked to appear again before the Committee, and contradict the statements which had been made. A great deal had been made by some speakers of the fact that the letter had proceeded from an unauthenticated source, and had not been fortified on oath; but the hon. Member for Gravesend might appear on his oath, and his position was therefore infinitely stronger than that of the writer of an unauthenticated letter. It had been admitted that the House got itself into a false position, by the fact that it somewhat rashly and hastily allowed itself to be seduced the other night into calling the printers of those newspapers to the Bar; and now how was it proposed that the House should extricate itself from that difficulty? Why, by a course which was in a manner a reflection upon one of the Committees of the House. [Mr. BENTINCK dissented.] The hon. Member for West Norfolk shook his head; but the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry that evening said—and he (Mr. Dodson) had taken down his words—that the appearance of that letter was a discredit to the Committee, and if they were to carry that Motion calling upon the Committee immediately to report as to their proceedings in regard to the matter, they would be endorsing the statement of the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire spoke in the same sense, and further criticized pretty severely the conduct of the Chairman of the Committee; but he was not going to enter into that part of the subject, for it appeared to him that no Member of the Committee objected to the course taken by the Chairman. It had been explained that the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Committee could not, without violating the Rules of the House, state to the House what had passed before the Committee, but a Member of the Government, who was also a Member of the Committee, had conveyed to them pretty plainly how it all came about. He contended that by the course now proposed, the position of the hon. Member for Gravesend would in no way be improved, and he cautioned the House against involving itself in another unpleasant position by appearing to reflect upon the conduct of one of its Committees. He trusted therefore that the House would support the proposal of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the City of Oxford, and that they would at once get rid of this difficulty by carrying the proposal that the Order for the attendance of the publishers at the Bar of the House be discharged, and that this question be put an end to. This Session they had been having nothing but questions of Privilege or quasi-Privilege. He thought the multiplication of those questions was not calculated to raise the dignity of the House, nor the honour in which it was held by the country; and that if they proceeded, night after night, with discussions of this character they would be in great danger of losing their prestige in the country, and not be far from taking that short but fatal step which separated the sublime from the ridiculous.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think that if the House had before been in want of any reason for supporting the Motion of my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, reason sufficient would have been supplied to it by the speech which we have just listened to, and especially if we couple with it the speech we heard a few minutes ago from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan). I am particularly anxious to call the attention of the House to the effect of these two speeches taken together, because it was my lot to be the organ of the Government in conveying to the House the assent of the Government to the original Motion for the appointment of the Committee which is now under discussion. When I conveyed to the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) that assent, it was felt that its appointment was a step for which there was no precise precedent. It was felt that the House was committing to them an inquiry of great delicacy, and one which it was a matter of some hesitation whether it was right and safe to hand over to a Committee. We have been told now to-day by the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire, that if the proceedings which are carried on before that Committee had been carried on before another tribunal, the letter about which so much has been said would not have been admitted, and therefore, from the talk which goes on, from the publication to which attention has been drawn, and from the comments made, we may ask with some anxiety, how is this Committee carrying on its business, and is it carrying it on in a manner satisfactory to the House and in accordance with the general feeling with which it was appointed? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Chester (Mr. Dodson) says that in calling on the Committee to give a Report with regard to a matter to which its attention has been drawn, you are casting some reflection, and implying some blame on that Committee. We are doing nothing of the sort. We are doing precisely the opposite. When we hear that certain things are said as to the mode in which the business before the Committee is conducted, we want to know whether there is any foundation for the charges made, and we take the respectful course of asking the Committee itself to report to us what is the mode in which they have proceeded. I cannot conceive anything less disrespectful or anything more respectful to a Committee than that, when our attention is called to a matter which involves a breach of Privilege, we should refer to the Committee itself to tell us what it is that has been going on. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Chester says—"Oh! but what need for this? You know all that goes on. It is in the newspapers." But we do not know whether the proceedings are reported correctly in the newspapers or not. A case has occurred this evening which shows that reports in the newspapers are not to be depended on as thoroughly accurate. We consider, therefore, that the proper, the legitimate, and the respectful course is to refer to the Committee itself to report to us what its proceedings have been. I do not doubt for a moment that when the report is made we shall see that the proceedings of the Committee are thoroughly correct, and such as we can approve. There is no other way of acting without leaving the matter in an unsatisfactory position. Our attention has been called to the fact that a certain letter which, if addressed to the newspapers directly, would expose them if they published it to an action at law, was read at the Committee, and afterwards found its way into certain newspapers. What we want to know is whether that letter was read at the Committee; whether, if read, it was taken down by the reporters from the mouth of the person who read it, or whether it was imparted by the Committee to the reporters. In short, we want to know whether, if so imparted, it was the act of the Committee, or whether it was done with or without consideration by any Member of the Committee. That is the matter before us, and I venture to think that we are taking the course not only most respectful to the Committee, but most convenient to the House.

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, I think the speech of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer should persuade every Member of the House to vote against the Motion of the First Lord of the Treasury. I venture to say a few words on this occasion as one who during the 15 Sessions I have been in the House, have had the good fortune or the ill fortune to be the Chairman of a good many Committees. Now, what follows if the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman is carried? It depends upon the success or failure of the Motion whether a Gentleman may accept with satisfaction the office of Chairman, or whether he must shrink from accepting it. ["No, no!"] Though I do not pretend to be an authority on Parliamentary practice, of this I am sure—that if there be one rule which is certain above all others, it is, that when a Committee is appointed, the House does not interfere with its proceedings except on a Report from that Committee. With respect to the internal conduct of a Committee, that is left to the Chairman, with the consent of the majority, and it is absolutely unknown that the House should interfere, not upon the Motion of the Chairman or of any Member of the Committee, but on a Motion of a Member of the House, who only draws his information from the newspapers. If this were only an ordinary case, the person so interfering would be transgressing a well-known principle established for many years. But what has the Chancellor of the Exchequer said? He has told the House that this Committee is dealing with questions of great delicacy and difficulty. He has told us that it was he who, on the part of the Government, recommended the House to appoint the Committee. But my right hon. Friend might have added that, until his speech was over, we were in doubt whether the Government would consent to the Committee or not. In fact, we listened to my right hon. Friend's speech wondering whether he would find out, from certain sources of information consulted in the meantime, whether the Committee might safely be consented to or not. My right hon. Friend has said that it was a Committee appointed to inquire into matters of great delicacy. But surely that, of all possible reasons, was the strongest why we should not interfere with its action. My right hon. Friend, however, says that, because the Committee was charged to report upon matters of great delicacy, we are entitled to see how it is carrying on its business. That reminds me of the story often told about children who, when they have sown seeds in their garden, are in the habit of digging them up to see how they are growing. If ever there was a case when it would be unwise to interfere, it is that of a Committee entrusted with the charge of inquiring into matters of the greatest delicacy and difficulty. But let us now go back to the origin of the muddle and mess into which the House has got. What happened during the last few days? In the first place, the hon. Member for Londonderry handed a Notice to the Clerk at the Table of a Question that he intended to ask. He was told that it was informal, and then the hon. Member, without consulting the head of the Government, who is responsible for matters of this kind, proposed that we should take a certain course in punishment of a breach of Privilege. The hon. Member made a speech of some length on Tuesday last, and when he had finished some seconds passed before anybody rose to second his Motion. It was only after considerable delay that an hon. Member at this side very unexpectedly did so. No one rose to answer; we were not assisted by the Leader of the House; then an hon. Member spoke a few sentences, which were received with dead silence; and, no one else rising, the Question was put. Nobody said "Aye" but the hon. Member for Londonderry and the Seconder; a very large number on both sides said "No," and I am sure a great many Members on both sides believed that the Motion was rejected. But the Seconder insisted on a division, and then we became aware that the right hon. Gentleman, who would not advise the House, who would not say a word, most unexpectedly instructed a particular person to say that he was going to vote with the "Ayes." That was the first after-thought of the right hon. Gentleman, and that was the way in which we had got into the muddle. The right hon. Gentleman said, a little while ago, that it did not occur to him at the moment that the present course ought to be taken; but it has since occurred to him to put the present Motion on the Paper, and he proposes that a certain reference should be made to the Committee. Hon. Members come down assuming that all that is proposed is this reference to the Committee; but, since the right hon. Gentleman has decided that, something else has happened and it has occurred to him that the Motion should be followed by the discharge of the Order for the attendance of the two publishers. That is the second after-thought. If that is so, may I suggest to the right hon. Gentleman to have a third after-thought, and to adopt the proposal of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for the City of Oxford? He must have seen from the course of the debate, and from the speeches made on his own side, that we are engaging in another difficulty, and that he will require a fourth after-thought in a few days. The Committee consists equally of Members on both sides of the House; it contains three Members of his own Government, and not one Member of the Committee voted with the right hon. Gentleman the other evening. He is taking a course of antagonism towards the Committee, and surely it would be much more dignified to drop the Motion and this affair altogether, and to go on with the other business.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the question was how the House could best escape from the difficulty in which it was placed. It seemed to him totally impossible, that the House should withdraw from the proceedings which it took a few days ago on this question. If it did, he felt with the Prime Minister that they were in danger of having those printers appear at the Bar, and, in language however courteous, convicting the House of not having defined what should and what should not be published in the shape of proceedings of one of their Committees, and thus being covered by the Privilege of the House. It appeared to him that the difficulty arose from the practice of the proceedings of the Committee being reported from day to day, and that the House had adopted no means whereby its Privilege might be secured against abuse being used for the purposes of libel and slander. This was brought home to the House by the charge directed against one of its own Members; but, surely, the House should protect not only one of its own Members, but should take precautions against its Privilege being used as a shield for libel and slander under cover of reporting the proceedings of Committees. This was, in his opinion, part of a very great question. Hitherto the House had trusted to the newspaper Press for the reports of its debates; but having now adopted a system of secret voting, and several other practices which had been prevalent abroad, they would have to follow the example of the Legislatures of France, the United States, Austria, and other countries in other respects, and especially in appointing an authority to supervise the publication of not only the proceedings of their Committees, but the reports of their debates. He doubted very much whether the Chairmen of Committees were competent to revise the reports of the proceedings which were issued to the public, and he believed that some authority—either the clerks of Committees, or some one else—ought to be directed to see that nothing libellous, slanderous, or discreditable, was published under cover of being part of the proceedings of the Committee. He thought they were quite right in asking some explanation from the Committee how it happened that this discreditable letter had been published.

MR. HORSMAN thought the further they proceeded in this discussion the more the difficulty appeared hopelessly inextricable. He could not see how those who voted with the majority the other evening could vote for either the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman or the Amendment. They were both at variance and inconsistent with the second vote the other evening. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had referred to the original appointment of this Committee, and to what then took place in debate. He said the House had entrusted to the Committee a very delicate inquiry. He might also have stated that it was an almost unprecedented inquiry; for he had not only implied it in the course of his speech, but asserted it more than once. The Government came down at 5 o'clock, intending to oppose the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James); but they found the feeling of the House too strong, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer put a new head and a new tail to the speech which he had evidently prepared to oppose the Motion, and then spoke in favour of the Motion; but he saved himself by taking two divisions. He stated the difficulties of the case, and he made one condition to limit the inquiry—that the hon. and learned Member for Taunton should put himself in communication with the Government, and they should take the lead in the nomination of the Committee. Three Members of the Government were named, with the Solicitor General, to watch the Committee generally, and make themselves responsible for their proceedings. The Committee decided it should be an open Committee, and new difficulties arose. A letter was read, it was heard by the reporters, and published with the rest of the proceedings. That was the state of the case, and he could not help thinking that the Chairman of the Committee had been treated rather unfairly. The Chairman of that Committee regulated its proceedings just as the Speaker regulated the proceedings of that House; but the one was no more responsible for those proceedings than the other for the course of their debates. In this case, the letter which was read contained a request that it should be sent to The Times and The Daily News, and as no Member of the Government asked how it was to be dealt with, the letter in the usual course of the proceedings got into those papers. The House knew all that it wanted to know, but having voted that a breach of Privilege had been committed, the question was, by whom? Was the Committee really responsible for that breach of Privilege? That seemed to be suggested by their sending back this inquiry to the Committee. There was an implied censure on the Committee. They asked the Committee to report that they were themselves responsible for the breach of Privilege. That was a very extraordinary proceeding. It was perfectly unprecedented to interfere with the proceedings of a Committee before they reported. He should be very glad to see his way out of the difficulty which did not involve him in inconsistency; but he must either vote for the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman, which he could not help thinking implied censure on the Committee, or he must vote for the discharge of the Order, contrary to the vote he gave the other evening. He thought the fairest, the most just, and the most generous course was to vote for rescinding the Order.

MR. BULWER said, he thought it very extraordinary if a Committee of which several hon. and learned Gentlemen, Her Majesty's Counsel, were Members, and who had determined to take evidence only on oath, had allowed an unauthenticated letter to be treated as evidence; and he did not believe that they had done so. But if not given in evidence, how came it to be published as part of their proceedings? That it ought not to have been published was perfectly clear, and if published by the authority of the Committee, it could only have been through inadvertence, which he had no doubt could very easily be explained. But as the matter stood, without explanation, the Committee and the House were in a difficulty. Three modes had been pointed out for getting rid of the difficulty. He ventured to suggest another—that the Chairman of the Committee or any other prominent Member of it should tell the House exactly the circumstances connected with the publication of that letter, and express their regret that a letter containing scandalous libels on a Member of that House had through inadvertence got into the newspapers, and the whole thing would drop.

MR. RATHBONE said, he would remind the House and the hon. and learned Gentleman that that was precisely the step already taken by a Member of Her Majesty's Government, the Judge Advocate General, who said that notwithstanding the Rules which regulated the proceedings of Committees, he should state what really took place, and he did so state. ["No, no!" and "Divide!"] He repeated that the hon. Gentleman had stated what took place at the Committee. ["No, no!"] He (Mr. Rathbone) should give his vote against the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman, and for this reason, that he did not wish to be a party to what appeared to him to be a solemn and untruthful farce.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS: I hope, Sir, the House will allow me to say a few words after the very peculiar terms in which I have been referred to by the hon. and learned Member for the City of Oxford. The hon. and learned Gentleman has proved himself a perfect master in twisting the remarks of other persons. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that I did not mix myself up with the Government. The observation which I really made was, that I would not mix the Government up in my action. Then the hon. and learned Gentleman referred to the evidence I gave before another Committee, as if for the purpose of twisting that also into a meaning different from what I ever intended. I will not retort upon him, as I might, by referring to the elegant expressions he has used in reference to the Party of which I am a Member. His idea was old, but the phraseology was new, and what was new was not good. In lieu of of telling us that we were a stupid Party, he thought proper, when addressing us in the elegant language for which he is often remarkable, to say that we were the "blockheaded Party." We are not in the habit of resenting such expressions coming from such a quarter. We know that is part of the stock language, stock imputation, and stock proprieties of the hon. and learned Gentleman. Will he allow me to remind him, by way of retort, that it has been said during the last few months that the Party to which I suppose he belongs is a no-headed Party. We hear that repeated frequently from those benches opposite. Let me suggest an alteration of the title. I think, from what we notice of the conduct of the hon. and learned Gentleman himself, and one or two right hon. Gentlemen on that bench, we may better describe it as a many-headed Party. We know that some who watch with interest the proceedings of the hon. and learned Gentleman think that what he desires is to bring it back to being a single-headed Party, and the noble Marquess at the head of the Opposition might address him in these well-known words—

"I stay too long by thee; I weary thee.
Dost thou so hunger for my empty chair
That thou wilt needs invest thee with mine honours
Before thy hour be ripe?"

Will the hon. and learned Gentleman allow me to continue the quotation, if I assure him that I mean nothing personal when I say—

"Oh, foolish youth!
Thou seekest the greatness that will o'erwhelm thee.
Stay but a little."

And the noble Marquess, without any vindictive feeling, might go on to say—

"Thy life did manifest thou lov'dst me not,
And thou wilt have me die assur'd of it.
Thou hid'st a thousand daggers in thy thoughts
Which thou hast whetted on thy stony heart,
To stab at half an hour of my life.
What! can'st thou not forbear me for half an hour?"

Sir, I do not pretend to be a master of that wonderful chaff and badinage in which the hon. and learned Gentleman is so great a proficient; but as he so often levels his shafts against me, let me have the liberty of telling him that, although he has left his seat here, he left part of his mantle behind him. I am sorry he did not take the whole, but still we have seen upon the front Opposition bench that divided allegiance and marvellous independence of spirit of which he might have shorn this bench, but which he left for me to copy as an example. But, Sir, the independence I have represented here has been independence of principle. I have never gone down to my constituents to rejoice over the misfortunes of my Party. In conclusion, and while asking the leave of the House to withdraw the Motion which I formally made, I would earnestly entreat of the hon. and learned Gentleman for the future that, instead of taking a person so unworthy of his ridicule and his shafts as myself, he will endeavour to measure his sword with some one more worthy and more able to meet him.

MR. SPEAKER: A Motion and an Amendment being before the House, I must remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that the Motion cannot be withdrawn unless the Amendment be withdrawn also.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Question proposed,

"That the words 'it being stated in 'The Times' and 'Daily News' newspapers of the 9th instant, referred to in the Order of the House of the 13th instant, that a letter, professing to be written by M. Victor Herran, Honduras Minister in Paris, and addressed to the Right honourable Robert Lowe, Chairman of the Committee on Loans to Foreign States, was read and made part of the proceedings before the Select Committee on Loans to Foreign States on the 8th instant, it be referred to the said Committee to report to the House whether such letter was produced and read before the said Committee and under what circumstances, and whether any copy of the said letter was communicated by or on behalf of the said Committee to the said newspapers or either of them,' be there added."

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment,

To leave out from the word "being" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "inexpedient to proceed further in the matter of the Order made on Tuesday 13th April that Mr. Francis Goodlake, the printer of 'The Times' newspaper, and Mr. William King Hales, the printer of 'The Daily News' newspaper, do attend at the Bar of this House, the said Order be now read, and discharged,"

—(Sir William Harcourt,)

—instead thereof.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the said proposed Amendment."

The House divided:—Ayes 231; Noes 166: Majority 65.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That, it being stated in "The Times" and "Daily News" newspapers of the 9th instant, referred to in the Order of the House of the 12th instant, that a letter, professing to be written by M. Victor Herran, Honduras Minister in Paris, and addressed to the Right honourable Robert Lowe, Chairman of the Committee on Loans to Foreign States, was read and made part of the proceedings before the Select Committee on Loans to Foreign States on the 8th instant, it be referred to the said Committee to report to the House whether such letter was produced and read before the said Committee and under what circumstances, and whether any copy of the said letter was communicated by or on behalf of the said Committee to the said newspapers or either of them.

MR. DISRAELI: I now move, Sir, that the Order for the attendance of Mr. Francis Goodlake, the printer of The Times, and Mr. W. R. Hales, printer of The Daily News, to attend at the Bar of the House be read and discharged.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT thought that the House ought to have some explanation on this matter. The House had resolved to ask a question of the Select Committee; but it now appeared that the answer was so unimportant, that the House were called upon to determine on the course to be adopted before they got the answer. It appeared to him that every step they took involved some additional absurdity. His right hon. Friend the Member for Chester (Mr. Dodson) feared that the House would lose its prestige in the country, but he (Sir William Harcourt) thought they were becoming the laughing-stock of the nation by going on in this way. It was always an unpleasant operation to eat your words; but the House of Commons was now asked by the Prime Minister unanimously to revoke what it had unanimously voted on Tuesday. This appeared to be a greater absurdity than any which they had already committed.

MR. DISRAELI: Mr. Speaker, I believe there is no passion which more influences the human breast than envy. When we remember that the hon. and learned Gentleman had announced that it was his intention to propose the very Motion I have now made, I think that we can sympathize with and pardon the excessive expressions in which he has conveyed his sentiments. The hon. and learned Gentleman is filled with the great desire—to use his own words—of "hanging these printers up." He says nothing can be more inconsistent than the course we are about to take. He says you have determined to refer to the Committee for information, and you will want the printers when you get that information. The hon. and learned Gentleman assumes that the Report of the Committee will be condemnatory of themselves, and will call upon the House to avenge its outraged principles. I will take a calmer and more charitable view. I would give the Committee the opportunity—standing high as they all do in the estimation of this House—of rising still higher in general esteem. I believe the communication they make will be satisfactory to all the interests and persons concerned. All that we shall then remember of this debate will be that the time has not been wasted—particularly when we see what is on the Paper this evening—which has given an opportunity to the hon. and learned Gentleman and his Friends to develop those Constitutional principles and pour out that Constitutional learning which the House so highly appreciates, and the possession of which tends so much to maintain—I will use the expression of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Dodson)—the prestige of the House of Commons.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: My hon. and learned Friend the Member for the City of Oxford did, Sir, express a wish to discharge these printers from their attendance; but he took that course, because he thought it never was necessary to require their attendance at all, and that the further progress we made in this matter the deeper we got into the mud. In total ignorance of what the Report of the Committee may be, the right hon. Gentleman moves that the printers should be discharged from their attendance, notwithstanding that the Report may show that a very serious breach of Privilege has been committed. We do not know whether the letter the publication of which is complained of was read in the Committee at all; we do not know that the newspapers did not acquire possession of the letter by some totally illegitimate means; but, still, although the House has declared that the printers have been guilty of a breach of Privilege, and although the right hon. Gentleman wishes to obtain further information as to the way in which that breach of Privilege was committed, he thinks it necessary to ask the House to discharge the printers from further attendance. I am sure that the Motion will not be disputed from this side of the House, although I cannot altogether concur in it for the reasons I have stated.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Disraeli

Ordered, That the Order that Mr. Francis Goodlake and Mr. William King Hales do attend at the Bar of this House, be read, and discharged.—(Mr. Disraeli.)

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

BRISTOL CHANNEL—HARBOUR OF REFUGE.—RESOLUTION.

MR. MONK, in rising to call the attention of the House to the want of a Harbour of Refuge in the Bristol Channel, and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the construction of a Harbour of Refuge at Lundy Island, which was suggested by the Royal Commission of 1859, demands the serious and early attention of the Government as a work of national importance," and after having presented various Petitions in favour of the Motion, said, there was no part of the coast where a harbour of refuge could be more useful, or where it could be less expensively constructed than at the place designated in the Resolution. The great question, however, had been one of cost, and with reference to that, he thought money could not be better laid out than in the protection of valuable lives at sea. The statistics furnished periodically by the Board of Trade showed that the number of wrecks and casualties which occurred periodically in British waters, within 10 miles of the coast, was absolutely appalling. Between 1852 and 1857 the average number of wrecks and casualties on the coasts of the United Kingdom annually amounted to 1,051; between 1858 and 1862 they had risen to 1,389; from 1863 to 1867 they averaged 1,732 annually, and between 1868 and 1872, 1,779; while in the first six months of 1873, beyond which the Returns did not extend, the number was 967. During the six years ending 1872, the annual average loss of life was 2,008, whereas during the six years from 1852 to 1857 it was only 780. In 1859 the loss of property was estimated at £1,500,000 sterling, while it now exceeded annually £2,500,000 sterling. These figures alone showed that the subject was one which well deserved the consideration of the House. A Committee of the House sat in 1857 and 1858 to investigate it, and they reported in favour of grants of sums of money for the construction of harbours of refuge. A Royal Commission was subsequently appointed, which visited the various ports and made a valuable Report containing a similar recommendation and pointing especially to the advantage of Lundy Island, as a site both for a harbour of refuge, and a naval station for the defence of the coast. In the year 1860 Mr. Lindsay moved that the recommendation of the Royal Commission should be adopted, and although the Motion was opposed by the Government of the day it was carried, and amongst those who voted in the majority were seven Members of Her Majesty's present Government, including the First Lord of the Admiralty, the noble Lord the Minister for Foreign Affairs, and the Judge Advocate General. In the year 1861, probably in consequence of the carrying of that Motion, the Government brought in a Pier and Harbour Bill and it became the law of the land; but the construction of harbours of refuge had received no support from successive Governments. The Royal Commissioners recommended that where there was an entire or a virtual absence of local interest at the place selected for the site of a harbour of refuge, and where the benefit would be confined exclusively to the passing trade it should be considered a national undertaking and be constructed at the public expense. A harbour of refuge at Lundy Island, as had been shown, would be most valuable as a point of departure for ocean-going ships, as a refuge for convoys, and as a naval station. The proposed works might be properly executed by convict labour, and the island was admirably adapted for a convict station, being $2\frac{1}{4}$ miles long, by half-a-mile wide, nine miles distant from the nearest land, with good water, and exceedingly healthy. The cost of the proposed harbour works, if carried out by free labour, would be about £500,000; but if executed by convict labour, for which the island was very well suited, it would be only one-half of that sum. Lundy Island possessed a lighthouse and a good anchorage; but during the westerly gales the pilot boats were driven away from the island, to the detriment of the service, and inconvenience and danger to life and property. If ever a harbour were to be constructed there, now was the time to think about it. The island belonged to one proprietor, it had good water, and he thought convict labour might be transferred thither from Portland. The number of vessels that navigated the Bristol Channel was somewhere about 80,000 per annum, representing some 11,000,000 tons of shipping. The loss of life on our coast was perfectly appalling, and he regretted to say a considerable number of the wrecks occurred in the Bristol Channel; for instance, in the year 1872, 250 vessels were lost in only a portion of it. At present there was no harbour except the small and dangerous one of Padstow along 60 miles of iron-bound coast from the Lands End to Lundy. He was sure the Government would give the matter their consideration, and he should leave it in their hands. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Resolution.

MR. CORDES, in seconding the Motion, said, he could bear testimony to the interest excited by the subject throughout the district. The question involved, however, was not a mere local one. The extent and value of the shipping which passed during the year through the Bristol Channel might be realized from the fact that it amounted to one-sixth of the shipping of the whole Kingdom. There could be no doubt whatever in the mind of any one who studied the subject that Lundy Island was well calculated for a harbour of refuge. One of the witnesses examined before the Royal Commission said the island was fixed there on purpose to supply a harbour of refuge. The Commissioners themselves were without doubt about such a harbour being necessary, and though they did not advise that it should be at once constructed, they recommended that the matter should be kept in view. That could not be said to have been done, for since then 16 years had elapsed, and now the question of a harbour of refuge at Lundy was hardly visible. They wished again to bring it into prominence, so that at no distant day a harbour into which vessels could run with safety might be made in the Bristol Channel. If he proposed that they should ask for £500,000, no doubt the Chancellor of the Exchequer would probably point to his cash-box, the empty condition of which he had on the preceding evening pointed out as the acme of financial art; but what he did propose was that a small amount should be expended annually until the harbour was completed.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the construction of a Harbour of Refuge at Lundy Island, which was suggested by the Royal Commission of 1859, demands the serious and early attention of the Government as a work of national importance,"—(Mr. Monk.)

--instead thereof.

MR. E. J. REED said, that no part of the country had shown greater enterprize than the ports of the Bristol Channel, and he should be sorry to do anything that would be injurious to the interests of their shipping trade; but when the House was asked to favour a Motion for the construction of a harbour of refuge it became it to look closely into the grounds upon which that proposal was based. Although he had nothing but praise to offer for the spirit in which the Motion had been made, he must say that the case presented was a weak and unsatisfactory one, since the particular harbour now advocated was not one which had really received the recommendation of the Royal Commissioners. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Monmouth (Mr. Cordes) said he did not apply for any large or immediate expenditure, he only asked for a small sum to begin with; but when once begun, the work could not be abandoned. The Royal Commission spoke of this harbour only in connection with the trade of the Bristol Channel, and to that extent it partook of all the incidents of a local trade, and although they did not recommend its adoption, they did one at the Mumbles. [Mr. Monk said, they recommended it as a naval station.] They recommended it as a harbour for the convenience of the Bristol Channel; as a harbour of refuge in its full meaning, it would be worth nothing. It was said that the formation of a harbour of refuge by means of convict labour would save much of the expense of the construction of the harbour in question. But it was proved that such labour was of very questionable nature; but the great objection that he had to the proposal of the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr.

Monk) was, that if the Government contemplated yielding to this demand they would decidedly fly in the face of the Report of the Commissioners, by taking up a harbour which they did not recommend in preference to those which they did recommend. He hoped the Government would not give any assent to this project, without giving the opportunity of re-considering the whole question of harbours of refuge. If the question were taken up under the auspices of the right hon. Gentleman opposite they might succeed in getting a number of harbours of refuge constructed with propriety, and in due order, worthy of the House, the country, and the period, and a great service would thus be rendered to the maritime interests of the world.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he should have great pleasure in supporting the Motion, for it was impossible for anyone though not a sailor, to reside in the locality, and not see, as he had at Weston-super-Mare, the many disasters which occurred to shipping, and which testified to the necessity for the provision of a harbour of refuge, not merely for the benefit of the trade of the port of Bristol, but also for the shipping trade of the Bristol Channel generally. From Gloucester to the Land's End there was not a harbour which was not a tidal harbour, and, owing to the sudden changes in the wind, and violent storms in that locality, there were sometimes 500 vessels windbound in the Channel, the ports of which owned a very large proportion of the shipping of the country. As regarded Lundy Island, no doubt the great objection made to it was the amount of expense attaching to it, from the great depth of water in which the works would have to be constructed. If it was too considerable, he would suggest that it might be desirable to construct a harbour and port of refuge at Brean Down, a promontory of the Bristol Channel, which, he contended, might be done for £100,000, and respecting which the testimony of eminent civil engineers, and especially of Sir John Coode, had been already adduced as to the practicability of constructing it. Anyhow, the Bristol Channel had a fair claim to be considered, and if the Government would give the subject its impartial consideration, he had no doubt the wishes of the hon. Member for Gloucester would, sooner or later, be carried into effect.

Mr. Cordes

MR. SCOURFIELD said, that as one of the few Members left in the House, who had served on the Committee on Harbours of Refuge, he felt greatly tempted to sing the praises of Milford Haven, and certainly if it were proposed to expend £500,000 on this coast, a fifth part of that sum might be advantageously spent upon the docks at that port. He doubted whether the representations of individual Members in favour of expenditure on their own locality had much weight with the House. The Executive was the proper Department to take such matters up, and if the Government declined to be guided by the Report of the Royal Commission of 1859 on account of the lapse of time, let them appoint another Royal Commission.

MR. BROGDEN said, that the establishment of telegraphic communication between Lundy and the mainland would be an object of great importance to the mercantile community and to the public, and one much more easy of attainment than that proposed by the hon. Member for Gloucester. Lundy presented already many of the features of a natural harbour of refuge; but for want of communication with the mainland, ships ran in there in stress of weather, and lay there for many days together without any knowledge of their safety reaching those who were interested in them.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, that the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) had rested his whole case on the Report of the Royal Commission of 1859. On turning to their Report, however, he found that they were of opinion, with regard to a breakwater at Lundy Island, that the depth of water was so great that the cost of construction was not to be thought of until the other harbours on the coast, which they regarded as more important, had been completed. The hon. Member, therefore, at once disposed of his own Motion. Lundy Island was itself a natural breakwater against the waves of the Atlantic, and he agreed as to its natural advantages as a harbour of refuge. It had also excellent material for building, and was well circumstanced for using convict labour; it was also better situated than other places named further up the Channel. But allowing for all the advantages attaching to Lundy Island, the Commission to which the

hon. Member for Gloucester referred recommended that public money should not be expended in making a harbour of refuge there until all the other places they mentioned had received prior attention. The constitution of harbours of refuge, in a national sense, moreover, was a very disputable point. It was a preferable course to facilitate the efforts of those engaged to deal with the necessities of commerce by the improvement of existing trading harbours. Since it had been found that the country was not prepared to expend money on artificial harbours of refuge, the local communities had set to work improving their own trading harbours. In the Wear, and the Tees, and the Tyne especially, gigantic works had been taken up by the localities interested in them, aided only by advances from the Exchequer Loans Commissioners. In that way the trading harbours had been so greatly improved as to be useful, not only for their original purpose, but likewise as harbours of refuge. Provision for maintenance was as important as that for first construction. These works were carried out with the support both of the communities where they were situated and also of the shipping interest; and they were afterwards kept in repair by the same means. The financial advantages of such a course were obvious, for the mercantile community, who were a rich interest, were ready to spend their money on works of that kind, and in a better way perhaps than the Government could expend it. On the other hand, the ship-owners distinctly told them that they were not willing to pay passing tolls for the support of national harbours of refuge, and the Underwriters equally rejected them. Perhaps it was thought that these interests considered themselves safe by their own insurances. But it should be remembered that they were perfectly ready to pay passing tolls for lighthouses, which they deemed useful to them, but not for harbours of refuge. In this case there would be no local dues to support the harbour, for the population might be said to consist of rabbits, and if it was meant to charge the shipping interest generally, one such harbour as this would make the Mercantile Marine Fund bankrupt. He could not think that the proposal contemplated that such a work should be carried out simply at the expense of the Consolidated Fund, especially as Lundy had no prior claim in the matter. With regard to the case of Dover, he had made no claim to the expenditure of public money there on account of its being a fit place for a harbour of refuge. He had laid his chief stress on the advantages of Dover for a naval and military station at a most important point on our coast. The changed circumstances of the coasting trade also further weakened the claim for harbours of refuge, because steam was now so much used that many vessels stood out to sea rather than seek such harbours. Altogether, then, he must tell the hon. Member that having appealed to Cæsar, to Cæsar he must go; and in the words of the Royal Commission, he said the cost of the construction of a harbour of refuge where the hon. Member suggested ought not to be thought of, at all events, until harbours of more urgent necessity had been made.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR thought the policy now so distinctly announced by the President of the Board of Trade of encouraging the improvement of mercantile harbours which would be valuable both for trading purposes and as harbours of refuge, was a sound and wise one, and he hoped it would be adhered to and enforced by the permanent officers of the Board of Trade, as well as by the Government. The fact of localities improving their harbours by means of loans from the Exchequer Loan Commissioners was most important, only it must be borne in mind that the aid rendered had only amounted to a loan of a little more than £1,000,000 against upwards of £25,000,000 borrowed from other sources, and in face of this short aid they now found the Board of Trade using every effort to draw the country into an expenditure on Dover Harbour to the extent of the aid granted as loans to all the other harbours in the kingdom. It was a project pushed forward with great force by the Liberal Party, which committed the country to this large expenditure, by obtaining a Vote of £10,000 at the end of the Session by a majority of 61 to 59 votes. The reasons now given by the President of the Board of Trade for the proposed large expenditure at Dover were quite new, and certainly they had never been put forward by the late Duke of Wellington. So far from that great man advocating Dover as the place to be improved on that coast, he, on the contrary, in 1843, before the Shipwreck Committee, pointed to Dungeness as the proper site; and in a conversation with Mr. Walker, the engineer, to Seaford, as shown in the Proceedings of the Committee on Harbours of Refuge of 1858.

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE QUEEN v. CASTRO—PETITION OF THOMAS BIDDULPH AND OTHERS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. WHALLEY, in rising to call attention to the Petition signed by Anthony Biddulph and others, praying for a free pardon to Castro alias Tichborne, said, that the Petition would have been signed by many other persons, including several noble Lords, but that they were prevented by the Forms of the House from addressing it on the subject. Among the signatories, however, was the cousin of the convict, a gentleman of unimpeachable position, and several persons residing in the neighbourhood of the Tichborne estates; and if he had been in this country he might have asked the present Viceroy of India to attach his signature, as he was one of those who, at the early stage of the proceedings, subscribed the sum of £5 towards a fund which was started with the view of enabling the person called Castro to prosecute his claim. Others who signed the Petition had been tenants on the Tichborne estate, but some of them, because they insisted that the Claimant was the heir to the Tichborne property, had lost their occupation. It was signed, also, by representative men, eight of the petitioners being chairmen of Tichborne Associations in the neighbourhood of London. The Petition, therefore, he submitted, was entitled to the attentive consideration of the House. There was nothing whatever contained in it to which the Committee on Public Petitions could possibly take exception. It broadly and boldly, but in respectful language, stated that in the opinion of those who subscribed their names there had been a serious miscarriage of justice, which raised by implication a charge against those who were responsible for the prosecution and for the conduct of the trial. The Petition was read at the Table and had since been printed by order of the Committee of Petitions. Each of those who signed it would, he believed, be found on inquiry to be well entitled to convey to this House his views on the subject, and not one of them could be justly styled a fool or a fanatic, or specimen of that ignorant, infatuated, and deluded multitude who, in public meetings throughout the country and by Petitions to Parliament, showed their views. The Petition was free from any of the objections successfully urged last night against other Petitions—that was to say, it did not expressly impute to the Judges who presided over this trial, misconduct; but it appeared to him that, by reasonable implication, it did put on trial the conduct of those Judges, and all who were responsible in any degree for the administration of the law in the memorable cause, and it afforded to the House the opportunity of doing justice to all such persons and authorities, if the House deemed them to be unjustly assailed. The Petition from Prittlewell had been rejected, because it stated in express terms that the Judge of the Tichborne trial had not secured for the defendant a fair trial. This Petition stated no more than they believed that the man now lying in penal servitude was innocent of the offences for which he was convicted, and, looking at the circumstances of that trial, such a statement was equivalent to the gravest and most specific charge of dereliction of duty on the part of those who were responsible to the country for originating and conducting that trial. What were those circumstances, and who were the persons or authorities responsible for that unprecedented trial? First, and in the highest degree, the House was responsible, and he laid stress upon this in order that the House might understand why it was that the vast sympathy which the people exhibited in public meeting and otherwise for the convict did not expose itself to insult and ridicule by open expression in the House. The late Attorney General, Sir John, now Lord, Coleridge, was counsel in the civil action which had terminated, not as was generally supposed, in a verdict against the Claimant, but in a non-suit. Notwithstanding that fact, however, the same hon. and learned Gentleman had taken the extraordinary course of having the defendant arrested and lodged in Newgate on a charge of perjury, and that without preliminary investigation; and, at the same time, with the leave of the House, he undertook to conduct and to pay the expenses of that prosecution. Subsequently, however, the hon. and learned Gentleman admitted the partiality, impropriety, and rashness of his proceedings by withdrawing from further connection with the matter. When called upon, however, to give an explanation of his conduct in the House, he declined to do so, throwing the responsibility upon the then Chancellor of the Exchequer and Home Secretary. He (Mr. Whalley) then applied to the then Chancellor of the Exchequer for the expenses of the defendant's witnesses, which he would be entitled to had he been examined before a magistrate; but the right hon. Gentleman referred him to the public, stating that the sympathizers with the defendant would, doubtless, find the money for his defence. That was, as he stated at the time, an outrage upon the course of proceeding and an insult to the administration of justice. At that time no less than £3,000 had been subscribed out of the pence of the working classes to enable the friends of the defendant to obtain his release from Newgate. It was necessary, in order to act as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had advised, by appealing to the public, to make explanations to them, and, accordingly, his friend, Mr. Guildford Onslow and himself held meetings for the purpose. They found, however, that upon an ex parte statement, Mr. Hawkins, instructed by the Government, had obtained their conviction for contempt of Court for addressing a public meeting in St. James's Hall before the trial. They attended the Court of Queen's Bench not to defend themselves, because they were advised that if they did it would be considered an aggravation of the offence alleged against them. The result was they escaped with the small and comparatively merciful penalty of £100 fine each. It was all very well to call the numbers of people throughout the country who believed that this man had not had a fair trial deluded and ignorant, and to characterize them as fools and fanatics. But the man had no means of defending himself, for ever since the death of his mother he had been utterly penniless, depending for his support entirely on subscriptions from the public, while he had been deprived of the aid and the protection of the law by the act of the Attorney General. His (Mr. Whalley's) own conduct in the matter had been regulated by his sense of public duty; he had declined to permit his fine to be paid by public subscription, and he could assure the House that it should never hear a complaint from his lips with regard to his own personal grievances. The question was, had or had not this man a fair trial? and it was one that was being asked by the whole English-speaking race. He knew of his own knowledge that upwards of 200 witnesses in this man's favour were unable to be called for want of funds. Yet the House stood by when men were sent to prison, and fined for their honest efforts to provide for him the means of defence of which he was so deprived, with the direct cognizance and consent of this House. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) demanded that this question—those charges against all concerned in this trial—should again be brought before this House, and the hon. Member for Stoke was severely censured by him for his delay in doing so. Until last night he (Mr. Whalley) shared the opinion that the hon. Member for Stoke should forthwith bring before the House the grounds upon which, with such extraordinary success, he had aroused the country to a sense of the injustice of this Tichborne trial; but that discussion and its result brought out plainly the fact this House was at present in no condition to do justice either to itself or to the question, and whether by reason of its sense of responsibility for any miscarriage of justice and waste of public money, or for any other inscrutable reason, social or political it mattered not, he could not but feel that the national scandal which that trial presented to the whole world would be greatly aggravated by any such action as would assuredly be taken at the instance of the hon. Member for Stoke. Could the House itself believe that it was at present in a fit state of mind, or adequately informed to enable it to discharge in the presence of that country and of the world the high judicial function of which it now demanded the exercise? Could it believe that when discussing the merits of a Petition, Member after Member, without a single exception, pledged himself, whatever his opinion on other matters, to the view that the petitioners and all others who believed that the defendant had not a fair trial were the fools and fanatics, the deluded, uneducated, and ignorant mass of humanity as described? Could that House desire to exhibit itself before the world, deciding in that temper and spirit upon questions involving the liberty of an individual and the gravest questions which for centuries had arisen upon the administration of justice? Was it not enough that they should have been for seven or eight years the ridicule of all who ever heard of the Tichborne Claimant; that either they could not punish an impostor, or that they would not do justice? He was not in the councils of the hon. Member for Stoke. He and the hon. Member for Stoke formed something like a party in that House, for they seemed to be the only Members in the House who believed that the Claimant was the true man, or even that he had not had a perfectly fair trial; for if there were any other Members sharing their opinions, surely under such stress as they were subjected to, they would have the manliness to step forward to their help against the overwhelming torrent of abuse and obloquy to which he, for a long time alone, and now the hon. Member for Stoke, were exposed. It had been generally accepted that there must be in this Tichborne Case a conspiracy on the one side or the other. He could assure the House that there was no conspiracy; no, not even combination or concert, between the hon. Member for Stoke and himself. Until last night he had but once seen or communicated with the hon. Member since he first entered the House, and he had no part in his public meetings, nor was he in any sense whatever responsible for his public writings or speeches, and he shared the opinion that he should not defer bringing the whole question before the House. For himself he had been a Member of the House for 23 years, and he trusted that nothing would occur to lessen the respect and the veneration he had always felt and manifested towards it; but after what occurred yesterday, he asked himself to what avail would it be, or what other result than to place this House in direct antagonism with so vast an amount of honest, earnest, patriotic sentiment throughout the country, and also with the common sense and the traditional respect, at home and throughout the world, which had so long been the heritage of their Courts of Justice. He was, therefore, of opinion that the hon. Member for Stoke had consulted the dignity of the House in declining to bring forward his Motion until a sufficient number of Petitions had been presented to educate the House on this question. He had been in America and in other countries on this subject, and he could assure hon. Members that this Tichborne Case—ignore it as they might—had attracted very considerable notice throughout the English-speaking world, and he lamented that it should be debated by the House in the temper which he had regretted to see manifested on a recent occasion. The jury never decided the question of his guilt or innocence at all; and therefore if the question were to be considered from that point of view, the case was entitled to the greatest consideration from the House. It was impossible to deny the assertion so often made that he had not had a fair trial; but he was sorry to say that from the present temper of the House he feared the question would not, or could not, be properly dealt with. There was, undoubtedly, a strong and growing feeling that the man was Tichborne; but, apart from that, there was a conviction that he had not had all the advantages in the way of defence which he ought to have had. The Lord Chief Justice himself had said there were grave doubts in the case; and on several occasions, addressing the defendant's counsel, he asked—“Have you considered what a disastrous effect, socially and morally, would follow if, after all that we have heard from these lords and ladies and gentlemen to the effect that he is not Tichborne, the jury should find that he is?”

MR. BULWER asked the hon. Member from what part of the Lord Chief Justice's Charge he had been quoting?

MR. WHALLEY replied, that he had not spoken of the Charge; but had said that the Lord Chief Justice on more than one occasion addressed the defendant's counsel in language to that effect. In conclusion, he would make an appeal to Her Majesty's Government to devise some way to get out of the difficulty in which the question was now placed. If the object of those who demanded further discussion was to arrive at the truth of the case, that could best be done by a Select Committee, or by a Royal Commission, as prayed for in the Petition, and the Prime Minister knew how to set in motion such an inquiry. He knew also how to stop it when it was set in motion; for taking out of his (Mr. Whalley's) hands the appointment of a Committee on this subject last Session, the right hon. Gentleman did himself personally superintend the proceedings of that Committee; and when he (Mr. Whalley) brought before them charges and imputations against the Judges, as strong and specific as in the Petition they yesterday rejected, and offered to establish them, the right hon. Gentleman deemed it best for the Judges and for the credit of the administration of justice to stop the inquiry, and to cover up still more effectually the scandal, he did himself propose a complimentary addendum to the Report in favour of the Lord Chief Justice. Nor could that House say they had had no opportunity of discussing and repudiating those charges against the Judges, for he (Mr. Whalley) did himself attempt to raise such discussion. He read the Petition of his constituents, stronger in terms than that of Prittlewell, and after various devices resorted to by the friends, he presumed, of the Lord Chief Justice, the Government and the Opposition combined to count out the House. He, for one, was not afraid of inquiry or discussion, and he repeated what he stated last night—that if the Prime Minister would again appoint a Committee, he (Mr. Whalley) would, if permitted, substantiate the statements in the Petition of his constituents, substantially the same as those of the Prittlewell Petition; but if, on the other hand, the object of demanding further discussion was to discourage, by the expression of opinion by hon. Members here, the action of the public out-of-doors, he was disposed to believe that the hon. Member for Stoke exercised a sound discretion, and that it was alike for the interest of the public and for the credit of that House and for the honour of the country, that that question should not be submitted to so prejudiced and heated a tribunal until it should have been further ventilated in public meetings. He had, however, attended no meetings, and was not responsible for the action of the hon. Member for Stoke. With reference to the evidence given before the Committee of last year, he would say that if there ever was a man who deserved to be disbarred, it was Mr. Hawkins. Ladies of rank in the neighbourhood of the Tichborne estate were prevented from giving evidence by his scandalous abuse of forensic licence. The Home Secretary had refused to attend to affidavits which he had placed before him, and the Secretary of the Treasury had declined to give explanations with regard to the £55,000 paid for the expenses of the prosecution. As he had said, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer had advised him, if he wished to raise funds for the Claimant's defence, to go about the country and solicit subscriptions. He did so, and he should be prepared, if necessary, to resume what had been termed his "mountebank operations," and to support the hon. Member for Stoke in his fearless agitation of this question, for the sake not merely of the Claimant, but of others who might be suffering from a miscarriage of justice. In two cases, he himself had at the last moment saved men from being hanged in consequence of a miscarriage of justice. He had now fulfilled his duty, and would only urge the House to grant the prayer of the Petition to which he had the honour of calling their attention, that they would recommend Her Majesty to grant a free pardon, or that there might, at all events, be a full investigation of all the circumstances of the case.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that, as he was specially responsible for the advice which must be tendered to Her Majesty in all cases where persons were convicted of crime, he hoped the House would allow him to say a few words on this subject. It was not his intention, however, to follow the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) in all the matters he had laid before the House on the present occasion. The hon. Member had undertaken to call attention to a Petition signed by Anthony Biddulph and others, praying for the pardon of Castro alias Tichborne. Now, although the House rejected a Petition last night on one particular ground, it had shown by the expression of opinion it then made that it would not too nicely scrutinize the language in which Petitions were couched when it related to a grievance which ought to be brought under the notice of the House. With regard to the Petition now before the House, he had no objection to make to one part of its prayer; but he had an objection to make to the speech of the hon. Member for Peterborough, because, although the hon. Gentleman had undertaken to call attention to the Petition, he had not alluded to a single paragraph in it, and none of the allegations made by the hon. Gentleman as to this trial were to be found in the Petition, from one end to the other. The hon. Member opposite had entered into the question of the origin of the prosecution by the late Attorney General, to the trial before the late Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, to the Government payment of expenses, and to the fact that the expenses of witnesses for the defence, though promised by the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, were not paid—although a large sum had been paid to the witnesses for the defence. The hon. Member also said he was told by the Government that he must go about the country, and that because he did so he was convicted in his absence for contempt of Court, and he and Mr. Onslow were punished for doing what they believed to be their duty. There was not a single word about these matters in the Petition. What the Petitioners did refer to was this. They stated a number of facts, or rather, alleged facts, and they said—"If facts like these should tell in the defendant's favour, they ought to be preferred to mere probabilities which tell against him." In effect they said—"If the law of evidence had been entirely changed and hearsay evidence admitted, the result might probably have been different." The Petitioners said—"The facts now mentioned by your Petitioners are only a few out of many which have come to light since the trial;" and then they proceeded to

"Pray your honourable House to advise Her Majesty to grant the defendant a free pardon, or, in the event of your feeling that you cannot accept all these statements as true merely on the assertion of your Petitioners, that you will advise Her Majesty to appoint, without delay, a Royal Commission to inquire into their truth."

For his own part, he strongly objected to a Petition praying that a Royal Commission should be appointed for the purpose of re-trying a case which had been heard by a Judge and jury. It was a proposition that could not be acceded to on any grounds. The hon. Member for Peterborough said that this case had not been tried by a jury, and that trial by jury was never intended to apply to a case extending over many months. Did the hon. Member think a Royal Commission would be much better? If the complaint were that the defendant had not been pardoned, he (Mr. Cross), and he alone, was responsible for the advice he had tendered to Her Majesty in this matter, and his hon. Friend knew perfectly well what course of action ought to be taken if, in the opinion of the House, he was wrong in giving that advice. He had paid attention to every Petition which had been presented in reference to this case. The hon. Member had stated that the defendant had not been treated in some particulars like other prisoners; but he (Mr. Cross) had invariably given directions that no difference should be made for or against that man in any shape, and that he should be treated in precisely the same way as other prisoners. If, on the other hand, the complaint was that there had not been a fair trial in the case, that the Judges and jury had been corrupt—that the Judges should be removed on account of the way in which the case was conducted—then, again, the remedy was plain. That House had stated that it would receive Petitions for an Address to the Crown to remove Judges; but he was bound to say that no Judges ought to be called upon to sit on the Bench and go on day after day administering justice while charges of the gravest possible description were hanging over their heads. It was our duty, if we had a charge against a Judge or any other person, to bring forward that charge directly with all our force—just as in a case of Privilege in that House, there must be no delay in bringing forward the case. He (Mr. Cross) must demand from the hon. Member for Stoke, if he meant to proceed with his Motion, that it be brought on immediately. He appealed to both sides of the House whether it was not the positive duty of the hon. Member for Stoke, if he was not prepared to proceed with that Motion, to take it at once off the Order Book of the House. The hon. Member said he was not prepared, because he had not got Petitions in his favour; but he had no right to leave his Motion on the Order Book until he got Petitions. He ought to know that it was his bounden duty to take it off. If, eventually, he got Petitions, he knew perfectly well that he had the power of putting it on the Order Book again. He (Mr. Cross) maintained it was due to those eminent Judges who had fairly and uprightly tried this case, in whose honesty, fairness, and purity, he believed most heartily, and who deserved and, he believed, had the perfect confidence of the country, that the Motion should not be allowed to remain on the Order Book of the House, unless the hon. Member was prepared at once to follow it up. He did not think that he ought at the present moment to detain the House further, except to say that, if the hon. Member for Peterborough thought he (Mr. Cross) was wrong in having advised the Crown that a free pardon should not be granted in this case, he was perfectly ready at any time to be answerable for his conduct to the House if the hon. Member chose to bring it before the House.

DR. KENEALY: Sir, when I came down to this House this evening I did not intend to speak upon this question. I had not read the Petition which was presented by my hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley), and it was only a few minutes before he brought on this Motion that I was first favoured with a view of it. I do not think it is a Petition that I could have laid great stress upon, and I candidly admit that it is open to some of the objections which have been raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary. Nevertheless, this House has never been too technically fastidious about the language of Petitions, and I hope it never will be, because Petitions are the expression of the wishes of the common people, who are accustomed to express themselves in common language, and who should not be required to get a special pleader to draw them up. Now, Sir, the plain aspect of this country upon the unhappy Tichborne Case is perfectly unparalleled in the annals of our history. There is no more law-abiding people in the world than the English nation. There is no other nation in the world that from long custom and from family recollections have a greater respect for the Bench than they have; but when we find millions of our English fellow-people, actuated by one strong and powerful impression that justice has failed to be performed at a late trial, certainly I think the matter deserves our most earnest attention. A statesman would look upon the present circumstances of our country with very great care. I have gone through the length and breadth of this land, through England, Wales, and Scotland—I have been summoned to various large localities, not by any desire or action of my own, but on requisitions made to me signed by thousands and thousands of people, all of which have been couched in nearly the same language calling upon me—[“Speak out!”] I would speak louder if I was able; but, unfortunately, I am not able. [“Oh, oh!” and “Order!”] My object must be to make myself heard by as many of you as there are here, and if I fail that must be my misfortune, not my fault. That language conveys only one universal idea on the part of the thousands of signers, that there has been a failure of justice in the late trial, that that unhappy man whose life has exercised the curiosity of the world for so many years has somehow or other been dealt differently with from all other prisoners that have been tried within human recollection. With regard to this point, I am sure a statesman might very well pause before he ventured to taunt the great common people with such opprobrious epithets of contumely and contempt as have been lavished upon our countrymen of late. If they are under a delusion, it is a delusion shared in by millions, and one that no statesman ought to pass by or can afford to despise. The more they are immersed in clouds of delusion, if they be ignorant and infatuated, as is falsely pretended, the more likely is their delusion to end in a terrible way. Therefore I say that to treat them as scoundrels and to treat them with scorn, is undoubtedly not the right way to deal with that large and mighty section of Englishmen. I have gone amongst these people. I have conversed with them. I have addressed them, and I have seen women weep, and tears in strong men’s eyes as they talked of that terrible trial. [Laughter.] Gentlemen may laugh, but it is true.

I have seen such feeling pervading thousands of the masses as I have read have pervaded the masses previously to a revolutionary outbreak. I honestly and firmly believe that if one half the Members of this House could bring themselves to realize the spectacles that I have observed in the greatest centres of industry in England and Wales and Scotland, they would hesitate a very long time before they persevered in the course on which they now seem desperately bent. Gentlemen—[“Order, order!”]—I humbly beg pardon. I do hope the House will make allowance for a new Member. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department has very pointedly addressed me to-night upon the question of the Motion which stands in my name. I did not have an opportunity last night of explaining fully to the House the reasons that persuade me that I ought as much in justice to the unhappy man whose claim I advocate as in justice to the House itself to postpone that Motion; and I certainly did not think when I sat down, without any opportunity of reply, that I should have been made the subject of so cruel and ungenerous an attack as was made upon me by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham. The right hon. Gentleman made an allusion to my character as if it were a bad one. [Mr. BRIGHT: You are mistaken.] I am glad to hear that I misunderstood the right hon. Gentleman, and will at once retract the observation I made; for, to some extent, the right hon. Gentleman is deserving of gratitude at my hands. The House will remember that on the second night when I entered this House I gave Notice of my Motion. Everybody who knows me knows that I am not a man to give a Notice which I did not mean to follow up. I very soon saw, however, that for reasons which I could not and cannot understand, I was treated as a sort of Pariah or outcast in this House. I am not ashamed to say that I stand on an equality as regards honour with any man in this House, and therefore I do not deny that I felt most keenly the treatment which I thought so ill-deserved. No man has undergone a more terrific ordeal of revengeful punishment than I have. I have been expelled from my profession—turned out of it, as if I had been guilty of crime. I have been ruined at a time when I have no means of recommencing another profession, and that solely on the ground, as was alleged by my persecutors, that I was connected with a newspaper which they do not admire. Upon my professional honour in the course of the trial my bitterest enemy had not dared to lay his hand; and I may well complain that for an offence which I consider no offence at all I have been driven an outcast from society—I will not say in my old age, but at a time when it is impossible to recommence life. Sir, I saw the feeling against me that pervaded this House when I entered it, and there was a full and mighty manifestation of the same feeling last night. I had not been more than two or three days in this House when the hon. and learned Member for Poole (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) denounced me before his constituents as a man guilty of the basest crime, as one who had called a witness whom I knew to be false, and then I demanded redress from the House, and you know what I received. Again, a fortnight or so ago two hon. Members got up at one of their farmers' dinners in Stafford, and one of them said that I was in the House of Commons, but that I was such a character that I would not be admitted into any London Club. Another hon. and learned Gentleman, a member of my own former circuit, said that I was expelled from the Bar, because I was a disgrace to it. If I or those who may be said to represent my views are a little intemperate when language of that kind is used with reference to me, I think some little consideration might be shown me, bearing in mind that I never alluded to one of those three hon. Members in my life so as to justify them in dragging me before the public as they did. Last night an hon. Gentleman whom I never saw before got up publicly in this House of Commons, and charged me with going about the country diffusing palpable lies, and no hon. Member called him to Order for it. I sat and listened to it with silent scorn. You, Sir, of course, as the guardian of the dignity of this House, felt it your duty to do so, and the hon. Member retracted, but did not apologize. With insults such as these heaped upon my head without any provocation—[“Oh, oh,” and Laughter—with insults such as these, sanctioned and re-echoed as it were by Gentlemen such as are now applauding these sentiments from day to day, how can it be expected but that I should make some sort of reply? Why should I be taunted because I do not bring this unhappy man's case before this Assembly? If I do not receive common justice from some hon. Members here, how can I expect this man, against whom a lowering crowd of prejudice presses, will receive justice when I simply advocate his cause? It is not merely for my own sake, but his, that I postponed that Motion. I entered this House with the greatest reverence and veneration for all its ancient traditions of glory and honour. I am anxious that there should be no impairment of those illustrious traditions; but if I bring that man's case now before this Assembly, which I hope will pardon me for saying is prejudiced and prejudging, what will be the inevitable result? Why, that I should make a lamentable failure. As far as I know, I can never twice bring before the House the particular Motion which I mean to place before it. [Mr. BRIGHT: Not in the same Session.] The right hon. Gentleman tells me, not in the same Session; but with the greatest respect and deference to him, I fancy if he knew what my Motion was, he would not doubt the observation which I have made. I myself feel confident that I never can bring it forward a second time, and if I cannot do so, what a terrible load of responsibility will be upon me! Should I then depart from that which, in my own conscience, I believe best for the man, and lose a chance which once lost is lost for ever? I feel confident I shall be beaten. I feel equally confident that the people of England will not accept that defeat. But I feel as sure as that I stand in the presence of this illustrious Assembly that the morning that follows the rejection of my Motion will carry dismay through England. [Ironical cheers and laughter.] Sir, Nero fiddled while Rome was burning, and I have heard and read of statesmen who danced upon volcanoes. I know there is a volcano in this Kingdom which may merge it at any moment in utter fire and ruin. Therefore I repeat what I said, that the morning which follows the rejection of my Motion will carry dismay and rage throughout the United Kingdom. What will be the result of that dismay and rage? Will it be to elevate the character of this great Assembly in public opinion? Will not the great masses of our countrymen say that, as the Court of Queen's Bench, which tried this man, prejudged his case, so the House of Commons prejudged his case also, and I do not envy those hon. Members who are chary, and rightly chary, of the glory and honour of this House, if they are prepared to accept an alternative such as that. I can tell them it is perfectly sure to come. I can tell the House that upon this subject the people of England are determined and serious beyond all other subjects that ever I saw; and if I am appealed to by thousands and thousands of our countrymen, if I am summoned by requisition to all the great centres of industry in this Kingdom, I shall be compelled to tell them the reception that I have met with here. I shall be compelled to give them my real opinion, that this House met to adjudicate upon a case which it was determined to reject; that this House had apparently set its mind, and was determined to listen to no reason, no argument, but was resolved to let a prisoner die in Dartmoor without redress. I may be wrong in that impression; but the result of the debate on my Motion will make the world know whether I am right or wrong. If, under these circumstances, the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary and the statesmen near him think that the honour and reputation of this House will be sustained by my bringing on that Motion, I am ready to bring it on whenever they please; I am as prepared now as I was on the second day of my entrance; but I respectfully warn hon. Members to beware of the consequences of its rejection. ["Oh, oh," and Laughter.] They may laugh, they may sneer—[Increased laughter—they may indulge in such an ebullition of feeling as they now exhibit, but I wash my hands of the consequences. I shall now address myself to the Petition before the House. Paragraph No. 3 says the Lord Chief Justice testified that most of the witnesses were respectable people, and so forth. With respect to that, it is contrary to true law—not sham law or Judge-made law—that the Judges should give suggestions to the jury on evidence. It is a maxim as old as Magna Charta that the jury shall act on matters of fact, and the Judges on matters of law. When a

Judge goes beyond that, he travels out of his province and usurps the province of the jury. If, therefore, it be substantiated before a Commission or any other tribunal that the learned Lord Chief Justice has, in this case, mainly relied upon supposition and hypothesis, I say that that alone justifies the interference of the Home Secretary. I want, therefore, to know if the right hon. Gentleman thinks this case differs from others, when, upon information received subsequently to conviction, he has become persuaded there has been a failure of justice and advised the Crown to remit the sentence. All I ask of him in the present instance is, that he should set his mind to think if it is possible that so many millions of the people of England can be mistaken in their views of the case, and if it would not be advisable for him seriously, cautiously, and carefully to investigate, with the view that he may at once satisfy his own conscience, and at the same time satisfy the reason and judgment of so many millions of his fellow-countrymen. The people of this country are not the only people who are dissatisfied with the result of this trial. The people of Germany almost unanimously believe that the Claimant has not had a fair trial. This fact is one of great concern, for in all matters of jurisprudence there are no people more competent to give a reliable opinion than the people of the great Teutonic nations. If they then have made up their mind that justice has not been done, it is a serious matter to take into consideration. A short time since the Countess De Civry was brought to trial, and after careful investigation, convicted by a jury, but subsequently the right hon. Gentleman became convinced that that lady had been wrongly convicted, and advised Her Majesty to grant her a free pardon. If then a jury such as that—for nowhere can you get better juries than in the City of London—was wrongly convicted after an investigation of only 24 hours, the right hon. Gentleman can hardly with much force throw in my teeth the verdict of the jury in the case to which this Petition refers. The 8th section of the Petition states that 18 witnesses were examined at the trial who swore that they saw and knew both Orton and Castro in Australia, and that they were distinct individuals, while only one witness was examined to prove that Orton and Castro were one and the same person, and that since the trial that witness has been convicted of bigamy and sentenced to six months' imprisonment. I always understood that the sentence passed upon that man was one of 12 months' imprisonment, and therefore I am surprised at this allegation in the Petition, that the sentence was only for six months; but the mistake is probably owing to the fact that the right hon. Gentleman, for some reasons which have not been made known, has remitted one-half the man's penalty. Another witness from Australia who swore that Orton and Castro were the same is Mrs. Jury, and she has since been convicted of robbery and sentenced to six months' imprisonment. Here we have two important facts stated—that two of the most important witnesses for the prosecution, and who were complimented both by the counsel for the prosecution and by the Lord Chief Justice as witnesses of value and respectability, have turned out to be fit occupants of one of Her Majesty's gaols. I would have thought that facts like these would have weighed with the Home Secretary, who has had more judicial training and more legal training, as everyone who has read his excellent book on law must be constrained to admit, than any of his predecessors in that high office. The 15th paragraph of this Petition states that Dr. Wheeler, a surgeon in the Navy, who was absent from this country at the time of the trial, has made an affidavit that he knew both Castro and Orton; that the latter wore earrings and was pockmarked, and that he admitted he was a ticket-of-leave man, and had been convicted of horse-stealing, thus confirming an important part of the evidence. Again, it states that it has been sworn that at the age of 18 Orton was 5 feet 9 inches high, while the prisoner is only 5 feet 9 inches at the present time. The 24th paragraph of the Petition is the only other portion of it to which I would now refer. The great and powerful point laid hold of by the prosecution was that no man of the Osprey ever turned up to confirm the story told by the Claimant; but it was most conclusively proved that a ship called the Osprey did bring a shipwrecked crew into the port of Melbourne, and it is just as reasonable we should doubt the existence of the Bella, because no person connected with that vessel had turned up, as that we should doubt the existence of the Osprey. In conclusion, I have to thank the House for the attention with which it has listened to me, and I most cordially join in the prayer of the Petition, that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary will either himself re-consider the case, or else issue a Commission to ascertain if the country has been guilty of the awful crime of punishing an innocent man. I am certain that if he can bring his mind to the conclusion that this is a matter for deep and serious investigation, and that if after going through that investigation he comes to the conclusion that justice has not been done, he will release this man, he will do an act which will crown his name with honour, not only in the present, but in the future, and which will earn him an undying title to the regard of his fellow-countrymen such as no other statesman ever enjoyed.

MR. BRIGHT: Perhaps, Sir, I may be allowed to make a little explanation. The hon. Member for Stoke has used language which showed that he had been somewhat pained by the observations I made last night. I observed to him at the time, sitting close to him, that he was entirely mistaken in the impression he had formed of what I said; but another hon. Member of the House has since told me that, having read one of the reports in the papers, he had come to the same conclusion. I have not read any of the reports, and do not know exactly what the error was; but what I intended to say last night was this: that if a Member of this House had made charges—and I refer to charges like those made by the hon. Member, and embodied in these Petitions, against the Judges—had brought forward a Motion and postponed it from day to day, and had given no intimation of when he intended to bring it forward, that, in the interim, by the various means at his disposal or supposed to be, he was exciting strong feelings amongst the public, or a portion of the public calculated, as I said, to destroy their confidence in the administration of justice, which I hold to be a great misfortune, and he failed to bring forward proofs and refused to substantiate charges, then in that case he himself would be guilty of conduct not less criminal than that which he charged upon the Judges. Now, Sir, up to this time, if the hon. Member were now to fix a day for his Motion I should not condemn him for having for a very undue period put off the proof which he has offered to the House; but, if it is deferred, I think I am entitled to say that the hon. Member is not doing that which he can reconcile or commend to himself, and I am sure he is not doing that which will be commended by the great body of his countrymen. Now, I have not—I take the House to witness if I have—said a word against the hon. Member for Stoke. I am conscious, as he is conscious, that he came into this House, and has been in it under unusual difficulty, and I have felt that it was my duty, as it was entirely my inclination, to greet him with all the respect that is due to the Representative of a great constituency and a Member of this Parliament. Sir, the hon. Member has moved a little, as I think, in his observations, from the position which the House understood him to occupy last night in this way. He has conveyed to the House to-night that his Motion would be directed especially to the case of the person whom he defended in the late trial, and that his object would be to induce the House to induce the Government to take some steps for re-trying the case, or for liberating the convict from his confinement. If that is all, it would not matter very much whether the Motion was brought on now or a month hence. [Dr. KENEALY: I was only referring to the present Petition.] I beg pardon; what I said was based upon the postponement of the original Motion. All I am urging is the great harm done to the public and the great injustice done to the Judges, if the charges against them are insisted upon, should an unnecessary delay be allowed to take place before an attempt is made to substantiate the charges. Now, I must beg the hon. Gentleman and the House to recollect, what he must be conscious of, that, whatever these charges are, whether they are true or false, they can receive no kind of support, by way of evidence, from the Petitions which will be presented. The Petitions may come in in great numbers, they may show the strength, or it may be the universality of the belief that the charges are true, but the House, when it comes to decide the question, will not decide upon the averments in the Petition, or of the belief of the petitioners, but upon its own consciousness of what is right and just, having heard the statement of the hon. Member and of any others who may support him, and the statements of other hon. Members which may be made in opposition to his case. Therefore, so far as the charges against the Judges go, the fact of the Petitions not being presented which may be expected—it may be during the next three months—is no kind of answer to the claim that the charges should be proceeded with and the question be determined. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary in his speech to-night has made an appeal, as I made an appeal, to the hon. Member for Stoke, urging that this question of the character of the Judges should be brought to issue at some early period, and I will ask the right hon. Gentleman if he cannot undertake to say that an early day, whatever day may be convenient to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Stoke, the Government would give him one of their days, in order to discuss what he may be prepared to bring forward. I tell the hon. Member with the greatest sincerity—and I hope he will believe it—that I make this appeal to him with no feeling of opposition to him, or with the view of putting any difficulty in his path in regard to anything that is honest and right, but it is because I am sure that in all parts of the country where statements that I think are incorrect, and unjust, and exaggerated to an extraordinary and incredible degree, are made to thousands of persons who have no fair opportunity of correcting them from their own investigation and their own knowledge, a great and real injury is inflicted upon the Commonwealth. The hon. Gentleman is not callous—he cannot be callous to the appeals which are made to him in this House to bring forward the Motion which stands in his name on the Paper. His speech to-night has been one which must show to the House how much it might gain if the hon. Gentleman abstained from some things which we think extravagant and ill-advised, and devoted himself to the public service and the service of his constituents as a Member of this House. His speech is one to which I have listened with great interest, and it only leads me to lament the more the course which he has taken under the aggravation to which he points, an aggravation which will justify great allowance for him. I say I am only sorry that he should not be able to get rid of, if it were possible, the sense of injury under which he acts, and become one of the 650 Members of this House who in the main, I believe, are honestly endeavouring to do their duty to those who send them here and to the country at large.

MR. WADDY said, he should be one of the last persons in that House to complain of the good faith or of the good intentions of the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley), or, in some respects, perhaps, even of the hon. Member for Stoke; but when the hon. Gentleman complained of his treatment in that House, and described himself as a martyr or a Pariah, he (Mr. Waddy) desired to state broadly and boldly, and in the most uncompromising manner, that the treatment which he had received was far kinder than he had any right to expect, considering the language to which he had committed himself with regard to that House before he came into it. There was a Paper pretty well known with which the hon. Member's name was indissolubly connected; and sooner or later it might perhaps be the duty of some hon. Member to ask the hon. Member for Stoke, whether it was with or without his consent that, week after week, it was publicly stated that The Englishman was edited by himself, and whether or not it was true that a paper containing the most scandalous statements with regard to hon. Members of that House and which bore his name was, in reality, edited by a Member of the British House of Commons? It was all very well in the presence of the Speaker to speak "with bated breath" and in reverential terms of that House. Of course, one would not pretend to doubt the perfect sincerity of the expressions now used; but what was the language published in connection with his name a short time before he entered the House? In a letter stated to have been addressed by himself to the people of Manchester, and signed Edward Vaughan Kenealy, there occurred this passage—

"We have no man in Parliament with courage enough or knowledge enough to meet the Speaker when he dares to say that he will not receive the Petitions of the people. We have no man to complain of the violated laws and outraged institutions of our once free country. Everything in that House and in the newspaper Press savours of falsehood, bribery, servility, and corruption, and I can hardly conceive any great nation that has sunk into a more degraded condition than we have. To stem this torrent which seems likely to sweep us all away headlong is the object which I have now in view. I wish to arouse the whole Kingdom to a just indignation at the conduct of the three Judges, of Cross, and of Brand the Speaker. I wish to test whether the old English spirit still survives."

On the same page the House of Commons was spoken of as—"A House of corruption, bowing down like a body of footmen, or spaniels, or beaten, frightened curs before Speaker Brand, when he dared to refuse Petitions from Englishmen, contrary to the Bill of Rights and all our ancient laws from time immemorial."

He (Mr. Waddy) ventured to think it was not with the best possible grace that the man whose hand, at all events, presumably, penned those passages should come to that House two or three weeks afterwards and complain that Members were not over anxious to associate with him. Still, let it be said that when any hon. Member came into that House, however far he might have forgotten himself before, it was their duty and their practice, until he challenged their memory, to try and forget what he might have said before his election. Therefore, with that reminder of what might have slipped the hon. Member's recollection, he passed to the Petition he wished them to deal with. It was a Petition, the purport of which was that a man who, on the statement of his own case, was disbelieved by one jury—and, on the statement of the case against him, was convicted by another jury—who, on the statement of his own counsel, was a man whose imposture, assuming it to have been one, was almost the most venial part of his character—that that man having been at last safely committed to prison, the House ought to be called upon to recommend Her Majesty to let him loose on society. Not that there had been any slip or mistake in the trial, but that, without any fresh trial, that man should be pardoned and released, for some reason which he had not yet been able thoroughly to comprehend. The only reason given for it that night was the somewhat strange one from the logical mind of the hon. Member for Peterborough, that the man should not have been convicted, because his trial took so long a time. According to that argument, no criminal, however vile or guilty, if he could call one or two hundred witnesses, could ever be convicted, because his trial would last so long. Those who, for reasons best known to themselves, had been agitating the country, could not have a bond fide expectation that that sentence would be reversed without rhyme or reason. The hon. Member for Peterborough told them the House was responsible for the excitement and the uncomfortable feeling abroad in the country in regard to the convict Orton; while the hon. Member for Stoke said there was a flame in the country which they ought to take care not to spread. Did that language come well from the lips of the firebrand, and were they to be asked to do what they verily believed to be contrary to justice, in order that the flame, which he had done his best to kindle, might be allayed? [Cheers. Mr. WHALLEY: Oh, oh!] He was delighted to find there was actually one man besides the hon. Member for Stoke who disagreed with him (Mr. Waddy); but he was also delighted that the majority of Members of that House would agree in opinion as to who was chiefly responsible for setting the country aflame. Somebody was to blame for this, and the man was he whose voice they had heard in the House that evening; because for a long time past, by such means as he had already mentioned, that man had been permitted, unfortunately without contradiction, to set on foot and keep on foot throughout the length and breadth of the land a system of mis-statements, exaggerations, and slanders that was perfectly shocking to every right-minded person. [Mr. WHALLEY: What are they?] He had not the slightest objection to describe them, though if he did not feel that the matter was becoming too serious to be laughed down, he would not help to give notoriety to the slander, ribaldry, and rubbish which were to be found in that wretched publication. Was it a right thing that there should be published from week to week a print in which the Judges of the land, the Speaker of the House, hon. Members on both sides, anybody and everybody who did not happen to take the fancy or suit the taste of one particular person, should be constantly slandered in the most vulgar, scurrilous, and defamatory style? [Mr. WHALLEY: Why do you not prosecute him?] That was not a question for him (Mr. Waddy) to answer, but if the hon. Member only exercised ordinary patience he would find that he was going to ask it. If he were asked to say how this excitement and confusion were produced in this country he would direct attention to this notice in The Englishman—

“Let no time, therefore, be lost in organizing the great Hyde Park demonstration, and the meeting of delegates. Let not an hour be wasted in preparing and signing Petitions.”

In the same print, a late Member of that House, now one of Her Majesty's Judges was constantly called by a nickname that was intended as an imputation of fraud and forgery; three of Her Majesty's Judges were almost incessantly defamed; Her Majesty's Solicitor General was treated with contumely and insult; the right hon. Gentleman who had spoken last was treated in the same style, and, indeed, no reputation was sacred enough to be respected. While all that went on unchecked, no wonder there were confusion and trouble in the country. He had said almost everybody was defamed; but he must do stern and strict justice. There was one remarkable exception. The volume he held in his hand, which would appear to be written by one person, contained the following:—

“A man so highly gifted, and uniting in himself numerous accomplishments of the highest order, to an undaunted courage and a generous philanthropic disposition, will not find his equal in the whole of that Assembly at St. Stephen's. Deeply learned in the knowledge of the Constitution, it will be hard to point out a rival to him in this respect; experienced as a lawyer, he has taken the highest honours of the Bar; as an orator, impartial scholars have pronounced passages in his ever memorable speeches during the great trial to be equal in sublimity of thought and refinement of expression to the loftiest efforts of Burke or Chatham; as an editor, by the very power of his name, he has obtained such a circulation for his journal as was never before attained in the same space of time; as a poet, he has supplied materials for the productions of a whole host of fledglings that now appear among us; as a linguist, it would form a long list only to mention the names of the languages he is the complete master of. To write a most beautiful stanza in English, to translate it into Welsh, Irish, French, Latin, Greek, and Hindustanee, is to Dr. Kenealy one of the easiest of all tasks. Most of the editors of the daily papers would be inflated with unendurable conceit if they only knew as much of literature as the learned doctor has forgotten—the very remnants of his garments would make them a splendid suit of clothes in comparison with which their present attire would seem beg-gaily. Such is the man, then, those noble Englishmen have returned for Stoke-upon-Trent, undaunted by the spleen of a Lord Chief Justice."

There was much more of the same sort, but he really could not go on with it any longer. The serious part of the matter was, that it was believed by hundreds and it might be thousands of deluded people; and that alone made it worth while to quote such rubbish in the House of Commons. How long was that kind of warfare to continue? Not only were the acts of public men challenged, but the attempt was made to deter them from doing their duty and make them wretched by threats of dragging into public light the absurdities or the follies of their earlier days. Weapons were brought to the work of journalism and the strife of politics more like the scalping knife and the tomahawk of the savage than anything else; and if public men did what they thought to be their duty, they were to be reminded of "domestic circumstances." If a public man did not choose exactly in all ways to bow down to the editor of that odious publication, there was to be something discovered in some strange and unheard-of fashion, or invented, which should do duty to bring him into discredit. It had even been said—he did not know, or care to inquire, how truly—that some of those who were attacked in that print, and of whom stories had been narrated or darkly hinted, were unwilling to come and face the light of day, because those stories might have been based perchance on something or other that had been extracted in hours of friendship in bygone days. If that were true, these slanders were written by a hand which had received benefits from the very man on whom he tried to heap ignominy and disgrace. But if it were true, he believed every one in that House would join him in saying that in comparison with that infamy even falsehood itself was venial. The hon. Member for Stoke said he should postpone his Motion for a time until he had received more Petitions. By what means? By continuing to spread this poison throughout the country? It was more and more necessary, therefore, for the House to insist on the Motion being brought forward. It was no longer the case of the wretched convict Orton; it had not been the case of the wretched convict for some time past; it was the case of those to whom they were accustomed to look up to with honour and reverence. In conclusion, he should ask two different questions from two different people. First, he would adopt one remark of the hon. Member for Peterborough, and he would turn to the Government Bench and ask "Why do you not prosecute?" He affirmed distinctly that the country expected it, and said it was high time. In this country people might go on for a time trampling decency under foot, but a time must come when a snake, however contemptible a snake, deserved to be killed. In the name of the country, of justice, and of everything dear to England, he called upon the Government to bring it to a short and speedy issue. There should be a criminal information filed against the person responsible for the abominable slanders and the wretched defamations of character of which there seemed to be no end. And, in the last place, he would ask a question from the hon. Member for Stoke. For any high-minded Englishman and a Member of the House of Commons to submit to have his name connected with these vile, scandalous libels was almost incredible; and while he hoped the Government would take speedy action in the matter, the House of Commons was entitled also to call upon one Member to say aye or no "Have we among us the man responsible for this vile work?"

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, as one who had endured a criminal prosecution himself, he begged the House, under the spell of the burning speech to which they had just listened, not to order a criminal prosecution. He believed the hon. Member had greatly exaggerated the feeling of the country; and he therefore asked the House not to be hurried away or to rush into such a false step as that suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Barnstaple—such a proceeding must have a very bad effect in any case.

MR. MACDONALD said, he had heard the speeches of the hon. Member for Stoke last night and that evening, and he yet shrank from attempting to substantiate those charges which, left as they were, must be felt by every right-thinking man in the country as offensive—to wit, against the Judges of the land and the administration of the law of the land. To defame that House would be a trifle. To defame the Crown would even more be a trifle, by comparison, in his (Mr. Macdonald's) estimation; but the law of this country was that which bound one man to another—which gave us repose and confidence the like of which no other country possessed. Men who went about defaming those institutions so sacred were guilty of the vilest offence known in the country. Not a moment should be lost in proving such charges to be true or false. If true, let them be established; and if false, as he believed they were, let no more be heard of them. He knew the people of the country as well as the hon. Member for Stoke—his (Mr. Macdonald's) knowledge was not based upon an imaginary grievance, but extended over 25 years—and he affirmed positively that no such feeling as the hon. Member had described was in existence. Let them have the "abyss," if there was one. He did not fear for the effect of the slanders on high and upright persons, but he did fear that the law and the administration of it might be brought into contempt by such writings as the hon. and learned Member for Barnstaple (Mr. Waddy) had read to them. He read in the paper the other day a speech of the hon. Member for Stoke, in which he said that on his arrival in the House 300 Members would cry out at his terrible presence. When he did come, however, nobody appeared to be frightened or alarmed; but now the hon. Member was here, he called upon him to bring forward his charges. If he did not bring them forward, then the Government must take some strong step to give to the people a feeling of confidence that they should not tolerate these slanders any longer.

MR. STAVELEY HILL said, he must deny that he had used some of the expressions which the hon. Member for Stoke had imputed to him. As a Member of that House—and he was sure that those who felt most strongly with regard to the hon. Member's conduct were animated by the same sentiment—he desired that there still might be a locus penitentiæ for the hon. Member. He hoped that the advice of the hon. and learned Member for Barnstaple (Mr. Waddy) with regard to a criminal prosecution would not be accepted, and in that view, he would appeal to the hon. Member for Stoke to leave the course which he had pursued, to abandon the phantom idea he had taken up, to endeavour to occupy in that House the position of the Representative of a great constituency, to employ his talents for the honour of his country, and not to force Her Majesty's Government to that which would be so deeply to be regretted—the criminal prosecution of a Member of that House.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (IRELAND)

(Mr. Ronayne, Mr. Butt, Mr. Bryan.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [23rd March], "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Butt.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, it had been his duty to look at the whole question, of which a part was raised by his Bill, and he was very doubtful whether the course proposed of assimilating the municipal law of Ireland to that of England not only with regard to administrative details, but also with regard to the franchise, was the best mode of dealing with it. The Irish Municipal Reform Act of 1840 had extinguished many old corporations, leaving but 10 in existence. In the 35 years that had since elapsed, only one other town had obtained a municipal charter; yet, if this Act had been really adapted to the requirements of the country, surely other large and growing towns would have followed this solitary example. They had, however, preferred to place themselves under the provisions of the Towns Improvement Act of 1854. The franchise under this Act appeared to be of a more popular character than the municipal franchise; a protection to owners of property being secured in municipalities—except Dublin—by the high franchise of £8 value, and in towns under the Act of 1854 by the limit fixed by that Act on the rating powers of the Town Commissioners. Objection might be taken to both of these provisions; he went so far with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Limerick as to say that to maintain the municipal franchise at £8 was not satisfactory, and to limit the rates which might be levied in towns might prevent their governing bodies from efficiently carrying out those objects for which they were appointed. Neither party in Ireland seemed to be satisfied with the working of the existing Municipal Acts; but the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman merely touched upon the fringe of the question, and in no way dealt with the government of towns, but provided that they should appoint their own sheriffs and their own clerks of the peace. There might be no objection to this proposal in itself; but as he believed—and the various Bills that had been introduced upon the subject confirmed him in the opinion—that the operation of the whole law relating to town government in Ireland required investigation, he did not think it advisable that the House should adopt a proposal which dealt with only a small portion of that law, and for which there was certainly no urgent popular demand. On the contrary, if the offices in question were to be dealt with at all, it seemed doubtful whether they might not be abolished; for if the recent recommendation of the Committee on the Jury Law were adopted—that the jury lists of the towns and of the counties should be fused—there would not be any occasion for town sheriffs to form the jury panels; while as regarded the clerks of the peace, the law with respect to their appointment, whether in counties or in towns, would, he hoped, soon be considerably modified. He hoped that the result of an inquiry by a Select Committee such as that he would propose as an Amendment to the Bill of the hon. and learned Member would, within a reasonable time, enable Her Majesty's Government to settle the municipal government of Ireland on a more uniform and satisfactory basis than at present. He begged to move, as an Amendment to the Motion for the second reading of the Bill, that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of the several Acts relating to the municipal government of Ireland.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation in Ireland of the following statutes: 9 Geo. 4, c. 82, 3 and 4 Vic. c. 108, and 17 and 18 Vic. c. 103, and the Acts altering and amending the same, and to report whether any and what alterations are advisable in the Law relating to the Local Government and Taxation of Cities and Towns in that part of the United Kingdom,"—(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach),

—instead thereof.

MR. POWER moved the adjournment of the debate.

MR. BUTT hoped the Motion would be agreed to. He objected to discuss the re-actionary policy of the Government at 20 minutes to 1 in the morning, and some hours at least should elapse before the right hon. Baronet should strangle the liberties of Ireland by obtaining the assent of the House to his Motion. The right hon. Baronet's proposal had for its object the extinction of all municipal privileges in Ireland, and contained the denial of the demand of the Irish Members for an equality of municipal rights in the two countries. He (Mr. Butt) maintained that the Government were pledged to pass the Bill, and that it was something very like a breach of faith on the part of this right hon. Baronet to bring forward such an Amendment as that proposed.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, he would not object to the adjournment of the debate; but believing that this subject ought to be fully investigated by a Select Committee, he was anxious that the inquiry should be commenced as soon as possible. The adjournment of the debate would, he feared, much delay the settlement of the question; but the responsibility for that delay would rest with the hon. and learned Member for Limerick and his Friends. He simply objected to the Bill, because he believed further inquiry to be desirable. He further had to complain that the intentions of the Government on the question had been grossly misrepresented by the hon. and learned Gentleman, and must emphatically state on their behalf, that they had no intention whatever to interfere with the existing rights or privileges of the municipal corporations in Ireland.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON regretted the course which the Government had taken with regard to the Bill and thought it would not tend to exalt the estimate of the proceedings of that House which was formed by the Irish people. In proposing a Select Committee, after the consideration the measure had already received, he was afraid that the Select Committee was proposed simply for the purpose of defeating the Bill. He therefore supported the Motion for the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

GREAT BRITAIN, AUSTRIA, AND FRANCE.—TREATIES OF VIENNA (1815) AND PARIS (1856).

ADDRESS FOR COPIES.

LORD CAMPBELL, in moving an Address for Copies of the Treaties of Vienna in 1815, and of Paris in 1856, said: * My Lords, I have just suggested to my noble Friend the noble Earl (Earl Russell), who rarely comes among us, that he should take precedence with his Notice upon Germany and Belgium; but as he does not wish to do so, although the House may be in some degree impatient to hear what falls from him, or the Government upon that question, they will not, I trust, accord to me a less indulgent ear than otherwise they would do. My Lords, I readily admit that the Treaties, for Copies of which I am about to move, by adequate research might possibly be found without the intervention of your Lordships. They might, perhaps, be scattered in a collection of State Papers, or in a mass of guarantees for which a noble Marquess opposite moved some years ago. I shall therefore feel bound to explain in a few words the political idea or aim with which the Motion is brought forward. Should we be compelled soon to act upon the Eastern Question, now revived, in consequence of our engagements or our objects, Austria would appear to be the sole ally we are enabled to invoke with any prospect of advantage. France would no longer be depended on as formerly. Her wounds are too fresh, her powers too exhausted, as some think, even her resentments too absorbing. Neither the German Empire nor Italian Kingdom are bound by any treaty to come forward. Spain has never been accustomed yet to mingle in the controversies which relate to the subversion, or defence of Ottoman authority, and few would judge her now at liberty to do so. Austria on the other hand is bound—and this in a few minutes will be clearer—by a regular and formal guarantee to act with us upon the subject. She has a population of 35,000,000, and an army in proportion to it. The wars of 1859 and 1866 have been disastrous to her. But how many disastrous wars has Austria formerly survived? To what Power may you apply with so much fidelity the well-known expression—

Since 1866 also she has been in a great degree re-organized, by that distinguished man (Count Beust), to whom it has fallen as a lot, to perform the greatest things, under the greatest disadvantages. My Lords, if that view is just, the step which Austria is alleged to be on the verge of taking, as regards Servia and Roumania, is deeply interesting to this country, because it would involve a final bar to all co-operation for the maintenance of Turkey. It would range Austria too completely with the adversaries of that Power, to leave an aptitude for union with its friends. The step to which I have referred, tends briefly to detach the Danubian Principalities from the Empire they belong to. This is not the moment to go into the train of reasoning by which that proposition is established. It is certain to present itself at once, to every mind conversant with the subject. How could Austria be invited to repair an infraction in the general arrangements of 1856, when the infraction sprang directly from the measures she had taken? How could she escape the new, although illicit, ties she would have recently contracted? With what dignity could Great Britain invite her to maintain a cause she had so openly determined to abandon? A barrier between Great Britain and Austria on the Eastern Question would spring up, would be matured, would be reciprocally felt, and neither Power could surmount it. It is, therefore, worth while to exhaust every method of, as it were, reclaiming Austria before the deviation is a final one, which any day it may become. Although the facts are not of the same magnitude, the situation is analogous to that we occupied before Nice and Savoy were annexed, before Denmark was invaded, before the Russian armies crossed the Pruth, before the war between France and Germany was unavoidable. Something is likely to take place, upon the continental world, involving future difficulties, which ought to be, if possible, averted. The course which I suggest is to bring certain documents conspicuously forward, and I proceed to say a word as to their nature, and to the effect which they are likely to produce, if now demanded, by your Lordships. The most important and the most applicable by far is the Treaty of April 15, 1856, in which France, Austria, and Great Britain, engaged themselves collectively and separately to defend the Treaty of March 30, 1856, embodying the general arrangements made after the Crimean War, from every infraction. Let the House remark the phrase. It is not only an engagement to come forward and defend the Porte against armed force, but to maintain the previous Treaty against every infraction. According to the language of the noble Earl the Secretary of State, as I have understood it, according to the language of the Ottoman despatch, which has not been replied to, Austria may be described as meditating an infraction on the system formed by the Allies who went to the Crimea. But when the Guarantee of April 15, 1856, appears, it is seen that Austria is bound to resist such an infraction and make war upon its authors. An Empire which respects itself, would scarcely wish to be in a position so ambiguous, and might be led to pause, before decidedly approaching it. As regards the Treaty of January 3rd, 1815, between France, Austria, and Great Britain, I refer to it for the obvious purpose of establishing that, after a struggle of nearly 20 years, Austria had the same mind, the same policy, the same determination as that which guided her in 1856; that she was equally resolved to join the Western Powers in order to maintain the European balance and the general tranquillity. The Treaty of January 3rd, 1815, bears a similar relation to the general arrangements of Vienna as the Treaty of April 15th, 1856, bears to the system founded by the Congress of Paris at that period. Both are outworks and defences of something which immediately preceded them; of something larger than themselves. But the Treaty of January 3rd, 1815, may be regarded as the emanation of Prince Metternich, whose very signature concludes it. It is the best reply to those who, in order to disparage the validity of what was done in 1856, might treat it as a modern, momentary, fanciful departure from the established line, the House of Hapsburg have pursued. No sooner is the Treaty of January 3rd, 1815, recalled to notice at Vienna, than it is seen that the Guarantee of 1856 is but a second application of the principle Prince Metternich had traced, and which in days of renovated force, authority, and splendour, as his design the Austrian Empire had adopted. Another word is not required on that part of the subject. My Lords, as to the effect on Austria these Treaties may be expected to produce, should the Motion be adopted, I have incidentally alluded to it. They must render clear to many what no doubt the Foreign Office have already explained to some, that an erroneous course is on the verge of being pursued, and one of which the full results have not been adequately realized. The fact is less astonishing, and less a topic of reproach, when we reflect upon the void in Austrian counsels, which the absence of Count Beust, was likely to occasion. As things stand, it should not be forgotten that, in all Governments, opinion is in some degree divided. It would be strange, perhaps, if history was entirely revealed, to see how many critical conclusions, have been narrowly arrived at. But we remark the process even in Committees. It betrays itself in every set of men by whom any kind of business, political or military or financial, is transacted. It is therefore worth while, at even at a late moment, to add a weight to that scale at the preponderance of which you are legitimately aiming. The chance of acting with effect on such a view, is greater in the Austrian Empire than elsewhere, because within it, avowed duality exists; because the conflict of ideas, of interests, of races is perpetual; because the relation of old and new authority is not entirely adjusted; because there are springs of influence whose force can hardly be appreciated, until it suddenly appears; because there is a Press in many tongues to bear on the Executive. A system composed of 17 Diets, of a dozen nationalities, of two Assemblies at Vienna, of two at Pesth, together with a Federal authority beyond them, may not be free from disadvantages, but it is calculated to secure a certain independence of opinion, a certain latitude of judgment, on any question which arises. At least you may assume that a considerable number of influential persons, from statesman-like opinion, are opposed to that line of thinly-veiled aggression on the Porte which the Identical Note of October last, unfortunately indicates. The publication of these despatches by the House, supplies them with an arm, which cannot be effectually encountered. It must materially aid the Foreign Office in any effort they are making. The Foreign Office can only appeal to men in power. The despatches strengthen those who are combined to watch, and even those perhaps who are entitled to control them. At the same time I indulge in no excessive confidence, in no unbalanced hope as to the result to be arrived at. The negotiation with the Danubian Principalities may possibly occur. In that event the House would have done something to impede or to retard, continued movement on a path, unhappily adopted. In that event the House would also have done something, when future controversies happen, to divest this country of all responsibility, for the loss of an ally, and for the presence of an European complication.

Moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copies of the Treaty between Great Britain, Austria, and France, signed at Vienna 3rd of January 1815, and of the Treaty between Great Britain, Austria, and France, signed at Paris 15th of April 1856.—(The Lord Stratheden and Campbell.)

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I hardly think my noble Friend is serious in his Motion for the production of those Papers. If he is, I hope he will not press his Motion to a division; because if he should do so I shall feel bound to oppose it;—not because there is anything which it would not be wise to disclose, but because they have been published already, and therefore it would be a waste of money to publish them again. Both the Treaties were laid before Parliament—not at the time they were made, but afterwards, and both may be found in the ordinary collection of State Papers in the Library of this House, and, I suppose, in many other public libraries. No doubt, if there were any general desire to have those Papers reprinted for general circulation, the Government and Parliament would yield to it; but I do not think there is any such desire, nor is it likely they would be much read or referred to, and therefore I do not suppose your Lordships would be disposed to agree to the Motion. But I take it that the object of my noble Friend was not so much to obtain those Papers as to have the opportunity of stating his views on the question to which they have reference—not on the Eastern Question generally, but as to that particular part of the Eastern Question which is involved in the action taken by the Roumanian Government. My noble Friend has a perfect right to do that, and to express his opinions on this or any other subject of international policy, and I am sure we shall always listen to him with interest; but I must point out that there is a difference between the position of an independent Member of your Lordships' House discussing such a question and that which would be held by the person who, however unworthy, for the time being represents this country. My noble Friend finds fault with the policy of the Austrian Government, and he has a right to do so; but if I took his view to the full extent—which I by no means say I do—I should not consider it a convenient course to express my opinions here, while the case is still under consideration, instead of communicating with the Austrian Government in the usual manner. I took an opportunity some weeks ago, in answer to my noble Friend, of stating the position in which things then were. There has been no change since that time. I do not deprecate discussion of the subject; but if we are to discuss it, I think your Lordships will be of opinion that we shall be able to do so with more advantage when the Papers are before your Lordships, and you are made acquainted with its details. I shall only say now, what I feel bound to say after the statement of my noble Friend, and it is this—That the Austrian Government does not express, and never has expressed, any intention to violate existing Treaties; the Austrian Government admits the binding nature of those obligations, and simply places—as I said before—a different interpretation on a portion of those Treaty obligations from that adopted by us. It is admitted that the Roumanian Government is entitled to enter into certain conventions with neighbouring States—and the only question is as to whether Commercial Treaties are included under the head of Conventions that may be entered into by that Government without the sanction of the Porte. The Austrian Government hold that they are. We, forming the best judgment we can, are of a different opinion. I can add that all the Powers are agreed in this—that providing the power claimed for Roumania in respect of Commercial Treaties can be legitimately exercised, no practical harm could arise from that power being used, and I have very little doubt that if the Porte were approached in a proper manner, its sanction would not be refused. The question, then, is narrowed to this—Some of the leading Powers hold that Roumania has this right without the sanction of the Porte, while we are of opinion that she has not the power without that sanction; but we have said all along that we are quite prepared to advise the Porte to grant it. I cannot regard this business in the light of a European question or as one involving serious danger.

LORD CAMPBELL asked the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary, when the Papers on the subject would be produced?

THE EARL OF DERBY: I cannot at present say; but if I see a chance of the Correspondence being so protracted that there would be no opportunity of discussing the question this Session if we waited for its close, I shall at once lay on the Table all the Papers that we can put before Parliament.

LORD CAMPBELL said, that the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had not even attempted any answer to the train of reasoning by which the Motion was supported. If however he thought that the production of the Treaties would do more harm than good and would not be so much an aid as an incumbrance, he was of course entitled to resist it, although no argument was offered in that sense. He (Lord Campbell) would not divide the House when he knew that they were anxious to go on to the next Notice, nor was he able to contend with the majority of the Government. But he should decline to withdraw the Motion and leave to the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs the responsibility of its being negatived.

EARL GRANVILLE: Without wishing to prolong the discussion, I must say that I think my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs has given very good reasons for not laying the Papers on the Table at present. If the noble Lord presses his Motion, the majority against him will not be composed exclusively of the usual supporters of the Government. In a case in which there is a difference between this country and other Powers, it is desirable that your Lordships should be in possession of all the information the Correspondence can give us before the question is discussed by your Lordships' House.

On Question? Resolved in the Negative.

GERMANY AND BELGIUM—
THE PEACE OF EUROPE.—QUESTIONS.

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, two Questions stand on the Paper in my name—one is to ask, Whether my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs considers the correspondence between Germany and Belgium entirely terminated: the other is, Whether that Correspondence causes him any fears for the maintenance of the peace of Europe? My Lords, I do not rise for the purpose of putting the first Question; because since I gave Notice of it a further Note appears to have been addressed by Germany to Belgium; but I should like to make some observations with reference to the international relations of the two countries, and as to the probable effect of those relations on the peace of Europe. Now, my Lords, in looking back to the commencement of the present century, I find in the pages nothing more wise—nothing of which England should be more proud, than the principles then laid down by the British Government. In 1802 Lord Hawkesbury wrote a despatch in which, referring to libels which were then being published in this country, he said that while jealously upholding the liberty of the Press, he, at the same time, held that the tribunals of this country had full power to entertain complaints against persons who published libels against those who conducted the French Government and to punish them for such publications. He also said he was told by eminent lawyers that this country would be guilty of a breach of amity if it did not proceed against such persons. When Lord Hawkesbury wrote that despatch libels of a violent kind were being published here against the First Consul of the French Republic. The Attorney General of the Government of that day took care to prosecute the persons who wrote those violent and malicious libels: all the eloquence and ability of Sir James Mackintosh did not prevail against the Attorney General, and but for the war in Egypt those persons would have been punished. The rule laid down by Lord Hawkesbury is the right one—that we should do nothing to curtail the liberty of the Press, while, at the same time, we should take care to prosecute and punish those who make libellous attacks on persons in power and authority in other countries. That is the principle laid down by Lord Hawkesbury; and I hope that when this Correspondence is laid on your Lordships' Table it will appear that the German Government have not asked anything inconsistent with that principle—I hope it will appear that the German Government did not propose to Belgium to give up any portion of that liberty of the Press which is enjoyed in Belgium, but only wished to have those persons punished who had written to a French Archbishop to propose that the life of Prince Bismarck should be taken by assassination. I trust that when this despatch comes to be laid on the Table your Lordships will find that nothing has been asked by the German Government which is unreasonable—that it has not thought it necessary to ask for any new legislation—but only that the principles laid down by Lord Hawkesbury in 1802—of which we may justly be proud—are those principles which are expected to prevail at the present time. At all events, I am sure it will require all the care and discretion of the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs to reconcile the different views of Belgium and Germany, and to induce them to come to an agreement which shall be honourable to all, and at the same time small maintain the peace of Europe. I do not ask anything more now, because I think the last step taken by Germany will tend to preserve the peace of Europe; and I think that the two Powers waiting—as it would appear they do wait—in a desire for peace, will be able to come to an understanding on the subject. It appears to me that it will not be difficult to obtain such a compromise. I will ask the noble Earl to say that when this Correspondence—which has appeared in the French newspapers and which has been read in the Belgian Chamber by the Minister for Foreign Affairs—reaches his hands it will be produced to both Houses of Parliament, we shall have the benefit of further inquiry and discussion. I am quite sure it does not require any interference with the existing law of nations or any new system of international law to carry out the principles laid down by Lord Hawkesbury in 1802.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, it may not be necessary, but probably it may be convenient, for me to remind your Lordships of the exact position in which this Belgian business now stands. The German Note and the Belgian Note have been published in The Moniteur Belge; they were read in the Belgian Chambers and they are now before the Belgian public. I hope the first Note of the German Government will be found to bear out the description given of it in "another place" by my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government—that it is in no sense a menace, but rather a friendly remonstrance on a point respecting which the two Governments differed. The second German Note reached my hands only this afternoon shortly before I came to the House, and I have had no time to do more than examine it in a hasty and superficial manner; but the German Ambassador has described it to me, and I am authorized by him to say that he has done so, as being conceived in an entirely friendly spirit. I am bound to say that I have heard a similar description of it from other quarters, and, as far as I can see, there is nothing in its contents to create a different impression. As I understand, the reply which the Belgian Government intend to send to Germany will be laid before the Belgian Chambers, and when the whole of the Correspondence is thus made public property, there will be no difficulty in laying it before Parliament. I may observe that Her Majesty's Government has not been formally consulted by either party. If such an appeal should be made—and I shall not pretend to say that it may not be—it would be made, not to one Government only, but to all the Governments of the Guaranteeing Powers. I think it would be imprudent and impolitic on my part to express any opinion on the question now, especially as we have in this country only a very moderate knowledge of some of the facts; but I do not hesitate to say that European opinion has considerably exaggerated the importance of the incident, and that, as at present advised; I look forward to its termination without any uneasiness as to its effect upon the peace of Europe, or upon the integrity and independence of Belgium.

MILITARY TRAINING—PUBLIC SCHOOLS AND TRAINING SHIPS. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE rose to call attention to the subject of what is called military training in public schools and public training ships, and to urge Her Majesty's Government to promote the same. The noble Earl said, their Lordships were aware that in this country great difficulty was experienced in getting either boys or men for service in the Army or the Navy. We ought to look to this while England was at peace, because war began now before one knew what he was about, and it was brought to an end before either side had time to train new lives. He was convinced, therefore, that if boys were to undergo a simple system of military training, the country would have a better class of men. There was nothing boys liked better than playing at soldiers and sailors, and the effect of military drill in schools was to promote order, regularity, and cleanliness among boys, and was, in his opinion, the very best species of gymnastics. The system of military training was enforced in all schools abroad, and now that we had introduced the compulsory system of education here he did not see why military drill should not be introduced as one of the necessary requirements. As to the Volunteers, too much could not be urged in their favour. They came forward nobly in defence of their country; but they knew they would be of no use unless they trained, and he thought that if the boys in our public schools were placed under a certain amount of military training it would have a most beneficial effect upon their future career—but if they waited until these boys had become young men one-half of their opportunity was lost. He had read with satisfaction the proceedings of a deputation which a few days ago waited on the Commander-in-Chief on this subject. It was pointed out to His Royal Highness that this drill would not only conduce to the health of the boys, but would engender habits of discipline and obedience. He believed the Government was disposed to do all it could to establish training-ships for the Merchant Service, and, therefore, he hoped it would do what it could to further military training in public schools.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he did not intend to go into the question which had been raised by his noble Friend with reference to the position this country would be in if suddenly engaged in war—he should confine himself to the bearing of the question on the military and naval services. His noble Friend began by stating that which was not quite in accordance with the fact—namely, that education was now compulsory; because, although, no doubt, the power of compulsion was vested in the school boards, that by no means described what prevailed throughout the country. He was quite ready to admit, with his noble Friend, that the drill of the character he described was of great benefit to all boys, whether intended for the Army or the Navy, by imparting to them those ideas of order, regularity, and discipline without which it was difficult to obtain fully-qualified soldiers and sailors. This subject was by no means new to them, for the Code which was issued in 1871—paragraph 24—provided that inspection at drill under a competent instructor might be given, and that two hours a week for 20 weeks devoted to this instruction might be counted as school attendance. When, in the same year, a circular on drill was issued by the Secretary of the Education Department to Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools, a memorandum was added pointing out that the arrangements for carrying out the drill must be made so as to suit the circumstances of each case. Attention was there called in the memorandum to the fact that the necessary drill could be imparted by the staff sergeants of Rifle Volunteer Corps or by members of a Militia staff, who during the greater part of the year had not much to do. It suggested that drill instruction should be given twice a week during at least six months of the year.

The Earl of Lauderdale

The then Secretary for War, his noble Friend (Lord Cardwell) stated that there was no objection to the employment, with the approval of the commanding officer, of drill sergeants in schools for drilling boys; so that drill was recognized by the Government, and means were taken to have it carried out in the various schools throughout the country which chose to avail themselves of it. There was some doubt raised as to what "drill" was meant in the Article he had referred to, and in the Code this year the word "military" was inserted so as to remove all doubts, though no question "military drill" was intended in the original Code. At present, therefore, all schools might have the benefit of the drill if they chose to avail themselves of it. With regard to the Naval Service, the First Lord of the Admiralty had expressed his readiness to co-operate with the committees of the training-ships in this matter; he had visited the training-ships, and had provided ordnance suitable for gun-drill, and he was prepared to make provision for having the boys drilled on board ship. There was also now before Parliament a Bill dealing with the Mercantile Marine, which had been introduced by the President of the Board of Trade, and in that Bill power was taken to attach an instructor to drill the boys in small arm and sword exercise:—so that it would be seen that Her Majesty's Government were quite as much alive as their Predecessors were to the necessity and importance of giving proper facilities for school drill.

EARL FORTESCUE thought nothing could be more satisfactory than the statement made by the noble Duke as to the plan adopted by the late and extended by the present Government for encouraging military and naval drill as part of the education of the country. The noble Duke had spoken of drill as a preparation for the military and naval service; but there was very strong evidence from manufacturing districts that drill was highly valued as a qualification for persons employed in manufacturing operations. Sir Joseph Whitworth stated that a workman who had acquired the habit of moving promptly at the word of command was worth on the average at least 1s. 6d. a-week more than a man of equal manual dexterity who had not acquired the habit. He regretted drill was not more extensively introduced into our middle and higher class schools. He was aware that drill was taught in our public schools; but he was sorry to say it did not receive from the masters generally the active support and countenance to which it was entitled.

LORD SANDHURST said, he could not agree with the noble Earl who brought forward this subject (the Earl of Lauderdale) that the drilling of boys at school would largely affect the recruiting for the Army. He was inclined to think that the introduction of drill into the schools mentioned by the noble Duke would not have a very great effect on the number of recruits, although it might improve very much the physical capacity of young men. In his Notice the noble Earl referred to "what is called military training in public schools and public training ships." He presumed that the noble Earl was alluding to schools of a really military character, and everybody knew that training ships had a naval character. From having had an opportunity of inspecting one of these ships, he was able to say that there was no better system of providing recruits for Her Majesty's ships. But there was this important distinction between the Army and the Navy:—it was possible, he believed, to employ a very great number of boys in ships profitably, whereas in our regiments the means of employing boys were limited. To this fact the illustrious Duke who usually sat on the cross benches (the Duke of Cambridge) drew their Lordships' attention last year. It was not his wish to throw cold water on the proposal of the noble and gallant Earl. To a great extent he concurred with him, and with the noble Duke; but he thought a small matter of this kind ought not to be allowed to divert their attention from the much more serious question which must shortly come under consideration in reference to the possibility of largely increasing the means at the disposal of the Secretary of State for strengthening Her Majesty's Army.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE was of opinion that much might be done by regular drill in elementary schools to diffuse a military spirit among the people. It had occurred to him that, as before long a number of men belonging to the Reserve Forces would be scattered about in various parts of the country, the Government would do well to consider whether, if the pay of some of them was slightly increased, they might not be made available as drill instructors in schools.

PAROCHIAL RECORDS OF IRELAND.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF BELMORE asked the Lord Chancellor, When the promised Bill to provide for the safer custody of the parochial records of Ireland was likely to be introduced, and into which House of Parliament?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he hoped to be able before very long to lay the Bill upon the Table of that House. He was very sorry it could not be introduced at an earlier period; but some difficulties occurred, which were not anticipated, as to the various provisions the Bill should contain.

INDIAN LEGISLATION BILL.

(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

(NOS. 46-59.) COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY thought the difficulty which had been mentioned the other night by the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Halifax) as to dealing with the question whether an Act passed by the Indian Legislature was ultra vires or not, in reference to a pending litigation, might be met by inserting a provision in the Bill that whenever it appeared to the Judges of the High Court that an Act passed by that Legislature was ultra vires, whether in consequence of a case pending before them or not, they might refer to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council for their opinion on that question. The noble Marquess accordingly moved an Amendment to that effect.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX entirely approved the course taken by the noble Marquess.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he was not present the other day when this Bill was before the House. He entirely agreed with the noble Marquess opposite in the object of the Bill. He thought the Bill was of the highest value, and in no respect more valuable than with regard to a matter to which he thought very little attention had been drawn—namely, the power which it would give for the first time to the Secretary of State to disallow part of a measure. When he (the Duke of Argyll) was in office he had no option between disallowing the whole of a measure and allowing the whole of it. He wished to know what was to become of a case pending a reference to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council for their opinion upon a question of ultra vires?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, the Judges would have power to adjourn a case pending such reference.

Amendment agreed to.

Further Amendments made: the Report thereof to be received on Friday next, and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 59.)

SPAIN—THE CIVIL WAR—ALLEGED ATROCITIES.—NOTICE OF QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE gave Notice that he would, on Thursday next, ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government has received any official information of the cruelties reported to be committed on prisoners of war by both parties in the war now raging in Spain; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government will follow the precedent of 1835, when Lord Eliot and Colonel Gurwood were sent out as Commissioners to the head quarters of both armies to remonstrate against the barbarities practised alike by the forces of the Government and the forces of Don Carlos, which led to the Eliot Convention, so conducive to the interests of humanity?

FAC-SIMILES OF IRISH NATIONAL MANUSCRIPTS.—QUESTION.

MR. GIBSON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Why the publication of Fac-similes of National Manuscripts of Ireland, published by authority of the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury under the direction of the Master of the Rolls in Ireland, was discontinued in January last after the sale of twenty-five Copies; and when the issue and sale of the said work will be resumed?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, the sale of the fac-similes of the Irish manuscripts was stopped temporarily, because the arrangements for their issue were incomplete, a sufficient number of copies was not ready, and the price had not been fixed. These matters have now been settled, and the sale will proceed without delay.

PARLIAMENTARY AND MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS ACT—THE CASE OF JOHN LANGTON.—QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT SPINKS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of John Langton, who was sentenced in March 1874 to eighteen months' imprisonment, with hard labour, in Salford Gaol, and who died in that prison on the 24th of March 1875; whether he is aware that the said John Langton was, during the whole time of his imprisonment, in delicate and failing health; whether a memorial, numerously signed, was forwarded to the Home Office in July 1874, asking for Langton's release (among other reasons) on the ground of his illness; whether another memorial was forwarded to the Home Office in March 1875, signed by 5,400 persons, and praying for the release of Langton on the ground of his serious illness; whether communications to the like effect were received at the Home Office from time to time from the Governor and Doctor of the prison in which Langton was confined; and, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House all documents and letters not private or confidential relating to Langton's health or release received at the Home Office during Langton's confinement?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, my attention has been called to the case of John Langton. As stated by the hon. and learned Member, he was sentenced for the offence of personation at a municipal election, by the Court of quarter sessions at the date specified, to 18 calendar months' imprisonment. That seems to be a very severe sentence, no doubt; but the Court was presided over by a salaried chairman of very high standing at the Bar, of very great experience, and a man of very great intellectual capacity, and therefore we must assume that he gave great attention to the subject. I was not aware that during the whole of his imprisonment he was in delicate or failing health. Certainly, a memorial numerously signed was forwarded to the Home Office in 1874, asking for Langton's release; but that memorial rested almost entirely upon the ground of the conviction having been improper, which I could not attend to for the reasons I have named, and only the very last words of the document were the words "that he was in delicate health." As was stated, another memorial was forwarded to the Home Office in March 1875, signed by 5,475 persons, but that, like the former one, practically relied on the ground of the injustice of the original conviction. At the same time, it did state that the prisoner had suffered seriously in constitution by his imprisonment. I received a letter a day or two afterwards from the hon. and learned Member, and, of course, the usual inquiries were made, and an answer was received through the visiting justices. The kind of certificate necessary in order to ensure the release of a prisoner is perfectly well known; but the certificate that was forwarded to the Home Office, instead of stating that there was any danger to his health from the imprisonment, simply stated that the prisoner's bodily health was impaired, and that he was unfit for any hard work. I think there has been some mistake in this case. With respect to the further part of the Question of my hon. and learned Friend, I can find no trace in the office of any communication either from the governor or from the doctor of the prison, except the one which was sent by the order of the visiting justices in answer to my own inquiry, and therefore I have no Papers to lay upon the Table of the House. As regards, however, any others relating to the case, I shall be glad, as far as possible, to submit them to my hon. and learned Friend for his information.

POOR LAW (ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND)
—GRANTS IN AID—MEDICAL EXPENDITURE.—QUESTION.

DR. CAMERON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether his attention has been called to the inequality of the Government Grant in aid of medical expenditure by the parochial boards in Scotland as compared with the Grant for the same purpose to poor law unions in England; and, whether it is his intention to place the two Countries in this respect on the same footing?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he was aware there was a difference in the grants in aid of the medical expenditure in the two countries; but he was not, at present, prepared to make any proposal for an alteration of the system.

CAPTAIN PIM AND MR. E. J. REED.
QUESTION.

MR. MONK asked the honourable Member for Gravesend, Whether he has taken the usual steps to secure a day for bringing forward the Motion which stands in his name in the Order Book, reflecting on the professional character of the honourable Member for Pembroke; and, if not, why he has omitted to do so?

CAPTAIN PIM: In reply, Sir, to the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk), I beg to disclaim any intention of reflecting upon the professional character of the hon. Member for Pembroke. I have selected the earliest day on which I could bring on my Motion—Tuesday, the 11th May. I am not acquainted with the hon. Member for Pembroke, and have never spoken to him in my life. If, however, he will put himself in communication with me, I shall be happy if I can meet his convenience in regard to the time of bringing the Motion before the House. I may add that I should have brought the matter before the House directly after Easter had not my time, as hon. Members are aware, been fully occupied.

MR. E. J. REED: Sir, perhaps the House will allow me, as one who is interested in this subject, to say a few words in regard to it. ["Hear, hear!" and "Order."] I will conclude with a Motion, as hon. Gentlemen opposite are disinclined to listen to a personal explanation.—["No, no!"] I would not presume to think that the Motion was an attack upon myself, but for the high authority of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty, that it was to be so considered; and while thanking the right hon. Gentleman for the way in which he answered the Question put to him, and the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) for having, without any communication with me, put the present Question, I must say that I have not felt any serious desire to have this question brought forward, and that for two or three reasons. In the first place, it is much easier to put a Question reflecting by imputation and inuendo upon the character of a Member of this House than it is to substantiate an attack by a speech which will satisfy this House that the attack is justified; but I have been willing to make great allowances for the hon. Member who has found himself suddenly placed in the position of being called upon to justify the imputation which his Question conveyed. In the next place, many circumstances may arise, after a Notice of this kind is given, to divert the attention of the giver of the Notice from the attack which he contemplates upon another person to the defence of his own position, and I am willing to make great allowance for those circumstances. And thirdly, I wish to be allowed to say, that whatever this Motion may be in the nature of an attack upon myself, it is also a Motion in the nature of an attack upon Her Majesty's Navy; and if it has any force whatever, it is calculated to spread anxiety in reference to Her Majesty's ships. The national guardians of the character of the Royal Navy in this country sit opposite, and as they have not thought the Notice of Motion was worthy of their attention, and have not taken the trouble to remove the imputations which it made upon Her Majesty's Navy, I have felt that I might freely pass by the imputations it conveyed upon myself in a like spirit. I will add, however, that I doubt whether it is to the credit of this House, that it should give countenance to individual Members making attacks upon other Members by the Forms of the House, allowing those attacks to remain upon the Notice Paper day after day and week after week, merely for the purpose of imputing charges without, as far as I can understand, coming forward to substantiate them. I would, therefore, venture to suggest that it would be better if hon. Members would defer making attacks until they are ready to substantiate them. I now beg to move the adjournment of the House.

Captain Pim

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

INTERNATIONAL OBLIGATIONS— GERMANY AND BELGIUM.—QUESTION.

MR. O'REILLY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is true, as stated in a German paper, that the German Government in January, 1874, and also after the accession to office of the present ministers, proposed to the English Government to address the Belgian Government upon the subject of what was called the Ultramontane agitation in the latter kingdom; if so, if these communications of the German Government were in the form of despatches, or verbal; and, whether he has any objection to state the substance of the reply, if any, of Her Majesty's Government?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, the hon. and gallant Gentleman has inserted a very necessary word in the Question since it was first printed on the Notice Paper—namely, the word "also." The Question is—"To ask the First Lord of the Treasury, whether it is true that the German Government in January, 1874, and also after the accession to office of the present ministers, proposed to the English Government to address the Belgian Government upon the subject of what was called the Ultramontane agitation in the latter kingdom; if so, if these communications of the German Government were in the form of despatches or verbal?"—

I understand by inserting the word "also," the hon. and gallant Gentleman refers to two different communications which he assumes to have been made by the German Government. With regard to the first inquiry—namely, whether, in January, 1874, the German Government proposed to the English Government to address the Belgian Government on the subject of what was called the Ultramontane agitation in the latter kingdom, and, if so, whether those communications were made in the form of despatches or verbally, I would inform the hon. and gallant Member it is true that Prince Bismarck felt compelled to make a strong representation to the Belgian Government on the subject of what he styled the conspiracy carried on in Belgium between the Ultramontane party, consisting of refugee Jesuit priests, and Roman Catholics in Germany. That was in the month of January, 1874, and he suggested, through the Ambassador of Germany, that Her Majesty's Government should support those representations. The Secretary of State of the then Government replied to that suggestion in conversation to this effect:—That it was the desire of the Government that no cause of difference should exist between Germany and Belgium; that the Belgian Government had always shown itself exceedingly prudent in its foreign relations and cautious to avoid any just cause of offence to its neighbours; and he expressed a confident hope that Prince Bismarck would not press the Belgian Government to go beyond whatever limits were imposed upon it as the Government of a Catholic country with free institutions. That was the answer given by Lord Granville, the then Secretary of State, to the proposition made by the German Ambassador to join in the remonstrance to the Belgian Government, in consequence of what the hon. and gallant Gentleman has called the Ultramontane agitation. This was the only communication which, as far as we know, was made to the late Government. It was not made by despatch; it was made in conversation; and it was an oral communication. I now come to the second part of the Question, which is, whether since the accession of the present Government to office, which would be immediately after January, any similar application had been made by the Government of Germany, either by despatches or in interviews, such as I have referred to, and I have to inform the hon. and gallant Gentleman that neither in interviews nor by despatches have any such propositions been made to the present Government.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE ESTABLISHMENTS.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY PEEK asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, on the opportunity promised for discussing the Budget Resolutions, he will be so good as to state the gross costs of the Customs and Excise Establishments; and, whether inasmuch as the four articles—Tobacco, Spirits, Tea, and Wine—produce nine-tenths of the entire Customs Duties, he will consider if a considerable saving may be effected by blending the two Departments?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that with regard to the gross cost of the two Establishments in question, his hon. Friend the Member for Mid Surrey would find the particulars in the Estimates; but if there were any points on which further information was desired, he would be happy to supply it. The second part of the Question was a large one, and one which he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) could hardly answer in the limits of a reply, but at the proper time he would be ready to answer it.

SUPERANNUATION ACT, 1859—PENSIONS AND RETIRING ALLOWANCES. QUESTION.

MR. O'REILLY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether there is any rule or regulation which directs that in calculating pensions or retiring allowances a man who voluntarily resigns a situation under Government, not being sixty years old, nor in bad health, forfeits all title to pension, and that in respect of services previous to such resignation his title is not revived by any subsequent service; whether, if there be such a regulation, he will lay it upon the Table; and, whether since its enactment such regulation has been maintained without any instance of infringement, or, if it has been infringed, in how many cases and for what reason?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, the 10th section of the Superannuation Act, 1859, 22 Vict., cap. 26, provides that—

“It shall not be lawful to grant any superannuation allowance under the provisions of this Act to any person who shall be under 60 years, unless upon medical certificate to the satisfaction of the Commissioners of the Treasury that he is incapable, from infirmity of mind or body, to discharge the duties of his situation, and that such infirmity is likely to be permanent.”

The 11th section of 4 & 5 Will. IV., c. 24, contained similar provisions, the age being 65 instead of 60. When a person leaves the Service under circumstances which give him no claim to any superannuation allowance, compensation allowance, or gratuity, it has always been held by the Treasury that his connection with the public service is absolutely broken by that circumstance; and that if he ever after re-enters the Service, such re-entry constitutes a fresh departure, from which date only his service can count for future pension or gratuity. The rule is a traditional one, and constantly acted upon, but no specific date can be assigned when it was formally “enacted.” It has hardly ever been infringed, and in every case in which it has been infringed, there have been some very special circumstances which have been held to justify the break of service being overlooked.

PARLIAMENT—DEFICIENCY OF CABS.—QUESTION.

MR. PALMER asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether a shelter cannot be provided for cabs and carriages in Palace Yard or immediate neighbourhood, seeing the inconvenience of want of cabs in inclement weather on the occasions of the late sittings of the House?

LORD HENRY LENNOX, in reply, said, that he was far from depreciating the amount of inconvenience suffered by hon. Members from the cause in question; but it was not in his power, neither did he think any Member of the Government had the power, to compel the attendance of the necessary number of vehicles. He had considered the suggestion to erect a covered way in Parliament Square; but it would be costly, and would not accommodate more than 15 or 20 vehicles—a very inadequate number—and further, with a regard to the square from an architectural point of view, such a shed would not be an ornamental structure. He had, therefore, turned his attention to the possibility of securing some of those popular “shelters” for cabmen which might be erected in the immediate neighbourhood, which would protect drivers in inclement weather, and allow the cabs to be within easy reach of hon. Members.

CUSTOMS—CONVICTION FOR SMUGGLING AT LEITH.—QUESTION.

MR. MONK asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the conviction of seven seamen at the Leith Police Court on Tuesday last, for smuggling twenty pounds of tobacco on board the steam ship “Dresden,” and to the sentence upon each of them of a fine of £100, with imprisonment until such fines be paid, notwithstanding that it was proved that the real criminal had disappeared, and that, in the words of the presiding magistrate, “they had been proved innocent of guilty knowledge;” and, if the sentence be in accordance with Law, whether he will take into his consideration the amendment of that Law?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that his attention had been called to the conviction and imprisonment of these seven seamen for smuggling tobacco at Leith, and on the day he heard of it, he also heard of their release. The magistrates thought they had no option but to convict under a particular statute, and the statutes relating to Customs' revenues were of a very stringent character. He had called the attention of the Customs authorities to the conviction, and asked them whether any relaxation in the statute would be desirable.

THE QUEEN v. CASTRO.—QUESTION.

DR. KENEALY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will give him a Government night to bring on the postponed Motion which stands in his name?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, in attempting to conduct the Business of the House, whenever a general feeling is manifested on both sides, that any question or subject should be brought forward, it is my duty, at any inconvenience to the Government, to endeavour to meet the wishes of hon. Members. I do not, however, understand the Question which speaks of a Motion as being "a postponed Motion."

DR. KENEALY: There is only one Motion which stands in my name, and that is the Motion with reference to the Queen v. Castro.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I see; it never has been postponed. I beg to state, on the part of the Government, assuming that there is an anxious desire on the part of hon. Members that any Motion upon a subject which may very much interest them should be brought forward, I should be always willing to make some arrangement for its being immediately brought forward; but a condition precedent, as long as I have had the conduct of the Business of this House, has been to know what the Motion is which is to be brought forward. I am at present in total ignorance as to what that Motion is; and I am not justified in giving or securing a day for any hon. Gentleman, unless I know what the Motion he intends to propose really is. The only information, in this case, which the Journals of the House afford me is, that on the Notice Paper I find this Notice—

"Dr. Kenealy,—'The Queen v. Castro,'—To call attention to the Government Prosecution of The Queen v. Castro, and to the conduct of the Trial at Bar and the incidents connected therewith, and also to certain incidents of the said trial which have occurred subsequent thereto; and to move a Resolution."

Now, in the first place, I do not wish to dwell upon it; but it is very remarkable to ask for a day to inquire into the incidents of a trial, and also the "incidents of the said trial which have occurred subsequent thereto." We want some explanation of what that means. What can the House of Commons do with such an imperfect Notice as this is? Who is to describe the conduct of the trial at bar or the incidents? Is it the hon. Member for Stoke, who is the Mover, and in that case who is to contradict, criticize, or cross-examine him? Is the House to take his statement as authoritative and unquestionable? These are inquiries which are deserving of consideration before discussing any question. Under ordinary circumstances you would have a Petition, properly drawn up, presented to the House, and every hon. Member would have the privilege of taking that Petition, and would have the right to form an opinion whether the statements in it were true or false. If he thinks them to be true, he has the right to bring the subject-matter before the House, and see whether the House agrees with his conclusion or not. So, also, in a still more legitimate manner, Papers might be moved for. You might move for the summing-up of the Lord Chief Justice, or the Minutes of Evidence, or documents of that kind, and the House would then have materials before it, and any Member who arrived at an opinion upon them might ask the House to agree with him, and the House would then have an opportunity of correcting his statements or meeting his arguments. But in the case of the Notice before us, we know nothing and we have nothing. The hon. Member for Stoke may make any statement he likes. He may make one of those wild and extravagant statements which he has frequently made throughout the country. He may repeat all those leading articles, so refined and finished, that we were favoured with the other night. But we must remember this—that he puts himself in the position of a witness without the sanction of an oath, without the correction of cross-examination, and without any definite Motion before the House. And therefore it is perfectly impossible for us to consider the proposition of fixing a day for the Motion until we know what that Motion is. If the hon. Member for Stoke will come forward and tell us what his Motion is, and if it be one consistent with the Forms of the House, and such as we are justified in receiving, then I pledge myself to do my utmost to give him the earliest day that can possibly be given.

DR. KENEALY: I do not know whether I am expected to answer the question of the right hon. Gentleman or not?

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member is prepared to give the House the terms of his Motion, no doubt the House will be glad to receive them.

DR. KENEALY: I consider that the Notice I have given is perfectly Parliamentary. I do not at all accede, with great deference, to the views of the right hon. Gentleman, nor has Parliament ever exercised any power of compelling a Member to be more specific in his Motion than I have been in this. I think it perfectly Parliamentary to "call attention to the Government Prosecution in 'The Queen v. Castro,' and to the conduct of the Trial at Bar." No one can deny that to be a Parliamentary inquiry. "And the incidents connected therewith." That likewise is a Parliamentary inquiry. "And also to certain incidents of that Trial which have occurred subsequent thereto." That is also perfectly Parliamentary. And then I propose to conclude with a Resolution. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: When an hon. Member has given Notice of his intention to bring before the House a Motion, the House expects, that before that Motion is offered and submitted to the House from the Chair the terms of the Motion shall, within a reasonable time, be in its possession.

DR. KENEALY: In answer, Mr. Speaker, to what you have just said, I thought that when my Notice of Motion concluded with an intention to propose a Resolution I should be asked what that Resolution was, and I was perfectly prepared to inform the House or any hon. Member what it was. I shall now do so. I intend to make certain complaints in the course of my speech, and I intend at the close of that speech to move either for a Select Committee or a Royal Commission, whichever may seem most expedient to the wisdom of Parliament, to inquire into these complaints. That is all.

MR. DISRAELI: Speaking, Sir, on the part of the Government, I shall be perfectly ready—having heard what the Motion is, and that the hon. Member for Stoke takes the alternative either of a Select Committee or a Royal Commission, and expecting and assuming that he will adhere to his Motion—to take means immediately to meet his wish. With regard to a Government day, those days before Whitsuntide are occupied with Business to defer which, if possible, would be more than a public inconvenience—it would be a national detriment. There is the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill, which cannot be postponed without serious danger. We have brought it forward as early as possible, and we have afforded hon. Members connected with Ireland every opportunity of discussing it. There are also measures connected with the Budget which cannot be postponed without detriment. There is, however, a universal feeling on the part of the House that the hon. Member for Stoke, if he will place a distinct issue before the House, should have the opportunity of doing so, and therefore I feel that private Members who have days occupied with various Motions of interest and importance would assist the Government on the present occasion. I have conferred with some of my hon. Friends, and I feel sure I can make an arrangement such as the House would wish. I would wish that there should be no delay, and I should have inferred from what the hon. Member for Stoke has said, that he would be equally anxious that not a moment should be lost, and if he likes to have to-morrow, my noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Eleho), who has a Motion of the highest importance and national interest to bring forward, but not of an absolutely pressing or urgent character, would probably give way in answer to my appeal. In that case I would, of course, feel bound to make some arrangement by which my noble Friend should not suffer. Therefore, if the hon. Member for Stoke is prepared to go into this controversy at once, I will give him to-morrow.

MR. BRIGHT: I am rather surprised, Sir, after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, that he should have ended with a conclusion which appears rather unreasonable towards the hon. Member for Stoke and unreasonable to the House. If an arrangement had been made by which the Motion could have come on on Friday, or this day week, it would be fairer to the hon. Member for Stoke and fairer to the House, and to such hon. Members of the House as may think it right to take up any defence on the part of the Judges, or to make explanations connected with the trial. I know I am not at liberty to make a Motion on the subject; but I feel bound to say, that I think the proposition made by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government is not a reasonable one under the circumstances. If the right hon. Gentleman has been able to persuade his Friends to give up to-morrow, I cannot doubt that with the authority which he exercises in the House—not a little on this side, and omnipotent on that—he will be able to set aside Friday, which, I think, will be more satisfactory to all parties who take an interest in the subject.

LORD ELOHO: Sir, I have no right to address the House; but I must say I think it will be agreed by most hon. Members that the position of a private Member is a hard one. He ballots for his chance of a day, and having got it, he is then invited to give up his day. In a case of this kind, when a private Member gives up his day, it is peculiarly hard upon him, because he is invited to give up his day to a Gentleman who might have had many opportunities in Supply of bringing forward his Motion, but who has thought it more convenient for his own purposes to delay bringing it forward. I may say, with regard to myself, that I feel I cannot bring forward a more important question than one which refers to the stability and strength of the Empire, especially looking to what is going on at this moment across the Channel. I admit, however, that the matter to which I am asked to give way is one of urgency, and I think it desirable that the very earliest day should be fixed to enable the hon. Member for Stoke to bring forward his Motion, so that the public ear may not be poisoned as it has been by slurs on the purity of justice. I therefore differ from what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham has just said, for I think there should not be a single hour's delay.

MR. SPEAKER: I wish to point out that there is no question before the House, and any debate on the question of time will be clearly out of Order.

LORD ELCHO: Perhaps the House will allow me to add, that, being so clearly of opinion that there should be no delay, I have much pleasure in giving way, upon the understanding that the Government will assist me to another day, so that I may not be damaged.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY: As the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Bright) suggests that it would be scarcely fair to the hon. Member for Stoke to fix to-morrow, I should like to hear from that hon. Member whether he himself objects?

DR. KENEALY: I object to it for the same reason. In the first place, I may say that I am labouring under a most violent attack of bronchitis. ["Oh, oh!" and "Order."] The House will remember that it was with great difficulty that I endeavoured to make myself heard by a portion of the House on Friday night. In the second place, my notes and memoranda are in the country, 10 miles beyond Brighton; and on Thursday my hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) has given Notice to move for certain Papers, and I consider the production of those Papers essential to the Motion that I have to make. I am very much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury for having so kindly consented to give me an immediate night; but I was guided to some extent by what I saw in this day's Paper that to-morrow week was an open day, and that it was probable that the right hon. Gentleman would have given me that day; and if he will give me that day I assure him that I will ask for no further delay, and I will endeavour to satisfy the House and country that I am justified in bringing the matter before them. I will only add that I shall try to condense my remarks into the smallest possible compass, so as not to occupy more of their time in doing so than I can possibly help.

MR. DISRAELI: I wish, Sir, to explain why I proposed to set apart to-morrow for the Motion. The hon. Member for Stoke mentioned on Friday last that he was as prepared then to bring forward his charge as he would be at any time, and, therefore, I put myself in communication with my noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), and the House has seen the result. Of course, when the hon. Member for Stoke says that he is suffering from bronchitis—though I carried on the whole of the business of last Session under attacks of bronchitis—I would not resist an appeal of that kind; but before I fix a day we must not be told hereafter that if certain Papers that we are told are to be moved for—of which we know nothing at present—are not on the Table, the Motion cannot be proceeded with. [Dr. KENEALY: No, no!] Until we know what the Motion of the hon. Member for Peterborough is with regard to those Papers, it is impossible for us to say whether we can consent to their production; but nothing can be taken as contingent upon that Motion. Taking all things into consideration, I shall propose that next Friday shall be the day on which the hon. Member for Stoke is to make his charges and bring forward the Motion which he has announced.

DR. KENEALY assented.

MR. WHALLEY wished to ask the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) a Question of which he had given him private Notice. It was, Whether it was true that he had refused to present a Petition forwarded to him by his constituents with reference to the Tichborne Case, on the ground that such Petition reflected upon the conduct of the Judges who tried the Case, and that on a former occasion, when a similar Petition had been entrusted to him to present, he was told he had better not lay it before the House. He (Mr. Whalley) wished to know what was the nature of the objection made against the presentation of the Petition alluded to, and by whom it was made?

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, the hon. Member had been correctly informed. He did not choose to enter into a controversy on the question; but he would state that on a former occasion, when he had had a similar Petition entrusted to him, he had drawn the attention of the Speaker to it, and the right hon. Gentleman had advised him not to present it. That being so, he did not choose to present it.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS said, that as the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had made the statement to which they had recently listened without having had any communication with him (Mr. Lewis)—he occupying the position of being first on the Notice Paper for Friday—he could only say that he would willingly give way to enable the question to be brought forward by the hon. Member for Stoke, which the House was so anxious to come to a decision on. He would, however, suggest that hon. Members should not ballot for the 27th of May, and thus enable those whose Motions were down for Friday next to bring them on on that day.

MR. DISRAELI: I wish to apologize to my hon. and learned Friend for not communicating with him. I did not anticipate any difficulty of this kind, or I would have given him Notice. I can assure him it was no intentional discourtesy on my part.

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY said, that the hon. Member for Stoke having intimated his readiness to bring forward his Motion he (Colonel Loyd Lindsay) would withdraw the Resolution of which he had given Notice with reference to expunging it from the Paper.

MR. ROEBUCK wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, Whether it would not be better that the Motion of the hon. Member for Stoke should be a direct Motion instead of being brought on on going into Committee of Supply?

MR. DISRAELI: Certainly; it would be better as a direct Motion.

SURVEYOR TO THE OFFICE OF WORKS. QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN asked the First Commissioner of Works, What amount the Surveyor to the Office of Works received last year for salary, and what amount for commission or purchases made for the Department of Works?

LORD HENRY LENNOX, in reply, said, that the salary of the officer in question was £750 per annum, and his commission in purchases made for the Department amounted to £331.

PARLIAMENT—THE WHITSUN HOLIDAYS.—QUESTION.

MR. O'REILLY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he is in a position to give the House information as to the Whitsun holidays?

MR. DISRAELI: I would be glad to indulge the pleasant dream which the hon. Member evidently entertains, but I am not yet in a position to do so, as it is too early.

LOANS TO FOREIGN STATES COMMITTEE.—SPECIAL REPORT.

Report brought up, and read as follows:—

"The Select Committee on Loans to Foreign States to whom it was referred to report to The House whether a Letter, professing to be written by M. Victor Herran, Honduras Minister in Paris, and addressed to the Right Honourable Robert Lowe, Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Loans, was produced and read before the said Committee, and under what circumstances, and whether any Copy of the said Letter was communicated by or on behalf of the said Committee to 'The Times' and 'Daily News' Newspapers, or either of them;—Have considered the matters to them referred, and have agreed to the following Special Report:

"The Committee, on the 22nd March, examined Captain Bedford Pim, a Member of the House; during his examination certain questions were put and answered, as follows:—

"Q. 1899. And that loan was stopped, as I understand, by some action of the police?—A. If you like I will give you the particulars of that.

"Q. 1900. If you please?—A. M. Herran, the Minister Plenipotentiary of Honduras in Paris, and M. Pelletier, his son-in-law, through the bankers, Messrs. Dreyfus, Scheyer and Co., said that they would not agree to the loan being launched, unless I took care that they had, the one 40,000*l.* and the other 16,000*l.* That is a sort of thing that English sailors are not much accustomed to, and I am afraid that I used very strong language about it; but the result was that these two gentlemen, in their official capacity, applied to the French Government, and, Paris at that time being in a state of siege, the French Government signed an order for my arrest, and I was arrested upon that order, and put in prison for 46 hours.

"Q. 1958. But as trustee did you not see what became of the sum of 101,000*l.* which you received?—A. I will tell you at once that 70,000*l.* odd was spent as the dividend then due on the 1869 French loan.

"Q. 2020. But supposing it failed, as it did, you would not be able to get it?—A. Nobody dreamt it had failed. Who would dream that the Minister Plenipotentiary of Honduras in Paris, and his son-in-law the Consul General, would attempt to come to an English gentleman and make such stipulations as they did, for me to pay 40,000*l.* to the one and 16,000*l.* to the other, and that they would go (I will leave it to the Committee to judge the nature of such men) and inform the French Government that I was not the Special Commissioner of Honduras, although they knew perfectly well that I was; and the consequence was that I was thrown into prison, and the loan came to nothing, of course."

"The Chairman, on the 8th April, laid before the Committee a letter signed by the said M. Herran, written in French, addressed to him from Paris, and received by the post. The following is a correct translation of the letter:—

"Paris, 7th April 1875.

"To the Right Honourable Robert Lowe, Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Loans, London.

"Sir,

"Absent from Paris more than a month, I returned only the day before yesterday, and could not at an earlier period reply to the attacks of Mr. Bedford Pim, which are reported in the journals, the 'Times' and the 'Daily News,' of the 23rd of March last. Although I am not fond of controversy, I cannot pass over in silence the false and calumnious allegations of Mr. Bedford Pim, who is unable to pardon me for having done my duty in preventing him from emitting a loan of 2,000,000*l.* in Paris, on the 26th of December 1872, under the false title of Special Commissioner of Honduras. I say 'false title' because he was never named by the Government, and, besides, the guarantees which he offered were illusory and without value, considering that the domains and forests, like all the other revenues of the State, were already hypothecated for the purposes of the first two loans, English and French, say for 3,000,000*l.* Mr. Bedford Pim declares that if I prevented the loan, it was because he was unwilling to consent to give me 40,000*l.* for myself, and 16,000*l.* for the Consul General, sums which we had caused to be demanded of him, says he, by the mediation of Messrs. Dreyfus Frères, the bankers, and he adds that if he did not consent to give this sum it was because such an act was alien from the habits of English sailors. I will ask Mr. Pim if the end he sought, to draw to himself from the savings of the French nation, without legal authorisation, 2,000,000*l.*, is according to him one of the habits of English sailors. I leave to the Committee the decision on this point.

"The house of Dreyfus Frères, quoted by Mr. Pim, with the object of giving to his declaration an air of veracity, is not known to me. I defy him to prove that I have ever had direct or indirect relations with it.

"As to the charge of having denounced him to the French police to procure his imprisonment, there is no word of truth in it, but it suited Mr. Pim to present himself before his countrymen as a martyr. Encouraged by the marks of sympathy which he obtained at the London Tavern on the 10th of January 1873, when he roused his complaisant audience against me, he thought he could continue with impunity to play his rôle of calumniator against the agents who performed their duty strictly and honourably, and serve as the salaried instrument of those who ruined an international work calculated to render immense services to commerce all over the world—such is the part played by Mr. Pim.

"As to the 70,000*l.* sterling which Mr. Pim says he paid for the arrears of interest on the French loan with the funds coming from the English loan of 1870, that is impossible, seeing that the dividends of the French loan were always regularly paid with the money coming from the Paris loan, of which the following is a proof.

"In July 1870, Messrs. Bischoffsheim & Co. received in bonds and money the amount of the French loan, 28,808,800 francs, and Messrs. Waring Brothers, contractors, had received in March 1,543,275 francs, making in all, 30,352,075 francs, on undertaking to carry out the agreement come to between the Government of Honduras, Messrs. Bischoffsheim, and Warings, on the 2nd of July 1870. I write this to show that the declaration of Mr. Pim is erroneous on this part as on all others.

"That Mr. Pim did not remain longer in prison is through my intervention with His Excellency Lord Lyons, with whom I interested myself to bring him out on the day on which he wrote the letter enclosed.

“ ‘When Mr. Pim naively declares that he resigned his post as Special Commissioner of Honduras, because he could not obtain my dismissal from the Government, that proves that my Government did never nominate him, but had estimated him at his true value. Besides the official decree of the 1st of March 1873, of the President, approves my conduct, and declares that Mr. Pim has never been Special Commissioner, and that no one had the power or right to appoint him.

“ ‘I believe I have sufficiently refuted the defamatory and calumnious attacks of Mr. Bedford Pim, and counting on your well-known impartiality, I have the honour to beg you to cause my letter to be published in ‘The Times’ and the ‘Daily News.’ Accept the assurances of, &c.

“ ‘Victor Herran,

“ ‘Honduras Minister in Paris.

“ ‘P.S.—If you should desire other information, I shall make it my duty to furnish it to you. I put myself entirely at your disposal.’

“ ‘The letter sent by Captain Pim from his place of detention was enclosed, and was also read. It ran as follows:—

“ ‘Excellency,—I have been arrested and am in prison. I come to beg your Excellency to take the necessary steps to prove that I am the Special Commissioner, which appears to be put in some doubt in the order for my arrest. That an English officer of rank and a gentleman should not remain in this place one moment longer will be sufficient cause, I am sure, for the kindness of your Excellency in causing my immediate liberation. Although I have not the honour to know your Excellency personally, I have the hope that you will act in this affair without delay, if only in the interests of Honduras, of which I am Special Commissioner, and which cannot suffer the indignity of my being one instant detained in an ordinary prison.

“ ‘Bedford Pim.’ ”

“ ‘This letter had been communicated to Lord Lyons.

“ ‘This letter was orally translated into English by Mr. Kirkman Hodgson, a Member of the Committee, in presence of the public. After the letter had been thus publicly read, the reporters of ‘The Times’ and ‘Daily News’ applied to the Chairman, in writing, to be allowed to see the original letter, in order to correct their report. The Chairman, acting on behalf of the Committee, gave directions that the reporters should see the letter in the Committee Room, but should not take it away. No similar application was made by the reporters of any other newspapers.

“ ‘The reporters were allowed to see the letter, because, if published, it was better that it should appear in a correct form.

“ ‘As the letter of M. Herran was in substance a denial of the very serious charges contained in the evidence of Captain Pim reported above, your Committee are of opinion that it would have been unjust to the Minister of Honduras, in Paris, to have suppressed his denial of the charges so brought against him, and thus to lead to the inference that they were not capable of contradiction.

“ ‘19 April 1875.’ ”

Report ordered to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

Afterwards—

MR. CHARLES LEWIS gave Notice that to-morrow (Tuesday), he would ask the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, Whether he intended to make any Motion on the Report of the Foreign Loans Committee which has just been presented by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the London University? and, if the answer of the right hon. Gentleman were in the negative, he should take the liberty of asking the opinion of the House on the question of Privilege and as to the contents of that Report.

THE QUEEN v. CASTRO—THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE OF ENGLAND.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BULWER: I desire, Sir, to crave the indulgence of the House for a few moments while I call attention to a statement made by the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley), on Friday night, reflecting on the judicial character of a most distinguished Judge—the Lord Chief Justice of England. I see the hon. Member for Peterborough in his place, and I have given him Notice of the Question I am about to put to him. The House will remember that on Friday there was a discussion of a Petition then before the House. In the course of that discussion the hon. Member said, that the Lord Chief Justice had, on several occasions during the trial of “The Queen v. Castro,” in addressing the defendant’s counsel, asked this question—

“ ‘Have you considered what a disastrous effect, socially and morally, would follow if, after all we have heard from these lords, ladies, and gentlemen to the effect that he is not Tichborne, the jury should find that he is?’ ”

I heard these words imputed to the Lord Chief Justice with astonishment, but as I knew that all—every word indeed—from the beginning to the end of the trial, had been published, and was in print, I did not suppose that any hon. Member could have made that statement, unless he had been prepared with authority for it. I accordingly asked the hon. Member where that statement was to be found, whether it was in the Charge of the Lord Chief Justice; or in any other part of the proceedings. The hon. Member, thus challenged, replied that he had not spoken of the Charge; but that, more than once during the trial, the Lord Chief Justice had addressed the defendant's counsel to that effect. Of course I could not at the time verify the statement of the hon. Member, nor did the hon. Member himself do so, nor was I prepared to deny it; but the next day I addressed a letter of inquiry to the Lord Chief Justice, whether there was any foundation for the statement of the hon. Member, which was made of course in the absence of the Lord Chief Justice, but to which, if made in his presence, there are not a few in the House at this moment who, remembering him in Parliament, can well imagine what sort of answer he would have given to it. The Lord Chief Justice sent me a reply which I hold in my hand. I do not propose to read it fully to the House, but I will give the substance of it. ["Read!"] Since the House wishes it, I will read it. The Lord Chief Justice writes to me as follows:—

"Dear Mr. Bulwer—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this day's date, in which you call my attention to an extraordinary statement made by Mr. Whalley in the House of Commons, in which he asserted that I had on more than one occasion in the course of the trial of 'The Queen v. Castro' addressed to the counsel for the defendant the observation set forth in your letter. The notion that a Judge should have addressed such an observation to the counsel for the defendant is in itself so preposterously absurd and ridiculous that it carries its own refutation with it, and I should have deemed it unworthy of notice; but as I see you are evidently shocked that a Judge, in whose Court you practise as a barrister, should have said anything so monstrous and improper, I feel that I ought not to hesitate or refuse you the means of refuting it. You have my authority and that of my brother Judges for refuting every word of Mr. Whalley's statement. It is not only untrue from the beginning to the end, but is absolutely destitute of the slightest shadow of foundation. I have not only not said what Mr. Whalley imputes to me, but nothing that by the most reckless perversion could be taken to mean it. I cannot suppose that Mr. Whalley would intentionally misrepresent me; and I presume therefore that his credulity has been imposed upon by some false report. At the same time it is difficult to suppose that any one possessed of common sense could have been misled by a statement so extravagantly absurd. But be that as it may, you have my authority for giving to Mr. Whalley's statement my most unqualified denial."

"(Signed)

"A. COCKBURN."

There is a postscript to that letter, which is as follows:—

"We fully concur in what has been said by the Lord Chief Justice, that Mr. Whalley's statement is without foundation."

That declaration is signed by Mr. Justice Mellor and Mr. Justice Lush, who, having both been present during the whole time, must have known if any such statement had been made either by the Lord Chief Justice, or any other member of the Court. I will not offer any comments to the House upon the letter. It speaks for itself. I trust I have kept my word in not trespassing upon the attention of the House longer than was necessary.

MR. WHALLEY: I recognize, Sir, very clearly in the letter just read the emphatic language of the Lord Chief Justice, and I regret exceedingly that I do not feel myself prepared at once to acquiesce in the contradiction of the statement I made the other evening, and to express to the House—as indeed would be the case—the great satisfaction I should feel if I could conscientiously do so—namely, to avow my regret at having—whether from want of common sense or some other cause—fallen into such an error. I also beg to acknowledge the courtesy of that portion of the letter in which the Lord Chief Justice supposes that I had not invented the statement; but, at the same time, I am unable, notwithstanding that letter is countersigned by the two other Judges, to acquiesce in the condemnation which the Lord Chief Justice and the two other Judges have given, and I do not make that statement merely on hearsay. It was only a few minutes before I entered the House that I received intimation from the hon. and learned Member of his intention to bring the matter before your notice. I thanked the hon. and learned Member for that intimation; but I wish to point out that I have not had time to make the inquiry which I think necessary. I will only say at present that it is not from hearsay merely that I have made the statement which is now the subject of complaint. I have made it from my own distinct recollection of the reports in the newspapers, confirmed by statements of the hon. Member for Stoke, and re-confirmed by answers I have got from the same hon. Member to questions I addressed to him. I shall, of course, refer to such authority as I can command, and I feel assured the House will allow me as early an opportunity as possible to state the specific authority on which the statement was made, or to offer such apology as I can. In the meantime, I very much regret that when I made a similar statement on a former occasion—when by Notice I brought the question of Contempt of Court and of some of the proceedings at that trial before the House—

["Order!"]
MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman cannot go into that, as he will be out of Order.

MR. WHALLEY: I will mention the subject again at a future and on as early an occasion as possible.

ARTIZANS DWELLINGS BILL—[BILL 1.]
(Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. Selater-Booth, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 12th April.]

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 15 (Formation of improvement fund for purposes of this Act).

MR. RITCHIE, in moving as an Amendment, in page 8, to leave out from lines 40 to 42, inclusive, said, his object in that and subsequent Amendments depending on it, was that the City of London should bear its fair share of taxation for the general improvement of the metropolis, and contribute towards the common purse for that purpose. By the Amendment under notice the Commissioners of Sewers would be struck out of the Bill as one of the bodies to whom power would be given to levy rates for the purposes of this Act within the City. In proposing that, he was actuated by no feeling of hostility to the City or its Government Body; but he felt that if the City were to remain as it was placed in the Bill, it would not bear its proper burden of taxation. There were very few unhealthy areas within the City; as large numbers of the working classes had been turned out into the surrounding districts, and the unhealthy rookeries in which many of them lived had been destroyed, so that the City would really have little or nothing to do under this Bill. He had been told that between Ludgate Hill and the River some thousands of people had been turned out; and that the poor rate had dwindled down from 8s. in the pound to one-fourth. He was aware that a considerable portion of this decrease was owing to other causes than the removal of the poor, but this had also contributed to the reduction; that in consequence of the improvements in Farringdon Street and near the Viaduct 40,000 of the poor had been turned out; and that large numbers had been removed from Clerkenwell and Moorfields. Indeed, it had been computed that the number of the working classes turned out of their dwellings in the City during the last 15 years was not far short of 100,000. The accommodation provided for the same class of persons within the City was little or nothing, and, for the most part, the people had to go to the surrounding area of the metropolis where localities hitherto healthy were rendered unhealthy by overcrowding. It was unjust, therefore, that the City should be relieved from its fair share of taxation which must necessarily arise under the Bill, and that injustice was still more striking when it was recollected that the rateable value of property in the City was about one-seventh of that of the whole of the metropolis. If that one-seventh escaped taxation of course the other six-sevenths would have to make it up. In his opinion, if there were one part of London more than another which should assist in providing healthy dwellings for the poor, it was the City, because the City was the head-quarters of business transactions; and he should like to know what class contributed more to business transactions than that immense number of labourers who lived about the Docks and in the borough which he represented. The poor were not the poor simply of the locality in which they lived; but it was justly considered that the whole metropolis had an interest in and ought to provide what was necessary for, the poorer classes. What did the City say in defence of their position under the Bill? They objected to the Metropolitan Board of Works coming into the City and invading their independence by levying any rates; but it was too late in the day for the City to bring forward such an argument, because the right had been recognized in many instances already under several Acts of Parliament, and there could be no doubt that the metropolis had gradually been treated as a whole for all sanitary purposes, and on all questions affecting the poor. Neither could it be said that the City would in this case be submitting to a Board on which it was not represented, because it formed a part of that Board, and returned three Members to that Body. Further, it was for the general good that, in respect to sanitary legislation, London should be treated as a whole, and beyond that, there was yet another claim which the metropolis had on the City of London. When the City wished to make an improvement within its borders, it came to the Metropolitan Board of Works, laid its plans before them, and submitted estimates, and asked for a contribution towards the expense of carrying out the scheme; and invariably the Metropolitan Board of Works contributed largely—as a rule, one-half—towards the expenses of those improvements. In fact, he found that within the last four years the Board of Works expended on widening and improving streets in the metropolis £403,878, of which the City of London got £202,400, and under all the circumstances, unless the City contributed towards the general purse, it would not contribute its fair share towards taxation under this Bill. He asked the Committee to look at the matter from a just point of view, and he felt sure that if they did so they would arrive at the conclusion that what he proposed was a fair proposal—that it was only in justice to the ratepayers in the surrounding part of the metropolis that the City should be called upon to pay its fair share towards carrying out what he regarded as one of the most beneficial measures we had had for many years. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Amendment.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, while complimenting the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) on the way in which he had brought the matter forward, regretted to have to differ from him in the conclusions at which he had arrived. Hon. Members must bear in mind that the Committee had already settled by an overwhelming majority that the City of London was to manage its own concerns under the Bill. In the whole of the metropolis there were to be two authorities, who were each within their own jurisdiction to act for themselves, the Metropolitan Board of Works and the authorities of the City of London. He put the question on a broad ground. He admitted that there were a great many Acts of Parliament which enabled the Metropolitan Board not only to levy rates all over London, but also in certain cases to interfere actually in the City itself. In some instances, however, that was not the case; and the sum and substance of the matter was, that practically no rule existed, every case being judged with regard to how the particular improvement could be best carried out. Great improvements had been effected in the City of London, but assuredly much remained to be done. It must be remembered, however, that the land and buildings which would have to be purchased for those improvements would cost much more than in almost any other portion of the metropolis; and by the proposal now under consideration, the City would be involved in unlimited expense. He had in his possession a resolution passed by the authorities of the City of London, that if the Bill became law they were prepared fully to carry it out; but he did not think they ought to have an unlimited purse placed at their disposal for the purpose, which would practically be the case if the Amendment of his hon. Friend were carried. If they said to the City of London—"You may make as many new streets as you like, and you have only to apply to the rest of the metropolis to assist you out of its funds," that arrangement would not be satisfactory. Having decided that the Corporation of the City of London were to do this work, the Committee ought to give it that advantage which every other municipal body in the country would enjoy. It was the greatest Corporation in the world, and if its hands were left unfettered, he had no doubt it would set an example not only to the other corporations of the country, but also to the metropolis itself.

MR. SAMUDA supported the Amendment. He differed from the conclusions of the Home Secretary. It was true that the Committee had by an overwhelming majority decided that the City should be allowed to manage its own affairs, and he had himself voted that the City should be its own local authority; but it was a totally different thing that it should be exempted from the operation of this measure. A process had been going on by which the poor had been gradually excluded from the City, and the way to rectify that was clearly not by allowing the City to exempt itself from the operation of the Bill. The last piece of land which he had known to have been sold in the City fetched £3,000,000 per acre, and as ground was so valuable there, the City authorities could not apply to the rest of the metropolis for any unreasonable contributions. But they would do what they had been doing so admirably for the last 10 or 12 years—they would pull down dilapidated houses, and build in their place, not dwellings such as were contemplated by the Bill, but warehouses and offices which would make the ground ten times more valuable than it was at present. From a Return moved for by the hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth) it appeared that the contributions of the Metropolitan Board to the improvements in the City had been nearly one-half of the entire cost, while the contributions to the other parishes of the metropolis had been only at the rate of about one-third. No one could say, therefore, that the City had been unfairly treated. Nor would there be any fear for the future that the City would not obtain its full share, for it was represented at the Metropolitan Board, and had its full weight with that body. His fear was, that they would have if anything more, rather than less than their full share of the general fund. The representatives of the City at the Metropolitan Board would have a voice in deciding on improvements affecting other parts of the metropolis, and that would be unfair if the City were not to make any contributions. He trusted, looking at the circumstances of the case, that the Home Secretary would give more consideration to the Motion than his remarks had seemed to promise.

MR. ALDERMAN COTTON said, that it was a mistake to suppose there was no part of the City to which this Act would be applicable. There were 39 places within the City of London which would fall within the scope of this Act, and in which the City would have to improve the dwellings of the poor. In these places there were close upon 16,000 inhabitants; of these 3,944 were in receipt of relief, 764 able-bodied, 796 not able-bodied, and 1,364 children. The City had no desire to escape from its responsibilities; but it was necessary for the purposes of the Bill that the City should be allowed to carry out its own improvements co-existently with the Metropolitan Board. He felt sure that if there should be any rivalry between the City and the Metropolitan Boards in reference to carrying out improvements, it would be an honourable rivalry, tending in both cases to the public advantage. Since 1858 the City had contributed to the Metropolitan Board of Works not less than £584,000, and having performed so many great and important works in the past, they desired no exemption for the future; all they asked was to be allowed not only to pull down, but to build up, as they had hitherto done, on their own responsibility.

MR. LOCKE said, that what had fallen from his hon. Friend who had just spoken sounded all very well as far as it went; but supposing the City should do exactly as it liked, and, unless compelled, would not build houses for working classes at all, though the spaces were cleared whereon such houses might be built? We had been told that the City had already built a great many houses for the working classes; but he had seen many large spaces where there were no houses, excepting a very few, and these were very large and handsome dwellings, not at all suitable for the working classes. Looking at all the circumstances, he did not see that any case had been established at all for making a distinction between the City of London and the other parts of the metropolis, and he should certainly give his vote in favour of the Motion of his hon. Friend opposite.

MR. GOSCHEN said, the Committee had already decided by a large majority that the City of London should carry out the Act within its own boundaries. It was said that the City would not have sufficient work to do; but if they went to the eastern part of the City they would find there were rookeries enough to engage the attention and absorb the funds of the Corporation, which had already commenced the work contemplated by the Bill, and ought to be left to continue that work in independence of the rest of the metropolis.

MR. KINNAIRD opposed the Amendment, on the ground, that even if the City authorities should fail to provide proper dwellings for artizans displaced in consequence of any improvement which might be made, the Home Secretary had the power to compel them to do so.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH supported the Amendment, although he had hitherto supported the Government. He thought there was some exaggeration in what had been said with regard to the vast amount that would have to be done in the City under the Bill. Judging from what had already been done by the City Corporation, in respect to the three blocks of buildings they had already provided, it seemed clear that their policy, if they cleared out these 39 places, would be to erect the blocks of new buildings outside the City boundaries and relieve themselves of all, or nearly all, the charge, by selling the land they had cleared at a considerably enhanced price, whilst the surrounding portions of the metropolis were heavily taxed. On these grounds he thought that it was just that they should contribute to the rates for the rest of the metropolis.

SIR JAMES HOGG supported the Government, on the ground that the House had already accepted, on a division in which he did not vote, the principle that the City was to do its own work under the Bill. He therefore thought the Amendment would be of no use.

Amendment negatived.

On the Motion of Mr. GIBSON, Amendment made in page 9, line 11, after "1872," by inserting "and by 'The Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1874.'"

Clause 16 (Power of borrowing money for the purposes of the Act).

On the Motion of Mr. GIBSON, Amendment made in page 9, line 36, after "1872," by inserting "or under 'The Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1874.'"

MR. TORR moved, as an Amendment, in page 10, line 19, after "local authority," to insert—

"Or to any body of trustees, society or societies, person or persons, with whom the local authority shall have engaged to carry the whole or any part of such improvement scheme into effect as provided by Clause 7."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER objected to the proposal, on the ground that the Commissioners ought not to be called upon to lend money at a low rate upon any security less certain than that of the rates.

MR. TORR said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD, in moving as an Amendment in page 10, line 26, to leave out the words "three and a half," in order to insert the word "four," said, he objected to the system, which had grown up of late years, of the Government lending money for philanthropic and useful objects at a lower rate than the money was worth. He argued that the Government were not in a position to lend at 3½ per cent, seeing that they were not capitalists at all in the ordinary sense of the word, but had to borrow themselves in the first instance. Besides, the Public Works Loan Commissioners had lent moneys to a number of companies for improving the dwellings of the labouring classes at 4 per cent, and he submitted that it would be a great injustice on the part of the Legislature to sanction loans for similar purposes at 3½ per cent. He should therefore move that 4 per cent. should be substituted for 3½ per cent in the Bill.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 26, to leave out the words "three and a half," in order to insert the word "four."—(Mr. John Hubbard.)

MR. ASSHETON CROSS defended the proposal of the Bill, on the ground that the country would gain by it.

Question put, "That the words 'three and a half' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 199; Noes 10: Majority 189.

MR. GOURLEY, in moving, as an Amendment in page 10, line 30, after "shall" to leave out "not," said, he objected to the unlimited powers which the Act would give them to impose rates, and would move to limit that power to the amount which they had already authority to levy rates.

MR. R. SMYTH thought the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley) had hit upon a serious blot in the Bill. It was surely rather a dangerous power to put into the hands of town councils and local authorities to levy an unlimited tax for purposes of town improvements. As the law stood at present, corporations were limited by their own local Acts of Parliament, and when they wished to carry out improvements they were under the necessity of doing so with the money they had, or else they must go to Parliament for new powers. But here was a proposal to enable a town council to tax the people to an unlimited extent. No doubt the individual Members of Council would vote for a higher rate under a sense of responsibility to the ratepayers; but the loss of a seat in the city or town council would not be a sufficient deterrent to prevent some men from voting away people's money under the provisions of this Bill. He was sorry that the Government could not see its way to impose some restrictions, and if the clause were allowed to stand in its present form, he thought it would be almost a fatal flaw in the measure.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS refused to accept the Amendment, on the ground that if carried, it would prevent many localities from making the alterations proposed by the Bill.

Clause 22 (Construction of terms of Act.)

On the Motion of Mr. HERSCHELL, Amendment made in page 12, line 4, by inserting after "tenure," the words "and any right over land."

On the Motion of Mr. GIBSON, Amendments made in page 12, by inserting after line 11—

"'Medical officer of health' shall, in the case of Ireland, mean 'consulting sanitary officer.'"

"'Local Government Board' shall, in the case of Ireland, mean 'Local Government Board of Ireland.'"

"'Clerk of local authority' shall, in the case of Ireland, mean 'executive sanitary officer' and acting clerk."

"'Superior Courts' shall mean, in the case of Ireland, 'Her Majesty's Superior Courts in Ireland.'"

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in accordance with a promise made at a previous stage of the Bill, moved after Clause 8 to insert the following clause—

("Power of confirming authority to modify authorized scheme.")

"The confirming authority, on its being proved to their satisfaction, that due provision has been made or secured for the accommodation in suitable dwelling of as many persons of the working class as may be displaced in the area to which any improvement scheme relates, either in manner provided by the scheme or in some other manner, may permit the local authority to modify any part of an improvement scheme authorized by the confirming Act, which it may appear inexpedient to carry into execution in accordance with such Act."

MR. DODSON asked, whether it was not unusual to give the Government a power to modify an Act of Parliament?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, it was necessary to provide accommodation before people were turned out; but a great Company, like that with which the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir Sydney Waterlow) was connected, might get hold of the land and make ample provision. There would then be no reason why the company should be bound by the clause, and there ought to be some power of relaxation.

MR. DODSON suggested that if the power were exercised, it should be under an Order in Council.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said it had been proposed that the Order should be made by the Secretary of State; but it was worthy of consideration whether it should not be exercised under an Order in Council. If so, he would cause a Proviso to this latter effect to be inserted.

Clause agreed to; and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS moved, after Clause 12, to insert a new clause (Inquiry on refusal of local authority to make an improvement scheme).

MR. DODSON agreed that the clause would put a little more strength into the Bill, but thought, after all, it was a very weak one.

Clause agreed to; and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

On the Motion of Mr. ASSHETON CROSS, new clauses, before Clause 18, (Provision where local authority has no seal); after Clause 18, (Power of confirming authority as to advertisements and notices); (Power of confirming authority to dispense with notices in certain cases); agreed to; and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

On the Motion of Mr. TORR new clause after Clause 4, (Provision in case of absence of medical officer of health); agreed to; and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW moved after Clause 7, to add the following new clause:—

("Completion of scheme on failure by local authority.")

"If within five years after the removal of any buildings on the land set aside by any Provisional Order as sites for working men's dwellings the local authority shall have failed to sell or let such land for the purposes prescribed by the scheme, or shall have failed to make arrangements for the erection of the said dwellings, the confirming authority may order the said land to be sold by public auction, subject to the conditions imposed by the scheme, and to a special condition on the part of the purchaser to erect upon the said land dwellings for the working classes, in accordance with plans to be approved by the local authority, and subject to such other reservations and regulations as the confirming authority may deem necessary."

He said that the object he had in view was simply to compel the authority, should it be necessary, to do that which they had undertaken to do. It was a power of which the necessity could not be doubted, though many occasions for it would probably not arise; but it was in accordance with the objects of the Bill, and he thought there would be no objection to it.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the proposed clause was free from the objections he had stated in the former Amendments which had been brought forward on the same subject, and he was willing to accept it. He must, however, repeat his belief that the scheme would be in full operation before the necessity for resorting to the clause could arise.

Clause agreed to; and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

MR. RATHBONE moved the insertion after Clause 16, of a clause empowering the Court of Chancery to authorize loans of the funds of charitable trusts for the purposes contemplated by the Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he must oppose the Motion, for the reason that, under the law as it stood, application might be made to the Court of Chancery with a view to such an application of trust funds as the hon. Member suggested. It was undesirable to legislate in a partial manner with reference to the disposal of trust funds by means of a clause in a Bill like the present.

MR. DODSON said, he also doubted whether the clause was sufficiently germane to the purposes of the Bill to enable it to be entertained by the Committee.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. FRESHFIELD moved that, after Clause 21, a clause should be inserted authorizing a local authority to give compensation, where it saw fit, to the owners of premises which were demolished as unfit for human habitation under the powers of the Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Act of 1868. By the 20th section of that Act it was provided that when a house was unfit for human habitation, and the owner had notice of it and did not take the house down, the authorities had power to take it down, sell the materials, and give back the balance, less expenses to the owner. Now that was a very harsh proceeding, and had been the means of driving very poor persons into the workhouse. He proposed to give power to the local authorities where they thought fit, to pay the maximum value of the property to be pulled down, according to the principle of the present Bill, that was, without further compensation.

THE CHAIRMAN intimated to the hon. Member that if the clause was carried, it would be necessary to alter the principles of the Bill.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, that he also was of opinion that the clause was foreign to the objects of the Bill as described in the Preamble, and he was still of an adverse opinion in reference to it, as he had been before.

Clause negatived.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE moved a new clause, to enable the local authorities to recover from the petitioners against a scheme, the costs of promoting the Order, when a Committee of either House of Parliament confirmed such Order without Amendment.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he must object to the clause in its then form, considering there should be a discretion.

SIR ANDREW LUSK objected to what he called sentimental legislation, which seemed to be the tendency of some of the Amendments.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was opposed to sentimental legislation as much as any one.

MR. DODSON said, he preferred leaving the law of costs as it now stood with reference to Provisional Orders.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedule.

MR. KAY - SHUTTLEWORTH in moving, as an Amendment, in page 20, line 9, to leave out from "where the party" to "transferred," in page 21 line 26, inclusive, said, he did so with the object of striking out that part of the Schedule which provided that there should be an appeal from the decision of an arbitrator to a jury. If the Bill broke down, it would be on account of the numerous stages through which a claimant for compensation would have to pass, for the previous part of the Schedule provided that the value of the land taken for the purposes of the Bill should be decided by an arbitrator, and then after the arbitrator had given his award, had sat upon that award, and given his final award, there was to be an appeal from that to a jury. It was like having an appeal from the House of Lords to a jury at quarter sessions, or an appeal from a High Court to a police court. At a recent discussion at the Institution of Surveyors, this provision was condemned, and it was pointed out that though a jury might be the proper body to deal with a question of right or wrong, they were not the proper body to deal with a question of value, and amongst those with whom he had conversed on the subject he had heard a unanimous expression of opinion against such an appeal. The Home Secretary proposed that this appeal should be confined to cases where the award did not exceed £500, or, in fact, to cases where a jury was the least capable of deciding. He (Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth), however, trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would see his way to striking out that part of the Schedule.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL, in opposing the Amendment, said, it seemed exceedingly desirable that the person whose land was to be taken from him should be satisfied as to the persons who were to decide upon the value of such land. If the decision was under the Lands' Clauses Consolidation Act, he would have the option of a jury or an arbitration; but under the Bill an arbitrator was to be appointed, and it might be that the arbitrator would turn out to be one who had a very low estimate of the amount of compensation that ought to be given for the property that was taken, and, if so, it would be extremely hard, if he had no remedy in the shape of an appeal. The hon. Member who had just spoken appeared to have a very mean opinion of the decision of a jury; but from his (the Solicitor General's) own experience, he would much rather have the opinion of a jury than that of an arbitrator. A jury was likely to come to a fairer and more moderate conclusion than an arbitrator was.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, he was opposed to conferring such powers on an arbitrator. He was generally an individual who had a higher opinion of himself than others entertained for him. They all knew what a barrister of seven years' standing was who accepted such an office. He objected to trust to one man to put everybody to rights.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, the appeal was given to the local authorities as well as the owners of property. He was opposed to the Amendment, for he did not think it would be safe to leave the decision in such cases absolutely to the mercy of an arbitrator.

Amendment negatived.

On the Motion of Mr. ASSHETON CROSS Amendment made in page 20, line 13, after "payable," by inserting "and such amount exceeds five hundred pounds."

PUBLIC HEALTH BILL.—[Bill 55.]

(Mr. Sclater-Booth, Mr. Clare Reed.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Sclater-Booth.)

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR: The Bill now before us is perhaps the most important measure with which we have to deal this Session. I do not refer to its bulk alone, though that is great enough, with its 333 clauses and 28 pages of Schedules. I view it as of great importance in both its aspect, as a Bill for consolidating and a Bill for amending sanitary law; because both these purposes may produce results for good or for evil of great consequence to the general welfare of the community. In discussing this measure as shortly as I can, I crave the indulgence of the House, because I was one of the Health of Towns Commissioners of 1846, from whose labours have arisen most of the existing legislation for the promotion of public health. Unquestionably, the law is now cumbrous and complex. It is scattered in 29 statutes, so that even a lawyer has difficulty in knowing the powers conferred by the law. The concentration and simplification of this law form a subject worthy of the attention of the House. If the object of the consolidation of the 29 separate statutes is to prepare the way for the future amendment of sanitary law, which is at present highly unsatisfactory, this Bill would be welcomed by all sanitary reformers, and I am sure the House would respond to the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, which he made to us in introducing this measure, that we should not view its clauses in the critical spirit which we are accustomed to apply to new legislation. But this Bill is not simply one of consolidation; it is also one of amendment. This combination of two purposes induces us to inquire whether it is not intended as the fulfilment of the promise given by the present Government when it came into power—that it would devote itself to the amelioration of the health of the people. If that is so, the Bill is not a mere preparation for future legislation, but is the promised legislation itself. This view of the matter is much more serious, and is rendered probable by the words used by the right hon. Gentleman when he introduced the Bill. In fact, his speech, if it did not describe the measure as one of finality, at least, indicated it as one of long permanence. His words were, "As far as the Government could see, there was no further need for fresh legislation upon the subject;" and again, in describing his Amendments, he said—

Viewed in that light of permanent sanitary legislation, I do not think this Bill in any sense fulfils its purpose. If we are to spend week after week in considering its 333 clauses, in order to render sanitary legislation efficient and permanent, the Government must be prepared to discuss and consider Amendments of a far more serious character than the few and inadequate Amendments which they have introduced into this measure. For it is a matter of great difficulty to settle law upon unsettled foundations, and the foundations on which this Bill are built are altogether unsettled. By far the largest part of it is devoted to the laws relating to the constitution of local authorities, their areas of administration, their powers, and their methods of procedure. Is this settled law? Is it not one of the most solemn promises of the present Ministry that they are to reorganize local government? At present the areas of local authorities are fragmentary, bounded neither by counties, parishes, nor natural watersheds, while their duties as to local government are divided without meaning between diverse authorities in the same district. Are we to understand by this Bill either that the promises as to the reform of local government are altogether illusory, or that we are to devote a large portion of this Session to the consolidation of law which is likely to be wholly upset next year, if a large measure of local government be really brought forward? In either point of view, the prospect before us is unsatisfactory. As to the amendment of sanitary law proposed in the present Bill, I see nothing in it worthy of our attention. For if the law regarding local government which constitutes the bulk of the Bill cannot be deemed settled law, undoubtedly the law relating to sanitary powers contained in the third division of the Bill must be considered as unsettled in the highest degree. In the first place, it deals with a subject-matter in which our experience is growing from day to day; and, in the second place, the law as it stands has been found in the working to be inoperative and illusory. Consolidation of such unsettled law in any measure aiming either at finality or permanence is positively prejudicial, because it tends to stunt the natural growth of a growing subject. Bacon has pointed out this evil when he says—

“When knowledge is once comprehended in exact methods, it may perchance be further polished and illustrated and accommodated for use and practice, but it increaseth no more in bulk and substance.”

This is what I fear if we pass the Bill. Our public health in England is so low that we suffer annually 125,000 preventable deaths, and have 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 of serious cases of preventable sickness, weakening the industrial powers of the survivors. Existing law has proved powerless to mitigate these evils, either from deficient administration or from ineffective powers. Allow me hastily to show how unsettled and inefficient are the sanitary provisions which we are now asked to stereotype into permanent law. The 1st section of Division III. relates to sewerage. But the future of our proceedings in regard to sewerage must depend upon the nature of the measure promised in the Queen's Speech upon the pollution of rivers. If that measure prohibit, as it ought to do, the use of rivers as means of getting rid of sewage, the whole law and practice of sewerage will be profoundly altered, and the consolidation of the complex law on this subject will have been useless. I pass rapidly on. The law relating to water supply is amended by the Bill in Clauses 57 and 59. But the powers for water supply in rural districts are wholly insufficient, and rural authorities are continually making representations on this head; yet the old law is to be stereotyped in a measure which leaves rural districts out in the cold. As regards the law of nuisances I would remark that the Bill exempts from its operation some of the most important industries, as the factories, obviously because they are under distinct administration, which, however, is not a sanitary one. Whether this is wise I will not stop to inquire; but I am quite sure it is not wise to exempt, as this Bill does, some of the most offensive accumulations of manufactures from the operation of the law. I would also say in passing, that I regret that no improved definition of a nuisance has been given in this Bill. The Legislature intended that anything should be deemed a nuisance which was offensive to the community or injurious to health. But a recent decision of the Court of Queen's Bench requires the injury to health to be established; and as this is often difficult of proof, the law is scarcely workable in its present form. I pass rapidly to the section on infectious diseases. No section of a Health Bill could be more important. The law as it stands is consolidated with scarcely any attempt at amendment. But is the existing law operative? In answer to that I will quote a passage from the Report of Dr. Child, the intelligent Medical Officer of Health in Oxfordshire. He says—

“As to the powers at present possessed by sanitary authorities and their officers of dealing with infectious disease it is not possible to imagine anything more illusory than the supposed powers now possessed by them.”

Well, we are called upon to re-enact these illusory powers without amendment. I am wrong: there is an Amendment in regard to the provision of mortuaries, and the removal of dead bodies to them. But if my right hon. Friend, who has shown such courage in regard to the dead, had shown like courage in respect to the living, we might have welcomed his stereotyping of efficient laws for the prevention of infectious disease. But to stereotype ineffective and illusory law is absolutely mischievous.

Mr. Lyon Playfair

The Bill of 1872 introduced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) went much further for the protection of the living than this Bill, which simply re-enacts illusory powers. Within the last few years our knowledge regarding the modes of propagation of infectious diseases has largely increased. Let me quote a couple of cases, both of which came under my own observation. A woman in a dairy, recovering from scarlet fever, milked the cows, and introduced scarlet fever into forty families which she supplied with milk. One of these houses was a school, and it broke up in consequence of the disease, sending its scholars, without any attempt at disinfection, to different parts of Scotland. New foci of disease were established by the seed thus sown broadcast, and scarlet fever became general. Would it have been an improper use of law, if the dairy woman, in the first instance, had been restrained from spreading the infectious disease under which she suffered? Would it have been an unwise sanitary provision, if simple and well-known methods of disinfection had been applied, under a skilled officer of health, to the persons and clothes of the scholars, before they were sent as infectious centres throughout the country? That instance of the distribution of infectious disease occurred in Scotland; but another example in which there were several hundred cases of attack, chiefly in Marylebone, occurred in the metropolis less than two years ago, and will be in the memory of the House. A dairy company received milk from a country farm in which a man had died from typhoid fever. The drainage of the house found its way into a well, and the water of this well became mixed with the milk. Many of the houses furnished with this milk were also supplied with typhoid poison, which suddenly appeared apparently as an epidemic in the best parts of London. Both these cases are instances on a large scale of the distribution of contagium from a single source which ought easily to have been prevented. But the law as it stands provides no remedy against such wholesale cases of infectious poisoning, either through food or water, and the latter is a most common source of spreading disease. It is quite true that the foundation of such legislation is scarcely laid in this country, and yet methods for isolating the sick and for preventing the spread of contagium are to be found in the Mosaic records. Still we are now only groping our way to legislation on this subject. The country should not believe that the consolidation in this Bill, of inefficient and illusory powers scattered throughout various statutes, will put us in possession of a code of value. There are the usual clauses for the prevention of epidemics; but they are founded on the existence and general prevalence of disease, and they aim rather at their wider extension than at their prevention. In the administration of the Poor Law, it is not necessary that there should be many cases of starvation before relief is given to the poor. But in the prevention of disease it is assumed that there ought to be many deaths before you presume to stop the ravages of disease upon the living. The Local Government Board acts well as a central audit for the accounts of the Boards of Guardians in the relief of the poor, but it neglects its duties as a central audit of death accounts throughout the country. It does not dream of inquiring why one population has double the mortality of another, and does not draw the attention of local authorities to their reckless extravagance in permitting their death accounts to rise so fearfully. That would be a central audit worth having, and there is a medical officer attached to the Central Board eminently qualified to perform it; but the notion of such duties does not fall within the conception of a Board administered according to its official notions. Yet, after all, deaths form but a crude index of the disease which has been at work. As a mariner does not delay to trim his vessel until the storm has done its work, and cast its wrecks upon the shore, but forecasts the storm, and prepares himself for it, so should a Department of State medicine, by watching the risings of disease in districts, give the local authorities timely warning of the coming storms. The measures to enable them to ride through these storms are neither occult nor difficult; but the law does not enable them to be applied. For this purpose a knowledge of the existence of disease in a locality is required. But existing law does not provide that the medical officer shall necessarily be informed in regard to disease, even when treated at the public expense, and far less in that occurring in private families. So that by the time his attention is awakened to the existence of a preventible disease, its diffusion has become so general as to be beyond the powers of restraint. The Bill is not improved on this point, for it simply proposes to reenact powers which experience has shown to be illusory. I have only one other subject on which I propose to touch, and that is the law relating to medical officers of health. The clauses relating to them are numbered 184 and 278. The medical officers of health are more and more becoming the motive powers of sanitary legislation. In the Artizans Dwellings Bill of this year, they form the primary motive power. Hence the regulations regarding them in any general Health Bill are of paramount importance. Now, is the present law, in its relations to medical officers of health, satisfactory to any one—to the local authorities, to the public, or to the officers themselves; or does the Bill introduce Amendments calculated to render the law more comprehensible and more operative for good than it now is? See how the case stands. When my right hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) passed his great measure of sanitary reform, he had to deal with difficulties which can now easily be depreciated, but which then were formidable. He found sanitary laws in chaos, and executed a great work in reducing them to some sort of form. The whole country was organized into sanitary districts, of which there are now 1,500, each with its appointed medical officer of health as the agent for disease prevention. All these districts were brought into relations with the central authority, and had to be instructed in their duties. Hence it was inevitable that considerable friction and even confusion should exist in organization. The local authorities had very varying ideas of their duties and responsibilities. Some were highly intelligent, and combined with neighbouring authorities to appoint a joint medical officer of skilled qualifications for his work. Others tried to defeat the law, and to this day a certain number of the local authorities decline to obey the law, and have refused to appoint medical officers of health. Other local authorities evaded the law by mock appointments, giving the medical officer £5 or £10 a-year, while the combined districts were giving £800 per annum. Some profess to pay by piece-work—that is, by guinea fees, and take care that no demand for work arises. In fact, in the administration of the law there is no uniformity, and complaints are made that the form of the law makes good administration impossible. The Sanitary Commission, presided over by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade (Sir Charles Adderley), had recommended that the Poor-Law medical officers should be made health officers, and looked to some 4,000 appointments. But they forgot that the knowledge of the prevention of disease requires a special training, and is rarely communicated to those studying for the cure of disease. Hence, to get 4,000 medical officers of health was a medical rhapsody. I am not complaining because this law did not fix salaries. The local authority—that is, the purchaser of the commodity, may safely be left to fix the salary of the medical officer, provided the Local Government Board had fixed his duties and qualifications. In such a case, the market value of a medical officer's services would soon have adjusted itself by the law of supply and demand. But the law neither insists nor provides for qualifications in the officers to whom such important duties are entrusted. In minor matters the law is very careful as to qualifications. The Local Government Board insists that a public vaccinator must be qualified, so must a public analyst under the Adulteration Act. But in the great subject of State medicine, applied to the preservation of our lives, when our health and the expenditure of heavy rates is involved, the moving power—the medical officer of health—may be entirely ignorant of his public duties, for the law requires no qualifications. Before the compulsory appointment of medical officers of health there were few indeed in the country, but their names had a meaning. They were persons of skilled technical knowledge of State medicine, like Dr. Letheby of London, Dr. Trench of Liverpool, Dr. Littlejohn of Edinburgh, and the like—men who knew their work, and did it. But the compulsory law destroyed this meaning; for it neither made mention of distinctive qualifications or duties, nor did it give power to the Local Government Board to fix them. It was as if the law had said to the local authorities—You are to appoint an algebraic X as your medical officer of health. His functions are unknown to you; they are equally unknown to us. Nevertheless, the law says you shall appoint your X as you best can. Is it surprising, under such circumstances, that the existing law has produced dissatisfaction to every one—to the local authorities, to the public, to the officers of health? The late President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Stansfeld) hoped to induce the local authorities to appoint efficient men by offering to pay half the salaries from Imperial funds. This was a good conception; but none of us calculated on the apathy of the local authorities, who found it cheaper and pleasanter to pay a doctor £5 to do nothing, than to pay the moiety of £100 to an active reformer of local abuses. The Local Government Board then tried to get better men by combining districts to appoint medical officers. They were, indeed, appointed by combined authorities; but the law gave no powers of management to these authorities after combination; so the medical officers were under the management of inconsistent and uncombined authorities—that is, practically they were under no management at all. If they were able and energetic men, they made abundant work for themselves, in spite of the defective provisions of law. Some of them have as much as 1,000 square miles to supervise; others have a single parish. In the first instance, the medical officer is an inspector general of health, with no definite relation to any sub-inspectors. The Poor Law medical officers might usefully be employed in such a relation, but the law does not allow it. Now, Clause 278 of this Bill tries to remedy this defect. Its purpose is to bring the local officers of health to the aid of such a general inspector. But this proposal is either too much or too little. It is too much in its present form, for it gives the Local Government Board the power to require two medical officers in each district, when the old law gave powers only to appoint one. It is too little in the interests of either efficiency or economy, for it does not define the extent of districts and does not give powers for united management when they are formed. Why not appoint such general officers of health for the county, as in the case of county analysts? Or, if you are not prepared for that, make the officer of health purely local, while the medical inspector over a large area might be an officer paid by, and responsible to, Government. But the new Amendments do not remove the confusion from the present law, and do not help us one step forward in more efficient local government. I have now done. My object has been to show that sanitary law, in its existing state, is not adapted for consolidation, if that consolidation has any pretension either to finality or permanence. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board may be in the confidence of the Cabinet, and know that the re-organization of local government is so distant that it would be useless to wait for it before he consolidates the laws which now relate to local authorities. If the reform of local government be beyond the powers of the Administration, then the laws relating to existing areas and procedure, which form the bulk of this Bill, may be consolidated with advantage. But do not let us stamp into permanent consolidated law the agglomeration of confused and illusory powers which relate to the prevention of disease, without making a serious effort to amend them. The present Government are especially pledged to the amendment of sanitary law. The Prime Minister used these remarkable words in his speech at Manchester—

“I think public attention ought to be concentrated on sanitary legislation. I cannot impress upon you too strongly my conviction of the importance of the Legislature and society uniting together in favour of these important results. After all, the first consideration of a Minister should be the health of the people.”

It is no fulfilment of this important pledge to ask us to consolidate law which is confused and inoperative, without Amendments of a serious character. The country has spent much money for the improvement of its sanitary condition. What are the results? They are not apparent to us. Some attribute failure to defective administration; others to defective law. Which is true? What the country desires is that preventible disease should be prevented. There are no Reports from the Local Government Board to show that this result is in any way achieved or in course of achievement, and for no less object ought local authorities to be harassed by a central government, and be made to expend Imperial taxes and local rates for objects which we have no evidence are attained. If administration is at fault, let it be improved. If law is defective, ask Parliament to make it effective and operative. But do not let us delude the country with the hope that we are about to improve the state of public health, because we are called upon to consider a mass of crude and undigested law, brought together into one Bill of Consolidation without attempt at serious amendment. Such a Bill may save local authorities as well as the Central Board some trouble; but it is not likely in any way to ameliorate disease or to save the community from any notable portion of its annual loss of 125,000 preventible deaths. If, however, the Bill, notwithstanding the finality speech of the right hon. Gentleman, be brought forward simply for the purpose of broadening the foundation on which future sanitary law is to be built, then with every sanitary reformer I will welcome consolidation. But I conceive it would be wasting the time of this House to ask us to go to the serious consideration of this Bill in Committee as any settlement of the demands for sanitary reform, when it simply repeats law which has been found so inoperative, without amending it in any important points.

MR. RATHBONE said, he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member the University of Edinburgh, in thinking that the present Bill would be useful as a consolidating measure, but that it could not be regarded as offering a settlement of the laws relating to the health of the people. He trusted that both parties would allow it to pass as a Consolidation Bill, without much discussion, and that the opportunity would shortly be given to the House to consider other Amendments of a more important character with reference to the subject, which might have a more important effect on the sanitary condition of the country. In his opinion, there was a decided objection to the omission, as the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board proposed, of the 3rd clause of the Bill.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he was not at all disposed to quarrel with his right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Lyon Playfair) in respect of the observations he had made upon the details of the Bill, or to shrink from accepting the challenge which he had thrown out. The right hon. Gentleman had, however, quite misunderstood the remarks which he (Mr. Sclater-Booth) had made in introducing the Bill. He would not, at that time, discuss the general question in its details; but he might say at once that the Bill was not intended to stereotype the existing law, and that it was not taken up in fulfilment of any engagement made by the Prime Minister. Nor had it been introduced with the slightest idea of interfering with those measures of local taxation which the Government expected to deal with by-and-by. It was primarily a Consolidation Bill and, as such, would no doubt clear the way for the adoption of those reforms in the existing law which the right hon. Gentleman had indicated. The Government did not intend, at the present moment, to propose any violent changes in the sanitary legislation which had been so recently adopted, because they saw no prospect of carrying them into effect either this or, it might be, the next Session, and the best policy, in their opinion, was to put forward in a presentable point of view, equally comprehensive and intelligible, the whole of the existing sanitary laws. In performing this task, however, they very soon found that it was absolutely necessary to insert Amendments, in order to reconcile the conflicting and sometimes unintelligible provisions of the various Acts passed since 1848, and thus the Bill assumed its present form. He believed it would be found a good starting point from which to survey past sanitary legislation and a good foundation for future improvements. In framing it he had had in his mind the results of consolidation as affecting the Acts relating to discipline in the Navy. A Bill was passed in 1861 which brought into one focus, so to speak, the provisions of eight or ten previously existing Acts on that subject; but it was not until 1866, after undergoing various changes, that the Naval Discipline Act assumed its complete shape. If the present Bill, therefore, was passed, he would not shrink from proposing such further Amendments as might be shown to be necessary. He ventured to submit to the right hon. Gentleman that that course was the best which could be pursued under the circumstances. With regard to the right hon. Gentleman's remarks about the unsatisfactory state of sanitary law, he might say that, in his opinion, a great deal had been done of late years. Instead of the general apathy which formerly prevailed with regard to sanitary measures, they found local authorities everywhere bestirring themselves for the public good. That was a fact upon which he thought they had good reason to congratulate themselves. His right hon. Friend was very anxious to have a set of competent medical authorities throughout the Kingdom. In that direction, too, very considerable strides had been and were being made, excellent Reports being issued under the direction of the Local Government Board for the instruction of medical officers throughout the country. With regard to the prevention of disease, he believed a good deal would be done by the local authorities, when they were once alive to the necessities of the case; but he thought his right hon. Friend a little forestalled the opinion of the country in the matter, and was in too great a hurry to believe that private individuals were anxious to be controlled and directed to the extent he suggested. The public, however, was being rapidly educated in these matters, and there was great reason to be satisfied with the progress that had been made. The Public Health Act, which constituted the local sanitary authorities, was only four years old; but a very gratifying amount of work had already been done under it. The great difficulty in administering from a central office powers which interfered to some extent with local self-government must be familiar to every hon. Gentleman; and they must all feel that although the Local Government Department possessed a great deal of persuasive power, and no small amount of compulsory power, it was unable, and would, he believed, always be unable to direct in detail the action of the local authorities. With regard to the substantial Amendments of which he (Mr. Sclater-Booth) had given an indication, one-half were directed to that particular portion of the Bill to which the right hon. Gentleman opposite had referred. He certainly looked forward to a Consolidation Bill passing, as it were, through several successive editions before it reached its final shape. Amendments which practical experience showed to be required, not going to the foundation of the measure, but rather intended to make it work more smoothly, might be dealt with in the Bill as a whole; and if it should pass with those Amendments, he thought the House would have done a considerable work, and one which would be sufficient for the present Session. The Amendments he would propose were explained in a memorandum which would be circulated among hon. Members. They were of a supplementary character merely, and he would deprecate any proposals to make radical changes in the existing machinery of the law. As to the manner in which the Bill had been drawn up, it was only right he should say that in the numerous communications he had received from all parts of the country, offering an endless variety of suggestions, the opinion was nowhere expressed that the existing law was not set forth by the Bill in a clear and proper manner. It was natural for Governments to view Consolidation Bills with some horror, for there was a danger of every clause being discussed at a length which would make progress impossible. He hoped the House would agree with him in thinking it was desirable to confine themselves to moderate Amendments in the present instance. He should, however, be happy to give his best attention to the suggestions thrown out from all quarters, and would take every opportunity of making such improvements and additions as might be thought of a reasonable character. He agreed with the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone) that the experiment that they were now trying with regard to the consolidation of the law was of an important character, in this respect, that it might afford a precedent for future legislation of a similar kind. If the House should be of opinion that this plan of consolidating the law was a plan worth trying, no great harm could come of it; but, on the contrary, the amendment of the law might be enormously facilitated, and on so interesting and important a subject as the sanitary legislation of the country they might lay a foundation for dealing with the Poor Law Acts and others of a similar character which had hitherto been brought before Parliament in a piecemeal manner. He believed the result of such legislation would be of great benefit to the country.

DR. LUSH trusted that the House would not only read the Bill a second time, but would aid the right hon. Gentleman in Committee in making it as perfect as circumstances would allow. His experience of sanitary matters led him to believe that the country was not yet ripe for any large measure of compulsory sanitary legislation. The consolidating portion of the measure was very important, and the amending portion contained some points which might prove of great benefit to the country. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh University (Mr. Lyon Playfair), complained that the Bill was not strong enough or coercive enough. He was as anxious as the right hon. Gentleman could be for strong and coercive legislation; but he held that any attempt by means of harsh legislation to force on the country provisions for which it was not ripe would not be attended with success.

MR. STANSFELD desired to know whether or not his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board was to be understood, speaking not of this Session, but of the next, to intimate that no further action would be taken by Her Majesty's Government with reference either to sanitary questions or questions of local government.

MR. SCLATER - BOOTH explained that what he meant was that the Government, in introducing this Bill, had no special object in view which would interfere with any measure of local reform which they might think fit to bring forward this Session or the next.

MR. STANSFELD said, he was quite satisfied with the explanation. There were some points in the speech of his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair) which he felt bound to notice, owing to his former connection with the Local Government Department, and to the fact that he had introduced the Public Health Act of 1870. His right hon. Friend had said that the sanitary authorities were scattered and the areas indefinite. He (Mr. Stansfeld) entirely differed from his right hon. Friend. The sanitary authorities were not scattered, and the areas were definite. The whole country was covered by sanitary areas, none of them overlapping; and there was one sanitary authority and no more for every sanitary area. His right hon.

Friend had taken some exception to the appointment by joint authorities of medical officers of health over large areas, and seemed to prefer that each of the 1,400 or 1,500 sanitary districts of the country should appoint its own medical officers of health, who should be superintended over larger areas by officers appointed by the central authority. He was bound to take issue on that point with his right hon. Friend. When he introduced the Public Health Act of 1870 he pledged himself to the principle of local government, and he remained true to that principle in the administration of the Act. His right hon. Friend who spoke last (Mr. Sclater-Booth) very wisely said that all these measures ought to be considered as educational measures. That was essentially his (Mr. Stansfeld's) view. He did not believe that we could make people healthy, either in their houses or their lives, by Acts of Parliament or by centralized authority. He believed in educating and training the local authorities to take care of their citizens, and he was content, whatever pains and labour might be necessary in order to accomplish that object, that Parliament, the law, and the State should educate the localities to fulfil that function. Had the lines of the Public Health Bill of 1870 been drawn upon a purely scientific conception, as to the instrumentality which might be considered the most potent for giving effect to the measure in the short period of four years during which it had been in operation, we should have had a reaction over the whole country against the progress of sanitary legislation; whereas, he would refer with confidence to the Reports of the Inspectors of the Local Government Board to show that very great practical progress in sanitary operations had been effected, and still greater progress in that educational sense in which he had spoken of training localities and their local administrators in the administration of the law. He was quite conscious of the variety that would exist when he passed the Bill. He accepted that variety as part of the educational character of the work. Without such variety, we should have no sanitary education in the administration of the law. But though he had foreseen and accepted that variety, he was not without definite hope of what it would bring forth. His right hon.

Friend the Member for the University of Edinburgh had expressed his belief that the appointment of medical officers of health on the half-pay system had, generally speaking, been a failure; but he (Mr. Stansfeld) did not admit that, and he did not think the President of the Local Government Board would confirm it. He did not rely upon it as a temptation or bait, and he never attempted to exercise any pressure on the local authorities, who were left perfectly free to take their own way in the appointment of medical officers of health under the obligation imposed upon them by statute; but it was only fair that if the central authority—the Government of this country—was to pay half the salaries of these officers, it should have some share, not in the individual appointments, but in the indication of the area for which the appointment should be made, the terms of each appointment, and the salaries to be paid to the medical officers appointed. He would now say a word or two on the Consolidation Bill of his right hon. Friend. He persisted in calling it a Consolidation Bill. His right hon. Friend called it an amending Bill as well; but, in his (Mr. Stansfeld's) opinion, there could not be a Consolidation Bill which was not also an amending Bill. He understood that his right hon. Friend would, without loss of time, put them in possession of the Amendments, so as to enable them to know what was purely consolidation and what was amendment of the law. But the Amendments he said were slight, and he asked the House to accept the Bill as a Consolidation Bill. The Bill consisted of 333 sections, and if it was not essentially consolidation, and accepted as such, if they were to discuss it clause by clause there could not be the slightest chance of passing it this Session. Treating it as a Consolidation Bill, he had examined it with sufficient care to be enabled, and he felt called on, to say that it was an accurate and reputable piece of work and would be an extremely useful measure. His right hon. Friend had not spoken of it as a finality Bill; but by the consolidation of the law it would accomplish two great practical objects of the greatest importance—making, in the first place, the law more intelligible in administration, and, secondly, what was of still more importance, would facilitate its future progress and amendment; and for these reasons he heartily approved of it, and hoped the House would advance it with rapidity so as to pass it this Session.

MR. STEVENSON said, that in dealing with the question they would have to take the rateable area. The railways might first of all be assessed, and then the amount for each parish might be taken.

MR. SPENCER STANHOPE approved the Bill, but it being a very large and important one, he hoped hon. Members would have the promised explanations and Amendments placed in their hands as soon as possible.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, he thought it was rather a difficult thing to say whether they approved or disapproved of a Bill containing 333 clauses. He wished to know whether he was correct in saying that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had stated that he was anxious that Government Medical Inspectors should supervise all the local medical officers? If that was the desire of the right hon. Gentleman, it was not shared by the country. The local authorities were perfectly willing, in cases of difficulty, to appeal to the central sanitary authority. If it was the intention of the Local Government Board to insist on having a central authority of medical officers, he felt certain that it would be the most unpopular thing ever attempted throughout the length and breadth of this country. He wished also to know whether his right hon. Friend had attempted to amend that which was known to be an evil in the last Bill—namely, the power of a small town to call upon agricultural districts outside to make a sanitary improvement for the benefit simply of that small town? Was there any provision in this Bill which would compel small towns, say such as contained not more than 2,000 inhabitants, to pay the whole of the expense of any sanitary improvements that might be made in them? It was manifestly unfair that they should be able to call upon outlying districts to pay for such improvements. He wished his right hon. Friend, further, to state which portion of this Bill was new matter, which part was contained in the old Bill, and which was the consolidating part of this Bill. Before they consolidated and amended the present law, they should ascertain whether or not they were going, by too rapid strides, towards that sanitary improvement which so many people thought desirable for this country. No doubt, it was desirable; but the people of the country were not prepared to advance in the matter with those rapid strides which some persons thought absolutely necessary. We ought not to advance at a pace which would involve the enormous expenses which some places had been called upon to pay under the existing Acts.

MR. CLARE READ, in reply, said, there was power in this Bill to rate separately any district which would benefit by an improvement. His right hon. Friend had, in answer to observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh and of the right hon. Member for Halifax, said there was no idea of constituting a great central authority of medicine. He believed the Amendments which were proposed by his right hon. Colleague would be in the hands of hon. Members on Wednesday morning.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

SALE OF FOOD AND DRUGS (re-committed) BILL—[BILL 83.]

(Mr. Sclater-Booth, Mr. Clare Read.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Interpretation of words).

MR. SPENCER STANHOPE said, that water was to be considered as associated with food, and should be subject to analysis. He would, therefore, move, as an Amendment, in page 1, line 21, after "drugs," to insert "or water."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Description of offences.

Clause 3 (Prohibition of the mixing of injurious ingredients, and of selling the same).

DR. C. CAMERON moved, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 4, the omission of the word "knowingly," on the ground that if it were necessary in order to obtain a conviction to prove that a vendor of adulterated articles knew they were adulterated, it would be impossible to obtain a conviction. He thought that the framers of the Bill, by the use of the words, had left a door open for persons charged with offences against it to escape in certain circumstances in relation to the evidence.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH thought the hon. Gentleman opposite should have directed his observations to a subsequent part of the clause, and not to that, the first part of it. As the first part of the clause would impose a punishment of six months in case a person permitted articles injurious to health to be bought from him, it was only reasonable that the practice of the criminal law should, to a certain extent, be followed, and that a guilty knowledge should be proved against him before convicting him.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR thought his hon. Friend was right in asking for the first "knowingly" to be left out, but he would preserve the second "knowingly." He could not understand how anybody could be discovered to have been guilty of adulteration, unless it could be proved that he had knowingly done so.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, that magistrates were always tender with a man who broke the law from ignorance, and he would keep the word "knowingly" where it was in the Bill. That was the spirit of our laws.

MR. W. GORDON said, he was of opinion that the onus of proving his innocence should be thrown upon a tradesman who mixed one thing with another so as to be injurious to health.

MR. FORSYTH would retain the word "knowingly." The House did not wish to punish offences committed accidentally. The very essence of the offence which it was desired to put down was, that the person who sold those adulterated goods should knowingly and wilfully do so.

MR. FIELDEN predicted that the Act would be quite inoperative, if the word "knowingly" were retained.

MR. GREGORY contended that if a mixture was made of various ingredients and sold as another article, that might be held to be done knowingly, and the retention of the word was unnecessary.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the argument of the hon. Member supplied the strongest ground for striking out the word. The accidental tradesman would be sufficiently protected by the clause; but the word "knowingly" would enable a trader to escape conviction when he ought to be convicted.

MR. VILLIERS thought the Committee ought to know that the Bill was regarded with great suspicion by the public generally throughout the country, because it weakened the security which a former Act was intended to give against the practices and usages of trade, from which they had suffered so much. The general impression was that a few years ago a Bill was introduced which seemed to reach the root of the evil; but the present Bill went quite in the other direction, and all sorts of excuses would be made that the tradesman had procured the adulterated article from some one else. If the Committee were in earnest in putting down adulteration, they ought not to insert these unnecessary words.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH thought that the right hon. Gentleman could not have read the original Act. The clause exactly followed the language of the old law, except that it used the word "knowingly" instead of "wilfully."

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY said, it was important the word "knowingly" should be taken out, because it gave a wrong impression in regard to the wish of the Committee. If the word were omitted, it was by no means likely that an innocent man would be convicted.

MR. SULLIVAN said, that an Act of this kind in Dublin had been obstructed for several years by the insertion of this word "knowingly." The City analyst again and again brought the vendors of "sweetstuffs" before the magistrates; but they were always able to throw the onus back upon the manufacturers, and the children continued for some years to be poisoned, until an alteration of the Act could be obtained. He warned the Committee that if the word "knowingly" were left in the clause it would obstruct the operation of the Act in the same way.

MR. MUNDELLA said, that the discussion was proceeding on the basis that adulteration was general, whereas the Committee of which he had been a Member came to a very different conclusion. The fact was, there was very little adulteration in this country since the adoption of low tariffs, inasmuch as it did not pay. He was, therefore, opposed to making the law so strict that magistrates would not convict under it. Under the existing law much hardship had been inflicted upon traders. The Bill might be confined to farm produce, for the two great articles which were the subjects of adulteration were milk and butter.

MR. BOORD hoped that if the word "knowingly" were retained, it would be explained and defined. He did not see how it was possible for a tradesman to adulterate the articles which he sold unless he did so knowingly.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, that the first "knowingly" was not required in the clause. If a person mixed deleterious materials with food, he must be taken to do so with the intent to adulterate. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would yield to the general feeling of the Committee and accept the Amendment.

SIR HENRY PEEK concurred with the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) that there was not so great an amount of adulteration practised as some hon. Members seemed to think, and that opinion was borne out by the Report of the Select Committee. He would like to know how people in this country would get their noyeau, if the use of prussic acid was altogether prohibited.

Amendment agreed to; words struck out.

MR. SULLIVAN moved, as an Amendment, in line 6, after "material," the insertion of the words, "whereby to reduce its value as an article of commerce." The effect would be to prevent the adulteration of food by substances which were not poisonous—such as of milk by water.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH pointed out that the cases to which the hon. Gentleman alluded were sufficiently provided for by Clause 5.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

DR. C. CAMERON moved, as an Amendment, in page 2, to omit in line 8 the word "knowingly," referring to the sale of adulterated drugs, and remarked that the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) had told them that if they made the law too stringent magistrates would not convict; but if they made it too lax they could not convict. Ignorance could, in no case, be held as an excuse for the violation of the law, and it was more important to omit this word here than in the former case.

MR. FORSYTH said, that it would be extremely hard upon shopkeepers if the word "knowingly" were omitted from the clause, because they would in that case be liable to a fine of £50 for any improper ingredient which might be introduced into an article which they received from the wholesale manufacturer abroad.

MR. W. E. FORSTER hoped the hon. Member for Glasgow would not go to a division. How was it possible a village shopkeeper could absolutely know whether an article he bought of the wholesale dealers was adulterated or not, and to subject him to a penalty of £50 for selling an adulterated article unknowingly was somewhat unreasonable. He did not think they could in justice strike out this word.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH believed that the word must be retained.

SIR ANDREW LUSK hoped hon. Members would not go on libelling and saying such hard things of a large number of their constituents who were just as honest as they were. He opposed the Amendment. The Committee had ascertained that almost the only articles adulterated were milk and butter.

MR. MACDONALD said, that the Bill was not brought forward to deal with the honest, but with the dishonest dealer, and therefore he trusted that the hon. Member for Glasgow would divide on the question.

DR. C. CAMERON said, that after what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman below him (Mr. W. E. Forster) he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR ANDREW LUSK moved, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 9, the insertion in lieu of the word "of," of the words "not exceeding" with a view of leaving it to the discretion of the magistrates whether a lesser penalty than £50 might not be inflicted.

SIR HENRY PEEK agreed with the Amendment. He had been amazed at the magnitude of the penalty. A man might kick his wife to death for less.

SIR ANDREW LUSK spoke from experience on the folly of inserting large fines. He considered a penalty of £50 excessive.

Dr. C. Cameron

MR. SULLIVAN said, that the penalty was to be imposed on persons who knowingly poisoned articles of food consumed largely by children and others.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH reminded the hon. Baronet the Member for Finsbury, that under the 19th clause of the Bill, power was given for the mitigation of fines imposed under the Act.

MR. WHEELHOUSE supported the Amendment.

MR. WATKIN WILLIAMS said, he hoped the hon. Baronet the Member for Finsbury would persist in his Amendment, as the clause referred to by the right hon. Gentleman did not meet the case.

MR. BECKETT-DENISON said, he did not think the penalty named in the clause as by any means too severe, regard being had to the fact that the offence must be proved to have been knowingly committed.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he did not accept the interpretation given by the hon. and learned Member for Denbigh of the 19th clause, but was still willing to adopt the Amendment. He would remind the Committee that the six months' imprisonment was retained.

MR. HENLEY thought that penalties might be cumulative for many acts of adulteration, which might cost the offender £150 instead of £50.

Amendment agreed to; words substituted accordingly.

MR. O'SULLIVAN, in moving, as an Amendment, to add at end of clause—"No person shall be permitted to mix, colour, or stain any food while in Her Majesty's Custom House Stores," said, that a practice existed of adulterating Irish whisky with a coarse and deleterious Scotch spirit. Dundalk was celebrated for its manufacture of whisky, and some persons finding that out, had availed themselves of that reputation, and were importing from Scotland a spirit called "silent spirit" to mix with it. That spirit was not made from pure malt, but from any sort of rubbish that could be distilled, and being bought at 2s. 8d. a gallon, of course, the genuine article, which was worth 6s., could be easily undersold. What was scarcely fit to be given to pigs would make good spirit of this kind. There were some distillers in Scotland, and a few also in England and in Ireland, who produced this spirit with Coffy's patent still, and from any sort of rubbish, no matter how inferior. This spirit when imported was used in the Custom House stores for the adulteration of whisky, to the risk of the health and even the sanity of the people. He once asked a friend of his to try this liquor. He did not tell him what sort of stuff it was, and so he drank it under the impression that it was a genuine article. Seing he made a wry face over it, he asked him what he thought of the spirit, and he replied that when drinking it he felt as if a torchlight procession were going down his throat. There was no doubt about the matter, that doctoring shops were set up with the sanction and connivance of the Customs authorities in Her Majesty's bonded stores. In some of the vats in Dublin containing thousands of gallons of mixed spirits there was not one gallon of Dublin whisky, although it was sold as the pure and genuine article. [Laughter.] This might be for hon. Members a laughable matter; but before they laughed they ought to recollect that a large portion of the revenue of the country was raised from the duty on whisky. Nine of the vats to which he had already alluded contained 23,934 gallons, of which 10,849 gallons were silent whisky, and not more than 1,660 Dublin whisky, the remainder being composed of different country whiskies. The permit issued by the Customs authorities gave no information, or next to none. It was the same as that for sending out the genuine article, and all it said was that the whisky was plain, ex vat, but it did not mention what the vat contained. Three-fourths of the misery, evil, madness, and destitution caused by this wretched concoction ought to be placed at the door of the Government. He believed that the object in allowing this fraud to be perpetrated was to destroy that article of Irish industry, the manufacture of pure Irish whisky. ["No, no," and laughter.] That was no laughing matter. The Irish woollen trade had been destroyed by an Act of Parliament; but in the present case the same thing was being done by more subtle means—namely, by a deception on the public. The injustice was one which, although not having any pecuniary interest in any Irish distillery, he was determined to protest against and to expose until the Government interfered and absolutely forbade its perpetration.

MR. M. BROOKS believed that a quantity of German spirits made from potatoes was also sent into Dublin, and then re-exported to this country under the sanction of a permit as genuine Irish whisky, and recommended in The Wine Trade Review as pure unblended spirits. If beer from Burton came to London, and was here mixed with an inferior article, as was the case with Irish whisky, he believed that complaints would not be made in vain to the Board of Customs. If the hon. Gentleman the Member for the county of Limerick pressed his Amendment to a division, he should certainly support him.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he considered the matter they were discussing as altogether outside the Bill. If the question was as regarded mixing whisky with any article injurious to health, that was already provided for by the Bill; but to take advantage of this clause to prohibit the mixing of any articles of any kind in the Custom House would be to go beyond the provisions of the Bill. The words would apply to the mixing of old sherry, for instance, with a wine of younger vintage. Where an injury was done by mixing Irish whisky with spirits of a deleterious character and destructive of health, the Bill provided for such a case. If the hon. Member for the county of Limerick and the hon. Member for Dublin did not press the Amendment, but came to him, he would consult with the practical officers of the Customs, and endeavour to see what satisfactory settlement of the question could be arrived at. He should be glad to have an opportunity of arranging the matter so as to prevent further complaints.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, the consumers got no information that the whisky was blended, as there was only the letter "B" rudely scratched on the casks. He would accept the offer of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. BUTT thought the matter was within the scope of the Bill, but would advise his hon. Friend to accept the right hon. Gentleman's offer, which seemed to him (Mr. Butt) to be fair, and calculated to meet the case, on condition, however, that he should not be put to the test of tasting any of this whisky.

If nothing could be done, the Amendment could be again brought up on the Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Prohibition of the mixing of drugs with injurious ingredients, and of selling the same).

DR. C. CAMERON proposed, as an Amendment, in page 2, lines 17 and 18, to omit the words, "of a nature injurious to health" in the case of drugs, which might be adulterated to an extent very prejudicial to the health and even to the life of a patient, by means of substances which were not injurious to health. Besides, chemists were not likely to do anything ignorantly, and therefore there could be no hardship in compelling them to sell their drugs in a state of purity.

SIR HENRY PEEK opposed the Amendment, on the ground that it was not always possible for druggists to obtain articles in a perfectly pure state.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR supported the Amendment.

MR. GREGORY observed, that the object of the Amendment was provided for in the 6th clause.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he wished to substitute for the Amendment the words, "so as injuriously to affect the quality of the drug."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On the Motion of Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH, Amendment made in lines, 17 and 18, by striking out "of a nature injurious to health," and substituting "so as injuriously to affect the quality and potency of such drug."

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR moved, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 19, the omission of the word "knowingly," on the ground that the persons who would be affected by this clause would not be ignorant shopkeepers, but chemists and druggists, who ought to be better informed as to the nature and quality of the articles they sold.

MR. MUNDELLA opposed the Amendment.

MR. PEASE said, he was apprehensive if the Committee adopted the Amendment of the hon. Member for Edinburgh University the result would be confusion and embarrassment.

Mr. Butt

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he had received representations from the Pharmaceutical Society, who could scarcely be supposed to desire the sale of adulterated drugs, against the principle of the Amendment. He therefore hoped the proposal would not be pressed.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, he would withdraw the Amendment in deference to what appeared to be the will of the House, and not because he had changed his view.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Prohibition of the sale of articles of food and of drugs not of the proper nature, substance, and quality. Exceptions).

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY moved, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 22, leave out all after "shall," and insert—

"Knowingly sell any article of food or drug which is not of the quality demanded by the purchaser, nor shall any person abstract from any article of food or drug any part thereof, so as to impair its quality, with intent that the same may be sold in its impaired state, as being in its unimpaired state, or knowingly sell any article of food or drug so impaired under a penalty of twenty pounds for a first offence and of fifty pounds for every subsequent offence:

"Provided that no person shall be liable to prosecution under this Act for selling any compounded drug prepared in accordance with the written prescription of a registered medical practitioner, submitted for that purpose to the seller, or with the regulations prescribed by the British Pharmacopoeia issued by the General Medical Council, or with a basis to be laid down by the Pharmaceutical Society, or the Privy Council, or with the provisions of 'The Pharmacy Act, 1868:'

"Provided also, That no person shall be liable to prosecution under this Act for selling any article of food or drug, mixed with any material not injurious to health, or impaired as aforesaid, who shall, at the time of delivering such article of food or drug, supply to the person receiving the same notice of its being so mixed or impaired, by means of a label, legibly and distinctly written or printed, stating the mode and extent in and to which such article of food or drug has been mixed or impaired."

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH hoped his noble Friend would not press the Amendment.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY consented to withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL BERESFORD moved, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 27, to leave out from "Where" to end of line 29, and insert—

"Where any matter or ingredient the presence of which is harmless when mixed therewith for the purpose of preserving it."

MR. VILLIERS opposed the Amendment.

MR. MUNDELLA supported it. Sugar was mixed with cocoa constantly for the purpose of improving it for immediate consumption.

MR. PEASE said, he also supported the Amendment, so far as the ingredients were harmless.

Amendment agreed to; words substituted accordingly.

DR. C. CAMERON moved, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 29, to leave out "or of improving its appearance."

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH suggested that the Amendment should be amended by the addition of the words, "unless such matter is used to conceal an inferior quality of the article."

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

On the Motion of Mr. CLARE READ, Amendment made so as to make the clause apply to proprietary medicines.

MR. SANDFORD moved, as an Amendment, to add at end of clause—

"And be it further provided that in the case where a person may be fined for the sale of an article of food or drug to the prejudice of a purchaser as aforesaid, without knowing them to be of a different nature, substance, or quality from that demanded, then in that case he may recover his costs with damages from the dealer from whom he may have received such article of food or drug."

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH hoped the hon. Gentleman would postpone his Motion until the Committee came to consider the 24th clause. There was no machinery provided for the recovery of the amount, and therefore the retail dealer had no better case against the wholesale dealer than that which he had under the present law.

MR. PEASE suggested that there should be a limit of six months.

MR. SANDFORD said, he had no objection to add words to that effect to his Amendment.

MR. MUNDELLA preferred the question should be dealt with under Clause 24. The wholesale dealer would be placed at a disadvantage, unless it was provided that the article was sold in the same condition in which the retail dealer received it from the wholesale dealer.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Friday.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 23, to leave out the word "fourteen" and insert the word "thirteen."—(Mr. Russell Gurney.)

MR. SULLIVAN impressed upon the Committee the strong feeling which existed on this subject out-of-doors, and supported the original proposal.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS supported the Amendment.

MR. MONK opposed it.

THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION. — CHAPLAINS.—QUESTION.

EARL DE LA WARR said, that since he gave Notice of the Question which appeared on the Paper in his name—to ask, If it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government, as reported, not to send a chaplain with the Arctic Expedition, the First Lord of the Admiralty had announced that a chaplain was to be sent in each ship; but, as there had been conflicting statements on the subject, it would, perhaps, be satisfactory to the relatives and friends of officers who were to serve in the Expedition, and to the public generally, to know that there was no longer any doubt as to the course which Her Majesty's Government would pursue with reference to the appointment of chaplains.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he need scarcely answer a Question which the noble Earl (Earl De la Warr) seemed to feel that he need scarcely have asked. The only difficulty which the Admiralty felt in the matter from the first was the fact that every foot of room in these vessels was required for the direct purposes of the Expedition; but it had been accomplished by cancelling the appointment of two assistant-paymasters, and a chaplain would be appointed to each of the ships.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT—BOARD SCHOOL AT HOLYHEAD.

QUESTION.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY wished to ask the Lord President for explanations as to the course taken by the Education Office with regard to a school site at Holyhead; and, whether he would have any objection to re-consider the decision of that Department? The parish of Holyhead was more than four miles long, yet, disregarding the wants of the agricultural children and the remonstrances which had been made to it, the Education Office persisted in insisting on the selection of a site close to the harbour opposite the Breakwater, at the extreme end of the parish, instead of accepting one more inland and more convenient for the agricultural children, who, if the waterside site were maintained, would have to traverse all the town, a great inconvenience for the infants, for whom an infant school would be built attached to the new Board School. Besides these objections, there was also this one—that while the site first chosen by the Board at Millbank, or any convenient place inland, would only cost £200 or less, the site favoured by the Education Office would cost £1,000. This site consisted of two acres of land which could not be divided, and which had long been in the market. The School Board proposed to sell half of this site; but they were not certain of being able to do this, so that in addition to the inconvenience caused by the distance, and the building a new school in a quarter already provided with two schools—one of which was never full—the ratepayers would be saddled with the expense of £1,000, or at best £500, supposing the School Board to succeed in selling the part they did not require. Now, before the Education Office Inspector came down to Holyhead there had been a vote in favour of Millbank site in the School Board, one of the members of which was not a ratepayer; the members voting on each side were even, and the Chairman Dr. Briscoe, the vicar, gave his casting vote in favour of the inland site. Dr. Briscoe subsequently requested that an Inspector should be sent down to report; and Mr. Watts came to Holyhead. He arrived at 1.30 and departed at 3 p.m. It was admitted by the Education Office that he did not inspect the site in the port, yet he reported in favour of the waterside site, and the Education Office had backed his view. Mr. William Owen Stanley, on behalf of the most influential ratepayers, forwarded to the Education Office a public memorial from them against the purchase of land for a school situated at the extremity of the parish, urging all the reasons which he (Lord Stanley of Alderley) had already mentioned against the site favoured by the Education Office. Several letters passed, but the Education Office never condescended to argue the matter, or to give any reasons, they were content to say that they agreed with their Inspector. He would ask leave to read their last letter—

“ SIR,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 19th ultimo. I am directed to state that in the letter addressed to you on the 18th ultimo the words ‘personal inspection’ were inadvertently used for ‘personal knowledge.’ It is doubtless true that Her Majesty’s Inspector has not visited the site in the parish since its selection by the Board; but he is sufficiently acquainted with it to be able to endorse the opinion of the Board that it is preferable to that formerly suggested at Newry Field. My Lords do not propose to urge any further consideration of the question upon the School Board.—I have, &c., &c.

“ Hon. W. O. Stanley.”

Now, whatever might be the case with the other public offices, bad grammar ought not to be tolerated in the Education Office, yet here the Office wrote that it “endorsed the opinion.” To endorse was to write your name on the back of a bill or cheque; you could not write your name on the back of an opinion. The use of that word was nothing else but commercial slang. There would, however, be less ground for dissatisfaction at the zeal of the Office leading it to side invariably with its Inspectors, if the head of the Department would hold himself free from the trammels of the officials, and hold the balance between them and the public, and impartially hear the appeals which were made to him, for if he did not hear appeals, then there was no appeal from the despotism of this Office which imposed such large sacrifices of money on ratepayers and voluntary contributors. Even if the noble Duke consented within the walls of the Education Office to what was there suggested, he was here in a different position, and might be expected to follow the precedent of various Lord Chancellors who had in this House reversed decisions given by themselves in another place. In conclusion he would venture to remind the noble Duke that if he did not check the extravagance of the School Boards, the unpopularity of the Education Office would redound upon himself; and he would read an extract from The Guardian, April 14, on the extravagance of School Boards—

“ But besides this, it cannot be denied that the Board system, even in itself, has a tendency to eat up the other system, and that many of those who work it are doing their best to increase this tendency, in utter defiance of the intention of the Education Act. A ready way to do this is to encourage a scale of educational expenditure with which it is impossible for voluntary schools to vie. It is almost impossible not to suspect that some portion of the increasing expenditure of School Boards is due, not merely to the natural extravagance of those who can draw on an inexhaustible purse, but also to a covert desire to drive all other schools out of the field. If this be so, it is a policy which deserves the most serious reprobation and the most determined resistance. . . . Still, we repeat, it is desirable to distinguish closely between the necessary costliness of the Board system and needless extravagance in its administration. Nor is it desirable to confuse the mere advocacy of economy, with the maintenance of the cheaper voluntary system.”

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, the noble Lord had referred to matters as to which he, as President of the Educational Committee, had no knowledge. He had, however, all the official Papers on the subject, and which supplied the grounds for his decision. It appeared that the population of Holyhead was 8,205, and that after making allowance for the provision made in the existing schools, it was considered necessary to provide a School Board School for 550 scholars. Some controversy had arisen as to the site; but the Inspector of the Education Department had reported that the site chosen was eligible. Since he had been President of the Council he had every reason to be satisfied with the Inspector, and he had no reason to doubt his report on the present occasion. The School Board of Holyhead had declared that it was the best that could be had, and assuming, as he had a right to assume, that the Board represented the ratepayers by whom they were elected, he came to the conclusion that the questions at issue had been settled to the satisfaction of those most interested in the matter, and best qualified to give a practical decision, while the opposition against the choice of a site was made to the Department by the Hon. W. O. Stanley, who presented a Memorial signed by one-eleventh only of the ratepayers. Having thoroughly gone into the whole matter, he could not re-consider the decision of the Department, which was to allow the School Board to have the site which it regarded as the best.

SAINT PAUL'S CATHEDRAL (MINOR CANONRIES) BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to extend the provisions of the Act of the third and fourth years of Her Majesty, chapter 113, relating to Minor Canonries, so as to authorise certain arrangements with reference to the Minor Canonries in the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul in London—Was presented by The Lord Bishop of London; read 1^a. MASTER AND SERVANT ACT—WORK ON GOOD FRIDAY.—QUESTION.

MR. MUNDELLA asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true, as reported in "The Lincoln Gazette" of the 10th of April, that at the Kesteven Petty Sessions Grason Wattam, a farm servant, was ordered to pay 2s. 6d. compensation and 9s. 6d. costs, for disobeying the orders of his employer in not going to church on Good Friday; and, if so, whether the conviction for breach of contract was under the Master and Servant Act; and, whether the conviction was legal?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, in answer to the hon. Member I shall read the statement I have received. The information alleged that Grason Wattam, on the 26th day of March, did unlawfully refuse to obey the orders of his employer, and did also there and then absent himself from his service without just cause or lawful excuse. The defendant pleaded guilty. The employer complained of general misconduct and disobedience of orders—that on Good Friday he not only refused to attend a place of worship in compliance with the rules of his employer, but absented himself all the afternoon and night without leave, and did not return till the following morning; consequently his duties had to be performed by another servant, to whom the employer paid 2s. 6d. for so doing. Wattam was not fined 2s. 6d., but was ordered to pay that sum as compensation to the employer, together with 9s. 6d. for costs.

THE EXHIBITION COMMISSIONERS OF 1851—FURTHER REPORT.—QUESTION.
 QUESTION.

MR. W. GORDON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1851 propose to make any further report of their proceedings since the 15th of August 1867, the date of their fifth and last report; and, if so, when such further report may be expected; and, whether he is aware of any intention on the part of the Commissioners to sell or otherwise dispose of any and what portions of their estate at Kensington Gore, with a view to the same being applied to ordinary building purposes, or to any purposes other than such as will "increase the means of industrial education and extend the influence of science and art upon productive industry?"

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, the replies to the Question of the hon. Member are—1. The question of presenting a further Report has been under the consideration of the Commissioners, and they have decided to make it when certain pending questions are disposed of. 2. The Kensington Gore Estate was purchased in part with monies raised on the mortgage of the estate, and the Commissioners, since they have possessed it, have been engaged in letting on building leases and selling various portions of it in order to free by degrees the remainder from the mortgage debt to which it is subject. There is no purpose to apply any portion of the money thus raised for any other object than increasing the means of industrial education and extending the influence of science and art upon productive industry. I may add, that if I have any power to order the Commissioners to make a further Report, it is my intention to do so.

THE QUEEN v. CASTRO — PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON (for Mr. WADDY), asked the honourable Member for Stoke, If he can state to the House the names of the Members who have refused to present Petitions referring to the trial of the Queen v. Castro, and the number of Petitions that have been so refused; and, whether, after such refusal, any or all of those Petitions have been presented to the House by some other Member?

DR. KENEALY: I am quite willing, Sir, to answer the Question of the hon. and learned Gentleman, although I think it an invidious one, and repugnant to all gentlemanly feeling, if the House wishes me to do so. I have a list here that has been presented to me of hon. Members who have not presented Petitions. If the House desires me to read that list I will do so. ["Read, read!"] I must premise that I myself have no personal knowledge of the refusal of these hon. Gentlemen to present Petitions. I can only speak on the information that has been furnished to me. I understand that Mr. Walker, Member for East Worcestershire; Sir John Astley, Member for North Lincolnshire; Mr. Birley and Mr. Callender, Members for Manchester; Mr. Fortescue Harrison, Member for Kilmarnock Burghs; Mr. Baillie Cochrane, Member for the Isle of Wight; and Mr. W. E. Forster, Member for Bradford, have refused to present Petitions; the last-named right hon. Gentleman because he doubted whether the terms of the Petition were consistent with the Rules of the House. Whether that be called a refusal or a putting off is not for me to decide. Sir James Elphinstone, Member for Portsmouth; Lord John Manners, Member for North Leicestershire; and the late Mr. Gore-Langton, the Member for West Somers-setshire, also refused to present Petitions, the latter because he believed the language of the Petition was inconsistent with the Rules of the House. That is an answer to the first Question. With respect to the second, I have to say that I am utterly unable to give an answer to the hon. Member, nor do I think I ought to be expected to give one.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: One word of personal explanation. The hon. Member for Stoke stated that he was informed that I refused to present a Petition, but with the qualification that I would only present it in case it was not contrary to the Rules of the House. What is the fact—and I can give the hon. Member proof of that—is that when I was asked to present a Petition having the object to which he alludes, I distinctly stated that I would present any Petition from any of my constituents provided it was in accordance with the Rules of the House.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—SUNDAY LABOUR.—QUESTION.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Postmaster General, If it is a fact that postmasters, letter carriers, and post runners in Dublin, and all other parts in Ireland, are compelled to work on Sundays as well as week days, and from which work the postmasters and letter carriers of London are exempt; and, if so, will he inform the House what grounds there are for the non-observance of the Sabbath day in Ireland more than that of the English metropolis?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, that postmasters, letter carriers, and post runners in Dublin and in other parts of Ireland had to do some work on Sundays. That rule was not confined to Ireland; it prevailed throughout the United Kingdom, with the exception of London, where, from time immemorial, no letters were despatched on Sunday. In accordance with the Report of the Commission of 1871, Sunday labour in the rural districts was dispensed with on the application of two-thirds of the recipients of letters, and in towns at the request of the inhabitants through their local authorities. The reason why there was a Sunday delivery in Dublin was that no such application had been made by the Corporation.

LOANS—THE SPECIAL REPORT.

QUESTION.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is his intention to take any step with reference to the Special Report of the Select Committee on Foreign Loans presented to this House on the 19th instant?

MR. DISRAELI: Mr. Speaker, I reluctantly voted the other night for the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry, the information which I thought the House required not being supplied by a Member of the Committee. I did not assent to the Motion as a punishment to the printers of the newspapers—I disclaimed that at the time. Since then, the House has had recourse to another mode of obtaining the information; and I think we can hardly regret what has passed, because in future, when the House finds itself in a similar perplexing position, it will know that it has a right to apply to the Committee, whose conduct I will not say may be questioned, but involved in the discussion, to obtain the information which it can furnish. Since we have obtained that information, the House possesses all the knowledge on the particular point it desires. It knows, for instance, that the document in question was read as part of the proceedings in Committee, and that the newspapers obtained it by application to the Chairman. I have, therefore, no intention myself of making any Motion on the Report of the Committee. I can only say for the guidance of any Gentleman who may have, that, as far as my experience can guide me, no question of Privilege was involved in the presentation of that Report; and, therefore, if I had any intention, I could only put my name down on the Paper in order, and the Motion would probably come on in about two months.

BURIAL SERVICE.—QUESTIONS.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON (for Mr. WADDY) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true that the Vicar of Beckley has refusal to allow the performance of any religious ceremonial at the burial of a child in the Beckley Churchyard, on the ground that the child had been baptized in a Wesleyan Methodist Chapel only; whether it is true that when the father of the child reminded him that his wife (the child's mother) had recently been buried there, and the burial service had then been read by the Vicar himself, although she had been baptized in the same Chapel, the vicar still refused to allow the child to be buried in the same grave with its mother with the ordinary rites of Christian burial, and that the child was accordingly buried there by the sexton without any religious service whatever?

MR. HEYGATE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether a clergyman, refusing to read the Burial Service "on the ground that the deceased had been baptized in a Wesleyan Chapel only" (as alleged by the honourable Member for Barnstaple in the case of the Vicar of Beckley), would not be acting in contravention of the existing law?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: It may be convenient that I should answer both these Questions at once. I have held communications on this question, and from the statements I have received, it seems that the circumstances are substantially as they have been stated, except as to the part of the statement respecting the burial of the child. It appears also that the incumbent did not know that he was bound by law to read the burial service. The burial service was read by him over the mother, he not knowing at the time that she had been baptized at a Wesleyan chapel. I have no doubt this clergyman acted through an entirely mistaken sense of duty, and he has been admonished by the Bishop of the diocese. I am advised that there is no doubt as to the illegality of the proceeding; and, in my opinion, and probably that of most persons, it is entirely opposed to all feelings of humanity and Christianity.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMEND-MENT BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked the President of the Board of Trade, When he expects that the amended Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Bill will be in the hands of Members; and, whether he intends proceeding with it on Monday next; and, if not, if he can name a day?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: I had hoped to be able to reply that the reprint of the Merchant Shipping Bill would be out to-morrow morning. It will, however, take a day or two more to correct the proof, as I have tried, as far as possible, to insert such Amendments of hon. Members as I could wholly or partially adopt. The Government are anxious to proceed with this Bill in Committee as soon as possible, and, when it comes on, to proceed with it continuously till it gets through. It certainly cannot come on next Monday, more time must be allowed after its reprinting, and the Government nights are full till Whitsuntide. I hope it may be one of the first Bills after Whitsuntide, and on Monday next I hope to be able to name the day.

NATAL—LANGALIBALELE—ACTION OF THE CAPE COLONY—QUESTION.

MR. RICHARD asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he is able to communicate the nature of the reply that has been received from the Cape Government to Lord Carnarvon's last Despatch, proposing that the Colonial Legislature should be asked to grant special powers for the location of Langalibalele within the limits of the Colony?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, the most convenient form in which I can reply to the Question of the hon. Gentleman will perhaps be if I read, with the permission of the House, the Minute addressed by the Colonial Secretary of the Cape to Sir Henry Barkly, the Governor of that Colony—

“Colonial Secretary's Office, Cape Town,

“Minute,—Ministers having considered Lord Carnarvon's despatch, No. 19, of the 15th ultimo, on the subject of the disposal of Langalibalele and his son, beg that it may please your Excellency to assure the Secretary of State for the Colonies of their earnest desire to render their assistance, in so far as is compatible with the interests of the Colony, in finding a satisfactory solution of the difficulty in which all parties now find themselves placed. With this object in view a Bill will be prepared and submitted to the Legislature soon after the commencement of the next Session on the 14th proximo for repealing Act No. 3 of 1874, and substituting other provisions for the detention of Langalibalele and his son within certain limits on the mainland of the Colony, and for carrying out in other respects the desire of the Imperial Government in his case.—(Signed) J. C. MOLTERO.”

PEACE PRESERVATION ACT—REPORTS OF MAGISTRATES AND POLICE, WESTMEATH.—QUESTION.

MR. BUTT asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he is prepared to lay upon the Table of the House the communications received by the Irish Government from the magistrates and police authorities of the county of Westmeath and the adjacent districts; and also the paper or papers containing a statement of agrarian murders committed in Ireland in 1874? To explain the Question the hon. and learned Gentleman read the following passages from the speech of the Chief Secretary in introducing the Peace Preservation Act:—

“The Government have felt it their duty to consult, both confidentially and more or less publicly, the magistrates and police authorities of Westmeath and the adjacent districts on this matter. Of course, it is impossible for me to give in detail to the House the information which we have received on this head; but, speaking generally, I may say the magistrates and the police authorities are unanimous in assuring us that this Ribbon conspiracy exists now as strongly as ever, and that its action has only been kept down by the repressive force of this law. We are told of cases where outrages of serious character—in some instances murder—are only in abeyance on account of the existence of this Act.”—[3 Hansard, ccxxii. 1010.]

He further stated that on the 22nd of March the right hon. Baronet referred to papers containing information respecting five cases of murder.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, the public communications he referred to were resolutions passed at meetings of magistrates and published in the newspapers; but other communications were obtained as confidential communications. In making quotations from constabulary and magisterial Reports upon the circumstances of the agrarian murders committed in 1874, he was careful to confine himself to those points which were matters of public notoriety. It had been announced that the murders had been committed; that certain persons were not ready to assist in discovering the offenders; and that the offenders had not been brought to justice; and he did not mention any names except the names of the murdered persons. The whole of the documents could not be presented to the House without disclosing confidential communications which he did not read, and which he could not have intended to bring before the House.

MR. BUTT gave Notice that on Thursday he should move for the production of the Papers, so far as they were referred to in the speeches of the right hon. Baronet.

THE QUEEN v. CASTRO—THE TRIAL AT BAR.—QUESTION.

NOTICE OF MOTION FOR ADDRESS.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the hon. Member for Stoke, Whether it is his intention to avail himself of the offer of Friday night to bring on his Motion, the Notice of which he has not placed on the Paper?

DR. KENEALY: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) has been kind enough to make a suggestion to me, which in my ignorance of the Rules of the House as a new Member I am extremely thankful for, and, acting upon it, I have already placed in the hands of the Clerk a copy of the Resolution with which I intend to conclude the speech which I hope to make on Friday. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) tells me I ought to have given it to the Speaker, but I was not aware of it.

The following is the Notice of Motion:—

"The Queen v. Castro.—That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying Her Majesty to be graciously pleased to appoint a Royal Commission, to consist of Members of both Houses of Parliament, to inquire into the matters complained of with respect to the Government Prosecution of The Queen v. Castro, and to the conduct of the Trial at Bar and incidents connected therewith, and certain incidents of the said trial which have occurred subsequent thereto."

ARMY ORGANIZATION.—RECRUITS.

RESOLUTION.

LORD ELCHO, in rising to call attention to the recent Army reforms, and to move a Resolution, commenced by observing that in 1871 the Government of the day induced Parliament to incur liabilities to the amount of £7,000,000 or £8,000,000 for the purpose of establishing our military organization on a sound footing: in a subsequent year further liabilities were incurred for the same object to the amount of £3,500,000 sterling. It was thus hoped that the measures of the late Government had placed the Army on a secure footing, but sceptical letters had appeared in The Times, and sceptical speeches been made this Session; but, after the speech of the Secretary for War on the Army Estimates, the hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) expressed a hope "that the discussion on the Estimates would reassure the public;" and the leading journal spoke of "the welcome reassurance conveyed by Mr. Hardy's speech." Under such circumstances it was an ungracious and ungrateful task to play the part of Cassandra, and speak rough things when smooth things would be much more acceptable. Yet this was the task he had set himself to do. He asked then the indulgence of the House, and the more so as he could not, in treating this subject, use high-flown language such as they had heard so much of from the Opposition on the Regimental Exchanges Bill. He could not speak of woman's virtue and of soldiers' honour as they had done—honour which, in passing, he might say, was as safe in the keeping of the soldier as of any right hon. Gentleman opposite; but he would have to deal in figures of arithmetic and not in figures of speech. His talk must be of soldiers' height, age, and chest measurements; matters in themselves prosaic and sublunary, but upon which depended the honour of Nations and the fate of Empires. He should ask the House to affirm a Resolution to the following effect:—

"That the state and prospects of our present Army organization, as regards the obtaining of a sufficient and continuous supply of efficient soldiers, are calculated to cause well-grounded apprehension, and demand some immediate remedy pending the remote and uncertain results of a more complete development of the Brigade Depot system."

In this Resolution he spoke of "the present system." It was, however, only by courtesy that he called it "a system," because it was a happy-go-lucky plan of proceeding, and, in fact, we had no system at all. If a military system was gauged by the test that it involved the largest expenditure of money with the most limited possible results, then we had that system. But if, on the other hand, a sound military system depended on the organization of the manhood and power of the nation and on putting them in the field at the lowest possible cost, then we had no system at all. The fact was, we had never had a satisfactory military system in regard to men, even in the plenitude of our power in the Great War against Napoleon. We got the men at that time in the most haphazard way—by the sweepings of the gaols, by bounties, by endless Acts of Parliament, and by enlisting foreign mercenaries, of whom in 1815 we had 50,000 in our pay. In the Crimean War we had 15,000 foreign mercenaries in our pay, and he remembered Lord Ellenborough rising in his place to protest against the system of hiring foreign mercenaries to fight our battles, and yet, notwithstanding all this, when the strain of war was upon us our Army was always below its establishment. We never had up to the year 1871 an organized military system such as would supply us with a sufficient number of efficient soldiers. This, after the war of 1870, was felt so strongly that, in that year, the late Government brought in a Bill to reorganize our military system. It was divided into three parts—the abolition of Purchase, Localization, and the improvement of the Ballot Act. The latter two were dropped, and, practically, the measure was only for the abolition of Purchase. The late Prime Minister admitted this when he said that by dropping the other two parts of the Bill “the Government had lightened it of everything immaterial.” He had no wish to revive the question of the abolition of Purchase; but two points were raised in the discussion on the Regimental Exchanges Bill to which he should like to refer. The House had been told that the Purchase system “had eaten into the heart and core of the officers of the Army.” A great injury was done to the officers by that statement, because Purchase had been forced on the officers by the Government, and the Government had gained by it. It appeared by a Parliamentary Paper laid before the House that £1,772,000 had been got out of the officers by the Government sale of commissions. Mr. Joseph Hume, in 1835, made a speech with reference to this question of Army Purchase, in which, adverting to the fact that the Queen’s Pages received commissions in the Guards without Purchase, he stated that “every commission given away took between £2,000 and £3,000 out of the pockets of the public.”

The Government, therefore, made money out of the officers. The other point was with reference to the cost of this abolition of Purchase. The House had in the recent discussions frequently heard that it would cost £7,000,000 or £8,000,000. He believed that was only a small portion of the real cost of the abolition of Purchase. The present Retirement Commission was appointed, first, in order to consider the present check to promotion, which was so great that the lowest lieutenant-colonel on the list would not, it was said, become a general until 1905, and to prevent the principle which had been described as “promotion by seniority tempered by selection” from becoming “promotion by senility distempered by selection.” He should be surprised if the Retirement Commission did not arrive at the conviction that the calculation made some years ago by Captain Vivian was near the mark—that it would be impossible to establish a system of retirement or promotion in the British Army under £1,000,000 a-year. That sum represented the interest of £30,000,000, which, added to the £8,000,000 that the abolition of Purchase would cost under the present arrangement, would make the entire cost of Purchase abolition between £30,000,000 and £40,000,000. And for what? He had heard it said by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for South Durham (Major Beaumont) that Parliament had done nothing by the abolition of Purchase which it could not have done without it, and that the whole of their work was still to be done. Not long ago the leading journal commented upon a letter written by his relative, Colonel Anson. The Times said upon the letter that “the British Army was the best-fed, the best-clothed, the best-lodged, and the best-officered Army in the world.” If it were the best-officered Army in the world, they were officers who had grown up under the system of Purchase. The reforms of the late Government had, he ventured to think, failed to put our military power on a footing of efficient organization. Considerable apprehension existed on this point in the public mind, and, in order to focus it, he had tabled this Resolution. He submitted that the words “well-grounded apprehension” were, under the circumstances, a justifiable expression on his part. As regarded the men, the present supply of efficient recruits was calculated to cause the gravest apprehension. It would materially clear the ground if those who succeeded him in the discussion would, if he might make the suggestion, follow his lead and deal with this question mainly, if not entirely, with reference to the Infantry. The test of a nation's military strength and power was not its guns or its Cavalry, but the number of bayonets it could put into line at the shortest notice. The Artillery and Cavalry stood in the same relation to the Infantry of an Army which the Bass in music occupied with regard to the Treble—they were accompaniments, and nothing more. He should, indeed, have passed by the Artillery, but for a statement made by the hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock), who said that the late Government had greatly increased our Artillery. He (Lord Elcho) gave them full credit for having done so. It was true we had 336 guns; but they were only on a peace establishment, and we had neither men nor horses to put them upon a war footing. He had received a letter from an officer on this subject, whose name he would not mention, but it would carry great weight with the House. His correspondent stated that to place 336 guns on a war establishment it would be necessary to buy 8,776 horses, and to improvise 5,272 carefully-trained and instructed gunners and drivers. A battery of Horse Artillery, he said, on the peace establishment, required 143 men and 114 horses; on the war establishment, 223 men and 250 horses. A field battery on the peace establishment required 144 men and 88 horses; on the war establishment, 269 men and 253 horses. But we had only men for 60 guns Horse Artillery and 126 field batteries, and only horses for 42 guns and 78 field batteries:—total, effective, 120 guns. Now, as regarded garrison batteries, there were 2,182 guns mounted for coast defence in the three districts, 25 men per gun would be required in time of war, and we would be only able to man 200 of the 2,182 guns, not leaving one man for Scotland or Ireland. The recruiting, too, for the Artillery was falling off. The recruits were required to be men of a certain physique, and they were not getting them. Since the Recruiting Report came out, they were, in fact, short by 1,100 men, and many that we had were men of bad character, as was proved by the fact stated by a recruiting Artillery officer, who told him that he had obtained only 75 recruits where he should have obtained 300, and that of the 75 at least 40 were men who had been, as he believed, discharged with ignominy from other regiments; but owing to the abolition of marking they had no proof of it. With respect to the Cavalry, his hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Sir Henry Havelock) had stated on the Estimates that he considered the condition of that branch of the Service "deplorable." He was not disposed to go so far as his hon. and gallant Friend, as he believed the Cavalry got good recruits, and, though few in number, were in a high state of efficiency. But the true test, as he had said, was the Infantry, and on that head he would have to trouble the House with some figures taken from official documents. Taking the Estimates for the year 1875-6, he found that the Infantry at home—in England, Ireland, Scotland, and the Channel Islands—rank and file, amounted in all to 43,730, and if he added the Brigade Depôts 7,100, the total would be 50,830. He, however, made a large concession in doing so, because it was notorious that a large proportion of the Brigade Depôts consisted of old soldiers who were engaged in the training of recruits. But what they wanted was not nominal but effective soldiers, and he unhesitatingly said that a soldier under 20 years of age could not be regarded as an effective soldier. He had, therefore, to deduct from the 50,830 the number of soldiers under 20 which he found in the Blue Book for 1873-4—they had not a Return for last year, which he believed was greater. The number was 12,991, which would leave the total at 37,839. But he had to make a further deduction for casualties, such as desertion, sickness, camp and other duties, and so on. For these he would deduct one-fifth, although he would be justified in deducting one-fourth. That would amount to 7,567, which would reduce the total to 30,272, as the only effective force of Infantry we could put in line in England, Scotland, Ireland, and the Channel Island, or could count upon for home service and for strengthening regiments abroad, in the Colonies and India. With respect to the Colonies we had, there, including drafts on passage out, a total of 14,140 rank and file, and from that number he would deduct one-tenth, as many of the men were engaged in garrison duty, leaving a total of 13,726 for Gibraltar, Malta, and West Coast of Africa, the Cape of Good Hope, the Mauritius, China, Bermuda, the Dominion of Canada, and other Colonies. And on this subject he would remind the House that if the policy of denuding the Colonies of our soldiers had been carried out before the Mutiny, we should have lost India. In the main, India was saved by the troops which were sent there direct from the Cape and Mauritius. With respect to the East Indies, the Infantry of all ranks, including drafts on their way, amounted to 47,500, or, deducting one-fifth for casualties—9,500, a total of 38,000—a very poor and beggarly account, even if the men were all of the proper physique. But it might be said at least the Militia was in a satisfactory condition. Its establishment was 119,000—in reality, the total effective Infantry enrolled were only 102,000; but making deductions for casualties—men absent without leave, men under 19 years, and the men in the Militia Reserve—the Infantry amounted to only 43,190. The desertions were very numerous; out of 25,000 men there had been no fewer than 10,000 desertions. Therefore, whether they looked to the Infantry of the Line or the Infantry of the Militia as regarded numbers, they could not be considered in a satisfactory condition. War would very soon test that fact, but they had a sufficient test in the Autumn Manœuvres. He had seen by the reports of correspondents that at the manœuvres at Dartmoor the deductions for casualties amounted to one-third, and even the journals which defended the present system were obliged to admit that the result was thoroughly unsatisfactory. The regiments at the Manœuvres were very weak on parade, instead of being up to their proper strength, and in a total force of 8,000 men, the casualties amounted to 2,400 men. He came now to the question of quality. The quality of the men was a matter of the first importance, and the present unsatisfactory state of our Army organization was due largely to the inferior quality of the recruits. It appeared from Returns before the House that there were in the Infantry 3,316 men having a chest measurement of under 33 inches, 11,173 having chest measurement of between 33 and 34 inches, and 20,101 of between 34 and 35 inches, making a total of 34,600, or 28 per cent, having a chest measurement of less than 35 inches. The Army recruits were measured straight round the chest under the arms, while the police recruits were measured slantingly round the chest, whereby the former obtained an advantage of $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches in nominal chest breadth. The police standard of 37 inches chest measurement, therefore, would be equivalent to $38\frac{1}{2}$ inches according to the Army measurement; while the minimum Army standard of 33 inches would, according to the police measurement, be equivalent to only $31\frac{1}{2}$ inches. These figures showed what a different class of men was secured by the police pay of 24s. a-week as compared with that which was attracted by the Army pay of 7s. a-week. In addition to this difference in the chest measurement of the police and Army recruits, there was also a striking difference in the physical and general appearance of the two classes of men. He had, along with some Members of the House, gone to inspect first the police recruits and then those for the Army in St. George's Barracks. He asked his hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) to accompany them, because the hon. Member, to his honour be it said, had handled the pick in his youth, and had by his industry and frugality saved wherewithal to educate himself at a Scotch University and thus fit himself for the high position he now held. There could not, therefore, be a better judge than the hon. Member of the physical qualities of a recruit. The recruits that had been accepted were all drawn up in line—Artillery and Cavalry on the right, Infantry on the left—a seedy-looking lot, which, if clothed in red, would indeed have been “a thin red line.” On being shown the Infantry recruits the hon. Member had exclaimed—“Good God! is this a specimen of our Army? It is a deception,” or words to that effect. He might well say so, for it was a most miserable representation of the famous British Infantry, and it was a sad thought that the nation's honour was sponsible for the efficiency of the Army to find out, with the aid of discussions like those at the United Service Institution, what was the proper system to adopt. There were, however, certain propositions bearing upon this question so plain and simple—propositions which it required no military knowledge or training to understand, but which were matters of plain, ordinary civilian common sense, and these, he would venture to state, as they came before the House, supported by the unanimous approval of the meetings at the United Service Institution. The rules of the Institution forbade the bringing forward of resolutions; but he endeavoured to turn their flank, and submitted certain proposals, embodying his own views, in order to be able to judge whether or not they were received with favour. He first read the Resolution which he was that evening submitting to the House, and it met with unanimous approval. His next proposition was that, as regarded the manning of the Army, the state of things was most unsatisfactory. That met with great approval. He went on to say that in the present position of European armaments and feeling, we ought not to sit still and do nothing, trusting to the complete development of the Brigade Depot system in 1879. He added, that at the best the Brigade Depot system was a doubtful and insufficient remedy. That, also, met with universal sympathy and approval. Another proposition endorsed heartily by the meeting, was to the effect that if obliged to raise the existing cadres of our Infantry Battalions to a war strength, these would necessarily—from their heterogeneous composition—be less reliable and efficient than more homogeneous regiments which fought at Alma, Inkerman, and in the Indian Mutiny. That was a matter of great importance in regard to the quality of the regiments. How were their attenuated battalions to be filled up when required? The Secretary of State told them he would have to find 58,000 men for this purpose, and of these he hoped to get 7,000 men from the Army Reserve, and 23,000 or 25,000 from the Militia Reserve, who must be deducted from the strength of the Militia. The Secretary of State, therefore, would get for the regiments of the Line 25,000 Militiamen, partially trained, and little more to be compared with the soldiers in our regiments in 1853 than a Volunteer would be if put into a Line regiment such as we then had. And how was the right hon. Gentleman to obtain the remainder of the men he would require to clothe his skeleton battalions with flesh and blood? Why, by a return to that of which they were perpetually boasting that they had got rid—namely, by bribes and bounties. In that way they were to get back men who had passed from the Army into civil life, and who were under no obligation to return. Regiments thus heterogeneously composed and made up of such elements could not possibly be compared with the men who fought at the Alma and at Delhi. His gallant friend, Colonel Anson, in one of his pamphlets said, that if at the time of the Mutiny they had had such regiments and the same quality of recruits as they were now having, India would certainly have been lost. He recollected his gallant friend Colonel Colville, of the Rifle Brigade, saying that when his regiment was going to the Crimea it had to be made up to its full strength, 1,000; and that was done by getting volunteers from another battalion of the Rifle Brigade which had just come from the Kaffir War. A hundred and fifty of those seasoned warriors were put into his regiment; and what was the feeling? Why that even those 150 veterans, not knowing their commanding officer or the regiment, and the regiment not knowing them, were even an element of weakness rather than of strength to the regiment. Any civilian of common sense might conceive what a regiment of 400 or 500 boys would be with such a heterogeneous collection sent into it, as the Secretary of State looked to in order to clothe his skeletons with flesh and blood. A regiment ought to be homogeneous. The officers, non-commissioned officers, and men should know each other, and should not be made up of men thus thrown together, packed off, perhaps, at 24 hours' notice to go to uphold the honour of England in a foreign land. That was a matter on which there was no difference of opinion among the officers at the United Service Institution. Another point of which they approved was, that no recruit could be considered an effective soldier fit for service in the field under 20 years of age at the least, or over 35 for foreign service. And then, as to the Reserve of 7,000 men, it had never been called out, because they had no power to do so. The hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) told them the other night that Lord Sandhurst had "invited those who had nothing better to do"—that was the curious phrase—to go out and take a turn at the Autumn Manœuvres; but that invitation was not accepted. He therefore thought—and his opinion was endorsed by the meeting to which he had referred—that that Reserve of 7,000 men ought to have its value and its fitness tested at the Autumn Manœuvres, and that, if necessary, a Bill should be brought in to enable that to be done. Then, with respect to the Militia Reserve, it might be imagined that they had their 103,000 Militia without the Reserve, but the Reserve had to be deducted. It was General Peel's original intention that, for every man who volunteered for the Militia Reserve, the officer of the regiment from which he volunteered should raise another. They should know what their Militia and what their Reserve really were; the two should be kept separate; and the Militia Reserve should be borne in excess of the ordinary Militia establishment. That was also endorsed at the United Service Institution. The last proposal was that the Militia Reserve men should be trained, not with the Militia regiments, but with the dépôts of their affiliated Line regiments. He knew what his right hon. Friend's answer would be to these proposals; it would be this—"If I am not to take any man into the Army who is not 20, the system will break down, and I shall not be able to keep up the establishment." His answer to that was—"If your Army system and your establishment depend upon this—that you have to admit into your ranks these striplings, these weedy boys, under 20, your whole system is rotten, and it is time you endeavoured to find out some other." He went further, and said that to send them out to maintain the honour of this country and to fight the regiments of foreign troops—he did not care whether French or German—such as they might have to meet, would be, as far as regarded these men and their officers, simple murder, courting, as Lord Sandhurst said in his place, disaster and defeat; and, as regarded this nation, it was absolute treason on the part of those who were responsible for the efficiency of the Army. He felt quite certain that his right hon. Friend felt the responsibility of his position; and he (Lord Elcho) did not apprehend that the right hon. Gentleman would expose this country to the disaster which would inevitably ensue from sending out our regiments to fight in the way in which they were. He had now completed the task he had set himself; he had laid bare what he believed to be the true state of the Army. He had, to use a familiar phrase—one that would be intelligible even to the intellects that believed that Orton was Tichborne because they were convinced that he was Orton—taken the gilding off the gingerbread, and shown the nation what the value of their fairing was, and what it cost. He believed the state of things in the Army to be alarming. It was thought now that all was calm. They thought so in 1870. They had the Queen's Speech in February telling them all was serene. Then, in July, they heard from the Foreign Secretary that there was not a cloud in the horizon; but in a few weeks the Secretary of State for War had to come down there, and ask for 20,000 additional men for the Army. They were not easily obtained, for the standard had to be lowered and five months spent in getting them together. And it was with this Army they were to turn out of Belgium the soldiers of whatever nation interfered with its neutrality. Why the idea was too comical and ludicrous to be entertained seriously for a moment. He had said that his task was ungracious and ungrateful; but he hoped in discharging it, and in speaking rough things, he had not shown the slightest political feeling, or given offence to any one. He gave full credit to the late Government, and he fully admitted they did owe a debt to the noble Lord (Viscount Cardwell) for what he had done for the Army. They owed to him localization, which was sound in principle, the Autumn Manœuvres, improvement in the Volunteers, the establishment of the Intelligence Department, and they also owed to him putting on a clear footing the relations existing between the Commander-in-Chief and the Secretary of State, which he hoped was now satisfactory to both. He gave full credit to the honest purposes of the late Government; and as regarded the present Secretary of State, he had displayed a candour in his statement which showed he was endeavouring to do his best, disguising nothing in order to make things pleasant to the House of Commons. Moreover, on the question of compulsion his right hon. Friend was not like his Predecessors who had spoken on this point—he did not turn up the whites of his eyes and thank God we were not in this country as other men were, but had shadowed forth the possibility of an ultimate resort to it, saying that he was surprised at the feeling in favour of compulsion in quarters where he had least expected it. His surprise must, indeed, have been greatly increased the other day when he heard a distinguished Member for a metropolitan constituency (Sir Andrew Lusk) say that he thought sooner or later they must come to compulsion of some form or other. He (Lord Elcho) did not believe compulsion or conscription to be required for the Army. He did not advise them to Prussianize the Army; but he did say Anglicize the Militia. He did not wish to enter into any question of foreign policy, but what did they see abroad? Whole nations were in arms, and the martial hosts were such as the world had never seen before. There were thunder clouds in the sky, and they could not say how little a thing might bring these thunder clouds down. They had all been more or less frightened out of their propriety by the Belgian question. In the late war all his sympathies were with the Prussians. He looked upon that war on the part of France as a wicked, wanton, dynastic war. He had the greatest admiration for Prince Bismarck, he admired him because he was a man who knew his own mind; there was no impulsive sentimentality about him, nothing molluscous, he was essentially a vertebrate animal with moral backbone and feet; but they now saw what was the result of the German Cæsar growing great on a diet of blood and iron. When France was the ruling military Power in Europe, it appeared as if no dog were allowed to bark; but now it looked as if, Germany being the great military Power in Europe, no mouse was to be allowed to squeak. He questioned whether they were in a much better position as regarded the peace of Europe from the transfer of the military power on the Continent; but he was certain that the state of affairs abroad was such that at any moment the armed hosts might encounter each other, and therefore it was desirable that England should put her house in order. Cardinal Manning, a few days ago, when assuming his new dignity in the Church of St. Gregorio, at Rome said, the first duty of man was to his God, the second to his family, and the third to his country. No one in that House would, he thought, dispute the first of these propositions unless, indeed, it meant that duty to God implied submission and subservience to any form of sacerdotalism; but as regarded the second proposition, he would put it last. He held that a man's duty to his country was before his duty to his family. It had been so in all ages of the world, and all history showed how readily the life of husband and of child had been given and sacrificed at the call of country. In England, the love of country was as strong or stronger than in any other country in the world, and he believed they might safely appeal to it. It was, indeed, said that the nation had become degenerate, and that public duties were ignored in the eager, selfish pursuit of wealth. He denied that proposition. 150,000 Volunteers had for 15 years been giving it a living lie, and he further maintained that the flame of patriotism in this country, if it were properly fanned by the responsible authorities, would burst forth as brightly as it ever had done in any period of our history, and that it had not been quenched or put out by showers of gold. It was not, however, without accepting sacrifices of some kind that we could place our Army on a proper footing. If the Government appealed to the patriotism of the people, it would not fail them, and he invited his right hon. Friend to trust and test it, in the conviction that if he did so he would be able to fill a niche—that of the Scharnhorst of the English military system—which had been hitherto unfilled. His firm belief was, that if his right hon. Friend would rely upon the patriotism of the English people, he might place our military establishment on a sound footing, thus securing the honour of the nation and making this Empire safe. The noble Lord concluded by moving his Resolution.

COLONEL MURE seconded the Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the state and prospects of our present Army organisation, as regards the obtaining of a sufficient and continuous supply of efficient soldiers, are calculated to cause well grounded apprehension, and demand some immediate remedy pending the remote and uncertain results of a more complete development of the Brigade Depot system."—(Lord Elcho.)

MR. A. H. BROWN, referring to the Report quoted by the noble Lord, said, the remarks as to the recruits being deficient in physique applied only to the reports of some of the commanding officers. For example, the noble Lord alluded to the fact that in the Northern District the recruits consisted chiefly of men of low physique from the manufacturing towns, but this was stated by three only out of the nine commanding officers in that district. Taking the total figures for the whole country, it appeared that 78 commanding officers were satisfied with the recruits; 26 were fairly satisfied; while only 32 reported that they were not satisfied. It was plain that any local system of recruiting in this country would be complicated by the reliefs for India, and it was on that ground that all comparison between this and foreign countries would fail, and this point the noble Lord failed to see. The noble Lord was wise in discarding the idea of a general conscription; but it appeared to him that the proposed ballot for the Militia, or, rather, compulsory service for the home Army, ought likewise to be discarded, and at the present time he found that the Militia were getting more recruits than ever. It was not so much for military reasons that ballot for the Militia should not be revived, but because it was totally unfair, and because it would interfere detrimentally with the commercial undertakings which made us the richest nation in the world. We must continue on the old voluntary plan of enlistment, and see what could be done to induce men of good physique and good character to join the Army. He thought that the localization system which had been established promised, when fully developed, to prove a satisfactory means of accomplishing the object in view; and he considered that there was no system of recruiting so satisfactory as that of Brigade Depôts. The localization was already producing its fruits. According to the last Report of Major

General Taylor, the Inspector General of Recruiting, the result of the system had been that we got 3,400 more this year than we did in the preceding year, and he further said—

"This increase may, in a slight degree, be attributed to the additional number of Brigade Depôts at work, but to a still greater extent it is to be ascribed to the system generally being better understood, the several agencies performing their duties more thoroughly, and the outlying portions of the several sub-districts being brought into clear communication with their local centres."

There were causes some time ago which made men consider that the Army was not a profession to which they should resort, but those causes had been done away with. The abolition of flogging was one, and the mistaken notion about branding was another. These prevented men from entering the Army. There had been also an increase of pay, a better kit provided, and a system of short service introduced, and the stoppage for meat ration had been abolished, and as education became more developed, and all these things were better understood, both the Army and the Militia would become more popular. It certainly appeared to him that the Army had been much improved, and they had got rid of the bad characters, and by that means improved the morale of the service, and this would induce a better class of recruits to take their places. Hon. Members were hardly aware that the system of localization was not thought of for the first time in the year 1872, for it appeared that it had been gathering force for at least 10 years previously. The Recruiting Commission, 1867, said—

"On the one hand strong evidence has been laid before us to show the advantages resulting to recruiting from a local connection being maintained between individual corps and certain localities."

This showed that localization, which was the key of this question, was carefully considered then. Again, as to the pay of soldiers. Some years ago a Return was presented to that House showing the weekly pay to soldiers, and it appeared that, calculating everything, the Infantry soldier had as much as 13s. 9d., and of course the men in the Guards, Artillery, and Cavalry had much more. Now, he found that in some districts the wages of unskilled labourers in the agricultural districts were not so good as the pay of the soldiers of the Line. For instance, in Dorsetshire the wages of an agricultural labourer were between 9s. and 12s. per week; in Surrey the wages were between 13s. and 14s.; and in Hampshire, between 9s. and 10s. In the northern counties the wages were between 12s. and 18s.; but, practically, in the other counties the pay of an Infantry soldier and the wages of an unskilled labourer were about equal. Further, soldiers of the Line could look forward to good-conduct pay, while the agricultural labourers had nothing more to expect than their wages all the year round. Some persons seemed to wish to have men in the Army equal to the police constables; but they were, in fact, skilled and educated men, as they had to perform very important duties—duties of a higher character than those of an Infantry soldier—and to have men in the Army of that class, and pay them at the police rates, would be a waste of public money. It had been suggested that if recruiting into the Militia were stopped, all those who recruited into the Militia would go into the Line; but he did not believe that half of that class which now went into the Militia would go into the Line, because a great proportion of that class were men of skilled labour. Therefore, to stop recruiting into the Militia would, in his opinion, be a great mistake. To sum up all that which he had pointed out, he thought that the only way in which they could get good recruits for the Army would be to popularize the Depot Brigade system and to carry it out as was being done now—that was, to have troops in the midst of the large populations to localize our forces and connect them to particular places; and he contended that there was nothing in the military service which bore out those fears which some men prophesied, and that they would be able to get recruits, as far as they needed them, under the voluntary system of enlistment.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL said, he should not have referred to the question of conscription but for the fact that very recently a prize had been awarded to an essay, the writer of which said, in effect, "give me conscription and I will give you an Army." This was no doubt true; but the whole idea of a conscription was so alien to the feelings of the nation that its adoption would lead to the country generally pronouncing against the maintenance of a standing Army. The question which the House had to consider was whether the voluntary system had been fully and fairly tried, and had broken down to the extent which had been alleged. He agreed with the noble Lord who had brought this question forward that the present physique and condition of the Army were unsatisfactory; and he hoped the Secretary of State for War would not consider him obtrusive if he suggested the propriety of his giving the House some information as to the condition in which he found the Depot Centres on taking office and their condition at the present time. As far as his information went, there was appointed at each Depot Centre a Colonel and a Staff, whose duty it was to enlist recruits; but, if report spoke truly, there were in many places where these Centres had been established no recruits to be enlisted. Therefore, the duties of the officers appointed must be very light. Their position reminded him of what he saw when he visited a nobleman in Ireland some years ago. He found a coachman and plenty of helpers on the premises, but no horses and no carriages. As far as the question of physique was concerned, the hon. Member who had last spoken did not seem to think the condition of the Army was nearly so bad as it was represented to be by the noble Lord and other authorities who had spoken and written on the subject. Now, a short time ago he had a short conversation with a Bedford magistrate and asked him whether, in his opinion, the county to which he belonged was doing its fair share in supplying men to the Army and Militia. The reply was that the county sent a fair stamp of men into the Militia, and that as for the Reserves Bedford Gaol was full of them. On hearing this he communicated with another Bedfordshire magistrate—Sir John Burgoyne—an old Guardsman who had seen much service in the Crimea and elsewhere. Sir John, who was a visiting justice of the county sent him some details with reference to 96 military prisoners who, at the date of his letter—February 26, 1875—were undergoing various terms of imprisonment in Bedford Gaol, under sentence of courts martial, adding—

"It is deplorable to see such a miserable lot of men bearing the name of soldiers, and I am convinced that three-fourths of them can never be made available for any service except to swell the Returns of the Recruiting Department, which some of them have done several times over. No wonder our Army is costly when we enlist and maintain in gaol men who are utterly worthless and useless."

The memoranda referred to—and for which Sir John Burgoyne was solely responsible—set forth that one man enlisted in June, 1872, had been three times tried and sentenced by courts martial and had passed two-thirds of his time in prison; a second man enlisted in May, 1874, had since that time been once sentenced to imprisonment by the civil power, and had been twice sentenced by courts martial for desertion; and had only done duty for about two months. A third soldier enlisted in August, 1871, had been three times tried and convicted by courts martial for desertion and had also fraudulently enlisted on three separate occasions. There were several other cases included in the list which were equally strong in the same direction. The feeling of the soldiers themselves on this question was much stronger than most people believed. A short time ago he saw a letter in which a non-commissioned officer on duty at Aldershot said—

"I am getting tired of this treadmill work. We have over and over again the same thing—desertion and rejoining from desertion with courts martial, as the order of the day. What a farce they have turned soldiering into! The word soldiering is not applicable to it, nor has it been for the past few years. You will remember Farr, and his is one out of hundreds of cases. He deserted from Belfast, turned up again in the 25th Regiment, and, being tried, went through his punishment. He afterwards joined the dépôt, and having deserted again turned up next in the 26th Cameronians, where he was once more tried and punished for his offence. He tell us that while in a state of desertion from us on the last occasion, he got a kit out of the 106th Regiment before he joined the Cameronians. It is now ten to one whether the authorities will discharge him, and if they do they will not cure the disease. Unless branding or something as good is introduced, we shall only be dealing with figures, not soldiers. In July next I intend to leave the service, after 23 years' service, and I feel as able to soldier as ever. I would feel insulted if I was compared to some who are joining now as far as stamina is concerned."

The noble Lord had referred to the police constables, and wished to have the same sort of men in the Army; but the fact was the Government wanted men for constables, letter-carriers, and tidewaiters, and competed for them, and then from the mass of the worthless left behind they recruited for the Army. In 1868, he endeavoured to induce the House to accept a scheme which would have entitled men who had served a certain time in the Army to writerships and other posts of employment in the Government Service. This proposal was received favourably at the time by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), who was then at the head of the Government, but up to the present time nothing definite had been done concerning it. In a discussion which took place at the United Service Institution a short time ago, Sergeant Major Leith Adams gave some testimony which bore so much on the stature and condition of the troops that he would venture to quote a short extract. That officer said—

"Now, I must candidly assert that the physique of our Infantry is not at present up to the standard of our race, and I cannot conceal from myself a feeling that, unless remedial measures are adopted, it will sink lower and lower. This conclusion has been arrived at mainly from my personal inspection of about 25,000 recruits, over 17,000 of whom have been passed into the Army. There is no gainsaying the fact that the numbers and quality of recruits have been steadily declining of late years, more so since the introduction of short service and doing away with pensions, &c."

At the business meeting of a company with which he was connected it was his duty on one occasion to declare a dividend of 6 per cent, upon which a shareholder proposed 12 per cent, adding that it was the Directors' business, not his, to find the money. In the same way some hon. Members thought their duty had been sufficiently discharged if they called attention to the evils of the present recruiting system, leaving it to the Government to find a remedy. But that was not the view he took of the matter, and he had accordingly drawn up a series of recommendations on the subject, which he ventured to submit to the Government and the House. One of his suggestions was that all applicants for employment in certain grades of public Departments, such as policemen's, tidewaiters', and postmen's places, should be asked to serve for a certain term in the Army; after which, if their conduct was good and they were properly qualified, they should have the preference over all other persons. Under that system some 120,000 or 130,000 men, trained to the use of arms, would be kept in the public service ready to be called upon in the event of any national disaster threatening, and that without costing the country a single shilling. By this means, also, we should get into the ranks that superior class of men of whom so much was heard and so little seen, instead of the deteriorated class which was now enlisted. In proof of the necessity of introducing this superior element into the Army, he would read an extract from a letter which he had just received from Captain Walter, an officer who had been largely instrumental in originating the Corps of Commissionaires—

“ I have lately occupied myself with examining the statistics of the Corps of Commissionaires, and find that since its foundation in 1859 no less than 2,334 pensioners have joined. Out of this number upwards of 25 per cent have been discharged for misconduct. Now, as those who have been admitted are above the average standard of character, the fact just mentioned is a proof to my mind that the morale of the Army is not what it ought to be, and far below what it used to be. Some persons are easily pleased, and, of course, if the moral or physical standard is sufficiently lowered it will be easy to prove that the recruits of the present day are equal to the prescribed tests. The result of my experience here obliges me to say that the present state of the Army is deplorable, and my recollections of the service as a regimental officer from 1843 to 1853 also convince me that any comparison between that period and the present is equally disadvantageous to the latter. In no point, however, is the difference so striking or so important as in the quality of the non-commissioned officers.”

He had no doubt that later on the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War would refer to the experiment which had been tried by the Postmaster General to give employment to soldiers. The Postmaster General, in his Report on the subject, stated that out of 220 nominations, not fewer than 103 failed, eight persons declined the medical examination, some were found too old, the addresses of others could not be found, and 22 persons were without any character, and out of the whole only 40 were admitted into the service. That attempt, therefore, to benefit the service had signally failed. Now, he should like to know whether the selection had been fairly made, and how it was made—whether the officers were asked if they had a number of men whom they could recommend as fit for the service. If they were taken from the Reserve he did not think that any fair case had been made out against the system. He would now refer to a few matters, and would offer them as suggestions towards an improvement in the service. In the first place he would say, re-introduce the long service with pensions. He would couple that with a shorter service, to be rewarded in the manner which he had described. He would make the Militia the real Reserve, and add recruiting to the Regular Army. He looked on the Reserve in a great degree as a delusion, and believed that the number would not exceed 37,000 in the year 1880. He would further say, officer the Militia with those who had served in the Regular Army and the Reserve, and that officers going on half-pay should be bound to serve with some portion of the Reserve Forces if required. He would allow exchanges at the discretion of the authorities between the active and the Reserve forces. He would suggest that men who, before completing their service, were considered unfit for foreign service, but were fit for the performance of home duties, should be transferred to the Militia, and not discharged as they were at present; that pensioners should be borne on the strength of the Militia, and paid by its Staff; and that the pay of sergeant majors should be increased, and that sergeants should retain their good conduct pay. With regard to the last point, he would point out that the condition of no class in the Army was more deserving of attention than that of the non-commissioned officers. A good many officers of experience were of opinion that it would be a good thing that disciplinary battalions should be formed either in India or elsewhere abroad, and that all bad characters should be transferred to them and not discharged as at present. That was, in his opinion, a better plan than discharging men and leaving them to re-enlist. Such a system had succeeded in the French Army, and the service was by no means unpopular with the officers. Again, something must, in his opinion, be done to check the desertion and re-enlistment, and the most natural and simple measure of precaution was to mark the men and officers on joining in the arch of the foot, and so afford a perfect mode of identification. They ought not to shrink from applying remedies because they might for a moment risk a little popularity.

Sir Charles Russell

MAJOR BEAUMONT referred to the Returns showing the number of recruits who had joined the various branches of the service from 1870 to 1874, for long and short service respectively. In 1870 there enlisted in the Line 12,000 for long service and 2,000 for short service. Last year only 1,400 enlisted for long service as against 10,000 and upwards for short service. The proportion of men, therefore, who preferred short service was 40 times greater than it was four years ago. It was true that in the Cavalry and the Artillery that was not the case, but then those services were exceptional. In the Engineers for the first three years no one enlisted for long service; but during the past year there were 287 enlistments for short as against 188 for long service. These figures showed, he thought, that short service was growing in popularity. Again, as to the quality of the recruits obtained, he was of opinion that the Returns were not altogether unsatisfactory. He was not, at the same time, one of those who thought that the quality of our recruits was all that was desirable. On the contrary, he looked forward with hope to the introduction of a better class of men into our Army. He, nevertheless, maintained that the Returns disposed of the arguments which were published in the public papers some time ago, to the effect that our Army was being recruited by men who were in every sense unfit to be soldiers. As to short service as it now existed, it was not really short service. It involved enlistment for 12 years, of which six were spent with the colours and the remainder in the Reserves; while no provision was made for the soldier when he had concluded his period of service. There were, he might add, two classes of men who enlisted, as it might be, for either short or long service, for the man who enlisted for the latter must make the profession of arms his business; whereas in the case of the former his connection with civil life was not to so great an extent interfered with. The term of six years, however, did not seem to him to be happily chosen; because while it was sufficient to break a man off to a great extent from his civil connection, it was a longer period than was necessary to make him an experienced soldier. For these reasons he maintained that the short service system, as introduced by Lord Cardwell, had not had a fair trial. He most emphatically protested against the idea that compulsion must necessarily be associated with a short-service system. Our position differed from that of Germany, inasmuch as we were able to fix upon a certain number of men as sufficient for the defence of the country. But on the Continent, where the Army was nothing less than the whole fighting force of the country, there arose at once a reason for compulsion. The raising of a sufficient force was a question of sufficient pay, and he held it would be a far cheaper arrangement for us to find the pay directly and hand it over to the men in the shape of so much coin than to tax the industries of the country by taking away those who were engaged in them when they were most wanted. He was one of those who regretted that Lord Cardwell had not gone further in the way of short service. Speaking of the Infantry, and not of special services, he would like to see men enlisted to serve with the colours for three years, and then paid really well on passing into the Reserve. Such an engagement would, in reality, amount to service almost for life, because when a man had served with the colours he would pass into the First Reserve and then into the Second Reserve, and when he had completed the full number of years he would be released from military service. It would be neither wise nor politic for the State to take the best years of a man's life and then turn him adrift, a disgrace to our humanity and a scarecrow to deter others from enlisting. A man who had served his full time ought to be placed absolutely above want. The cheapest way for the State to do this was not by paying a pension which had not been earned, but by increasing each man's pay gradually, keeping back a certain amount, and on the completion of his service handing over to him a sort of terminable annuity, which would end with his life. He did not expect he would be supported by the opposite side of the House when he said that the beginning and ending of all Army reform was the stopping of all recruiting from the Militia. Only in that way could they prevent one service from clashing with another, and secure that one "harmonious whole" of which so much had been heard and so little seen. Lord Cardwell and other high authorities had said that there was nothing to be urged against his plan in theory, but that its weak point was we could not get the men. It was said that this short service would require 30,000 or 40,000 men every year. Well, the Returns showed that in 1874 we obtained 20,000 recruits for the Regular Army; and if to these were added the recruits for the Militia, irrespective of the Volunteers, the requisite number would be almost reached. It was said that the men who recruited for the Militia were of a different class from those who recruited for the Army. He admitted that; but if short service were introduced a better class of men would be got. No doubt it would be better to stop recruiting from the Militia, but he did not say that this should be done at once; but if it were correct that by shortening the period of service and increasing the reserve pay the country would get a better class of men as soldiers, then there was the strongest reason for pushing the short service system to its legitimate conclusion. He thought they were much indebted to Lord Cardwell for the two great propositions he had introduced—the abolition of Purchase and short service. Army reformers desired that the country should be divided into military districts, each with a corps d'armées ready to take the field; and although that had not resulted from recent legislation such a state of affairs was not impossible under it. He might add, in perfect sincerity, that so long as the necessary steps were taken he would be as happy if they emanated from the opposite benches as if they were proposed by the Party with which he usually acted.

SIR HENRY PELLY said, he trusted he should receive the indulgence of the House when he said a few words on this most important subject. It was the first time he had addressed the House, and he would not trespass long upon their attention. He had served in the Army for 10 years, and took the greatest interest not only in it, but in the great object of its existence—the safety, honour, and integrity of the Empire. No one who had attentively listened to the speech of his noble Friend could venture to deny that it was supported by figures and facts which were not his own, but official Returns which were in the hands of Members, and incontrovertible. His noble Friend confined his remarks to the Infantry. All soldiers would agree that in that branch lay the real strength, the true test of efficiency, of an Army. He was a Cavalry officer himself, and must admit, with regard to the Cavalry, what the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan) said of Artillery—that, however highly important, however indispensable—they were only auxiliary to Infantry. Looking, then, at the state of the Infantry force, so far from taking a pessimist view of its state, he considered that his noble Friend had considerably under-estimated the probable inefficients at one-fifth. All experience pointed to a much higher proportion. Even allowing his noble Friend's figures to be correct, what force had we to oppose to the armed millions of Continental Powers? Only 30,000 bayonets, after deducting those who were, from physique and extreme youth, utterly unfit to take part in a campaign. He had no remedy to propose for the present state of things beyond that proposed by his noble Friend; but there was one point intimately connected with the question on which he might make some suggestion which the War Minister might think worthy of consideration. He referred to the epidemic of desertion which afflicted the Army. He ventured to suggest that it would be advisable to have a central dépôt for all recruits at Aldershot or elsewhere that might be decided on, where they might be kept for a month's instruction; and if they deserted and reappeared, they would be again brought under the same instruction. The expense would be much smaller than with 5,572 deserters from the Army out of 20,640 recruits, very many of whom re-enlisted. Then, again, the police, who formerly received £1 for the apprehension of a deserter, now only received 10s., at the discretion of magistrates. Though extra money should not make the police more zealous in the performance of their duty, it undoubtedly did so. He also thought it would be necessary to return to the system of "marking" with the letter "D." The question admitted of no delay. When danger came—as it might at any moment—where were they to turn for help? The time had long since passed when an Army could be raised for an existent war. Could they trust to a levée en masse? That was a "broken reed at best." Their levies would be scattered, as Gambetta's were, like chaff before the wind. He supported the Motion, in the belief that, if carried, it would materially assist the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War in the arduous task which the Army and the country felt he so ably discharged.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, though a difference of opinion might exist upon many points which had been adverted to by the noble Lord, yet everyone must agree that the bringing forward of this Motion was timely, inasmuch as it would enable the authorities to show to the country that they were alive to the importance of the subject, and quite prepared to effect those changes which were required to make our Army more efficient. He differed from the noble Lord on those points where he found fault with the present organization of the Artillery. At no time in our history had we such a fine force of Artillery as we had at the present time. We might not have a war establishment of horses; but as regarded men the batteries were nearly of the same strength as the Indian batteries, and our field Artillery in India had been maintained of late years on an efficient footing, and had never failed to perform its duties. At the present time we had no fewer than 366 field-pieces, completely manned. There might be some deficiency of ammunition waggons; but our present establishment of field batteries was considerably in excess of the establishment maintained in Germany, which had no greater advantage than we had in procuring horses. He could not from the Reports see that the recruits were inferior to those enlisted under the system of 21 years' service, although he admitted that we had failed in obtaining the improved material which had been expected from short service, the fact being that about the same class of men enlisted as formerly. In the course of the inquiry of 1866 he became well aware that there were many men in the Army under proper age, and who were not fit for the work. General Peel, in view to improve the Army by inducements to join the service, added to the pay of the soldiers, which increased the expenditure of the Army by £500,000 a-year. No doubt pecuniary advantages were a great inducement to men to join the Army; but this increase of pay, unaccompanied by the adoption of certain other recommendations of the Royal Commission, had not been effectual either in respect to increasing the number or improving the quality of the recruits. He had always considered that some improvement in the condition of the non-commissioned officers was much wanted. The practice of the Indian Army was a good example to follow; and if good men were raised from the non-commissioned grades to the warrant-officer rank to fill situations in the Store and Commissariat Departments it would elevate their position, while it would not entail upon them those expenses which made Army commissions of such doubtful advantage to them. He also viewed the present rule of enlisting every man for a fixed period of short service as unwise. He would allow a soldier great latitude as to the period of enlistment—if not for one year he would certainly let him join for three years' service. The permission to enlist for three years' service during the Crimean War was a great inducement. There was also something to learn from the experience of India under the East India Company. When he first entered the Indian service the men were enlisted under Wyndham's old Act for three periods of seven years' each. At the end of the first seven years a small bounty was given to a man if he was willing to serve for another seven years. After the 14 years he had earned the right to receive a small pension; but if he were in good health he might receive another bounty, and serve for a third period. A short service could always be extended. All that was necessary was for a soldier whose service was about to expire to give a three months' warning-notice of his intention to leave, or of his desire to extend, his service, which need not be accepted if the soldier was objectionable. Then came the difficulty of obtaining men for the existing universal service in all parts of the world. He was one of those who thought it impolitic to abolish the special European Army for India. It was too late to return to that separate Army system. He would, however, urge that the existing service at home and abroad should be so arranged as to enable recruits to know how they might enlist to go to India. Under the old system of an Indian Army when there was a difficulty in obtaining recruits for service elsewhere the Indian service was invariably full, and any number of men might be obtained. During the Crimean War Lord Hardinge did all he could to induce the recruits for Indian regiments to volunteer for service in the Crimea, but they refused, preferring to go to India. Arrangements for obtaining recruits for colonial service might be more difficult, but something might also be done in this direction. He must say he was never satisfied with the mode in which the recruiting service was carried on. He felt disposed to advocate the separation of the recruiting department from the military branch at the War Office, believing that those duties might be more efficiently performed—separate and special branches organized in communication with or by the registrars of births, marriages, and deaths in the various districts. He thought it was worthy of the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman whether the civil organization could not be so improved and enlarged as to enable it to perform the duties which were now fulfilled by the recruiting department of the Army. He would urge improved modes of raising recruits voluntarily, in order to prevent conscription, which had been mentioned as applicable to the Militia. Once let a Government have the power of forcing men into the ranks of the Army and there was the greatest risk, as in Germany, that it would be turned into a force of an offensive description. It would be dangerous to entrust any Government with such a power. The extension of the agencies for recruiting was the most urgent needed, for the success of recruiting depended on the number of recruiters, and just in proportion as they covered the country with recruiters so the Horse Guards succeeded in obtaining recruits. The Guards always had a larger proportion of men detached for recruiting than any other regiment, and the Guards formerly never had any difficulty in obtaining the number they wanted. With respect to the formation of dépôt centres, in this view, no doubt, if rightly formed, they were improvements, but he did not think they were sufficiently numerous to secure the results in respect of recruiting which was expected of them. The noble Lord the Member for Haddington had referred to the state of things which prevailed during the Crimean War, and compared it with that which now existed, and certainly the comparison was one which deserved attention on the part of our military authorities. During that war our Army, though largely and expensively augmented, yet it dwindled away to nearly as low a position as it was in now, or, rather, it never was able to raise the men that Parliament had voted for its ranks. That was owing to the fact that either the Militia failed to furnish the requisite proportion of recruits to the Army or to the defects in our recruiting system in not raising men, or perhaps to both causes. At all events, it was plain that, from whatever cause, the Army was then very far below its fixed establishment, and the fact was important in view of the question whether if war broke out we had the organization whereby we could bring our Army up to the requisite standard, or even be able to maintain our present force. At the present moment we had fewer rank and file than we had in 1854, while the expenses of the Army—owing, among other things, to the existence of those small and attenuated battalions which had been referred to—were greater now than they were then. During the War with Russia, our dépôts held large numbers of young lads; but Lord Raglan, in the Crimea, used strong language as to these boys being sent out as soldiers; this had been and was now a great defect in our Army as compared with that of Germany. There the main body of the men were fully matured, aged from 24 to 28, in all their bodily strength, no doubt the results of universal service. He believed that with proper organization we could procure the required number for our Army of men who would be free from the defects which Lord Raglan pointed out. He quite agreed with the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) that the force of Infantry we could place in the field appeared to be small; but if they looked to their total strength which was, or could be, made available, he did not think there was any cause for alarm, seeing that they had no fewer than 208,000 privates of Infantry, including Militia, Guards, and Infantry of the Line, and under proper arrangements, these could be largely increased. With such a force, if they abstained from interfering with the affairs of the Continent, he could not but think that they were in a position to defend the Kingdom and maintain the honour of the Empire.

MR. BUTLER - JOHNSTONE remarked that this question had become a most stupendous one, in view of the declaration of our Colonels that they would not be answerable for the consequences if they had to go into action with men of the class that now formed our regiments. Many useful suggestions had come from both sides of the House; but, even if they were all adopted by the Government, they would, in his opinion, bear but little fruit. The real fact requiring to be taken into consideration was the state of the labour market. He did not for a moment believe that the lack of recruits was owing to the unpopularity of the British Army, but it was due to the labour market. Seeing what large wages men could get in almost every civil employment, it was absurd to expect that in times when the excitement of war was wanting they would give up such prospects for the small pay our soldiers received. On the other hand, it would be impossible for our Estimates to bear the strain of paying our soldiers such a sum as would enable us to compete for men in the skilled labour market. It had been remarked many years ago that the question of armaments was a question of policy. Now, if there was any nation in Europe bound over to keep the peace it was England. Any English statesman who would adopt a warlike policy would be regarded as a raving lunatic. But with other nations the standing policy seemed to be one of war, and not of peace. If, then, England, with her peaceful instincts, retired from the councils of Europe, the guarantees of peace were proportionately diminished. There were probably Powers which must desire that the present state of military paralysis in England should continue; while those who, in England, desired only the continuance of her trade must observe with dismay that the voice of England was hushed among the nations. Lovers of free institutions everywhere, also, must lament that our armaments should be allowed to be the laughing-stock of Europe. It was right, then, that they should not rashly disarm, but that they should rather look well to their armaments. And this was precisely what other countries were doing. Germany led the way with her landstrum. France with her territorial army was doing the same thing, and Austria had followed suit, all her subjects having to serve under the standard. Even Italy, which had nothing to gain from war, and Denmark and Sweden, who ought to be beyond the reach of these baneful influences, had been seized with the mania, and were in arms. What was the reason of Europe thus bristling with bayonets? It arose out of the transactions of the late war. At the end of that struggle, England was not able to prevent a territorial re-distribution. It was, in fact, a territorial re-distribution which had brought this state of things about; and the peace of Europe at the present moment was not worth 12 months' purchase. Had England been able to prevent this territorial re-distribution the certainty of European complications at no distant date would have been prevented. But England was unwilling or unable to do so. The consequence had been that Europe was now armed to the teeth. The great practical question was this—What was the military organization that would least affect the trade and the industry of the nation? He should be sorry to see our Military Estimates increased. He thought that if £14,000,000 was not enough to secure our military position there must be something more needed than the supply of money. What we really wanted was a small standing Army that could be rapidly and extensively increased in time of war. Raw recruits would be of no use in an emergency, for the war would be over before they could be made available. Lord Cardwell's Reserves were ludicrously inadequate to the task of supplementing our standing Army in case of necessity. What we required was not a Prussian, a French, or a Continental system, but an English system of reserves, which should be suited to the genius and the character of the people. In this country the people could not be hurried into war without their consent, and, therefore, we did not require those large legally organized reserves to carry out a policy which it was anticipated would be unpopular. He agreed with what had been already stated this evening, that the well-drilled men who should swell the ranks of the Regular Army in time of war should come from the Militia. He should like to see the Militia formed into a permanently embodied force, in which every man in England, whatever his rank or position, should be required to serve for 12 months. At the end of the term of service, the men should be allowed to merge themselves in the civil population, and no compulsion should be used to force them again into the ranks even in time of war. He had such confidence in the military spirit of the nation that he was certain that in time of danger such numbers of well-drilled men would rush into the Army as would astonish the world. Should such a system be adopted, our standing Army might be still further reduced, and we might return to the old system of long service. To some such system the country must eventually come if we wished to preserve our position, and not to become a cypher in the councils of Europe or the prey of nations that envied our greatness and our foreign possessions. He could not concur in the noble Lord's expression of astonishment at finding that the hon. Member for Finsbury (Sir Andrew Lusk) regarded some form of compulsory enlistment as inevitable. Patriotism and public spirit were not a monopoly of either side of the House; and when it became desirable to adopt compulsion, hon. Members who sat on the Opposition benches would no doubt be as ready as others to give it their support. It was not a question which could be brought at once to an issue; the feeling of the country was not yet prepared for compulsion; but he, for one, felt confident that the military system of England would eventually be placed on a satisfactory basis. Whatever might happen, he trusted this would never become a Party question.

MR. W. M. TORRENS said, he could not agree with some of the observations of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Butler-Johnstone). He must dissent from the doctrine that the exigencies which were anticipated as possible required the House to consider whether it was not their duty, in some form or other, to entertain the principle of compulsory military service. Surely the richest country in the world did not require to have recourse to the expedient of imposing a poll tax upon the people. That was a semi-barbarous proceeding, of which despotic and bad Governments were so fond, and which was the curse of modern Europe. He supposed there was not a man in that House that did not deplore the exigency of war; but he hoped, also, there was not one who would not be ready to support a Minister who, at the risk of unpopularity, did not shrink from coming down to that House informing it that an ally was in danger, and proposing to it what his Cabinet thought necessary for maintaining the historic honour of the country. At the same time, he had for the last few years regarded with increasing anxiety the very imperfect system of recruitment existing in connection with our Army. Four years ago, as the result of a Motion he made, an Address was presented to Her Majesty praying that—

"She will be graciously pleased to give directions that measures be taken to prevent as far as practicable Soldiers enlisted in any Regiment of Cavalry or Infantry of the Line, being called upon to serve Her Majesty out of the United Kingdom, who shall not have attained the age of twenty years."

The Royal Message, in reply, said—

"The subject of your Address had already engaged the attention of My Government, and I have given additional directions in conformity with your desire."

There could be no higher authority on this subject than Professor Aitkin, of Netley, who had forcibly drawn attention to the high percentage of soldiers under 20 brought to the hospital, and who, in a preface to one of his lectures, had written as follows:—

"If military duties and drill do not lead directly to the premature death of the young soldier, they sooner or later lead to his discharge as unfit for duty. Thus he becomes a burden on the civil population, with one or more of his vital organs damaged, for the remainder of his life."

However difficult and at whatever cost he abjured the Minister that this wretched system should cease for ever. In no other country in the world was the physiological and practical mistake made of risking the defence of the country on the shoulders of those who were incompetent and incapable of doing the work required of them. He spent yesterday at Netley, and the best request he could make was that Members should visit that place and see the patients for themselves, and they would not wonder, when they considered that these young men had to undergo hunger, thirst, and night watches, and were liable to every disease and tropical ailment, that the Army dwindled in numbers. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War would keep the pledge given four years ago, and, moreover, that he would adhere to the words he had himself spoken a few weeks ago when he moved a Vote of £4,500,000 for 129,000 men. It was men the money had been voted for, and men they ought to have. In Germany, about which we heard so much, no one was allowed to bear arms before he was 20. [Lord ELCHO: Twenty complete.] Indeed, there could not be found in any European country a parallel to the state of things in this. The way to maintain peace was to let our neighbours see that we were able to maintain it; there was no other security for us now-a-days, and we could never vindicate ourselves to our people and our children unless we took care sometimes, when the country was quiet and prosperous, to obtain an efficient Army. That eminent physician, Sir William Fergusson, referring to the extreme youth of our soldiers, said—

“There is good reason to believe that evil must arise from sending recruits to India at an early age. Men of experience are against the practice, and, physiologically, I consider it unfair to the constitution of a born Englishman.”

The Chancellor of the Exchequer appeared to entertain the idea that we should keep the peace volens volens as long as possible, and that with that view he was prepared to charge the country with a larger sum than was otherwise necessary in order to pay off the National Debt. He (Mr. Torrens) was prepared to vote any amount of money that might be necessary to secure real soldiers and place the defences of the country on such a footing that no jealous, envious, or ill-natured enemy dare attack us. The pension which formerly induced adults to join the service had been taken away, and now they wondered that men did not enlist. He said, let them restore the pension which their fathers were wise enough to offer the soldier, and let them also, if requisite, give him better pay. He believed that the people of England were not so degraded, so unworthy of the name they bore, to whatever party they belonged, as to shrink from the sacrifices which might be demanded of them to uphold the honour and security of their country.

COLONEL NORTH said, that the question was how were they to have an Army for the defence of the country, and it appeared to him that they were doomed never to gain anything by experience. The Royal Commission of 1866 on Recruiting gave a most prophetic warning, winding up their Report by remarking that recent events had taught us that we must not rely in future on having time for preparations; that wars would be sudden in their announcement and short in their duration; and woe to the country which was unprepared to defend itself against any contingency that might arise or any combination that might be formed against it. Those words were scarcely written before the war between Prussia and Austria in 1866, followed three or four years later by the struggle between France and Germany, occurred to give them only too complete a verification. Were we, he asked, only to look to the defence of the country, and never to contemplate the time when we might have to fulfil any of the engagements into which we had entered? Again, were we in a position to meet such another war as that of the Crimea, and also at its close to encounter another Indian Mutiny, should the stern necessity arise? Why, only two years ago, when an expedition of about 2,000 men was about to be sent into Africa, we were obliged, in order to find those men, to break up three regiments; and that fine regiment the 42nd Highlanders had to borrow 137 men from the 79th Highlanders. Was that, he asked, a state for an Army to be in? In 1868-9, when Sir John Pakington was War Minister, our force was 137,530 men; but in 1869-70, the year in which the Franco-German War broke out, when Mr. Cardwell succeeded him, the number was reduced by 24,000. He believed great harm had been done to the different branches of the service by the constantly changing policy which had been pursued. The Army of this country in time of peace might be comparatively small; but, whatever it was, it should be in the highest state of efficiency, and capable of expansion upon the contingency of a sudden outbreak of war. Who were the men to keep up the real esprit de corps of our Army? The old soldiers of our military service of whom the Duke of Wellington said that they were the soul and strength of the regiment; and Lord Cardwell had said much the same thing. But where were they now to be found? He deeply regretted the withdrawal of the old pension system, believing that the change had had a most injurious effect upon our military strength. The system of economy had been carried to such an extent that the defences of the country were seriously imperilled. As an illustration of that system, he might mention this fact. A regiment which was quartered in Dublin applied for an escort to carry its colours to Lichfield Cathedral, to be there deposited. The answer given to the application was, that a sergeant might be sent in charge of the colours, but the country must be put to no expense on account of the matter. An officer of the regiment, being disgusted with this reply, carried the colours himself to Lichfield Cathedral; but on approaching the place of their destination he was met by a crowd who followed him under the belief that he was an acrobat. He fully agreed with many of the remarks of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), especially as regarded the class of men who were now enlisted into our regiments, and he hoped the Government would give the subject their earnest attention.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN said, they had had speeches addressed to them that night from almost every quarter of the world of military criticism. There was one thing which he observed in connection with debates on this subject—that so long as the speakers confined themselves to the destructive part of the argument their unanimity was wonderful; but the moment they attempted to disclose to the House the cures they would apply to the evils they were so forward in exposing their unanimity ceased, and they became wide as the poles asunder. So far as he could make out, also, if any one of their theories were adopted, the supporters of the other theories would bestow upon it more acute criticism and view it with even greater animosity than they displayed towards the system which now existed. He had a few words to say, first as to the evils alleged to exist, and then as to the remedies proposed. They had heard a great deal as to the numbers in the Army. The noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire had taken the year

1853, and had compared the number of Infantry at that time with the number of Infantry serving in 1873. Now, he would observe that the year 1853 was one in which there was a larger force maintained in the United Kingdom than in the previous or subsequent years. The number of Infantry was 50,458 in 1851; 45,932 in 1852; 53,651 in 1853; and 49,325 in 1854; but he presumed the noble Lord took the year 1853 because it was exactly 20 years before 1873. [Lord Elcho: I took the Infantry on the whole establishment, in England and the Colonies.] The noble Lord had spoken of the Infantry in England, Scotland, and the Channel Islands, and then went on to refer to the whole establishment. It was of the former only that he was now speaking. Of course, the noble Lord was entitled to take for the purpose of his comparison a year exactly 20 years distant, but it was only fair to remark that, as it happened, in that year the force was exceptionally large. Having stated that, in 1873, there were altogether, rank and file, only 50,830, the noble Lord had proceeded to make certain deductions; but, of course, if a comparison were instituted between that year and a year two decades before it, a similar deduction must be made in the earlier year. The comparison in that case would not appear so unfavourable. But what was the real difference in the two cases? Whereas, in 1853, that number of Infantry represented a small number of cadres full of men, in 1873 it represented 70 cadres—a very much larger number than before—kept at a low strength, but capable of being filled up from Reserves. That was the system on which the Army was now constituted, and hon. Members must not forget the advantage of it when it should be complete. It was said we had not the means of filling the cadres up, and several speakers had referred to the fact that there were only 7,000 in the Army Reserve. But the reason was very simple; it was that the short-service system had not yet come into play; for there was not a single man who had entered the Army under it and passed into the Reserve. The six years not having elapsed, those 7,000 men who were so often spoken of as an inadequate Reserve were all long-service men who, as occasion offered, had been allowed to pass voluntarily into the Reserve, and thus they were entirely over and above any calculation that might be made as to the result of the short-service system proper. That fact was constantly ignored or forgotten; but he hoped the House would understand now that the Army Reserve which would result from short service had not yet come into existence. As to the Militia Reserve, 28,000 was the existing number. Many objections had been urged to this Force, to which he might simply reply that the Militia Reserve had been maintained, because there was no Army Reserve; and he presumed that when the latter reached its full proportions—which it must do as the men went out from the service with the colours—then the Militia Reserve might, at any time, be put an end to, if it were found desirable. It never professed to be more than a stop-gap. The real object of short service was to obtain elasticity. They had heard a good deal about the Crimea from the noble Lord and the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster (Sir Charles Russell). The House was told that if we again attempted to take a Sebastopol or to suppress an Indian Mutiny we should fail; and in a former debate the hon. and gallant Member for Renfrewshire (Colonel Mure) told them very graphically of the wretched boys who were sent to the Crimea and trampled to death at the storming of the Redan. The effect of short service would be to prevent the possibility of any such calamity occurring again. The very reason why those boys were sent out to the Crimea was that we had no Reserve at that time, and the gaps caused by disease, fatigue, wounds, and death had to be filled by imperfectly drilled and imperfectly developed recruits. In future old soldiers would be sent out, and this would be done under the short service system. That was the theory and intention of the system. [Lord ELCHO: Hear, hear!] He was glad that the noble Lord admitted so much. As to the number of recruits, the Reports of the Inspector General of Recruiting were taken, he presumed, as being satisfactory on that head; for last year, the great inflation of the labour market having ceased, recruits came in in sufficient numbers, so that recruiting was almost allowed to cease. More, indeed, was said as to their quality.

For his part, he preferred facts to rumours or assertions, and attached more importance to statistics, compiled by responsible officers, from details furnished by other responsible officers, and laid on the Table by the Head of the Department, than to vague reports of what one or another officer said. The House had been told that every officer one met said that the recruits were unsatisfactory. The statistics circulated that morning furnished a complete answer to that allegation. What were the answers of officers commanding regiments with regard to recruits sent to them from April to December, 1874? There were answers from 136 commanding officers. Of these 78 were "satisfied;" 26 were "fairly satisfied;" and 32 only were "dissatisfied." The noble Lord had read the "remarks" appended to this Return as if they applied to the whole of those answers from commanding officers; but those unfavourable remarks came only from the 32 "dissatisfied" officers. And the House would observe how entirely this Return confirmed the opinion expressed by the Inspector General of Recruiting in his Report. What did he there state of the Infantry recruits? He said—

"In a large majority of regiments and depôts the quality is satisfactory. A smaller proportion is fairly good, but in many instances complaints are made to a degree that is far from satisfactory."

This Report, which had been issued before the Inspector General knew anything about the answers just referred to, was the exact counterpart of those answers, so that the genuine character of the Report was established, although it was said such Reports were not to be depended on as they were made to suit the Heads of Departments. With regard to the physical qualities of our soldiers, according to the latest Return, in the whole Army there were only 111 in 1,000 men under 20 years of age, and 334 in 1,000 from 20 to 25 years. The general average age of Infantry recruits was 19 years 9 months and one-fifth. The hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Torrens) had spoken of sending recruits to India under the full age, and had drawn a terrible picture of the skeletons he had seen of young soldiers, practically killed by the hard work imposed upon their immature strength. He did not ment; and Lord Cardwell had said much the same thing. But where were they now to be found? Member for Finsbury (Mr. Torrens) had spoken of sending recruits to India under the full age, and had drawn a terrible picture of the skeletons he had seen of young soldiers, practically killed by the hard work imposed upon their immature strength. He did not know how far the hon. Member's investigations into those skeletons and bones had gone, but this he, for his own part, would say, that taking the opinion of the medical officers of the Army generally, and not of scientific men who had far less practical knowledge of the subject, he found that in the Report for 1874 they expressed themselves as—

“fully satisfied with the physique and general appearance of the men who have joined the several corps. A very few exceptional cases have been remarked upon, chiefly of lads, objected to as being deficient in stamina and bodily development; but these in nearly all instances have grown since into strong healthy young men.”

They must bear in mind that these recruits were engaged to serve in the Army a short time with the colours, and then in the Reserve. They passed through their drill and acquired a knowledge of their duties while young; then they were passed into the Reserve, and would be the men to be brought out in the First Line in case of war. By that time instead of being 20, they would have reached the age of from 23 to 25, or more, so that they were not dependent upon those young soldiers, as they would be if they had no Reserves. The other statistics as to physical condition were likewise satisfactory. In the Army there were only 200 men in 1,000 under 5 feet 6 inches in height; while, as to chest measurement, there were 709 in 1,000 who were 35 inches and over. Next, came their moral qualities. It appeared from the Report of the Director General of Education that the standard of education among the soldiers was improving. As to medical condition, the latest Report, for 1872, showed that “all the ratios were considerably above the average.” What were the facts as to desertion? The percentage of desertions to recruits in 1861 was 41. In 1870, during the excitement of the war, it fell to 12. In 1872 it rose to 33, in 1873 it was also 33, those being years of great excitement in the labour market, and in 1874 it fell to 27. Taking the net loss by desertion, the percentage of deserters to recruits in 1869, when the late Government came into office, was 18; in 1874 it was 17. And it must be remembered that the abolition of branding undoubtedly greatly facilitated desertion. But that step was taken at the urgent instance of Parliament, and Parliament was not likely to retrace it. The result of a review of the whole case appeared to be that they were able to hold their own, in the competition for recruits, in the unskilled labour market. He did not say that it might not be better if they could get a higher class of men; but what they really required was to obtain able-bodied and intelligent men, and those they found in sufficient numbers in the classes engaged in unskilled labour. If they attempted to obtain recruits from the class of skilled labourers, they would have to raise the pay of the soldiers considerably, and they had no assurance that they would not experience the same difficulties with which they had now to deal. In prosperous times artisans might desert the Army for other employments, and their abstraction from the industry of the country would indirectly but effectively add to the cost of the Army to the country. They were at present able to compete with success in the unskilled labour market, and the sensible course appeared to him to be that they should trust to the advantages which their soldiers received being better appreciated than they were at present. It was not a question of wages; the mere pay of the soldier might be small; but he had many advantages over his fellows in civil life. He was better housed, clothed, looked after, and fed; he had medical attendance, reading-rooms, recreation rooms, and many comforts, and luxuries, of which those in the same position outside of the Army had no notion at all. Nothing was better calculated to make these advantages known and appreciated than the district system, the object of which was to search out every corner of the country, and to bring the advantages of the Army to every man's door. Coming now to the other end of the soldier's active service, he would say a few words of the Reserves. The pay of the Reserves, 4*d.* a-day, was only a retaining fee, and until it was found to be too little, it would not be prudent to raise it; it was the pay of the Royal Naval Reserve, and the answer to the statement that the Reserves would not be forthcoming when required was that on the occurrence of the Trent affair the men of the Naval Reserve turned up in a way which exceeded the anticipations of those who founded that Reserve.

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

For the purposes of identification of the men nothing was required but local watchfulness, and that was furnished by the brigade dépôt system. The existing Reserves, it should be remembered, as he had already pointed out, were not the fruit of the short-service system. That system was calculated to give the country a large Reserve; and he believed that if it were completely carried out, the Reserve would reach a normal strength of 80,000 men. [An hon. MEMBER: When?] He could not say exactly, not having the figures before him; but his impression was in 10 or 12 years. And now he wished to glance at the alternatives they had been offered as a substitute for the present system. The alternatives proposed were two—first, there were those who would extend short service further and give higher pay, and thus, as they thought, obtain a better class of recruits. On the other hand, there were those who would have compulsory service in some form or other. He would remind the House that there was one essential postulate underlying both these proposals, which was that there should be separate Armies for India, the Colonies, and the British Isles. Parliament some time back put an end to the system of maintaining a separate Army for India, and he did not think the Government of the present day was likely, except on the strongest possible grounds, to reverse that policy. So long as it continued to be the policy of Parliament, it was incumbent upon those who advocated its reversal to prove their case, and it was not for him to disprove it. He therefore wished the House to understand that he was not undertaking to set before it a fair statement of the arguments against that proposal, but he wished to indicate a few of the considerations which lay on the surface of the question. There was no doubt that if they were to accomplish the tripartite division of the Queen's Forces, the solution of the whole problem of military organization would be greatly facilitated; but it could not be accomplished without the greatest difficulty. How could that esprit de corps, and that regimental system so dear to hon. and gallant Members, survive such a division? Which regiments should we assign to home service, and which should we banish to India? Again, those who maintained that there should be three armies, and, at the same time, advocated an elastic short-service system, seemed to forget that the armies for India and the Colonies must be long-service armies, and that there would be no Reserves to fill their ranks. At present the officers and men of the British Army had a varied and adventurous service, which gave them an experience in their profession which no other Army acquired, and of which they would be deprived by a division of their forces. If the Army were divided into three portions, the home division would become little better than a well-drilled Militia, the Colonial Army would be degraded into little more than a police, and the Indian Army would be subject to those evil influences which in former days had such a fatal effect on its efficiency. The House would see the importance of this question, which could not be urged too strongly, for if the division of the Army was a condition which must be granted before certain schemes came into operation, and if it was an impossible condition, then those schemes were, of course, utterly impracticable. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms) proposed that the pay of their Home Army should be increased by 6*d.* a-day, and that the Reserve should receive £30 per man; but that was a very large addition to make all at once, without any good reason for it, if we could get men without it, and he (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) would be curious to see how this scheme could be worked out without a large addition to the Estimates. He did not see how a Home Army of 66,000 men serving for three years could be kept up, as his hon. Friend said it could, by 20,000 recruits annually, or how an Indian Army of 66,000 serving for seven years could be maintained by 8,600 annual recruits; and they might well doubt some of the more far reaching and elaborate calculations of his hon. Friend, when the figures which lay upon the surface were so open to question. His hon. Friend, both in the House and out of it, had frequently urged the necessity of having a business-like organization and system in the Army. Now, having had some short experience in the world of business, as well as in the official world and in public life, he had no hesitation in asserting, and he thought it right to say so, that the monopoly of business qualities was not confined to business men, but that many public servants and soldiers had as much business-like capacity as was to be found in the world of business itself. Now, with regard to the question of conscription, it seemed to him to be open to very serious objections, not on the high ground of the freedom of the individual, but because, however applied, whether enforced for the Regular Army or for the Militia, or any branch of the Service, it was the most unfair means of carrying out the defensive arrangements of the country. It was taxation by lot; taxation equally heavy, whether it took a man's money in the payment of a substitute, or his own time and service. If every man was to serve it would be equal all round; but he did not know whether the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Butler-Johnstone) had ever considered the enormous drain on the productive industry of the country which would be involved by every man serving for a year in the Militia. He trusted that the country would not submit, save in the last necessity, to be reduced to such a dreadful alternative as that of compulsory service in the Army or the Militia. The noble Lord's idea was, he believed, that conscription should be applied to the Militia, with an exemption for the Volunteers. [Lord ELCHO: Under the existing law.] Did not the noble Lord know the result of the application of that law? In 1803, Mr. Addington passed a law for compulsory service in the Army and Militia, with an exemption for the Volunteers. And what took place? Why, that out of 500,000 persons liable to serve, 420,000 offered themselves as Volunteers. The noble Lord's way of keeping up the Volunteer Force, whose great glory was its spontaneous character, would be to frighten people into it by the threat of conscription. And if there was to be this universal service in the Militia, would it have no effect on recruiting for the Army? Men passed in large numbers from the Militia into the Army. Between 4,000 and 5,000 had done so last year. But surely, if men were compelled to serve in the Militia, many who now offered themselves as recruits for the Army would not do so. What was the effect at the beginning of the present century? Mr. Windham, in speaking on the subject, said that—

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

"The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Addington) had not only not provided an Army, but had rendered it impossible that an Army should be provided, for the Volunteer system had locked up 400,000 of the active men of the country."

These were very serious precedents, and worthy of consideration. He would ask the House what was the right thing to do at the present time? The systems both of short service and of localization were introduced a very few years ago. The short-service system had never yet been completed. No men who had entered under it had passed into the Reserve. The localization system had only been just set up; the officers were not thoroughly familiar with their new duties; many of the depôts were not even formed; and it was idle to suppose that any great results could have occurred. His right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), speaking the other night of the conduct of the House in its dealings with the Foreign Loans Committee said, that it reminded him of the action of children who sowed seeds, and dig them up to see whether they were growing. But if the House adopted the Motion of the noble Lord, it would go far beyond the impatient curiosity of children, for it would condemn a system which had not even had a chance of failing, and would dig up the seed for the express reason that the grain was not already garnered, at a time when the most that could be expected would be to see the tender blade appearing above the surface of the earth.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, he thought the hon. Member for Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) had shown clearly the position in which the late Government had left the Army of this country, and the question for consideration now was, what was necessary to be done under the circumstances of the case? The noble Lord (Lord Elcho) had said that there were no appreciable Reserves—that the short-service system had not come into play, and that only 7,000 men had gone into the Reserve. But he did not point out that even with that small number the late Government had not the moral courage to let the country know that these men were actually a reserve. The hon. Member for Stirling Burghs admitted that the system had so far failed that they had not got that class of recruits which he and Lord Cardwell expected to get—

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN observed, that he had not said anything about the class of recruits, but that it was not proposed to go out of the class of unskilled labour.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, he would not argue that point further. Everyone knew from what class the recruits were obtained. The whole case was summed up in the demand for labour. When labour was dear recruits were very scarce. When men could not obtain labour they entered as recruits. But, notwithstanding the dearness of labour, and the other circumstances which had occurred during the last four years, the Returns showed that 118,161 men had been recruited for the Militia, and that 79,193 men had been recruited for the Army, making a total of 197,354. In view of this remarkable result of the voluntary system, how, he asked, could they with any show of reason propose to introduce a conscription? He thought, however, that his noble Friend had done good service in bringing the question before the House; because the discussion which had taken place would show his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War what were the opinions of the House on the subject. He agreed with the hon. Gentleman opposite that the two systems introduced by Lord Cardwell had not yet had a fair trial, and that it would be madness to ask the Secretary for War to do something very different. But there were many things which ought to have been done by Lord Cardwell which had been left to his successors properly and judiciously to carry out. The dépôt system had been established, and a certain number of colonels, with large staffs, had been appointed; but when they got recruits in certain districts, it was found that they were wanted in other parts of the country, and some of them had actually been sent from Chichester, recruits that ought to have joined the 35th Sussex regiment, to join a Highland regiment in Scotland. That was certainly not carrying out the dépôt system to its legitimate conclusion. He would venture to ask the Secretary for War, in dealing with this question, to begin with the privates, and see whether it was not possible to do away with some of the stoppages, and out of those stoppages to provide a fund which might be given to them when they left the Army. He would also ask, with regard to the corporals, and especially the lance-corporals, and lance-sergeants as well as sergeants, that their pay should be increased, and that when these men left their regiments, and by reason of their good conduct were appointed either to the Militia or Volunteers, their service in the Militia or Volunteers should count and entitle them to a pension for so many years' service therein. If these suggestions were acted upon, he believed a better class of recruits would be brought into the Army. He thought we should have 25 regiments filled up to their proper strength, and fit to land in any part of the world. As to a Reserve, he wished his right hon. Friend to bear in mind that the great object of a Reserve was, that when our regiments were sent abroad, they should be filled up with men who were trained soldiers and of a certain age. But a man who had left the Army for several years was not fit, at a moment's notice, for foreign service. The authorities ought, therefore, to know where every man who joined the Reserve was to be found. He should not be allowed to leave one district to go to another without giving notice to the proper authorities; and he ought to be called up every year for 12 days' training. Besides this, care should be taken that he had proper clothes and accoutrements, and was practised in the use of the arm with which he would be supplied. That was a very important point in these days of new inventions, and in the change of weapons which these inventions involved. He knew that the reason which had been urged against dealing with our Army Reserve was that farmers and manufacturers would not employ men who were liable to be called out for 12 days' training every year, and to be drafted for foreign service if required. He had a far higher opinion of Englishmen than to believe that they would be influenced by such motives as these. He believed that the classes he had named were as anxious and determined as any class to support the honour of our flag and the honour of the nation in every part of the world.

COLONEL MURE said, he knew that in seconding the Motion of the noble Lord he was undertaking a grave responsibility, inasmuch as the Motion was one to a certain extent of want of confidence in one of the great Departments of the State. The most extraordinary thing which had struck him in all these discussions was the exceeding apathy that existed on the subject, both in Parliament and in the country. We spent £14,000,000 yearly on our Army, nearly one-third of the entire Revenue of the country, excluding the interest on the National Debt; and yet, when the subject of the Army came before Parliament, it excited no sympathy either in that House or without it. It appeared as though people who spent their lives in making money by civil and commercial pursuits had never realized to themselves what an Army should be, but looked upon it as a kind of toy, to be kept up with red clothes and other external paraphernalia. But in this country, as in others, the existence of an Army was a grave burden on the resources of the country; and when the time came for active service, either abroad or at home, and we found our Army inefficient, it would cause a great amount of commercial ruin and of widespread suffering among all classes. He saw great danger in the apathy which prevailed as to the inefficiency of the Army at the present moment. His hon. Friend the Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) had made a speech that night, the whole object of which seemed to be to seek the domestic convenience of this country, instead of recognizing its dangers. The responsibility which the Minister of War had taken upon himself was a grave one. It was the custom of this country to place at the head of the Army and Navy Gentlemen who had no professional knowledge of either of those Departments. In Mahomedan countries some officials were bound to read certain portions of the Koran and learn them by heart, in order that they might be reminded of the gravity of the duties they had before them, and he should like the Secretaries for War in this country to read the Report of the Commission that inquired into the sufferings of our troops in the Crimea, in order to remind them of the value of private information about the Army as opposed to purely official information, and to warn them of the mistakes of red tape. He would like them to read the history of the Redan, to be warned of the danger of enlisting lads and trusting to them; and to read the history of the Indian Mutiny, in order to be warned against the danger of living in a fool's paradise. If the Secretaries for War, as they came into office, would read those melancholy chapters of British history, such discussion as they had had that evening would not be needed. It would be no consolation to us, if some day a terrible national disaster befel us, that we had carried out the principle of appointing unprofessional men to the control of these professional services. It had been stated that a Departmental Committee had been appointed to inquire into, and report on, the condition of the Army. He had understood that the War Office and the Horse Guards were thoroughly acquainted with the condition of the Army and of the recruits. They had every means of acquiring the information; the recruiting centres and all the regiments were only a few hours' distance from each other, and information could be easily and speedily obtained. The country paid enormous sums for the supervision, regulation, and management of the Army and of recruiting, as set forth in yearly and half-yearly Reports, prepared by a costly staff at the War Office. He had always supposed that the information department in the War Office was a going concern, not needing to be galvanized into life by pressure from without. But, if that was the case, how was it that the Secretary for War and the Commander-in-Chief had been obliged to issue a Commission of Inquiry into Recruiting? Had not annual Returns been sent in for the last seven years? Had they not Major General Taylor's Return? If the Departments were masters of their duties, why send out a Commission? There could be no greater proof of apathy, not in the country alone, but where above all it ought not to reign, than in the issue of this Commission. Then there was a most extraordinary conflict of opinion with respect to the condition and physique of the men. He recollected Lord Cardwell, when a Member of the House, saying in the course of a debate which took place in 1873, that any one who had been present at the Autumn Manœuvres of the previous year, and seen the admirable condition and regular marching of the men, must be a very fastidious person if he was not satisfied with what he saw; but if the House would turn to the Medical Report for that year they would find that those who took part in those Manœuvres were picked and selected men. In fact, a vast number of wretched youths had to be left behind because they were physically incapable. The noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) had shown that the case was still worse in that year. In 1874, Lord Sandhurst brought this question under the notice of the House of Lords, when he told their Lordships that the recruits for the Infantry were wretched lads who could not carry their knapsacks. Lord Sandhurst, he would remind the House, had much more experience of the Infantry than any living man, whereas Lord Cardwell had none. He had served in the Infantry; he had spent his youth there; and was now in command of the garrison of Dublin, the largest Infantry force in the United Kingdom; but nevertheless, in contradiction of his statement, Lord Cardwell said, that the Medical Report on the condition of the men was satisfactory. If Lord Sandhurst was right Lord Cardwell was wrong, and if Lord Cardwell was right Lord Sandhurst was wrong; for if both were right then the Medical Report must have represented that a force of wretched youths who could not carry their packs was satisfactory, which was a reductio ad absurdum. In fact, they had the most lamentable accounts of those weeds and boys. Dr. Leith Adams reported that the assurances of improvement were not realized, and he spoke of the staminaless youths who came from the great cities. He (Colonel Mure) had received that day a remarkable document. On the 9th of March the Secretary for War went to Aldershot and inspected the recruits of 1873 and 1874. He did not see the soldiers who had developed out of the recruits of 1871 and 1872, nor did he go to the hospitals and inquire the opinion of the medical men. The document, however, showed that in one of the three hospitals situated there, there were on the 9th of March, 261 patients, and of these there were 54 boys under the age of 20; in the second hospital there were 199 patients, of whom 51 were boys under 20 years of age; in the third there were 136 patients, including 19 boys under 20 years of age. He would now direct the attention of the House to the extraordinary increase in invaliding which had taken place since the introduction of the new scheme. During the three years 1867, 1868, and 1869, the number of those invalided at Aldershot was 622; but in the three years 1872, 1873, and 1874, the number invalided was 1,168. Great as was the increase of invaliding exhibited by those figures, the percentage of the youths included in them showed a still larger increase. He had not the exact figures, but it was something very great. If they went on descending lower and lower in the scale of efficiency they would come to the condition of the giver of the wedding feast in Holy Writ. When they could not get good men to come in and join the Army, they would have to send out and gather in the halt, the lame, and the blind. Now the halt, the lame, and the blind were all very well for a parable, but they were not fit recruits for an Army. He knew that the difficulty in getting strong men was very great; but he preferred to reduce the numbers, and restrict recruiting within the limits of our capacity to get efficient men. Out of 96,000 men at present in the United Kingdom, even if we drew on the men necessary for drafts for India and the Colonies, we could not put 40,000 men on the Continent, Guards included, owing to the large proportion of immature recruits in the ranks. His noble Friend (Lord Elcho) had quoted Dr. Parke, the head of the hospital at Netley, who had stated that a lad was not fit for service in the Army unless he was from 20 to 21 years of age. The best authorities said, that 21 was the age, and Dr. Parke quoted several high authorities in support of that opinion. He (Colonel Mure) had statistics which confirmed that view. We had at present a Committee trying to ascertain how we could prevent recruits from entering the Army while they were too young, and a Commission trying to discover how they could persuade officers to leave the Army before they were too old. The fact was, the officers were growing older and older, the men younger and younger, and the result would be that while the officers would go on creeping into their graves the men would be crawling into their cradles. In short, if things went on as they were now going on, we soon should have an Army of men in their nonage commanded by officers in their dotage. Our Army could be well compared to a costly engine, which consumed an enormous amount of fuel, but was so badly put together and unskilfully managed that it turned out a ruinously small amount of work. The Army cost upwards of £14,000,000 of money; but it was not only money that they were burning. There was another class of fuel employed, and that was the ruin to the constitution, and the suffering caused to those wretched lads who were sent out to India. He begged the right hon. Gentleman to endeavour to come to some arrangement by which a stop would be put to the system of sending out these wretched lads to India, ruining their constitutions, and then sending them home to the workhouse and the pauper's grave—for it must not be forgotten that now, even when permanently invalided, they received no pension, excepting for the first six months after their discharge from Netley Hospital. A vast proportion of the soldiers they enlisted were perjured boys. He did not blame the lads for misstating their ages on enlisting, for they were forced to do so by the hard necessities of their position; but what was to be said of the calm deliberation with which the military authorities winked at the perjury that was going on? He trusted the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War would put his shoulder to the wheel, and see if he could not move us out of our present difficulties. Much of the difficulty arose from misunderstanding the financial position of the Home Government and the Indian Government. Were we safer in India than we were in 1857? We held it with the greatest difficulty then, and were we stronger now? The right hon. Gentleman the other evening stated that the death rate in India was only 13 per 1,000. He was very much surprised to hear it. He believed that in 1873 it was 19·30 per 1,000, and in 1874 it was very much the same, although the Returns of those who had died on the voyage home had not yet been received. But even if the death rate in India were only 13 per 1,000, it should be remembered that the Army of India was not kept on a war footing. They were sending the men to the Hills, and laying them up in lavender. It reminded him of what was said when one officer asked another whether such a man was a good rider. "Oh," said his comrade, "he looks very well on horseback, but the moment the horse begins to move he tumbles off;" and so the Army in India might look very well, but let them move that Army, and it would fall to pieces. There was an opinion very prevalent in this country that we should not go to war again; but that matter was not within the power of any man or the collective wisdom of any body of men. The Government of this country was practically a Democracy—the people were the masters. It was said that we were not a martial nation; but was it not the fact that we had conquered almost the whole world by men voluntarily carrying arms? At the present moment we had, including the Navy, 500,000 men voluntarily carrying arms. If the conscription were abrogated in Belgium, Germany, and France, those countries would have attenuated battalions of attenuated boys. The temper of this nation could not be relied upon as a guarantee that we should never again be involved in war. The history of the country at the periods of the Crimean War, and subsequently of the war with China also conveyed a warning. Although the present right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) and the late Mr. Cobden, who had devoted their lives to conferring benefits upon the people, warned them against the folly of rashly flying to arms—the crime and suffering which they were going to undertake—what happened? Why their advice was scouted. The Crimean War took place, and the result was a torrent of tears, oceans of blood, millions of treasure, and a torn-up Treaty. The Chinese War followed. For opposing it the right hon. Gentleman and Mr. Cobden were both turned out by the very constituencies which they had done so much to benefit. Much had been said of the conflicting evidence adduced on the efficiency of our land Forces. The right hon. Gentleman preferred to believe the prophets of good, those who made things pleasant. Let them go on as they were doing now, and sooner or later a time would come when a witness would come into Court whom they would be obliged to listen to and believe. That witness would come unsuborned, unsolicited, and his precognition they would be obliged to respect. That witness would be a noble people misled by their rulers, enervated by prosperity and money-getting, in mourning and humiliation for some grievous and overwhelming national disaster.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, after the long discussion which had taken place, and the great number of figures which had been cited, he should abstain, as far as possible, from going into any arithmetical calculations. The hon. and gallant Colonel who had just sat down had certainly not shown any of that apathy that was said to prevail in the country. If strong language could have any effect, it had not been spared. The hon. and gallant Colonel spoke of the military authorities conniving at perjury; he said they did not take the trouble to ascertain anything connected with the Army; and with regard to himself, he admitted what he said to be true—that when he entered upon his present office he was extremely ignorant on matters connected with the Army; but this he would add, that he had done his best to make himself acquainted with it since. [Colonel MURE said, that he only complained of the system.] The hon. and gallant Colonel complained generally of them all. He said they were so ignorant that they had actually appointed a Committee to get the best information they possibly could; but at least the hon. and gallant Colonel could not say that he had kept back from the House the information which had been collected. If it was to be said they were not to have a Committee or Commission without avowing their entire ignorance on the subject, those whose duty it was to act would be brought into the position of being autocrats in office, and they must dispense with those military men who were placed there to assist them. The hon. and gallant Colonel, when he spoke of those military men, little knew the ability, attention, and care which they brought to bear on this subject. When he (Mr. G. Hardy) formerly spoke upon the Estimates he explained that he desired to proceed cautiously and slowly with respect to Army reform, and to give a fair trial to the scheme introduced by his Predecessor. But he might add that he did regret that when that scheme was instituted more was not done to create a Reserve in the first instance, which might have, so to speak, stopped the gap until the service of the short-service men had been completed. Then with respect to the Militia Reserve he thought his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Campbell-

Bannerman) hinted that it had been instituted by Lord Cardwell; but that was not the case. [Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN explained that he had not said so.] He accepted the explanation. But passing from that he might say that even short service was not a new thing. During the Crimean War they enlisted men for two and three years, and on other occasions they enlisted them for 10 years, under the Warrant of General Peel. The hon. and gallant Colonel (Colonel Mure) had stated that when he (Mr. G. Hardy) went down to Aldershot, he did not take care to see many things which he ought to have seen. He had, however, sent word the evening before that he wished to see all the recruits there in their nakedness, to use a familiar expression, and not combined with men who had served a long time, whereby a better appearance might have been presented. Indeed, it was only for the purpose of seeing our recruits that he had gone down on that occasion. No doubt he should have derived much benefit had he visited the hospital. As for the recruits, all he could say was that he had consulted the medical men in respect to them, and especially in respect to their age. The hon. and gallant Colonel complained that they got many recruits of 18 who said they were 20 years of age; but he would remind the hon. and gallant Colonel that that fault did not lie with him. Not only did those young men pass the recruiting sergeant, but they were certified to by the medical men as being, in their opinion, of the proper age, and when they were deceived what remedy could they have? It was idle, therefore, for the hon. and gallant Colonel to tell them that they were conniving at perjury when they were simply acting upon the authority of the medical men and the authority of the recruiting sergeants, who had the best means of ascertaining the real facts of the case. Then the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens) called upon him to pledge himself to do something which it was utterly impossible for him to do, and for this reason—that they had no means of deciding whether those young men really were the exact age which they represented themselves to be. All he could say with respect to that part of the subject was that the men they sent to India were supposed to be the proper age, or trained and physically fit for the service. He had had a great many questions put to him that night; but they were, for the most part, of a very conflicting and contradictory character. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Westminster (Sir Charles Russell) had asked him what was the condition of the Brigade Depots when he came into office? Well, it was this. There was nothing practically done except the appointment of colonels, and he was not yet, therefore, in the position to give a competent answer as to what would be the real value or effect of that system. It had not yet had a fair trial, and that was what he was anxious it should receive before he pronounced any opinion. He had received many hints upon that subject during the course of that debate; but the opinions had been so conflicting that the House would agree with him it was not very easy to decide off-hand on it. The hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Butler-Johnstone), again, proposed that they should keep down the existing Army and substitute for it an embodied Militia. That was an entirely different system from any other that had been suggested. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Westminster, for his part, had made a great many suggestions. He had said that the Government should provide civil employment for the men who had served in the Army, and that such system had not been fully tried in the Post Office. But he (Mr. G. Hardy) had consulted the Postmaster General on the subject, and the noble Lord (Lord John Manners) had informed him that the system had been efficiently tried in that Department of the public service, and that a more complete failure could not possibly be conceived. He would, however, admit that it was a very important and desirable thing that they should, as far as possible, give employment in the Civil Service to men who had served in the Army; and he could only promise for himself to do all he could to help forward that object. His hon. and gallant Friend had also referred to the corps of Commissionaires which had been formed under the auspices of Captain Walter; but it should be borne in mind that they had been organized at a time when the system of long service prevailed, and when the conditions were totally different from those which at present existed. With respect to desertion, he might say he had looked back into the subject and found that desertion had prevailed to an enormous extent in former years, and was not a peculiarity of the present time. There was certainly always to be desertion when inducements were held out, as they necessarily were, for the men to obtain money by re-enlistment, or by disposing of their kits. But his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Westminster said, they should have long service combined with short. No doubt a great deal might be said in favour of that proposal; but it would require further consideration before being adopted. His hon. and gallant Friend further contended that the Militia should be officered from the Army. That system he (Mr. G. Hardy) admitted, would be of very great value. Indeed, it was not a new idea to him, and very few people would deny that if they were to have a real Reserve they must have it commanded by efficient officers. Another question to which attention had been called was the expediency of giving some advantages, in addition to those which they at present enjoyed, to non-commissioned officers. Well, upon that point all he need say was that he hoped before the close of the Session to bring forward a scheme that would prove advantageous to that meritorious body of men. He need not go into the question of disciplinary battalions—the question of making all men who deserted and were bad characters serve in one regiment, which should be stationed abroad. Those who deserted, it ought to be remembered, were of very different classes. Some ran away from bad motives, others went on what they called a “spree;” and not a few who left their regiments were by no means men of absolutely bad characters. That was a point that required very careful consideration. But on the first blush of it he did not think this country was prepared to see regiments composed entirely of bad characters. The hon. and gallant Member for South Durham (Major Beaumont) had urged increased pay; but, on the other hand, the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Butler-Johnstone) objected to any further increase of the Estimates; and he (Mr. G. Hardy) thought the House would agree with him, that it could not be done without the latter. Passing to another point, he might say that he did not think the

Army would benefit by stopping recruiting for the Militia, because a totally different class went into the Militia from that which went into the Army. He had heard of a collier, for instance, who enlisted in the Militia in order to get a month's fresh air above ground and not be allowed to get drunk. For his own part, he had never professed to be an optimist with respect to the Army, and while there were, he believed, 30 per cent of our Infantry recruits which were not entirely satisfactory, there were 70 per cent, of which the opposite might fairly be said. He could not, however, concur in the opinion that none of the 30 per cent would ever become good. It had been stated by several hon. Members that evening that no man was fit to enter the Army until he was 20; but he would venture to say that, whether in agricultural or factory work, men were found to be very efficient under that age. It had been said by the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) that we were getting worse and worse, and that the Army was composed of more children every year; but, no doubt, young men at 18 or 19 years of age, and with good drilling, would turn out efficient soldiers. In 1873, there were in the Army 28,263 under 20 years of age, while in 1874 they had fallen to 19,764. Up to 35, there was a larger number in 1874 than in 1873. A great deal had been said about chest measurement. He had not had much knowledge connected with it; but he was assured that the chest measurement as at present conducted was a fair measurement. It was 34½ inches for the Infantry, and that was said to be adequate to make an efficient soldier. He should not like the House to suppose that the Army was getting only the dregs of the population. Colonel Hammersley, Inspector of the Gymnasia, in his Report on the Infantry Recruits, said, in comparing them with the young cadets of the Royal Military Academy, and the young officers at the Royal Military College, that the average chest measurement showed that the recruits under the present system of recruiting were physically superior to the young men in a higher grade, and that all of them when they reached the age of 20 or 21 ought to be fit for any exertion that might be required of them. It struck him as very singular that those young men at the military academies who had been better fed, and had had everything necessary to make them physically strong, should not have a better chest measurement than the recruits now enlisting. It was said that we ought to look at the police force. That stood on a very different footing from the Army. The police were allowed to marry, they settled down in houses in the neighbourhood, and their duties did not require those quick and rapid movements demanded in the Army. Some of them had, no doubt, been in the Army when young; but they had now settled down to a very solid and heavy body that would hardly be appropriate to Light Infantry regiments. He would admit that it would be desirable if they could get the same class of men, and men of the same stamina for the Army. From inquiries he had made with regard to men of 20 years of age belonging to better classes, he did not see that they could, by additional pay or any other means, secure them for the Army, owing to the great pressure in this country for workmen. By the time a young man was 20 years of age he had usually settled down, if in the manufacturing districts, to some kind of work which suited him. Sometimes he received high wages. They were able to move about and find better employment than they thought they could find in the Army. It was proved by the great number of persons who bought their discharge that they must belong to classes who could raise some money, because it cost £30 to purchase a discharge, and their doing so, so soon after their entering the Army, showed that they came of a class who, when in the Army, did not altogether like it. He had heard a great deal said about the bad character of the Army. He had reason to suppose that certain regiments recruited from certain places had a great number of bad characters in them; but circumstances showed that if the men were treated well, they were not insensible to the sentiments of rectitude and good feeling. He had heard of a man of education who had taken his degree at college, who, having a great taste for the Army, had enlisted and taken his place in the barrack-room as a common soldier, and had associated with the other men. This gentleman was of exemplary character, with plenty of means, yet lived like the soldiers, and the men had respected him to that degree, that after a short time there was no bad language or swearing heard in his room from admiration of the man who had come so unexpectedly among them. That was a trait in their character that deserved to be mentioned, and he thought that some of the harsh epithets applied to them should be modified. His noble Friend (Lord Elcho) had referred to what took place at the United Service Institution, where there was a long discussion on recruiting, and that opinions expressed by him in the form of questions received general assent. He thought that they might naturally suppose that those who took part in the discussion at the United Service Institution were interested in theories of their own; and though he did not say they were not representative men, they were not such representative men as would be met with if they took the Army promiscuously. His noble Friend was not able to test his opinion then by a resolution because it was forbidden, and he was only able to draw forth applause by those well-turned sentences which he was so qualified to employ. He was not sure that he had followed his noble Friend as to the mode in which he would deal with the Army. He had some difficulty in ascertaining what it was his noble Friend wished in respect of the Army. He was in favour of a ballot for the Militia, and he proposed that to enter the Volunteers should exempt from the Militia. That raised large and difficult questions. In the beginning of this century repeated attempts were made in that direction, but it did not succeed as was expected; but the Volunteers became a large body, and as they were much more drilled than now, and were brought out in regiments and trained as such, they were naturally able to exercise greater influence in war time than the Volunteers of the present day. He regretted his noble Friend, in the course of his speech, did not say one good word for that Force, the organization of which, he had done so much to promote—the Volunteers. Although not in a position to be placed in battalions at the beginning of the war, he could not but think there were many stalwart men among them, and that in an emergency they would give an account of themselves against any enemy who endeavoured to invade the country. With regard to defensive armaments, it was often stated, and might be said to be admitted, that we had an equivalent for 200,000 men in the strong fleet we could place between us and the Continent. In respect to the Continent, it was necessary that armies should be able to move at a moment's notice; but that was not the case with us; and, therefore, so far as defensive warfare was concerned, we stood on a totally different footing from any other European Power. It must not be forgotten they had not failed in the wars in which they had been engaged, and though they had met with great disasters, they had managed to come out of them creditably in the end. The hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Mure) had said that he (Mr. G. Hardy) ought to have read the story of the Crimea and the Report of the Crimean Committee. He had done so at the time, and had read a good deal on the subject since; but he could not help reminding the hon. and gallant Gentleman that although it might be perfectly true that at this moment we could not embody home battalions like those which fought at the Alma, because at that time we had old soldiers, yet that if we provided a Reserve of a seasoned character, the home battalions might readily be brought into an efficient state in time of action. It had been said that we ought to have in the front rank a certain number of regiments brought up to the highest standard, and he admitted that the subject was one requiring the gravest consideration. Considering our position with respect to guarantees, it was a matter of some importance that we should be able at any time to send forth as large an Army as we had done in former years, and, if possible, on conditions which would enable us to keep it up by a system which would ensure not boys, but men of some service in the Army besides. The system, which the noble Lord complained was not kept up as before the Crimean War, was a few years ago deliberately abandoned, at the cost of a large expenditure, which was still going on, with the view that there should be a Reserve at length of 80,000 men. It might be necessary to take steps to obtain an efficient Army Reserve sooner than through short service by means of the Militia Reserve. That was not an untried Force, and although it was not brought up to the perfection that the Army was

by constant drill and manœuvres, some of those regiments commanded by his hon. Friends in that House would present a very fair front by the side of Regular troops. It must not be forgotten that some of the Militia regiments which were sent abroad at the time of the Crimean War were spoken of in terms which might almost be applicable to regiments of the Line of the highest character. He was very reluctant to go much further into this case; because he must ask the House to extend to him that length of time which he thought necessary to consider those things carefully. Of course, his noble Friend proposed his Resolution in the kindest possible way; but he could not help saying that if agreed to, it would convey the opinion of the House that he had not been proceeding with sufficient speed. His object was to investigate all the facts and circumstances carefully, and not to throw discredit hastily even upon the things that he might not eventually approve of, so that when he made a statement to the House it would be one that would carry conviction with it. With respect to the troops, he was bound to admit that a great deal remained to be done. A large amount of organization and preparation was needed, and the military authorities were bound to see that the Reserves were forthcoming, and that they should be found in readiness when their services were required. Further, he would say that the time would come when it would be necessary to allot to every man in the Reserve the place in which he should appear when he was wanted, and when it would be necessary to organize in such a way that it would be known where every Army Corps was to be found. In spite of the remark that many of our officers were decrepit, he entertained no doubt that there were many young officers who were perfectly well able to lead men into action; and one who had lately distinguished himself—Sir Garnet Wolseley—remarked on a recent occasion that he would rather lead young men than old men into action. He merely mentioned this, however, to show that there was a conflict of opinion on the subject. The hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), had referred to the education of the Army, and it was remarkable how steady an increase had been going on in the education of the Army. It was shown that in some of the regiments which had the best recruits the men were both physically superior and better educated; and when we were getting men of that sort, though the improvement did not go so far as could be desired, it would scarcely be wise to throw too much discredit on our Army. It was our only Army, and we had to make the best of it. As regarded the defence of the country, it must be remembered that they were in other respects better provided. There were fortifications on the Thames and other rivers that did not exist before; larger stores than before, and in place of 40 guns, in 1846, they had now 336. And, although his noble Friend was justified in saying that the Infantry was the foundation of the Army, still he ignored the Artillery rather too much. For his own part, he would remark that no Artillery in the world, on a peace footing, was better horsed than the Artillery of this country. He would not detain the House any longer. He deeply felt the responsibility which rested upon him and was grateful to the House for the kind manner in which they had received his Estimates. He trusted the noble Lord, contenting himself with the discussion he had raised and with the opportunity he had had of bringing many valuable suggestions before their notice, would not press his Motion to a division, or endeavour to force his (Mr. G. Hardy's) hand by asking him to make premature declarations which might tend to embarrass his action and eventually discredit his administration.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON expressed his sense of the candour and fairness of the statement which they had just heard from the right hon. Gentlemen. He was sure the House would not grudge the right hon. Gentleman any time which he thought it necessary to ask, in order that he might make himself thoroughly acquainted with this important and difficult question. The right hon. Gentleman had now the benefit of more than one year to give his attention to the subject; and it was impossible he could have come to the conclusion that there was anything radically wrong in the arrangements proposed by his Predecessor, Lord Cardwell, and be able at the same time to make the statement to which the House had just listened. There was one observation of the Secretary of State for War in which he could not concur. The right hon. Gentleman had expressed regret that when the present system was introduced by Lord Cardwell, some steps were not taken to create immediately a larger and more efficient Reserve. It was difficult to see how that could have been done otherwise than by the mode proposed by Lord Cardwell, of passing a certain number of men through the ranks. For the immediate creation of a larger Reserve the right hon. Gentleman had had exactly the same means at his disposal as his Predecessor had, and yet had not thought it necessary to ask the House to sanction any further proposal in that direction. With regard to the speech of the noble Lord (Lord Elcho), to whom they were indebted for the interesting discussion which had taken place, he was sorry to have heard in it some observations which did not seem consistent with the exhortation at the conclusion to look upon this question without any Party feeling. If the noble Lord himself viewed it without Party feeling, it was difficult to understand why he had introduced into the debate his favourite subject of the abolition of Purchase, which had nothing to do with the question. The noble Lord, moreover, had scarcely redeemed the pledge with which he set out—that he was not going to deal in figures of speech, but only in figures of arithmetic. He had dealt in a somewhat free manner with a document which had that day been laid on the Table of the House, and had given to it a meaning which was scarcely justified. But, without going into details, even if the state of things was as bad as the noble Lord wished them to believe, it could not be contended that it was the fair and true outcome of the system established by Lord Cardwell. It was nothing but the remains of the old system, the evils of which Lord Cardwell had fully acknowledged. If the old system had continued, there was no reason to suppose that the average age of the recruits and of the soldiers would have been a day greater than at present; and, as pointed out by the hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), the short-service system had not yet come into operation, so that the existing evils could not be attributed to it. Nothing should induce them to abandon the plan they had so deliberately adopted except proof of its total failure. He preferred the testimony of official and responsible persons, such as the Inspector General of Recruiting, whose Report could not, on the whole, be deemed unsatisfactory, to the somewhat vague and wild assertions made either in newspapers or in that House. The question could not be disposed of by declamation about sending "wretched boys" to India, when they were told that those "wretched boys" were found satisfactory by commanding officers, and that the rate of mortality amongst the troops was decreasing. It appeared that the number of recruits they were obtaining was sufficient, that crime in the Army was less than it ever was before, and that good-service rewards were increasing. All that indicated a state of things which ought to make them hesitate to undo everything that had been done during the last few years and begin entirely de novo. He did not clearly understand what the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) proposed that the Secretary for War should do, unless it was to put an end to the present system and resort to a compulsory one. [Lord Elcho said, he wished to see the existing law enforced.] But the noble Lord had not shown how that would facilitate enlistment, or increase the number of recruits. No doubt, there was a good deal in the state of the Army that might be improved. No doubt, the pay they gave attracted a considerable portion of the unskilled labour of the country, and a much higher rate of pay would probably attract a superior class of men. To him it was a matter of more astonishment that so many good recruits were obtained rather than that they obtained so few. For although everybody was willing to compliment the profession of arms when they spoke of it as a body, yet, almost all who undertook to give advice to their countrymen, while acknowledging that in the abstract the Army was a glorious profession, yet told any young man who thought of enlisting in it that it would be a disgrace rather than a credit to him to do so. As long as that was the case, it was not very surprising that there should be a difficulty in getting the very best class of recruits. It might sound something like a paradox; but he thought the best way in which they could improve the quality and probably also add to the number of their recruits would be by adopting stringent regulations as to the character of the men they selected. There were reasons known to everybody who was familiar with barrack-rooms which made them not the most desirable places into which a highly respectable young man could enter. He could understand the authorities of the War Office should be unwilling to throw away any chance of enlisting men who might be useful at present; but when a good Reserve had been established, he believed that they would have greater facilities for choosing the recruits whom they would take, and that then—without resorting to anything like conscription—it might be possible to obtain an adequate number of recruits, and also to exercise a considerable selection as to their quality.

LORD ELCHO, in reply, said, he had not treated the question as a Party one, though he felt bound to allude to the abolition of the Purchase system which had cost the country a large sum of money without any apparent benefit. He rejoiced that his right hon. Friend had given up the name of the Control department; and, although he felt some disappointment at the tone he had adopted, yet it was a necessary result of Parliamentary government. It was complained that he made no proposal. It was for the paid servants of the State, who were responsible for the safety of the nation and its honour, to decide and make proposals. His part was done when he had shown from official figures the lax state of the Army. He wished to ask the noble Lord opposite and his right hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for War, whether they considered when Russia fixed the age at 21 for its soldiers, Prussia at 20 years complete, and France at 21 years, they would be justified in regarding as effectives the youths in the Army under 20 years? If they rested on that foundation those who were in office took on themselves grave responsibility. He regretted that his right hon. Friend did not shadow forth that he would do something to put the Army on a sounder footing than it was now.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

BANKS OF ISSUE.

CONSTITUTION OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. M'LAREN moved that the Select Committee do consist of 23 Members. He maintained that the Scotch banks had a close monopoly, and a monopoly which was getting closer, in proof of which he stated that while their business had been doubled within the last 30 years, their number, which in 1841 was 30, had been reduced in 1843 to 23, and at the present time was only 11, the other 19 having been absorbed in these. He thought that Scotch bankers were well enough represented; but he wanted some representation for the public outside banks. He accordingly proposed that the Select Committee do consist of 23 Members, and that Sir Windham Anstruther and Mr. James Barclay be added to the Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Select Committee on Banks of Issue do consist of Twenty-three Members."—(Mr. M'Laren.)

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY, by way of replying to the remarks of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, said, the Scotch banks were always found willing to accommodate any man who could give adequate security. It was for the hon. Member to show that they did not do so, and he could bring evidence to that effect before the Committee.

MR. ANDERSON said, the question was whether the Scotch public were to be represented? The Chancellor of the Exchequer had increased the number of the Committee from 17 to 21; but the four Members he added were English Members, and thus the balance was turned against Scotland.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER remarked that the question of the number of the Committee had been discussed fully before, when he had shown the inconvenience that would result from making it any larger. Besides if this application were granted, there would probably be requests for the representation of other districts—say, the Northern Counties of England or Ireland. He thought the suggestion a good one which was made by the hon. Baronet (Sir Graham Montgomery)—namely, that the hon. Member for Edinburgh should prepare any evidence he thought desirable and bring it before the Committee.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH said, he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not agree to the Motion of the hon. Member for Edinburgh. The remarks of the hon. Member were quite uncalled for, and ill-timed. The Committee ought never to have been appointed; but if appointed, its numbers should have been smaller; and to place two additional Members, merely because they were Scotchmen, was unreasonable. The hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) had referred to what he termed the trades-unionism and monopoly of the Scottish banks, and that the interests of the public consequently suffered. He (Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh) denied that assertion, and said, that from an experience as a bank director extending to nearly 20 years, he had never known of banks declining to give credit where that could be reasonably expected; but he had heard of people becoming bankrupt complaining that banking facilities had contributed to their ruin. The Committee having now been fixed for good or for ill, he thought they had heard the last of it in that House until its Report came to be presented. The hon. Member seemed to fear that the interests of the Scottish people would not be looked after, because its four Scottish Members were connected with, or were presumed to be favourably disposed to, the banks; but the hon. Member might keep his mind easy on that score, for with the feeling shown by the English bankers, some of whom were on the Committee, those English bankers would take very good care that any defects or shortcomings on the part of the Scottish banks would be prominently brought out. For these and other reasons, which the lateness of the hour forbade him from entering upon, he opposed the Motion of the hon. Member for Edinburgh.

MR. M'LAREN disclaimed having any feeling in the matter, and said he only wished to express to the House his belief that there was a deep feeling in Scotland in regard to this monopoly, and his feeling that the outside public should be represented. He would never think of going before the Committee and giving evidence. He had no hobby to ride, and simply moved in this matter, because he was in favour of free trade, and opposed to monopoly.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 48; Noes 119: Majority 71.

THE TICHBORNE PROSECUTION—MOTION FOR RETURNS OF PROCEEDINGS AND EXPENDITURE.

MR. WHALLEY moved—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House a Copy of the Reports taken in shorthand of the proceedings before the Court of Queen's Bench in the several cases of Contempt of Court tried and adjudicated in that Court in relation to the Tichborne Trial; account of the expenditure occurred in relation to the said trial up to the present date, specifying the amount paid to the witnesses who were examined and also to witnesses who, although subpoenaed, were not examined, and stating, as in other cases of Crown prosecutions, the sum paid to each of such witnesses; and Copy of Affidavits sent to the Secretary of State for the Home Department in relation to the said trial, and especially as to certain statements and conduct of the foreman and other members of the jury.”

The hon. Gentleman said, it was most desirable, in the interests of the motion to be made on Friday, and with a view that the public agitation on the question should cease, that these Papers should be produced. The hon. Gentleman who supported him in the matter (Dr. Kenealy) had unfortunately disappeared; but he hoped some other hon. Gentleman would second him. If the Papers were produced they would show that nothing more scandalous had ever occurred in a Court, and it was most desirable that the House should have them for reference, and to satisfy themselves as to the nature of the trial. With regard to the costs, they had not been informed how the £55,000 returned as the costs of the brief had been spent, and he had, as far as he could, insisted upon having them before the House. It was the more necessary that they should be produced, as many witnesses brought over to prove that the Claimant was not Tichborne had declared that he was, and had been paid large sums of money in order that they might not prejudice the case for the prosecution. The last Papers were the most important of all, because there had been a great deal of perjury in the case, and the foreman of the jury had stated that he had given his verdict on the faith of letters purporting to be written by the sisters of Arthur Orton, and addressing the defendant as "dear brother," which they had since declared on oath that they never wrote.

MR. WADDY seconded the Motion.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he should not enter into a discussion of the merits of the case. Speaking on the part of the Treasury he had no knowledge of any shorthand minutes of the case. Such Papers as were in the solicitor's office to the Treasury were open to his inspection. With regard to the cost the fullest information should be given of the cost to this time; but he had not the means, nor would it be desirable, to give information as to the sums paid to the several witnesses. That was an unusual course, which had only once been pursued, in the case of the Welsh fasting girl.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he must decline to give the Papers included under the last head of the Return, which had always been treated as private and confidential. But the hon. Gentleman could get letters from the parties who made those communications, and they might be read, which would have the same effect.

MR. WHALLEY said, he should not press the Motion; but he did not think that, for the sake of fair play, the documents should be withheld.

Question put, and negatived.

CLERKENWELL HOUSE OF DETENTION.

ADDRESS FOR COPY OF RULE 75.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER rose to move an Address for—

"Copy of Rule 75 of the Clerkenwell House of Detention previous to amendment, and subsequent to amendment after May Quarter Sessions of 1873 of the Magistrates of Middlesex, whereby the compulsory labour of persons remanded or waiting for bail was abolished."

The hon. Baronet said, that the Rule 75, abolishing labour of unconvicted persons, those waiting for bail, or on remand, in the House of Detention, Clerkenwell, having never been carried out, it was supposed that the new rule had been cancelled by the Home Office. He had ascertained that it had never been forwarded to the Secretary of State. It was the duty of the Clerk of the Peace to carry out the decisions of the Quarter Sessions in the necessary and legal manner. The scrubbing of the floor of their cells by persons whose bail was not at once forthcoming, and those remanded for a week by a magistrate, still went on at Clerkenwell House of Detention, although the fact was little known; the public believing that the new Rule had been carried out according to the decision of the magistrates on May 29, 1873. He would ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the said amended Rule was forwarded to the Home Office by the Clerk of the Peace for Middlesex for approval in due course or not?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, that the Rule had not been sent to the Home Office, but that that Department would have no objection to the proposed change.

Motion agreed to.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN : Mr. Speaker, I rise to invite the attention of the House to a measure which passed its second reading during the last Parliament on four different occasions by very decisive majorities, but which I fear is not likely to fare so well in the House I am now addressing. But however that may be, however foregone may be the conclusion against which I have to struggle, it will nevertheless be my duty to state as briefly as I can, the grounds on which I ask the House to give a favourable consideration to this Bill, whilst I ask at the same time that indulgence which the majority of this House rarely refuse to the advocate of a losing cause. And, Sir, I am the more desirous of making these statements, because I cannot help feeling that, notwithstanding all the discussion and debates on this question, considerable misapprehension exists in the public mind as to the nature and scope of the Bill. Only the other day I heard it described as a Bill to confer on Nonconformists the right of burial in parish churchyards. And yet it will be obvious to everyone who reads the Bill that it confers no right at all to bury in the parish churchyard, and that for the best of reasons—namely, that the parishioners possess that right to the fullest extent already. As I have more than once stated in this House, the right of interment in the parish churchyard is a civil, and not an ecclesiastical right. In other words, it is the right of the parishioner, and not the right of the Churchman. Although the fee-simple of the parish churchyard is vested in the incumbent, that incumbent can no more exclude the Nonconformist parishioner from being interred in the churchyard than he can prevent a parishioner on the same grounds from taking part in any discussion in the parish vestry, or, in a proper case, from receiving parish relief. That right is laid down, and has been confirmed in the Courts of Law. It is laid down in all the text-books, and is recognized in several Acts of Parliament; and so well-known is it as a point of law, that I do not know that it has ever been disputed here. In fact, the most effective arguments against the Bill have assumed rather than denied the proposition. Some time ago the hon. Member for North Northamptonshire (Mr. Stopford-Sackville) argued with some force against the Bill. He admitted that the parish churchyard belonged to the parish; but then he added that the churchyard belonged to the parish in the same sense as the church—that is to say, everyone using both must conform to the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England. He put it in this way—the parishioner has the right of using the church for the purpose of getting married; but if he uses it for marriage, it must be according to the rites of the same Church of England; so, if he uses it for the purpose of burial, it must be according to the rites of the same Church. Therefore, if this year you throw open the parish churchyard to the ministrations of Dissenting ministers, you must next year throw open the church to the same ministrations. But before you press that argument further, let me call attention to one essential difference between the two cases. The use of the church is optional, the use of the churchyard is not optional. Take the case put by the hon. Gentleman. If a Nonconformist desires to get married, he has merely to step into the next chapel, and there he can be married with any ceremony he pleases. Or if he objects to any religious ceremony, he can step into the Registrar's office, and there can be married in each case as effectually as if the ceremony had been performed in Westminster Abbey. Now, there were, in 1873, 531 public cemeteries in England in which the Legislature has required that a certain part shall be set apart for Nonconformists. Of course, Nonconformists dying in parishes provided with these cemeteries can be buried with any ceremony they please, and to that extent the two cases put by the hon. Member are analogous. But to those parishes the Bill has no application whatever. But I gather from a Return of the hon. Member for West Surrey (Mr. Cubitt), that there are now in England and Wales between 12,000 and 13,000 parishes, containing among them several millions of inhabitants, in which parishes the churchyard is the only place of interment. Any Dissenter dying in one of these parishes, unless he happens to be possessed of a private burying ground of his own, must almost as a matter of necessity be buried with the ceremonies of the Church, which, however beautiful they may seem to us, however beautiful they may be in the abstract, may be, to say the least of it, distasteful to the surviving friends who are assembled around his grave. If, on the other hand, the deceased person happens never to have been baptized, whether from neglect or conscientious scruples on the part of parents, the law requires that he should be buried without any religious ceremony whatever. Now I have previously called attention to the fact that baptism administered by any person, even by a woman, has been held as efficacious as baptism by a clergyman of the Church of England. But if a man dies without being baptized, then his body must be committed to the earth without any ceremony whatever—or to use a phrase very common in my country, more forcible than elegant—it must be buried like a dog. The hon. Member for West Kent (Mr. J. G. Talbot) has actually suggested in a Bill not now before the House this mode of interment as a solution of the whole difficulty. Of course, I cannot deal with the hon. Member's Bill, as it is not before us; but I may perhaps, in passing, be allowed to express my amazement that any three Members of this House should exhibit—I will not say so little knowledge of the feelings of Dissenters—but so little knowledge of human nature as to suppose this canine mode of interment can be accepted as a solution of the difficulty. Sometimes, the case is further aggravated by the refusal of the clergyman to accept what is called Dissenting baptism. A case of this kind occurred lately, and I was glad to hear the Home Secretary say the other night, not only that the refusal was contrary to law, but contrary also to all our ideas of humanity and Christianity. But why the interment of a baptized adult in that contumelious way should be more contrary to our notions of humanity than the burial of an unbaptized child, is what for the life of me I cannot understand. Now, does that state of the law constitute a grievance, or does it not? Sir, I cannot help thinking that if we could get rid of the unfortunate atmosphere of prejudice through which many of us are in the habit of looking at this question, we should have but little difficulty in answering that question. The desire that exists everywhere, that a relative or friend should be committed to the earth with some religious ceremony, and that that ceremony should be not only in accordance with the feelings entertained by the dead man himself, but in accordance with those held by the surviving relatives and friends—is one so natural, so legitimate, so human, that I cannot conceive anyone endowed with the “ordinary feelings of humanity and Christianity” who would not desire to give effect to it. I remember the time when the burial laws of Continental countries were as illiberal as the laws of England now. I remember well the feeling of indignation among the friends of any unfortunate man who happened to die abroad, and was required to be buried as our law requires the unbaptized Dissenter to be buried, and as the Bill of the hon. Member for West Kent would permit all Dissenters to be buried. Do not say that this is merely a sentimental grievance: we all know how severely sentimental grievances press upon men, especially if they are felt at a time when even the most callous of natures are the most accessible to the influence of sentiment. But if this be a grievance—and I think every person in or out of the House will admit it is in the nature of a grievance—then I ask you what do you gain by perpetuating it? That is a question rather difficult to answer. I hope I shall get an answer in the course of this debate. Let me put a case which may happen and which I know has happened. Take the case of a man who through life has lived in open hostility to the Church of England, a man who may never have darkened the door of any church. You cannot compel him to come there while he lives; but the moment the man is dead, the moment the breath is out of his body the law enables you to lay hands upon that man and impose on his remains ministrations from which the man, if alive, might have recoiled. Now is this barren, I had almost said, this odious privilege worth all the ill-feeling and bad blood which the constant and persistent recurrence of this question must generate. Because—and do not let any hon. Member deceive himself—it is impossible that this question can be settled in any way but one. It is easy for hon. Gentlemen in this House and writers of newspaper articles to pooh-pooh this question, and say that nobody requires any alteration of the law. I know it is otherwise. I know the feeling in favour of this Bill is so deep and so widely spread, that the country will never rest until the law is altered. Therefore, I ask you again, is this question to be permitted to raise that ill-feeling and bad blood which is year after year extending? I do not wonder that hon. Gentlemen opposite should shrink from answering that question. I do not wonder that they should rather take refuge in the argument that the change which I propose will lead to scandal and abuse. Reverting to that question, I do not think I ought to delay any longer a statement of the changes I have made in the Bill since it was first introduced in 1870. It will be in the recollection of those hon. Gentlemen who had seats in the last Parliament that five years ago—that in the year 1870—I introduced a Bill to amend the Burial Laws, which was almost, with the exception of one or two formal clauses, identical with the one I now hold in my hand. Strange as it may now seem, the opposition to that Bill was very feeble. It was opposed, among others, by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, in a speech marked by fairness and moderation. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War, than whom no more fearless or honest man sits in this House, said that although he felt bound to say “no” to the second reading, he should say “no” in a very faint voice indeed. In fact, the objections raised were objections to detail rather than objections to principle, and it was to meet these objections that the then Home Secretary, now Lord Aberdare, carried the Motion for the Bill to be referred to a Select Committee. The Bill was referred to a Select Committee, and I think almost every safeguard that human ingenuity could suggest was introduced into that Bill. But I soon found that not one of these Amendments conciliated a single vote in this House. On the contrary, the Amendments introduced into the Bill in Committee, far from smoothing our path, rather threw difficulties in our way; because everyone of these so-called safeguards served as a sort of peg on which hon. Members wanted to hang other safeguards, and the trouble and the difficulty, in fact I may say the impossibility, of forcing the Bill through Committee was in great measure due to the concessions which I had made. In fact, one side of the House thought the Amendments unnecessary, and the other side thought them useless. Now, believing as I do that every word in an Act of Parliament which is not necessary is mischievous, I have taken it upon myself to strike out all these so-called safeguards, and to bring the Bill back again to the lines of the Bill of 1870; and if you ask me for precautions and safeguards, I say I prefer trusting to the good sense and good feeling of the Nonconformists of England, who are not likely to select the grave of a friend as the place from which to hurl a polemical Philippic at the head of a theological opponent. But we are not without the light of some experience to guide us, because in the year 1868—now nearly seven years ago—a Bill was introduced and carried by the then Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell), affecting Ireland only, and which applied to Ireland almost exactly the same state of the law which by this Bill I seek to apply to England, the only difference being that in Mr. Monsell’s Bill the funeral service was required to be performed by a priest or minister of some denomination. Well, now, I called upon you before, and I call upon you now; to point out if you can, a single instance in which that privilege has been abused in Ireland. And surely it is a poor compliment to your own country to say that Englishmen are not fit to be trusted with a privilege which Irishmen have for seven years exercised without a word of complaint from anybody. If you think otherwise, it is of course open to you to make the Bill more stringent in this respect. You have the command of this question in your hands. My hon. and learned Friend has a most docile majority behind him. Let him, or let the Government, pass this Bill, and then let them introduce into the Bill in Committee every precaution or safeguard they may consider necessary. I am sure they will not meet with any opposition from this side of the House. Meantime, do let us be honest. Oppose this Bill, if you like, on the ground of principle; object, if you please, to the principle of the

Bill; but do not let us hear any more of that nonsense about Shakers, Jumpers, and Socialists, which nobody believes, and which will not influence any single man inside or outside of this House. And if you talk about scandals and abuses, I ask you are there no scandals and abuses arising out of the present law? I believe hon. Members have had sent to them this morning 14 illustrations of cases which occurred within last year, showing the necessity for amendment of the burial law. I am not going to refer to them, and I will tell you the reason why. In the first place, it is an ungrateful and ungracious task to attack in this House people who are not present to defend themselves. In the next place, it is almost impossible to test the accuracy of newspaper reports of these cases. I recollect an instance of this kind in 1873 in the case of the Vicar of Leigh, in which I was guilty, of course, not intentionally, of exaggeration. I have already expressed my regret at this, and I beg to repeat that regret now. At the same time, it is impossible to believe that where there is so much smoke there is no fire. None of these recent cases, so far as I am aware, have been contradicted, and only one or two of those which I cited in former speeches have been contradicted, so that, if it were necessary to rest this Bill on the abuses of the present law, such abuses would not be wanting; but the House will understand that I prefer to rest my case on the broad ground of equity and justice rather than on sensational anecdotes. But I wish to call attention to two objections raised against this Bill with which I cannot help feeling some sympathy. It is said in this Bill you are placing the Dissenting minister in a better position than the clergyman. You allow the Dissenting minister to perform any service he pleases over any person, whereas you require the clergyman to read the service of the Church over the most abandoned person whom he consigns to the earth, and who may be the most profligate of his congregation. It is impossible not to feel some sympathy with objections of that kind. But I ask this question—who is it—what is it that imposes these fetters on the clergyman? Why, his own Church and his own rubric! When this Bill was originally drawn, I introduced a clause expressly allowing clergymen to refuse to perform the burial service over a man if they thought it proper to do so. But when I proposed to do that, I was met with this objection—"You are trying to change the rubric. You are invading the province of Convocation, and you will have all the Archbishops and Bishops down upon you." That is a task from which even the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Recorder of London has shrunk; but should my right hon. and learned Friend seek to alter the law in this respect, he will have my entire sympathy and support. There is another objection, with which also I admit I have some sympathy. It is this. It is said that by this Bill you are throwing open churchyards to ministers of all denominations, and at the same time, having abolished church rates, you do not provide a fund outside the Church to keep the churchyard in repair; and it is not fair to the incumbent, who may, under this Bill, be excluded from his own churchyard, to throw upon him the whole expense of keeping the churchyard in repair. Now, I may say this Bill does not touch the fees which the incumbent is entitled to receive. Those fees are not paid for the performing of the service, but for the breaking open of the ground. The incumbent will continue to receive his fees for the breaking of the ground; therefore, it is hardly fair to say that the incumbent receives nothing for keeping the churchyard in repair. At the same time, it may be said that if you make the churchyard the property of the parish, it is only fair that you should throw on the parish the burden of maintaining it. Now, I had in the Bill of 1870 introduced a clause which, I hope, the House will allow me to read. It is as follows:—

"In order to maintain in decent condition any churchyard or graveyard which shall be for the time being used under this Act, and also for the necessary repair of the walls and other fences thereof, the churchwardens shall once in every year, at its usual Easter meeting, lay before the vestry an account of the moneys expended for the aforesaid purposes during the year then last past; and unless there be some other fund legally chargeable with such costs and expenses, the overseers shall, upon the resolution of the vestry to that effect, out of the rate made for the relief of the poor for the parish or place in which such churchyard or graveyard is situate, repay to the churchwardens the moneys so expended by them."

tion raised; but I had hardly read it in this House, when my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope) rose and objected to it, and it found so little favour in the House or out of it, that I was obliged to drop it. When, therefore, I introduced that clause, I was blamed for introducing it; and now, when I omit it, I am blamed for omitting it. Sir, I have gone through several objections urged against the Bill, and I cannot see one of them which is, in my opinion, sufficient to justify the uncompromising and relentless opposition which is year after year offered to this measure. I shall of course be informed, in the progress of this debate, what is the origin of that opposition—what it is that gave such an impetus to the opposition, that it became impossible for me to force it through Committee. What was it that two years ago called together the largest House that ever divided on any private Member's Bill? What was it that induced the Prime Minister himself to come to this House and enter the lists with so humble an individual as myself? Sir, I am loth to believe what I am often told, that the uncompromising opposition to this Bill arises from that spirit of exclusiveness—so unfortunate an attribute of a National Church—which induced an English Bishop to refuse the title of reverend to a Wesleyan minister; that spirit of exclusiveness which induced an English vicar to raise a wall between the burial places of Churchmen and Dissenters—a feeling quite as reasonable as that of the widow in Oliver Goldsmith's story, who objected to the corpse of a person who had died of small pox being laid by the side of her unvaccinated husband. Far rather would I believe that hon. Gentlemen who oppose this Bill à outrance, do so from higher motives and upon broader grounds—that they honestly think that in thus guarding the threshold of the Establishment, they are only doing their duty to the Church—that they honestly believe that in fighting the battle of the churchyard, they are really fighting the battle of the Church. Well, Sir, if that be so, all I can say is, that the champions of the Establishment have been most unfortunate in their choice of a battle-ground. The Church of England must be in a very bad way indeed, if she is driven to do battle for such a privilege as this—if she is driven to exclaim, with the baffled divinity of Greece—

Now, Sir, I wish to be perfectly frank and open with the House on this as on every other question. I believe, rightly or wrongly, that there are influences now at work, not only without but within the Church, which are, slowly it may be, but very surely, preparing the way for the severance of Church and State in England. In that belief I may be right, or I may be wrong; but, whether I am right or whether I am wrong, of this I am perfectly certain—that the passing or rejection of this little measure will not hasten or retard the advent of disestablishment by a single day or a single hour. Your voices, though given in overwhelming preponderance in favour of the rejection of this Bill, will no more avert the disestablishment of the Church of England than the voice of the Danish King could check the rising of the tide. But though the rejection of the Bill cannot avert disestablishment, I will tell you what that rejection can and will do. It will help to embitter still further a struggle which, God knows, is bitter enough already. It will proclaim to the country that death, which heals all other differences, is powerless to heal the differences between Christian and Christian, and, what perhaps is worst of all, it will fasten upon the Church of England the unworthy—I had almost said the odious imputation—an imputation under which no Christian Church should be permitted to lie—of refusing to bind up the wounds of the broken-hearted, and to listen to the prayer of the mourner. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading.

MR. WYKEHAM MARTIN seconded the Motion. As a devoted member of the Church, he thought the damage accruing to her interests, occasioned by the scandalous scenes which had occurred, such as that recently in the Cowley case, was out of all proportion to the extent of the grievance. An unburied corpse was allowed to lie in a cottage for 11 days; a most shameful riot occurred in the churchyard, and all the odium fell on the Church. It might be said that the admission of Dissenters to churchyards would create new scandals; but even if that were so the injury to the Church would be much less than it suffered at present from such conduct as that of the curate of Cowley and some others, and for this reason, that the odium would be transferred to the Dissenters from the clergyman of the parish. It was time that these scandals were got rid of, for the time of burial was not that for raising polemical controversies. This Bill would remove those scandals, and not create any, and therefore he supported it. They might safely trust the good sense of the people to bury their dead without abusing the privilege conferred on them.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Osborne Morgan.)

COLONEL EGERTON LEIGH, in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, denied that there was any real general grievance to remedy, though there might be an exceptional one. In discussing the measure, they should do as much as possible to avoid promoting the odium theologicum, and his own idea was that they should not do anything which would create a larger breach than existed at present between one denomination and another, but which they would assuredly do if they excited them by such a Bill as the one before the House. He had made the most careful inquiries on the subject, and found that no dissatisfaction whatever existed, and that the different religious denominations were on the best of terms. The Wesleyans and other religious Bodies had, in point of fact, purchased a large number of cemeteries for their sole and separate use. Wesley was himself a Churchman, and in order that his congregation might attend the parish church in the morning, he used to fix his services at such a time as not to interfere with this arrangement. Some time ago there was not so much Dissent, and there was a general desire to be buried where "the rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep;" but it did not now exist. In fact, the hon. and learned Member who acted as undertaker to his Burials Bill—he could not call him a mute—seemed to have found his grievance at the vanishing point. Churchyards were closed by Orders in Council; cemeteries and burying-grounds were opening in all directions; and the hon. and learned Gentleman's brief was walking itself off to the grave. But lawyers did not object to weak cases; the weaker the case the more credit was acquired by a clever attack or defence, and if the hon. and learned Member gained credit in proportion to the weakness of his case, no doubt he would have a high place assigned to him in the Pantheon of lawyers. He (Colonel Leigh) thought the Bill absolutely unnecessary. It had no general support, as was manifest from the few Petitions presented in its favour. If there was a general feeling among the Nonconformists in favour of the Bill, the House would be inundated with Petitions. He denied the existence of any strong feeling of hostility to the Church; he rather believed there was a growing sympathy with the Church, founded on the knowledge of what she had done and was doing. In his own division of the county, a Nonconformist gave the whole of the stone which was wanted to build a new church. There were, however, such beings as resurrectionists of grievances, and he could not but think the present a most unreal, for it was a sentimental grievance. But it served as a cheval de bataille—he might say "a pale horse"—for an attack upon the Church. He saw from a Parliamentary Paper the other day that there were no fewer than 120 sects of religionists in England, and if the Bill passed, he could very well conceive the confusion that would arise in a churchyard from a mob consisting of those who "came to scoff" and did not "remain to pray" at a funeral of a Mormon elder, buried by elders, and attended by 20 or 30 widows, howling in concert or dissonance. Perhaps they might have a number of Communists delivering speeches more marked by blasphemy than religion over the grave of a deceased brother. No doubt cases of scandal had occurred, but these were exceptional cases, and they could not legislate for exceptions. He, however, greatly disapproved of the conduct of Mr. Coley, and was glad he had given up his incumbency, for such conduct did far more harm to the Church than could be done by Dissenters; but such conduct was quite exceptional, and they ought not to be asked to legislate for all exceptions, but to trust to public feeling and indignation to alter the views of such clergymen. As the Queen was the head of the Church as well as the head of the Army, he might say he should not be sorry, where such cases occurred, if Her Majesty caused to be inserted in The Gazette a notice that she had no further need of the services of such ecclesiastical officers. But it was not only Church of England clergymen who objected to the ministers of other persuasions officiating in their churchyards. He would, by permission of the House, read a short account of what happened at a funeral in Dublin a few days since, germane to the subject they were now discussing—

“In the closing scene there was an element of discord as unexpected as it was suggestive. It had been arranged that the Rev. Mr. Carroll, rector of St. Bride’s parish, should read the Burial Service of the Church of England, and he accordingly attended for that purpose. The rev. gentleman is of liberal views, and made no objection to officiating in the cemetery, though it is a Roman Catholic one, very few Protestants being interred in it. When, however, he proceeded to discharge his sacred duty, some of the mob who had obtained admission expressed their dissatisfaction and showed a determination to interrupt if they could not prevent the ceremony. They hooted, and in some few instances pelted him, so that, although he went through a portion of the service, it was altogether divested of its reverent character. The occurrence furnished a strange comment upon the popular demand for religious equality, and the assertion of the principle by the deceased in the agitation which preceded the Irish Church Act.”

He desired to see the hatchet of war buried, and peace and good-will promoted among mankind, and for that purpose he proposed to bury the Burials Bill, having sent an invitation to the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire to act as chief mourner. He would accordingly move the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day six months.” — (Colonel Egerton Leigh.)

MR. GLADSTONE: I am afraid I shall not be able to compete with my hon. and gallant Friend who has moved the rejection of this Bill in his persevering and successful efforts to dispel the gloom of the subject by agreeable and facetious remarks; but I am very anxious, at least, to compete with him, and I hope considerably to surpass him, in the compression and brevity by which what I have to say shall be characterized. I can perform in a very few minutes the only object I have in rising—that of explaining why I shall very cheerfully support the second reading of the Bill, and why I do not give an entirely silent vote on the subject. If my hon. and learned Friend who has introduced the Bill on the present occasion, under circumstances perhaps less favourable than those of former years, had been content to introduce it with the same provisions as they stood when it was last under discussion, I, for one, would have been content to support him, and that without troubling the House for a single moment. The omission of those provisions, however, makes it only fair and ingenuous on my part to say as to some parts of the questions, that there are difficulties which it appears to me he has not taken sufficiently into view. I would say, in the first place, with regard to certain special cases of difficulty arising from the erroneous views of clergymen as to the state of the law, that I do not found my support of the Bill upon cases of that description. As the hon. and gallant Gentleman has said, they have been exceedingly rare. We pass over many years usually without the occurrence of any case of the kind; and when they do occur, they are usually owing to errors on the part of the clergy in respect to the law. At that we cannot be very much surprised, when we reflect that every clergyman being a public officer, as well as whatever else he may be, it is extremely difficult for him to comprehend exactly the ecclesiastical law, which is full of unsolved problems and anomalies, arising mainly out of its antiquity, notwithstanding the attempt of Parliament to adapt it from time to time to the circumstances of the day. I am bound to say that the Bill of my hon. and learned Friend neither will nor can prevent the recurrence of such cases. The clergyman may still refuse to read the service over an unbaptized person, and with respect to this my hon. and learned Friend would not propose to alter the law as to the one last posthumous act of conformity to the Church. I do not know, indeed, whether it would not be somewhat more likely that a clergyman would be tempted, from any doubt he might entertain, to decline to perform a service he was bound to read, if he could point to the existence of a liberty supplied by the Statute Book of having other services. Therefore, I could not base my support of this Bill on the occurrence of any of those cases; besides which I know no reason, if the clergyman does not perform his legal obligation, why he should not be dealt with like any other person who fails to perform the obligation. It has been said—"Unhappy is the individual who gets into an Ecclesiastical Court." That may be so, but we generally hear the observation made by gentlemen of the legal profession. It is an observation which I do not pretend to dispute; but I am disposed to broaden its scope, and say—"Unhappy is the man who gets into any Court at all, whether secular or ecclesiastical." It is one of the most mournful incidents of the vicissitudes of life. But be that as it may, the simple question in this case is—Is there a grievance? If there is, I think my hon. and learned Friend is entitled to ask us to vote for the second reading of the Bill. I hope it was rather the temptation to a jest which he could not resist, than a very strict view of the case, which induced my hon. and gallant Friend to propose that we should "bury the Burials Bill." That seemed to express an indisposition to move at all in this matter; but let me remind him it is admitted on all hands—it was admitted by the House of Lords, in the shape of a Bill which they sent to the House of Commons the year before last—that it is a distinct and decided grievance to a clergyman and the parties, notwithstanding their concurrent indisposition, that they should be under a legal obligation to have the services of the Church of England performed over the remains of the dead who were not members of that Church. Consequently, so far, at least, there is an undoubted grievance existing at law, and I am by no means disposed—I do not think my hon. and gallant Friend himself or this House would be disposed—to object to an alteration in the law in that respect. That, however, is not a grievance with which this Bill proposes to deal. My hon. and learned Friend has not embodied in his Bill any clause relieving the clergyman from the obligation of reading the Burial Service in cases where he and the parties concur that it should not be so read; but he could not object to the introduction of any such clause. Sir, the Bill proceeds much beyond that, and many are prepared to concur to that extent in the alteration of the law, and yet cannot support the Bill. He says it is a grievance that those who do not belong to the Church of England should be debarred from the privilege of accompanying what the law terms the easement of burial in the churchyard with a religious service on the spot, at the grave. In answer to that, it is said that the performance of the religious services at the grave has not been usually characteristic of the religious bodies of this country, other than the Church of England. Neither the Roman Catholics nor the Non-conformists have been in the habit of using such services; but I am bound not to tie them down in their absence, and I do not think that it is for us members of the Church of England to say it would be at all unseemly or unnatural on their part were they in particular cases, or generally, to adopt the view that it was expedient and becoming to perform some religious service at a grave. The question now is, whether it should be prohibited by law in the churchyards of the Church of England. I am of opinion with my hon. and learned Friend that there is a grievance in the prohibition, and it is because I look upon this Bill as a means of removing that grievance that I think it right to vote for the second reading. When, however, I look at the particular clauses and provisions of the Bill, I own it seems to me that there are several questions which would require consideration in Committee—indeed, it is quite plain to me that they are strictly questions that can only be treated there. The state of our churchyards at the present moment is very different indeed from what it used to be 30, 40, or 50 years ago, partly from increasing wealth in the country, and partly, I cannot help thinking, from greater sensibility of feeling on the part of all classes of the community, particularly in the labouring classes, and this has led to the introduction of proceedings perfectly innocent and even laudable in themselves, which tend to give to the churchyards of this country a character not only of decency, but almost of delicacy in their arrangements, which renders it rather difficult to deal with them in cases where you contemplate or propose to permit or encourage a considerable assemblage of people within their limits. It may be contended that on the occasion of funerals, as at present conducted, no practical difficulty arises; and why should there be a practical difficulty if this Bill become law? The present state of the case is this—the clergyman, who by law is invested with the freehold of the churchyard, is also by virtue of his office guardian of peace and order within its confines. He is the superintendent of all funerals that take place also, and it is his business and duty to call in the aid of the police authorities upon any occasion when the presence of a crowd is expected, the police authorities recognizing this as one of the occasions on which the police are invariably present for the purpose of making the arrangements necessary to prevent damage to the churchyard from inconvenient pressure. I do not for a moment speak of the presence of restraint at those assemblies. Anything of that kind may be safely dismissed from our contemplation. It is a case that would be so rare in recurrence, and so utterly repugnant to the whole feeling of the community, that it should be treated like any other of those exceedingly exceptional cases which cannot be made the subject of practical consideration. At present not only the clergyman personally seems to have to discharge the duties attending funerals, and to take cognizance of all their incidents, but he is also the person upon whom falls the burden and responsibility if any damage of any kind is done. He has to collect the funds by which the churchyard is maintained—a duty which too often falls as a heavy charge upon him, inasmuch as few English families like to assume the responsibility of collecting the pecuniary requirements of our Church. His authority, therefore, is certainly a great security in respect to order at funerals; but there is no person holding a corresponding position in the case of the Roman Catholics and Nonconformists, and it might be thought invidious, and even probably officious, if the clergyman, as a quasi-civil officer, were to assume the responsibility of taking the arrangements in those cases. It therefore appears to me a very serious question, independent of other matters connected with the public peace, of what is really to be done to prevent our churchyards from receiving damage, not from any feeling of misconduct, nor from a desire to do mischief, but as a necessary consequence of the presence of large numbers, who sometimes assembled in crowds for the purpose and with the desire of hearing some eloquent preacher deliver an oration or address in a very limited space, among the rather delicate and fragile nature of the freshly dug soil and newly-deposited flowers on the graves of their fellow-subjects. I, therefore, think it would be necessary in Committee in some manner or other to provide against this difficulty. These are the reservations I wish to make in saying that I should cheerfully and confidently vote for the second reading. The hon. and learned Member said, that he had introduced precautionary provisions in the Bill. I will not say that they are the best, for it very often happens that when you think you do not do good by introducing such provisions, you will often find you have done harm in omitting them. I believe it would be reasonable in the present condition of this country, especially in the present condition of the religious professions, and especially in the present condition of Wales—where there is a large proportion of the population belonging to the Nonconformist Bodies, constituting a case very much resembling, although in a more limited area, the case of Ireland, for which long ago we made special provision—that we should pass the second reading of this Bill, and, with the reservations to which I have just referred, I shall give it a very cheerful and hearty support.

MR. HEYGATE supported the Motion for the rejection of the Bill. At the same time he had always felt that there was a certain amount of grievance in connection with the burial question; and in his opinion, the only difference lay in what that grievance was, and in the remedy proposed. The remedy suggested by the Bill was, however, of so violent a nature that it was far worse than the disease. There were two real grievances, the first being that the friends of a deceased person should be obliged to have one particular service read over the departed, of which they disapproved; and another cause of complaint was, that the clergyman should be called upon to use words which, having regard to the character of the person over whom they were read, were felt to be scarcely justifiable or proper, unless on the ground of excessive charity. He should endeavour to meet those grievances; but he did not think the way to do so was to throw open the churchyards to persons of all religious denominations, some of which had no ministers. He could not agree with his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich in the "see-saw" manner in which he treated the question; and the very fact that they had now a Bill before them which professed to remove the difficulties, showed only that it would fail in its object because it did not contain any safeguards. There was no security whatever in the Bill. He (Mr. Heygate) had brought in a Bill four years ago on the subject, which, if carried, would, in his opinion, have proved satisfactory. That Bill was read a second time, and the hon. and learned Member who brought in the present Bill had expressed himself then in a very different manner from that in which he had expressed himself on the present occasion. He denied that those who objected to have the service of the Church of England performed in the churchyard had a right to have the service of their own particular communion celebrated there. It seemed to be claimed as a right; but there was no such right, though it was true that every parishioner had the right of being buried in the graveyard. There was an exact analogy, he maintained, between the case of the churchyard and admission to the church itself, and until some reason for drawing a distinction between the two was shown, and some grounds were advanced showing that the proposals of the hon. and learned Gentleman might be granted without its being sought to make them a stepping-stone to the performance of every kind of service, he must continue to oppose such a measure as that under discussion. To prove how great were the facilities other than those afforded in our churchyards for interments, he might point out that in reply to a circular asking for information on the subject, it was stated that out of 6,209 parishes which sent in returns, 1,627 had chapel burial-grounds, 421 public cemeteries, while in 2,140 no Dissenting chapel whatever existed. He hoped his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department would direct his attention to the subject and endeavour to meet the case by applying some remedy, either by increasing the number of cemeteries, or by giving facilities for separate burials. He might mention that no single Conservative Member for England or Wales had ever supported the Bill; while as to the feeling in its favour, he wished to observe that it had found little or no expression at the last General Election, for while much pressure had been put upon candidates in respect to other questions, such as the income tax, local taxation, and even the Contagious Diseases Bill and the Permissive Bill, the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Denbigh had been wholly unnoticed. Again, although a measure embodying that proposal had been read a second time by a majority of 63 in 1873, it was carried by the votes of the Scotch and Irish Members, while it should be borne in mind that the majority in its favour in 1870 was 111. He would further observe that the number of Petitions in support of the Bill did not show that any great grievance was felt to exist; and that although three or four years ago, a considerable number had been presented on the question, they came almost entirely from Ireland and Scotland. No case had, therefore, he contended, been made out in favour of the Bill which would warrant the House in passing it, while the scandals alluded to by the hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. Wykeham Martin) would remain untouched by its provisions. He felt bound, he might add, to admit that no such evils as had been predicted had resulted from the operation of the Burials Bill which had some time ago been passed for Ireland, although what occurred at the funeral of Sir John Gray did not show a very satisfactory state of things. In Ireland, however, there were practically only three religious denominations, and therefore there was not that inconvenience that would be likely to arise in a country which comprised so many religious sects as were contained in England. Admitting, however, as he did, that there was a grievance, he thought it might be effectually removed by the Interments in Churchyards Bill, introduced by himself, and which stood for a second reading that day. Believing then that the grievance was extremely small, that it might be met by giving increased facilities, and that the operation of the Bill in this country would be injurious, he should vote against the second reading.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he had on the invitation of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbigh (Mr. Osborne Morgan) put his name on the back of the Bill, and he therefore wished to say a few words in reference to it. He supported it, first, because the grievance complained of by the Nonconformists was well-founded, and next, because—in the interest of the Church itself—it was desirable that this grievance should be fully and amply remedied. Upon the whole, however, he preferred the Bill brought in by his hon. and learned Friend last year to the present measure, although he had no doubt exercised a wise discretion in leaving the concessions recommended by the Committee of 1870, since they had failed to conciliate the opponents of the Bill, to be inserted, if the House should see fit, at a future stage. It was, in his opinion, unnecessary to extend the Bill to those places which were already provided with cemeteries, and it would be well to make provisions against celebrations of a civil character in the churchyard; but the principle of the Bill, that the Nonconformists had a right to the celebration of interments by ministers of their own religion, had his warm approval. The hon. and gallant Member opposite (Colonel Egerton Leigh), who had moved the rejection of the Bill, had indulged in a number of jokes, the best of which were somewhat misplaced, and which were little calculated, in the hon. and gallant Member's own words, to "bury the hatchet" between Churchmen and Nonconformists. He was surprised to hear the hon. and gallant Member deny the right of Nonconformists to burial in the parish churchyard. The right of parishioners to be interred in the parish churchyard was not an ecclesiastical right, but an indefeasible civil right. There was no exception to that rule, and it not only belonged to Nonconformists and Roman Catholics equally with Churchmen, but a Mahomedan parishioner, if one could be found, would be entitled to be buried in the churchyard of the parish. A clergyman of the Church of England was bound to read the Burial Service in all cases except over persons excommunicated, those who had committed suicide, and those who had not been baptized, but he was obliged to recognize baptism by a Nonconformist minister, and even by a layman. There were two classes of Nonconformists who suffered from the law as to baptized persons—those with whom baptism was not a customary rite, and those who postponed the rite until children had attained to a more mature age. There were only 530 cemeteries in England and Wales, while there were 13,000 parishes not provided with cemeteries; so that the grievance was largely felt by Nonconformists, who had no desire to possess separate churchyards of their own, and who wished the Burial Service to be conducted by their own ministers. Besides that, there was a growing feeling among the clergy themselves, that it was a hardship to be called upon to perform the service over persons not in communion with them. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Heygate) himself recognized this hardship, because he had brought in a Bill which, although wholly futile in other respects, would relieve the clergy from this disagreeable duty. There were many who believed that the effect of this Bill would be to create polemical discussions in churchyards, and lead to demonstrations of rival sects which might cause a breach of the peace. He, however, agreed with his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich, that there need be no fear of civil disturbance, if this Bill became law, neither did he think there was any danger of polemical discussions being held in the churchyards. In Scotland and Ireland the law was very much the same as that now proposed for England. In Scotland it was not the custom of the Presbyterians to use any ceremonial rites at the grave. The service was usually performed in the house, and then the corpse was committed to the grave in silence. In Ireland, until quite lately, the law and practice were almost the same as in England. An Act, however, had been passed, which had been accepted as a measure of conciliation by all parties. When that Act was before Parliament, in 1868, the same predictions as to its working which were urged against the present Bill, were freely indulged in. Mr. Lefroy warned the House of the danger of collisions if a Roman Catholic procession had a right to enter a churchyard and perform their own funeral service. In the House of Lords, the Archbishop of Armagh predicted that the Act would lead to nothing but confusion and collision. What, however, had been the result of the Act? The churchyards were the exclusive property of the Church of Ireland, yet ministers of all religions might perform any ceremony they thought fit at the funerals of their flocks; and he had been assured by those best acquainted with the subject, that the Irish Burials Act had worked well, and that no cases whatever of disturbance had ever occurred. He would therefore ask why a measure which had succeeded so well in Ireland should fail in England? But then it was said that this was only the thin end of the wedge, and that, although the Nonconformists only asked for the churchyards now, they would next ask for the churches. Even in Ireland, however, when the Church was disestablished, no demand was made for the churches. Believing that all the measures of conciliation passed during the last 20 years had strengthened the Church—that the grievance was one which affected not only the Nonconformists, but the clergy—he asked the House to accept the Bill as a step in the right direction, and as a measure which would not result in any of the evils that were so confidently predicted.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he was sure that the House felt obliged to his hon. and learned Friend opposite (Mr. Osborne Morgan) for the way in which he had advocated the measure. He was sure his hon. and learned Friend had said all that could be said on behalf of his Bill, and he had said it in the ablest manner; and if the principle did not meet with the acceptance of the House, it was because there was something weak in the case, and not on account of any defect in the advocate. The question was most important, yet it lay in an exceedingly narrow compass. It had been represented by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) and the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) as a Nonconformist grievance, the removal of which they had a right to demand. No doubt, if it were a grievance, and one of sufficient magnitude to call for legislation, it ought to be remedied, always provided that it could be remedied without creating in its turn a grievance of equal or greater magnitude; and the reason why he opposed it was, not because no grievance at all had been made out, but because it would create a much larger grievance than that which it removed. No doubt, every parishioner had a right to be interred in the parish churchyard; yet there was a limit to his right. The churchyard was legally vested in the incumbent, and he held it as a portion of the property belonging to the Established Church, and no parishioner had a right to be buried without the observance of the laws and regulations of that Church. Now, what was the grievance of the Nonconformists? His hon. and learned Friend did not complain that those who died excommunicated, or had committed suicide, or had died unbaptized could not have the Burial Service read over them, and if there was a defect in that direction, it was not, at all events, cured by this Bill. What he complained of was, that Dissenters who had a right to be buried in the churchyard must submit to have the beautiful and exquisite service of the Church read over their deceased relatives, instead of having a service of their own by a minister of their own denomination. It was said that there were persons who objected to the reading over their deceased relatives of that service which of all services was the most solemn and beautiful. That grievance was sought to be remedied; but the remedy proposed did not meet the views of those who were in favour of the present measure. The grievance of which they complained was that a Dissenting minister, or a person who was not a minister at all, was not allowed to read at the funeral of a Dissenter, and in the parish churchyard, any service, deliver any harangue, or perform any rite he might think proper. Well, it had been admitted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich—than whom no one was better informed on such subjects—that, as a rule, the Nonconformists did not wish for any funeral rite to be performed in the churchyards. Then, again, they ought to consider the small number of places there were in which Dissenters had, of necessity, to be buried in the parish churchyard. They had, no doubt, in some rural districts; but in the vast majority of cases, they had burial grounds of their own, and in scarcely any case could they fail to obtain ground for the purpose. Besides that, churchyards in cities and towns were daily being closed, so that every week the grievance was diminishing. But it was said that although the grievance was a small one, it ought to be remedied by legislation, and he admitted that if no evil consequences arose, it ought to be remedied. The Bill, however, placed no restriction upon the ceremony to be performed, and it should not be lost sight of that there were a large number of persons in the country who objected—and fairly objected—to such a provision as that proposed. They were members of the Church of England, of that Church whose property the churchyard was, and might they not very reasonably say that they did not like such services to be performed in the churchyards as might be under the Bill, and which would be a greater offence to them than the fancied grievance complained of was to the Dissenter? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich said, that a grievance existed which ought to be removed, but that it did not exist to anything like the extent which had been asserted, and he went on to say that dangers might have to be encountered which were of no mean or trifling description; and the right hon. Gentleman drew a picture of a quiet churchyard—the burial in it of some Nonconformist who had been a political celebrity, and an eloquent minister from some distant place delivering in the churchyard a funeral oration. What security had the parishioners who were members of the Church of England that that oration would not contain offensive and irritating allusions? But if the Nonconformists were so desirous of having those privileges, why did they formerly so strenuously resist a tax for the maintenance of the churchyards? Forty-three or forty-four years ago the Nonconformists agitated for the abolition of compulsory church rates. They carried on that agitation with the greatest possible vigour and to a successful issue, and when it was suggested as a compromise that while they ought not to be called upon to pay for the maintenance of the structure, they ought for that of the churchyard in which they might bury their dead, they would not listen to the suggestion. It came, therefore, from them with an ill grace to bring forward this measure, and he should oppose it on the ground, as he had before said, that the grievance now sought to be remedied was at best a very slight one, and its removal would create a still greater one in another direction.

MR. ROEBUCK: I am anxious not to give my vote without a reason, and I am the more anxious to give that reason after the speech we have just heard from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General, which seems to be more that of a lawyer speaking from his brief than of one who is anxious that the Bill should be defeated. I regret that the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Egerton Leigh) who moved the rejection of the Bill has thought it right to make so many poor jokes upon the subject. Now, in a matter of this sort, which touches the dearest affections of many people, it is not proper that idle and foolish jokes should be indulged in. Let me ask where is the real mischief likely to arise from passing this Bill. We can do no injury to the dead, and nothing we can do will be of service to the dead. The persons injured and affected by the existing state of things are the living, who have to bury the dead. What harm would take place if something of this kind occurred? A Dissenter dies, and he dies in a parish in which he has lived all his life, and his relatives require that he should be buried in that churchyard in which the bones of his ancestors have been laid. That is surely a very natural desire, and there must be a feeling on the part of every right-minded person that the desire should be gratified. Well, suppose the Bill has passed, and the Dissenter is buried there. The Church of England clergyman, not being present, is not injured, because it is the minister of the Dissenter who comes and pronounces over the body such a speech or discourse as he thinks will please the relatives, and do honour to the dead. I want to know what grievance there is there. "Oh," but it was said by the hon. and learned Gentleman, "there is a grievance. There may be a large number of people in that parish who don't like to see a Dissenting minister in a Church of England churchyard, and they show that feeling by opposing this Bill." Now, I regret such a feeling towards one's fellow-creatures. In my opinion it is much to be desired that such people should be taught to have right feeling and to act like Christian men; to feel for people in affliction and seek to soothe their sorrow rather than to entertain narrow-minded prejudice against them. Would it not be more in accordance with Christian feeling that the relatives and friends of the dead should be allowed to be soothed in their sorrow and gratified in their feelings by the one to whom they had been in the habit of looking? Let us get rid of the narrow-mindedness which opposes this Bill. When I heard that it was likely it would be rejected by an overwhelming majority, I asked myself why should the House of Commons be so narrow-minded—what possible advantage can it be to the Church of England to retain in their hands this small power, and what injury can be done to the great body of the Church of England by granting to their fellow-citizens what is now asked? To my mind the first great thing to be done amongst us all is to get rid of this narrow-mindedness about religion. Unfortunately, that subject—the most difficult and most mysterious—has created more heart-burnings and mischief than any other question which agitates mankind; but, as years roll on, I have seen in my days so many changes in religion, and so much setting down of differences and no injury following therefrom, that I cannot help thinking the House of Commons will do well to consider what they are about, and not to cast a slur upon the name and greatness of the great Body to which we all belong.

MR. FORSYTH said, he should oppose the Bill, but not from any disrespect towards the Dissenting Body. He thoroughly respected their conscientious scruples; but he should vote against the Bill, amongst other reasons, because its promoters had made out no case in its favour. After the Disruption of the Church of Scotland, great difficulty was found by those who joined the Free Church in obtaining building ground on which to erect their churches. It was said that immense tracts of land belonged to certain persons who would not give or sell any portion of it for that purpose, and a Bill was threatened to be brought in to compel them. If he had been in Parliament at the time, and that Bill had been brought in, he would assuredly have voted for it. But what was the case here? The hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) founded his Bill almost entirely upon the ground that there were only

531 parishes in England in which there were public cemeteries; but that must be wrong, because he used the same figures in 1873. [Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he had used to-day the figures of 1873.] If the number had increased the hon. and learned Member should have told the House so. In 1873, the Home Secretary resisted the Bill, on the ground, amongst others, that greater facilities ought to be given for providing cemeteries. It was to be regretted now that they had not before them some Return or other authentic information to show whether there were not a very large number of churchyards, as he believed there were, in which Dissenters could be buried with as much freedom as the members of the Church of England. The hon. and learned Member further stated that there was an overwhelming preponderance of feeling in favour of the Bill. He (Mr. Forsyth) was astonished at that statement, and would like to ask if any such feeling had been expressed by Petitions, as it would be if it really existed? He had made inquiry at the Petition Office on the subject, and found that while there were 24 Petitions against the Bill, with 511 signatures, there were in its favour three Petitions, under official seals, bearing four signatures only. Sure he was that if Petitions could have been procured—and they were the true index to the feeling of the country—his hon. Friend would have had them and rested his case upon them. There could be no doubt as to the right of every parishioner to be buried in the parish churchyard, subject to having read over his remains the Burial Service of the Church of England. There was a sentimental objection to that condition, and he respected it, but ought not the sentiment of those who were opposed to the Bill to be respected also? They all knew that the parish churchyard was a sacred place, consecrated by prayer offered by a duly authorized Bishop, according to the rights and usages and forms of the Church of England, whose faith was belief in the Trinity; and if Dissenters objected to the Burial Service of the Church of England, surely they ought to allow members of the Church of England to object to services such as a political harangue which might be delivered over the grave of a Dissenter, and which might violate the holiest doctrines of their religion. Under the Bill there might be any service or no service, and that was the substantial objection to the Bill—not the fear of rioting or the destruction of flowers. Another objection was this—that if Dissenters might have their service read in the parish churchyard, those of them who usually read all or a portion of their service in their chapels might claim the right to read it in the church, and if the one claim was conceded how could the other be resisted? The only plausible ground for the Bill had been removed by the abolition of church rates, for Dissenters now were not asked to pay 6*d.* for the maintenance either of the church or of the churchyard—the necessary funds being subscribed voluntarily by Churchmen. He himself was resident in Berkshire, and paid a voluntary church rate for the sustentation of the fabric in which he worshipped; and he did not think it fair or right that those who did not during their lives take any part in the maintenance of the churchyards should have the right claimed for them, not to be buried there—for that right existed—but to be buried with any ceremony or no ceremony, just as their relatives desired.

MR. RICHARD: As this question has not been before debated in the present Parliament, perhaps I may be permitted, as a Nonconformist, to explain the precise nature of the grievance of which Nonconformists complain. I am the more anxious to do this, as it seems to me clear from the course of the discussion, and especially from the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General, that considerable misapprehension still exists in the minds of even well-informed persons, such as we may presume him to be. But I must first correct a statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), and, of course, deriving great weight from his authority, which has been repeated in still stronger terms by the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Heygate) and has been assumed by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General as an indisputable fact—namely, that it is not customary among Protestant Dissenters to have a service at the grave, but that silent burial is the rule among them. Perhaps, on this one point, I may venture to place my authority even against that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. So far as I know, with the exception of Scotland, and perhaps the Presbyterians in England, it is the universal custom of all Bodies of Nonconformists to have service at the grave. A great deal has been said on the point that there is no demand for the Bill. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Marylebone, who has just sat down, has repeated the assertion made by several others, that there have been no Petitions, or very few, presented in its favour. I believe the hon. and learned Gentleman was not a Member of the last Parliament; but when my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbighshire first brought forward his measure there was a large number of Petitions, having more than 100,000 signatures. I used to come in myself, almost every day for weeks, with an armful of Petitions which I could scarcely carry. The reason why there are no Petitions now, is that people cannot be always sending Petitions on the same subject. The hon. and gallant Gentleman who moved the rejection of the Bill referred to a case in which he himself was concerned. As I understood him, when he was once in command in Scotland, one of his men died, and he was allowed to go into a Presbyterian churchyard, and read the service of the Church of England over his body. Did it not occur to the hon. and gallant Gentleman that then a privilege was accorded to him by the Presbyterians of Scotland which his own Church in this country would deny to the Presbyterian or any other Dissenter? The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General raised the objection that, possibly, some celebrated Dissenting politician might die, and that a political oration would be delivered over his grave, and he says that members of the Church of England would object to such a thing being done in a churchyard that belongs to them. Well, in the first place, the churchyard does not belong to them. It belongs to the parish, and every Dissenter who lives in that parish has as good a right to be buried there as any Member of the Church of England. But I can tell the hon. and learned Gentleman that it is not the habit of Dissenters to turn graveyards into places of political declamation. I wish to correct another prevailing error. It is sometimes supposed that Nonconformists are promoting this Bill, because they have a conscientious and inveterate objection to the Burial Service of the Church of England. Now, I believe that is an entire misapprehension. I doubt whether you would find one in a hundred among them who would object to that service for its own sake, or who would doubt that it is a beautiful and impressive service when used over those to whom it appropriately applies. So far is it otherwise, that they themselves almost invariably employ a large portion of it. I have attended many scores of Dissenting funerals, and always the greater part of the service has been the same as that of the Church of England, and for this obvious reason, that the larger—and hon. Gentlemen opposite will allow me to say—the better part of that service itself consists merely of selections from the Holy Scriptures, selections made, indeed, with admirable judgment and taste, but nothing more. And it is remarkable that the comparatively small portions of the service not taken from the Bible are just those to which not Nonconformists only, but many Churchmen have strongly taken exception. But we object to have any form imposed upon us. We are accustomed to greater freedom in our religious exercises. We believe that no form which human ingenuity can devise would be applicable to all the infinite variety of human life and circumstance. We feel—and surely there are occasions when members of the Church of England must also feel—that there is something more than anomalous in having one service over a child of three days old and a man three-score years and ten; over some Christian man or woman who has lived a whole life of devotion to the service of God and humanity, and the notorious profligate who may have died in a drunken orgie. It is not the Nonconformists only who feel this anomaly. There are hundreds of earnest and conscientious clergymen who feel the obligation to the indiscriminate use of this service as a grievous burden on their consciences. If I may venture to say so, without offence—and I am sure I mean none—I believe one of the reasons why the Church of England has lost its hold on large sections of the people, is the unyielding rigidity with which it adheres to forms. Your system is hard, inelastic, unaccommodating. You insist upon putting your own ministers—highly intelligent and educated gentlemen—into a strait-waistcoat of uniformity, and do not give them the slightest power or discretion to vary or alter the services they perform according to the circumstances of the case. Now, I wish in addition to the admirable statement of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan), to say a few words further as to the object of this measure. There are two classes of persons whom we propose to relieve by this Bill. There is one class who are denied all rites of Christian burial in the parochial churchyards. As the House is well aware, there is a large and respectable body of persons in this country who do not think it right to administer baptism to infants, but only to those who can make an intelligent profession of their personal faith. When the children of such persons die, if no burial-place but the churchyard is accessible, they must be buried without any religious service whatever, and this is often felt to be painful and humiliating in a high degree. But there is another and a much larger class, comprising all the Nonconformists of every denomination, who are now forbidden to have their dead buried by their own ministers, and with such religious forms as they prefer. We object to this on two grounds. It seems to us as if the Church took advantage of its position to lay its hand on the Dissenter and claim him as its own when dead, though through life he has conscientiously refused her his allegiance. It is impossible to put this view of the matter more clearly than was done by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. Speaking in this House in the year 1863, the right hon. Gentleman said—

“If he (the Dissenter) has access to the churchyard, or has access to it subject exclusively and absolutely to the condition of having the service of the Church read over his remains, I confess I do not think that that is a state of the law which is consistent with those principles of civil and religious freedom on which, for a series of years, our legislation has been based. I do not see that there is sufficient reason, or, indeed, any reason at all, why, after having granted, and most properly granted, to the entire community the power of professing and practising what form of religion they please during life, you should say to themselves, or their relations when they are dead, ‘We will at the last lay our hands upon you, and not permit you to enjoy the privilege of being buried in the churchyard, where, perhaps, the ashes of your ancestors repose, or, at any rate, in the place of which you are parishioners, unless you appear there as members of the Church of England; and, as members of that Church, have her service read over your remains.' That appears to me an inconsistency and anomaly in the present state of the law, and is in the nature of a grievance."—[3 Hansard, clxx, 153.]

Then, I think, you are casting an ungenerous aspersion on our character in refusing to us this right. Here we are engaged side by side with you in carrying on the great work of Christian civilization. You will acknowledge—indeed, most generous acknowledgments have frequently been made by distinguished members of the Church of England—that but for the labours of the Nonconformists there would be a deplorable destitution of the means of religious instruction among large masses of the people of this country. Some of you do not to hesitate to join with us in various forms of religious and philanthropic enterprize. Yet when we come with our dead to the graveyards, which are the property of the nation, and ask to have them interred by our own ministers, and with such religious services as are most consistent with our consciences and preferences, you meet us with uplifted hands, and exclaim—Procul, O procul, este profani! It has been alleged over and over again in the course of this debate that it is a very small grievance with which this Bill deals. It may be very small to those who inflict the grievance; but it is those who suffer who are the best judges of that matter. It is astonishing with what perfect philosophical calmness and composure we can endure the wrongs and grievances of others. One of the reasons assigned in support of the allegation that this is a small grievance is that there are now so many opportunities for Dissenters to be buried elsewhere without coming to the graveyards attached to the churches of the Church of England. The hon. Member for South Leicestershire, in a former debate, speaking, as he always does on this question, in a kindly and conciliatory spirit, referred to Wales as a part of the country where there are ample graveyards attached to the chapels. He could scarcely have selected a more unfortunate instance in illustration of his argument, because it is just precisely in Wales that a very large proportion of Dissenting chapels have no graveyards attached to them. I hold in my hand some statistical returns, and I have this guarantee for their correctness, that they have been procured from those who represent the various Nonconformist denominations in Wales. In Carnarvonshire the Calvinistic Methodists, Independents, and Baptists have 240 chapels—of these 35 have graveyards, and 205 have none. In Anglesea, there are 147 chapels belonging to the same Bodies—25 have graveyards, and 122 have none. In Flintshire, the Calvinistic Methodists and Independents have 113 chapels—13 of these have graveyards and 100 none. In Merionethshire, the three denominations have 173 chapels—of these 46 have graveyards, and 127 have none. In Denbighshire, the Calvinistic Methodists and Independents have 133 chapels—of these 27 have graveyards, and 106 have none. In Montgomeryshire, the same two denominations have 155 chapels—of these 27 have graveyards, and 128 have none. In Cardiganshire, the Methodists and Independents have 150 chapels—of these 48 have graveyards, and 102 have none. In Carmarthenshire, the three denominations have 225 chapels—of these 149 have graveyards, and 76 have none. In Glamorganshire, the Calvinistic Methodists and Independents have 332 chapels—of these 162 have graveyards, and 170 have none. It is not for me to presume to give advice to the Members of the Church of England; they are the best judges of what is their true policy. But I should have thought that in the interest of their own Church, it would be wise to remove these grievances, which are like a blister on the consciences and feelings of a large portion of the community. Some, I believe, oppose this Bill, because some of us who promote it advocate the disestablishment of the Church. Certainly we do so, and my only wonder is that right hon. Gentlemen proclaim this now, as if they had made some remarkable discovery. Why, we have been engaged any time these 30 years in agitating for disestablishment. But do you imagine that you serve the cause of the Establishment by perpetuating such exclusive and invidious distinctions as these? If I were mindful only of the cause of disestablishment, I should say to my hon. and learned Friend—"Pray do not touch this question; leave it alone. These scandals that are occurring continually up and down the country, partly through the fault of the clergy, but much more frequently through the state of the law, are making rapid converts to disestablishment; therefore I should be glad to retain this grievance so far as that object is concerned." But I am anxious to see it removed, because I believe it will tend to allay a great deal of irritation and animosity. I wish that around the graves of those who may have differed in life the battle should no longer rage, especially as we may cherish the consolatory hope that at the very time when we are fighting, as it were, at the tomb, all discord and conflict have ceased for them, as they have entered into what has been beautifully called the all-reconciling world.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, that the Bill was by no means an honest one, for although it was generally assumed that its object was to confer an extension of the rights of burial upon the Nonconformists, the Bill itself contained no reference to the Nonconformists or to any other Christian community, and, in fact, the title of the Bill ought to have been, "The Burial Service Bill." It had been argued in support of the Bill that whatever divisions might exist between the Dissenters and the Churchmen in life, an end ought to be put to them in death. With that proposition he entirely agreed, and he thought that nothing could reconcile differences in theological views more thoroughly than a uniform service embodying all points on which Protestants were agreed, and excluding all on which they were disagreed being read over the graves of Dissenters and Churchmen alike. The causes of complaints against clergymen were very few and far between, and had been much exaggerated. For instance, the Welsh case to which the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire had referred in his speech of the 23rd of March, 1870, as having done more to widen the gulf between the Church and the Dissenters, and to weaken the tottering fabric of the Establishment than anything else that had occurred during the last 90 years, was one in which the clergyman, having granted leave as a favour that the body of a person who was not a parishioner should be buried in the graveyard attached to his church, thought that under the circumstances he had right to read the Burial Service at the funeral. The clergyman was the more justified in the course he had taken, inasmuch as the deceased, who was a Methodist minister, had during life always expressed the greatest admiration for the Church of England Burial Service. And yet this was a case that was declared to have been regarded throughout the country as a piece of gross tyranny on the part of the clergyman. For his own part, he should be delighted to see any real grievances under which the Dissenters were labouring fully and completely redressed. Some line, however, must be drawn with regard to the nature of the service permitted to be performed in the churchyards, and it could not be tolerated that the representatives of every extraordinary delusion should be allowed to go through what they chose to regard as religious ceremonies on the occasion of the funeral of any of their followers.

MR. D. DAVIES, who claimed to represent the feeling of the majority of Nonconformists said, he might describe himself as a fair specimen of them, without having any crotchets on this subject. The vicar of his own parish was a tenant of his, and one of his best friends. Anyhow, he had been his friend for 35 years, and that was a good deal for a Nonconformist to say. If the House would kindly accept him as a fair specimen, he might add, in answer to the inaccurate remark that Nonconformists did nothing to restore the fabric of the church, that he gave the first subscription towards the restoration of his parish church. The Nonconformists were more or less one-half of the population in England and Wales, so that they were not a mere insignificant handful of people. Not only were they an important section of the community, but they were very loyal subjects of Her Majesty. Having said so much on that point, he would tell the House what his grievance was in common with that of all other Nonconformists. He would have not the slightest objection to the service of the Church of England, even when he was dead himself; but he hoped to be a good man, and then the service would be for him a proper service. What he complained of was, that they would not have the same liberty in death as they now had in life, and that the minister whom he was accustomed to hear was not allowed to conduct the burial service for his friends while he was alive, and for him when he died. That was the secret of the whole grievance. Granting that burial grounds should be regarded as sacred, permission to Dissenting ministers to pronounce the funeral service would do them no harm. As regarded learning, he thought that Nonconformist ministers were equal in that respect to the clergymen of the Church of England; in fact, he believed that the most learned and the greatest preacher that ever lived was a Nonconformist. As a body, they were a very happy people, and acted on the principle of "give and take." The best plan under the circumstances was for the Church of England not to stand strictly upon what she might regard as her legal rights, but to act upon the same principle and give and take and to become liberal in her views. He put it to the Government whether it might not be worth their while to lend their aid towards carrying this Bill, on the understanding that it should be amended in Committee. Such a measure would be carried sooner or later. The law, as it stood, was a positive insult to Nonconformist ministers, and he asked the House to pass the Bill unanimously, if that was not too much to expect. He trusted that they should hear nothing more of the Interments Bill, under which he understood persons would be buried like dogs. He did not wish to interfere with hon. Members opposite, who were all very good in their way; but he warned them that if they passed the Interments Bill, they would find at the next General Election that the power of the Nonconformists was not to be despised.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I have nothing to say against the bonhomie of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cardigan, who has just addressed the House; he would have us consider him quite an exception to the ordinary Nonconformist. He tells us that, although he is a Nonconformist, he has actually let some land to the vicar of his parish; he further informed the House that he considers himself a very good man, so that there could be no objection to the Burial Service of the Church of England being read over him. He also told us that the Nonconformists were not apt to provide for their own religious requirements so freely as they ought to do. This brings me to the position in which we stand. What is the fact? The Nonconformists have adduced all the same sentimental arguments they have used in favour of this Bill, when a few years ago they wanted to get rid of Church rates. The argument they then urged was, that it was unjust to make them pay for the maintenance of churchyards which were of no use to them; and now the same persons come forward and tell us that although they pay nothing towards the maintenance of these same churchyards, they claim the use of them on their own terms. Why do they object to the increase of cemeteries? Is it because they fear having to pay heavy fees; and yet they will not provide more ground than they want for their chapel buildings to stand on; they will not provide graveyards for themselves, but claim admission to the churchyards for their ministers to perform services over their dead. I would ask the Representatives of Nonconformists whether they expect us to think this a very modest or moderate request? The hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) felt this so strongly that he said, that it would be necessary to re-enact some sort of a Church rate before these claims could be rendered perfectly equitable. But would it not be as well that the hon. and learned Member should bring in his Church Rate Bill before continuing to urge the present proposal? The Representatives of the Nonconformists should at least propose on their behalf, that they should do something for the maintenance of churchyards, before insisting upon this claim to a peculiar use of them. The hon. and learned Member, however, glanced at burial fees, forgetting that they were never applied to the maintenance of churchyards, but that these fees formed part of the income of the clergy. To seize the burial fees and to apply them to the purposes of Church rates would be simply to confiscate part of the income of the clergy. The Representatives of Nonconformity cannot come forward with clean hands to urge the proposals of this Bill, until they bring forward a measure showing their readiness to maintain the churchyards, in the use of which they claim to participate, not as parishioners, because their right as parishioners no one denies, but to participate as Nonconformists, who refuse to accept the parishioners' conditions, but insist on imposing new conditions of their own choosing—namely, the admission of any one belonging to any sect into the churchyard in order to perform any burial service or ceremony he may desire. Then the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil said—"We do not deny that we desire to disestablish the Church, but we assure you that we appear here to support a measure which is totally inconsistent with our primary object." The old saying Fas est ab hoste doceri, is often quoted; but the hon. Member must allow me to accept this advice with very considerable qualification. For what is the fact? The Church of England—and in saying the Church of England, I speak particularly of the laity—have no title to their churchyards, or to the fabrics of their Churches, different in its nature from the titles by which the Nonconformists hold their chapels. No congregation, and this I say in the presence of lawyers, can be distinguished except by the peculiar doctrines and ritual of that congregation; no Church can be known except by its distinctive doctrines and ritual, and without this recognition of doctrine or of ritual no religious body can be identified, and if it cannot be identified it cannot prove any title whatever to property of any kind. That is a position which no lawyer will dispute. Now, what does the principle of this Bill involve? The proposal is, that the churchyard shall no longer be held by any title that can be recognized through the character of the services performed within it; and does it not follow at once that the proposals of this Bill, which I believe to be founded upon a grievance that is greatly exaggerated; does it not follow, that the proposal of this Bill, if adopted, would strike down the title by which the great body of the Church of England, laity as well as clergy, hold their property in the churchyard? It is the habit of the Church of England and I believe it is the habit also of the Nonconformists, to perform a part of the Burial Service in the church or chapel, and a part at the grave. Well, can any one believe, if this Bill were to pass, that the next demand would not be—aye, as soon as the Bill had become law—that Nonconformists should be admitted on equal terms with Churchmen to perform any service they might deem appropriate in the Church? Is it not clear that if this Bill passes, that the principle on which the title not only to the churchyard, but to the church is secured to the great body of the Church of England, must lapse? The hon. Gentleman, the Member for Merthyr Tydvil, who always speaks with great authority on the part of the Nonconformists, said, that he quarrels with the services of the Church of England because they exemplify an obsolete uniformity, and that uniformity is an invasion of liberty. Whose liberty is invaded by the uniform performance of the Burial Service? Clearly the liberty of the congregation, the liberty of the laity of the Church of England, is secured, by this uniformity. The hon. Gentleman has told us distinctly that he is not contented with that liberty, because the clergyman, according to the charitable doctrine of the Church of England, is bound to express a hope for the salvation of the departed person, without regard to his character during life; and the hon. Member claimed for the Nonconformist minister, whom he would admit to the churchyard, and claimed for the clergy also, the right to pronounce judgment on the dead. The hon. Member will perhaps recall his words; but it appeared to me so strange a thing to advance in the name of freedom and of toleration, that it sank deep into my mind. A claim put forward on behalf of ministers of religion for liberty to pronounce judgment on the dead, to that I most decidedly object. I adhere to the glorious and charitable doctrine of my Church, and I say that no true Churchman would wish to see any clergyman of the Church of England absolved from the obligation to express on the part of those who are present at, as well as of those who are absent from the funeral, the fervent, but the humble hope, that Almighty God may judge the departed more leniently than men are apt to judge. Let me not be told, then, that the Bill is to be passed in the name of toleration, or of freedom, or of charity. Thus interpreted, the Bill does little credit to the charitable feelings of those who advocate it. For my own part, I should be willing to vote for any Bill to secure the appropriation of proper sites for graveyards for Nonconformists, which should be accessible in every parish. I am prepared to vote for any extension of the means of providing cemeteries, and in that way to meet the religious desires of my Nonconformist fellow-subjects; but I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that behind this Bill there lurks the intention to disestablish the Church of England. Upon that point I think the Nonconformist Conference, which was held two years ago, might be taken as some authority. It met at Manchester in 1872, and the second of its resolutions—

“Claims equal right for all citizens in national or parochial churches and burial-grounds; and while just regard is had to vested interests, the Conference protest against any exclusive privileges being accorded to any section of the community in the interment of the dead.”

The House will observe that in that resolution, the Conference coupled a claim to the unrestricted use of the Church with the claim now put forward to the use of the churchyard. Sir, I wish not to violate the great principle of equality before the law, and I say that I am willing to maintain for the Nonconformists an exclusive right in their own chapels and their graveyards; but I would warn them of this. Churchmen may reply to them by saying “If you are about to claim indiscriminately all the graveyards of the Church of England as national property in the sense in which you advance that claim, why should not we churchmen, in our turn, claim an equally free right over your graveyards?” Do you expect that you will escape from the application of this principle of confiscation to what you regard as your own? At the same Conference to which I have referred, another resolution was passed—

“That no amendment (of the marriage laws) can be satisfactory to Nonconformists which does not provide for the absolute equality of all citizens.”

Is there not equality already in the laws of marriage? Perfect equality. But what this resolution—taken with that which I have quoted—really means is, that Nonconformists claim that not only the burial services in the churchyards, but that the marriage services in the churches of the Church of England shall be performed in any manner they chose, and by any ministers they chose, and for this they seek opportunity by this Bill. Sir, there are many hon. Members in this House who have not heard this question so often debated as some of us have; and I hope they will excuse me, therefore, for thus bringing before them the fact, that behind this ostensible and sentimental grievance, there lies the intention to deprive the Church of England of her property; and I cannot imagine upon what grounds we of the Church of England, who hold that property upon terms which have existed for centuries, can fairly be expected to yield our title and our right. We are willing to allow our Nonconformist brethren all the use of the churchyard that we can, short of abandoning our title. It is not fair thus to call upon us to concede to them our privileges, for which they have refused to pay; privileges which we do not possess in the use of property, now doubly our own by the passing of the Act which abolished Church rates, but to which until then Nonconformists and Churchmen alike contributed. I oppose this, because it would confer upon Nonconformists privileges which we cannot share, and which they refuse to share with us on equal terms.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, it had been remarked that hon. Members on that side seemed to suppose that it was some new exclusion against which they were contending; but, for himself, he was quite aware that it was an old exclusion which was now the subject of complaint. It was one of those old exclusions which the hon. Member who had just spoken had vindicated ever since he entered that House, and would probably continue to vindicate as long as he sat there. The hon. Gentleman had alluded to the supposed inconsistency of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) in proposing such a measure after church rates had been abolished; but supposing the difficulty to be met, as it had been in Ireland, and if afterwards there was any reason to believe that the graveyards were not properly supported by the voluntary subscriptions of Churchmen and Dissenters, he did not believe there would be any practical difficulty in removing any inequality. The hon. Gentleman said the next thing the Dissenters would claim would be the right to enter the churches of the Church of England and hold their services there, and he had quoted resolutions of a Nonconformist

Conference in justification of that opinion. It was altogether beside the question to refer to these resolutions. As to the one about the marriage laws, it no doubt meant, not what the hon. Member supposed, but that Dissenting ministers, equally with the clergy of the Church of England, should have the power of registering marriages. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Marylebone (Mr. Forsyth) had asked where were the Petitions in favour of the Bill, and had said that because there were no Petitions—or but few Petitions—there was no feeling in the country on the subject. He believed that the hon. and learned Member was wrong in his assumption, and he believed that the absence of Petitions did not augur favourably for the security of the Church, because the fact was, that many Nonconformists, who like himself were not prepared to destroy the Established Church, began to see that they would not be able to obtain this measure with the Conservative Party in power, until the Church was disestablished; and that they were therefore quietly waiting for that event to take place in order that they might get what they desired, considering that Petitions would be of little avail. He believed there were many Nonconformists, who were not sorry to see this grievance remain, because they felt that in the end, it would strengthen their hands in making an attack upon the Establishment itself. Let them consider the case of Wales. There was in that part of the United Kingdom a population of nearly 1,500,000, and he supposed no one would dispute that the large majority of the population was Nonconformist, and that, at all events, while there was resistance to such a reasonable Bill as the present they were likely to continue Nonconformist. It was all very well to talk of cemeteries, but a large majority of these Welsh Dissenters had as yet only one burial-ground, and that was the parish churchyard, and it was by no means answering the question to say that because there were cemeteries in Liverpool or other places, that people in Wales should not bury their relatives in the parish churchyard, unless they were prepared to agree to certain conditions, especially as all the Welsh had to do was to cross the Channel and go to Ireland, and they would see that in that country the difficulty had been met. The fact was that 50 years ago the question had been arranged so far as Ireland was concerned by a Tory Government, and he would ask the Prime Minister to see whether he could not take a leaf out of Lord Liverpool's book with reference to this subject. If the present question was one in which party considerations were mixed up, he might say that the best thing which could happen for the Opposition side of the House was that the Bill should be rejected—rejected, moreover, with a simple and positive refusal to entertain any mode of meeting the difficulty. ["No!"] He had no hesitation in saying that, because most likely the constituents of hon. Members opposite would compare the manner in which the question was treated by the Conservative Party now, when they had a majority, with their attitude in regard to it five years ago under different circumstances. On that former occasion the right hon. Gentleman the present Secretary of State for War and the Home Secretary acknowledged the existence of the grievance, and expressed an anxiety to meet it, while unable to approve the particular measure which had been brought forward. But, judging by the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General. Government now met the complaints by a denial that there was a serious grievance, and by saying they saw no way of meeting what grievance did exist. It was quite within the power of the Government, if they did not approve the remedy now proposed, to bring forward a measure of their own, as their Predecessors had done in regard to Ireland; and perhaps it would be worth the while of the Solicitor General to read the eloquent speech delivered in favour of the Irish Bill by Mr. Plunkett, one of the Law Officers of Lord Liverpool's Government. Why could they not carry out in this country the same principle that had been applied to Scotland and Ireland? Objections had been raised as to the probability of there being crowds and disturbances, but surely all difficulties of that kind could be met in England as they had been in Ireland. No one doubted that if the Government took the matter in hand they would be able to find a satisfactory solution of the difficulty. The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone had asked why the feelings of members of the Church of England should not be considered as well as those of Nonconformists; but surely the same consideration was not due to the feelings of those who were intolerant of religious services other than those to which they were accustomed, and to the feelings of persons who had either to allow their relations to be buried with a service which they did not approve, or to seek a burial place, at great expense, and, it might be, with great difficulty, in some other place. If it was a question of consulting the feelings of the majority it would probably be found that, in most cases, those feelings were on the side of the Dissenters. He could not think so ill of the men and women of the Church of England as to suppose they would be shocked by the proposed change. Besides, the hon. and learned Member should recollect that in Wales the majority of the people were Nonconformists, and laboured under a peculiar difficulty, owing to the fact that a third, or, at least, a fourth of the whole population were Baptists. Now, so long as any child of a Baptist was unbaptized, there was great risk of the feelings of the family being outraged by the clergyman refusing to allow the child to be buried. Indeed, if the fact came to the knowledge of the clergyman, he was bound by law to refuse burial; and, consequently, if the feelings of the inhabitants were consulted, no such system could be maintained in the Principality for another hour. He contended that, under such circumstances, they had no right to say to the inhabitants of Wales, You must not have your service conducted as you wish if you bury your dead in our graveyards. He believed, however, that the real reason why this measure was opposed was, that there was an idea that the Church Establishment would be endangered if the Bill was carried. He did not, however, believe that the Church would suffer in any way. The real power of the Church was the parochial system, and that system would be considerably weakened if numbers of people were year after year forced to do what was distasteful to them when they wished to bury their dead. In conclusion, he was sure that every attempt to maintain the position of the Church by exclusiveness injured that position, and that its real power would be increased by passing such a Bill as the present, which would tend to remove the natural conviction in the minds of Nonconformists that the opposition to it was an attempt to maintain an exclusiveness which was contrary to the civilization of the age.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was glad to have heard the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down that, on his part, there was no wish to disturb the present relations between Church and State. He hoped that feeling was shared by a large number of the right hon. and hon. Gentlemen who sat on the same side of the House; for he felt certain that the more the country reflected on the question, the more emphatically it would recognize that the State gained much more from its connection with the Church, than the Church did from its connection with the State. He was glad, however, to find that the debate had been carried on—at least, so long as he had been in the House—without the customary allusions to clergymen, which had been indulged in on former occasions, who had acted injudiciously under the present law through a mistaken sense of what was their duty. He was glad to be able to say this, and he would remind the House that when the question was first brought before them by Sir Morton Peto, it was introduced in a very calm and deliberate manner, the grievance being simply and clearly stated. It was pointed out that by the Canon Law every parishioner had an absolute right to be interred in the churchyard of the parish, according, of course, to the ceremonies and rites of the Church of England; but that that rule was subject to three exceptions, having reference to persons who had been excommunicated, persons who had committed suicide, and persons who were unbaptized. The sole practical grievance related to the last of these exceptional classes. Now, it was well-known that the word “unbaptized,” did not refer merely to baptism according to the rites of the Church of England. It applied only to those who had not been baptized at all, and the present head of the Church of England had expressed an authoritative opinion which really took away the only grievance of which Sir Morton Peto had complained. The grievance now complained of was, however, totally different. It was demanded, in point of fact, that those who differed from the Church of England should have greater privileges than those who belonged to it. The Nonconformists claimed as a right to be interred in the parish churchyard by their own minister and according to their own form of burial service. That was a right which did not belong to a member of the Church of England. He was bound to accept the services of the clergyman of the parish, although he might never have seen him, or although he might not like him. Now, it was contended that the Canon Law right of interment possessed by the parishioner rested upon the fact that the churchyards had been provided at the common expense of the parish. That, however, was not the case. Hon. Members who took that view forgot that Church rates had been abolished. Well, the very argument employed in favour of the abolition of Church rates was—“Why make us pay for the support of churches and graveyards which we do not use?” How then was it that they now came forward and made that demand about the graveyards, on the ground that they contributed towards their support. He did not deny that many people conscientiously believed in the grievance adverted to. He, for his own part, had always expressed his willingness to meet that grievance as far as it could be done practically. But he held that the remedy proposed by the Bill would meet the minimum of grievance with the maximum of irritation and annoyance throughout the country. The grievance, moreover, was a lessening one. It had been different in times when there were no cemeteries in the large towns; but now the number of cemeteries was rapidly increasing, and it must be remembered, in addition, that many parish graveyards had of late years been closed. We were wiser in sanitary matters than our ancestors, and the feeling now-a-days was that burial-grounds ought not to be attached to churches. Under these circumstances, the proper remedy for the grievance complained of would be the establishment of more cemeteries. It might be said that the burial-grounds of the Church of England were in a sense national property; but it must be remembered that there had been voluntary gifts of land for burial-grounds to the Church of England, and surely such gifts ought to be placed under no greater disadvantage than similar gifts for cemeteries? He would only push this argument to the extent of asking whether Nonconformists would like to see the services of the Church of England, or of the Church of Rome, or of the Greek Church performed in their own burial-grounds. He had not heard a single Nonconformist say that he would approve such proceedings. That being so, was it strange that members of the Church of England should feel an objection to the performance of services other than their own in the parish churchyard, and should not some allowance be made to those who felt so? When the Nonconformists needed chapels, or ministers, or schools, there appeared to be no difficulty in providing them. Why, then, was it that not only in Wales, but in richer places, there were so very few burial-grounds attached to their chapels? The simple reason was, that the want of them was not felt. He believed, indeed, that there were not many Nonconformists who objected to the Burial Service of the Church of England. If the present measure was passed, it seemed to him that great annoyance and disturbance would be the inevitable result. It would be impossible to prevent the Nonconformists from making use of the church as well as the graveyard for their services. If a funeral service was conducted in the open air on a wet, stormy day, great discomfort would be suffered by those attending it, and the thing would be regarded as an outrage, and it was certain that as the result of such occurrences, the services would have to be allowed in the church. It had been said that no serious difficulties had been met in Ireland, and hon. Members had maintained that if the Bill was passed, the State Church would last all the longer for it; but did our experience in Ireland altogether bear out this argument? He, for one, did not feel inclined to look to the case of Ireland for any precedent in this matter. It must not be overlooked that the provisions of the Bill did not tend simply to the relief of Dissenters; but that they would practically disturb the whole of our ecclesiastical regulations as to burial. The effect of them would be that a man, whether a Dissenter or a member of the Church of England, would be at liberty to ask any clergyman or minister, or, in fact, anybody—

it might be the parish doctor—to conduct a burial service. Therefore, as he had said, they would really inflict under that Bill the maximum annoyance and irritation to relieve the minimum of grievance. He would be the last person to do a single thing that would make the Church of England the Church of a sect, and not the Church of the nation, and he was perfectly willing to meet the grievance, but not in the way pointed out in the Bill. If there was a grievance, let it be remedied in the way pointed out by himself and his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War in a former debate in a previous Session. He asked the House to have some regard for the conscientious feelings of members of the Church of England, and of that hard-working and devoted body of men, her clergy, whom he believed they could not more thoroughly wound and displease than by passing that Bill. The matter was one that touched most strongly the sentiments, feelings, and passions of the clergy of the Church of England, and also of a very large number of her lay members, and therefore, he would most heartily give his vote against the measure.

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, I find a difficulty in attempting to address the House for a few minutes on this question, because it seems to me that it neither demands nor admits of much argument. That, I confess, is a strange thing, perhaps, to say after listening to so much argument about it. But there are some questions which come before us, and which, it appears to me, are so simple—I am not speaking now as to the mode, but as to the principle—that I do not know how hon. Members are able to find so many arguments on the one side and on the other. In this case, a good many things are admitted. It is admitted that the parochial burial-ground is intended for the service of all the inhabitants of the parish—that all have a right to use it when their friends come to be buried. Generally, the parochial burial-ground has been created and maintained at the expense of the parish. ["No!"] I know what hon. Members would say; but, at any rate, up to the time of the abolition of church rates, the parochial burial-grounds were provided and supported by the parish. I presume that all the burial-grounds that were in existence before the passing of the Church Rate Abolition Act were established at the cost of the parish, and therefore now are—as they indeed all are by law—the property of the parish. I am sure, moreover, that hon. Gentlemen opposite know that, notwithstanding the repeal of church rates, there are thousands of Dissenters in this country who contribute voluntarily and constantly to the support both of churches and of parochial graveyards. Therefore, I have a right to say that the graveyards for the most part—I believe almost universally—are plots of ground in which the parishioners generally have a pecuniary interest. Well, it will be said that everybody has a right to be buried there, but only on certain conditions; that either he must have the service of the Established Church, or have no service at all, for that, I think, is the argument of hon. Gentlemen opposite. Now, it is quite open to persons to dissent if they like from the service of the Church of England, and about one-half the population of England and Wales have so dissented. They dissent—and I think that is a considerable matter when we are discussing this question—for various reasons. There are many grounds upon which men have dissented from the Church of England, the chief being that they have been brought up in Nonconformist principles by their families, and because all their associations are connected therewith. It is, therefore, quite reasonable to expect and understand that they should prefer at funerals not to have the Church of England Service, but that their own service or ceremonial should be adopted in its place. Well, if they think so, I should like to hear some reasonable argument why their opinions should not be complied with. But, on the other hand, you say that they should have no service at all. Yet you must admit there may be those who, from some cause or other, entirely dislike the Church of England Service, who are still of opinion that it is better to have some service, not for the sake of the dead—for I hope, indeed I believe, that no Nonconformist in this country is so superstitious as to believe in such a thing as that—but for the sake of the living and those who surround the grave. Now, why is it that you impose this test? You say the graveyard is the graveyard of the parish. Well, the body which is brought to the parish graveyard is that of a parishioner whom only last week you held as a fellow-parishioner, and whom you met in your street, on his farm, or in his garden. He is brought to the graveyard, and his friends propose to bury him there. But you say—"No; he shall not come at all, except on certain conditions. First of all, he shall have read over him a service arranged some 200 or 300 years ago"—which I am willing to admit is very impressive and very beautiful; nobody, I think, denies that—but "he shall have this read over him, and nothing else; if he does not have this, he shall have nothing at all." I will not say he shall be buried like a dog. That is an expression founded on a miserable superstition. Why, in that sense, I shall be buried like a dog; and all those with whom I am best acquainted, whom I best love and esteem, shall also be buried like a dog. Nay, more, my own ancestors, who in past time suffered persecution for what is now held to be a righteous cause, have all been buried like dogs—if that phrase be true. Let me ask, then, that if one half the population hold these opinions, why is it that they should have this test imposed upon them? You have abolished tests for holding offices. It is not now necessary that a man should take the Sacrament according to the practice of the Church of England to undertake an office under the Crown. That test, I say, has been swept away. Why is it, then, when a man, or the body of a man, of one of the parishioners comes to your graveyard gate, and his friends ask that he may be there interred with decency and solemnity, that you say—"No, he shall not enter here and not be buried here,"—even although his family, his parents who have gone before him, and his children who have come after him and prematurely died before him lie there—"unless he has the service that we have prescribed, or unless he has no service at all;" and shall thus be buried in a manner of which his friends may not approve? I ask that question of hon. Gentlemen opposite. Why is it that you have abolished the test in so many other instances and that in this instance you adhere to it?—for it is no other than a test. I will take the case of my own sect and try to draw an argument from that. We have no baptism; we do not think it necessary. We have no service—no ordered and stated service—over the dead. We do not think that necessary. But when a funeral occurs in my sect, the body is borne with as much decency and solemnity as in any other sect or in any other case to the grave side. The coffin is laid by the side of the grave. The family and friends and the mourners stand around, and they are given some time—no fixed time; it may be five minutes, or ten, or even longer—for that private and solemn meditation to which the grave invites even the most unthinking and the most frivolous. If anyone there feels it his duty to offer any word of exhortation, he is at liberty to offer it. If he feels that he can bow the knee and offer a prayer to Heaven, not for the dead, but for those who stand around the grave, for comfort for the widow or for succour and fatherly care for the fatherless children, that prayer is offered. Well, but if this were done in one of your graveyards—if, for example, such a thing were done there, and a member of my sect, or a Baptist, an Independent, or a Wesleyan came to be interred in one of your graveyards, and if some God-fearing and good man there spoke some word of exhortation, or on his knees offered a prayer to God, is there one of you on this side of the House or on that, or one of your clergymen, or any thoughtful and Christian man connected with your Church, who would dare in the sight of Heaven to condemn that, or to interfere with it by force of law? Why the proposition as reduced to a simple case like that is monstrous and intolerable, and I believe the time will come when men will never believe that such a thing could have been seriously discussed in the English House of Commons. Well, but what is wanted—I do not mean by the clauses and the details, but by the principle of this Bill? Why, that the Nonconformists of this country—the Independents, the Baptists, the Wesleyans, or the members of my sect—shall be permitted to enter the parochial graveyard and conduct not what is commonly called a service, but the ceremony of a funeral, in the way that I have described my sect as doing? Because, although with respect to us there is no stated and recognized, no written or printed, form, yet what does it signify whether it is written or printed, or is the extempore utterance of a full heart on a solemn occasion of that kind? I say we are doing harm to the Church of England by maintaining this test. I say further, that very great benefit would be conferred on all that Christianity teaches if some such system as that recommended by the Bill were wisely adopted in this country. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cross) seems to think that a great grievance would arise, that the feelings of the ministers of the Church would be harassed. Well, no doubt, if men have feelings of that kind, nurtured by preference and monopoly, the time will come—it constantly comes—when those feelings will have to subside, or suffer something like discomfort. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) has referred to the opinion of a distinguished lawyer and former Member of this House, some 50 years ago, as to the case of Ireland. What is the case of Scotland at this moment? I was down in Scotland last July, and I recollect particularly visiting a quiet little parish graveyard there at Lochnagar. I noticed a tomb erected in what I thought good taste. From the inscription on it I found it was the tomb of a minister who had been the minister of that parish before the Disruption of 1843. Well, after the Disruption—and the same thing is to be seen in many parishes in Scotland—the minister who seceded became the minister of a Free Church in the very same parish. At the end of his earthly career he is buried alongside of the very minister who succeeded him in the parish in which he was originally settled. In Scotland, I say, they know no difference of this kind. Somebody will get up and say, “Yes, but in Scotland they do not care about these things, because their ground is not”—what do they call it?—“is not consecrated?” But may I tell hon. Gentlemen opposite what is the course which the Church of Scotland takes with regard to the Episcopalian Church in that country? You have Scotch Bishops and Scotch clergy, and Scotchmen who are Episcopalians. Well, they are allowed to be buried in their churchyards, and your own burial service is constantly and regularly read over the bodies of Episcopalians in Presbyterian graveyards in Scotland. Now, I ask you if in Ireland 50 years ago it was thought necessary to abolish the exclusive system—if in Scotland, by the liberality, I say, the Christian liberality and good feeling of the Scotch Presbyterians, Episcopalians are treated so liberally and justly in this matter, why is it that Presbyterians, if you like, in England, and Nonconformists generally, should have to appeal to some 400 Gentlemen in this House—all of whom, I presume, or the great bulk of whom, are members of the Established Church of England—for like toleration, or why it is that you should think it necessary to reject a Bill like this? The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, as I understand him, does not object to the principle of the measure. He would be willing—for I have always noticed in him ever since he has sat in this House a certain liberality, which, I think, is rather in advance of some other feelings that I have seen evinced among his Friends—he, I say, is willing to adopt some principle of this kind, and, if possible, by some means that he thinks would perhaps be less hurtful to the feelings of Churchmen, he would assent to some measure having the effect which this one is intended to produce. I am sorry that in the course of his speech—having made that admission for which I give him credit—he did not indicate to us some mode by which he thought that could be accomplished; because if he could point out to us any reasonable method that would be at all satisfactory to those who appeal to you on this question, I feel sure the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire would be delighted to give him all the help in his power, and would even withdraw his own measure and adopt the Government Bill, if it succeeded in doing that which the right hon. Gentleman proposes. I have only one other observation to make—I wish to speak to Churchmen on another point that bears on this subject. All the arguments, all the feelings that have been expressed to-day I have heard and seen expressed I think 20 times since I have been in Parliament on the question of church rates. You know how much you prophesied about the ill effect of abolishing church rates, and you also know how little your prophecies have been fulfilled. You know how greatly you feared that your churches would fall into decay, and that churchyards and everything connected with the Established Church would suffer. Well, I believe there never was a time since the Church of England has existed in which your churches and churchyards were kept in such admirable order as they are at this moment. There never was a time when so many old churches were being repaired and rebuilt and so many new ones erected as has been the case since the day when nobody was compelled to subscribe for them. There is no doubt that the voluntary effort of the people—mainly, of course, of Churchmen—has done more for the Church than any law that Parliament could ever discuss or pass. And I would say to Churchmen—perhaps you think I cannot put myself in your position, but I think to some extent I can—I would say to you that if you were to deal with the Nonconformists of this country with more consideration and more condescension, with more of what I call Christian kindness and liberality in regard to matters of this sort, I suspect you would find that the strength of the Church would not be lessened, but increased; that the hostility with which, in many parts of the country, she is regarded would diminish; and that there would be a general subsidence of some of that animosity which must, I am afraid, to some extent prevail where there is a favoured and Established Church. It is a political question, as the church rate was a political question. Churchmen in the country, wherever you meet with them, do not discuss this subject as it is discussed in Parliament. They are more liberal than Parliament. Parliament is pledged. These questions are made questions of Party; and in questions of Party and in Party discussions I am afraid that sometimes common sense, often justice, and very often Christian thought and Christian liberality, are almost entirely forgotten. If we could once get rid of Party discussion, and could consider this matter as men—whether we be Nonconformists or Churchmen—anxious above all things for that kindness—that brotherly kindness and that peace which is inculcated upon us all alike by all the precepts of our common Christianity, I think we should have no difficulty in agreeing by a large majority to the Bill now before us.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, after the eloquent speech to which the House had just listened, he would waive his right of reply.

The House divided:—Ayes 234; Noes 248: Majority 14.

BILL—(No. 39.)

(The Lord President.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

THE DUKE OF RUTLAND said, that as he had no opportunity on a previous occasion he begged to be allowed to make a few observations upon the general scope and principles of the measure. He regarded the Bill as an honest attempt on the part of his noble Friend who had charge of it to settle a very difficult and important question. He concurred with the noble Earl who spoke on a former occasion (the Earl of Airlie) that his noble Friend was right in upholding the principle of freedom of contract as between landlord and tenant; but many of their friends out-of-doors thought that instead of being permissive the Bill ought to be compulsory. But that idea, he thought, was based on a mistake. It was a great mistake to imagine that the interests of the landlord were contradictory to those of the tenant. It was quite as much to the advantage of the landlord as it was to the tenant that the land should be cultivated in the best possible manner, and that the largest amount of capital should be invested in the land, and that the tenant should have security for the capital he invested. Again, there were those out-of-doors who looked with alarm at this Bill because they thought it likely to introduce "the thin edge of the wedge." He thought that was a baseless fear. The people of this country were sufficiently intelligent to know well that there ought to be freedom of contract between landlord and tenant, and that consequently landlords and tenants should not be compelled to come in under this Bill. The noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Somerset) was, he thought, rather hard upon the farmers of England. He said, when the Corn Laws were repealed they showed no great desire to increase the food of the people, but now they were extremely anxious for a Tenant Right Bill to pass, in order to add to the quantity of food. Now, he (the Duke of Rutland) believed the farmers of England were quite as patriotic as any other class of men, and were just as capable of taking large, enlightened, and patriotic views of any question that came before them; and he would remind the noble Duke, when he told them that 600,000 acres had been laid down in permanent pasture, that the main argument used by those who supported the Corn Laws was that that very thing would happen, and that they might, in case of war, be dependent on the Power they were at war with, for their food. A perfect Bill was what no one had a right to expect, for everyone was aware that no possible Bill could be introduced that would be perfectly satisfactory to both sides; but this Bill he thought was as good a one as could be had. There were two points, however, in the measure respecting which he entertained objections. First, he thought that the drainage of land should be put in the second class of improvements instead of in the first class. Next, he thought that the year's notice proposed by the Bill was objectionable. He did not see of what advantage it could be to the tenant, while it might be a great disadvantage to the landlord. In many cases it would amount to practically two years' notice. He was sorry to say that one of his own tenants had become insolvent. He could not give that tenant notice till next Lady Day, so that he would not be obliged to quit till Lady Day, 1877. In the meantime, the tenant might exhaust the land so as to get all he could out of it. He might be told that as landlord he could claim compensation if the tenant acted in that way. But how was he to recover payment and compensation from an insolvent tenant? Excepting these points he thought the Bill satisfactory.

House in Committee accordingly.

Clauses 1 to 4 agreed to.

The Duke of Rutland

Preliminary.

Tenants' Compensations for Improvements.

Clause 5 (Tenants' title to compensation.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY inquired whether its provisions were to be retrospective?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND replied that decidedly the intention of the Government was that they were to be prospective only; and the 16th clause provided that neither landlord nor tenant should be entitled to compensation unless three months before the determination of the tenancy he gave notice to the other of his intention to claim compensation. This showed that it did not apply to anything done before the passing of this Act.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, that the provision requiring such a notice was not in the original draft of the Bill.

THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH pointed out that it often happened that in the matter of drainage the landlord cut the drains and the tenant built them, and in other ways the tenant was assisted by the landlord by materials and by money in the case of temporary buildings. There ought therefore to be some words inserted to meet such cases.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET submitted that the words "adding to the letting value thereof" were objectionable, and he would move that they be struck out. It might be that an improvement was a valuable one, though from circumstances with which the tenant had nothing to do, the letting value of the farm was not improved in the sense of a higher rent being obtained for it. He moved, as an Amendment, the omission of those words.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he would be willing to consider the suggestion of the noble Earl when they came to consider the 6th clause. He was sorry he could not agree to the Amendment of the noble Duke. The principle that the improvements for which compensation was to be paid should add to the letting value of the holding was that from which the Government started in the framing of the Bill. First of all, by the clause now under consideration, where the tenant executed an improvement which added to the letting value, he should be entitled on the termination of his tenancy to compensation for the improvement—in other words, the tenant received compensation for an unexhausted improvement. This was the keystone of the Bill. Then came Clause 6, which defined by classes the improvements for which compensation was to be allowed; and that was followed by a clause defining what the amount of the tenant's compensation was to be. If the tenant laid out money on the land which would result in making the farm one which would let for a better rent—when his improvements added to the letting value of the land—he would be entitled to compensation if his tenancy was not sufficiently long to enable him to recoup himself for his outlay in the improvements. On the other hand, if the improvement did not add to the letting value, the tenant could not be compensated under this Bill. He hoped their Lordships would keep Clause 5 as it stood.

THE EARL OF MORLEY thought the noble Duke had overlooked this consideration—that though the improvement might be a valuable one per se, yet other causes might operate to decrease the letting value of the farm, and in this case the tenant would not be entitled to compensation. He thought that a certain ambiguity would present itself in respect of the third class of improvements, which were the application to land of purchased artificial or other manure, and consumption by cattle or sheep or pigs of corn, cake, or other feeding stuff. He did not see how these added to the letting value of the farm. If any unexhausted good was left from such sources the succeeding tenant, not the landlord, would have the benefit.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND apprehended that such an improvement as his noble Friend had suggested in the opening portion of his remarks would come within the Bill. As to the third class of improvements, there was an inconvenience in discussing a clause which was not before their Lordships, and the classes of improvements were provided for in Clause 6; but in reply to his noble Friend he was willing to introduce a proviso to the effect that all improvements of the third class should be deemed to be unexhausted if no crop of corn or potatoes had been taken off the land after the manure had been applied. As everyone knew, there would then be nothing left.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX observed, that what would come within the third class was rather an improvement to keep the farm precisely as it was—to prevent it from deteriorating—than one which would add to the letting value of the land. Artificial manures did not add to the letting value of a farm. He thought, therefore, that Clause 5 ought to be restricted to the first and second classes of improvements.

LORD CARLINGFORD thought the Government were quite right in adhering to the words which the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) proposed to strike out. Even though the land would not let at a higher rent, the particular improvement might have increased the value of the land on which it had been effected. Whether it did or did not was a matter which could be ascertained without reference to the rent at which the farm, as a whole, could be let.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE thought the Government were quite right in maintaining that anything which contributed to the preservation of the land contributed to its letting value.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, the question was not whether the improvement had increased the rent, but whether, if it had not been effected, the letting value of the land would have been as great.

LORD HAMPTON hoped his noble Friend (the Duke of Richmond) would re-consider this matter, because he thought that the words which the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) proposed to strike out would lead to litigation.

THE MARQUESS of BATH was of opinion that those words were of vital importance, and he therefore opposed their omission.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that some of the objections urged against the words of the clause now under consideration might be ground for modifying Clause 7, which defined the amount of compensation; and when the latter clause came on for discussion he would propose an Amendment in its terms to meet those objections; but Clause 5 was the keystone of the structure of the Bill, and he could neither assent to the Amendment nor promise to re-consider the matter.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that the words to which the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) attached so much importance were scarcely just to the tenant. The Bill required the consent of the landlord to the execution of any improvement for which compensation was to be claimed. Supposing the tenant spent £1,000 on drainage which turned out to be a failure and did not add to the letting value of the land, ought the whole loss to fall on the tenant, though the expenditure was one to which the landlord had given his consent?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND thought that in the case just suggested the matter was one of covenant between landlord and tenant. If the latter entered into a bad speculation, was he to turn round and ask the landlord to pay for it?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, while approving the determination of the Government to adhere to the words which the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) proposed to expunge, thought at the same time that the difficulty just suggested by that noble Duke was one which was well worthy of consideration. In the county of Norfolk a body of gentlemen, among whom were Lord Leicester and Mr. Clare Read, drew up a document in which it was stated that—

“No case has been made out for compensation for any outlay which is not suitable to the holding and calculated to increase the letting value unless it be made with the written consent of the landlord.”

This last qualification was an important one. Within his own personal experience as a landlord there had occurred a case which illustrated the point. A tenant of his undertook some drainage with his consent, and, after having consulted and obtained the advice of the best authorities, the work turned out a failure. It would have been rather hard on the tenant to have had to bear the loss, seeing that it had been executed under such circumstances. That case was not sufficiently provided for under the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY reminded their Lordships of the power to charge compensations on the estate which this Bill would confer on limited owners. He thought such compensation ought to be charged on the land, not on the landlord. This must be considered when they came to the question of paying for such improvements as that just referred to by his noble Friend.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, he would not press his Amendment.

The Duke of Somerset

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE said, that in consequence of the Amendment which the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) had promised to propose on Clause 7, he would not propose the Amendment on Clause 5 of which he had given Notice.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE moved an Amendment that the compensation should be limited to the amount laid out by the tenant.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he would accept his noble Friend's suggestion; but the proper place for the insertion of the words of the Amendment would be in the 7th clause.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that before the clause was agreed to he wished to make a few remarks. The plan of the Bill appeared to be this—it set out in this clause a general principle with respect to compensation for improvements, which, when they passed that clause, their Lordships would affirm. The Bill then went on to limit the application of that principle of compensation in various ways. It was most important, therefore, that their Lordships should look carefully to the wording of Clause 5, this clause being, as it were, the standard raised by the Government, and under which the provisions of the Bill were to be carried out. In considering the question of tenant-right there were several matters which ought to be borne in mind. First, the improvements should be real and such as to add to the value of the land; secondly, they should not be made in pursuance of any agreement with the landlord; thirdly, they should not be, directly or indirectly, for valuable consideration received; and, fourthly, that the tenant had not already been recouped his outlay, either by length of occupation or by cheapness of rent. These were four limitations upon the right and equity of compensation for improvements which so far were fully admitted, and which were fully admitted even in the case of the Irish Land Act. But this clause alluded to one only of these limitations—and that was that the improvement should be really effectual and really add to the letting value of the land. He asked whether it was wise to put into the Bill a sweeping assertion of right which went far beyond the obvious and admitted equities of the case? The Government Bill had the character of a general proposition, and then they were obliged afterwards to insert limitations which appeared inconsistent with the proposition. He ventured to suggest that if not now, at least on the Report, their Lordships would endeavour to import into this clause words which should cover the limitations to which he referred. He had not put down an Amendment because long experience had convinced him of the difficulty an independent Member found in effecting consistent improvements in a Bill introduced by another. They had imported the words into the Bill of "adding to the letting value." That, in the first place, meant adding to the profit of the tenant. Let them look at the clause in this light. "When a tenant executes on his holding improvements adding to his own profit he shall be compensated." And this was what the Government asked the House to affirm. No precaution had been taken with regard to cases where the tenants were allowed to sit in their holdings at prices far below the market value of their farms, and where they had long since been recouped for the improvements they carried out. He might illustrate that by a case within his experience. Some years ago a friend of his purchased a property in a picturesque but rather sleepy English county. He paid a high price for the estate, and he found that most of the tenants were sitting at rents much below the market value. He informed them that he had the best means of knowing that they enjoyed a large percentage for their money—that whereas his return was about 2 per cent, from information he received, their return was from 20 to 25 per cent, and that, under these circumstances, he asked them to advance the rents. Most of them said—"You think our rents are low; we think, on the contrary, we are sitting at the average rent of our neighbourhood, and we cannot advance our rents." The landlord said he was sorry, but he must put the farms to competition and test what other farmers would give. The result was that a considerable number of the tenants were themselves the highest bidders for their farms. What did the House think turned out to be the preference rent at which the tenants had been sitting and in respect of which they might well have executed the most costly improvements? They had been sitting at a preference rent of between 50 and 70 per cent. This might be an extreme case, but he was certain that in many parts of England where tenants were sitting at a very low preference rent, out of those preference rents they were well compensated for any improvements they made. Now under this Bill these tenants might make large claims for improvements, for nothing was said in the Bill on the point. It was announced that although this Bill referred only to England, it was to be followed by another Bill applicable to Scotland. One of the limitations admitted by the advocates of tenant-right was this—that improvements which were to be compensated for should not be improvements done in virtue of a contract or in fulfilment of any other understanding. He ventured to affirm this—that all improvements made by tenants holding under leases were improvements made in virtue of a contract; and it was preposterous that a man should make a clear and distinct bargain with another, taking a farm for a particular rent, and then, not satisfied with the profit which that rent would give him in the exercise of his legitimate occupation, that he should demand at the end of the lease additional compensation. He laid down the principle generally that this clause was not a clause which in principle ought to be extended to leases at all unless the improvements done were of an extraordinary nature. Each party ought to be kept to his own bargain. The clause affirmed a principle of compensation for improvements in terms dangerously, inequitably, wide and sweeping, and he suggested they should introduce into it words to the effect that they recognized this right on the part of the tenant only where he had not been otherwise remunerated for the improvements.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the greater part of the speech of the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) had been a criticism on the wording of this particular clause—a criticism which might have been rendered unnecessary by the proposal of seven additional words. Every person who admitted the idea of compensation for improvements was agreed that such compensation ought to be guarded and qualified by various conditions—such as lowness of rent, length of occupation, and the question as to whether compensation had been already given in some other way for the improvements. He and those around him were perfectly agreed upon the propriety of these conditions; but he demurred to the course suggested by the noble Duke—for his criticism amounted to this—"At the beginning of the Bill, when you first enact that there shall be compensation, before you put a full stop at the end of the fifth section, you ought to enumerate in it every one of your qualifications and conditions, for if you leave one of them out the clause will hereafter be cited as a proof that you have admitted the principle of compensation without any qualification whatever." He put it to their Lordships whether this was not the effect of three-fourths of the noble Duke's speech. For his own part, he believed that one of the main causes of obscurity in Acts of Parliament was the attempting to express in one long sentence, running perhaps to a page or a page and a-half, a large number of qualifications. You must take an Act of Parliament by steps and go from clause to clause, and no one had a right to take one of a fasciculus of clauses and to maintain that it expressed Parliamentary approval of a general principle, unmodified and uncontrolled by anything that came after. Still, if the noble Duke wished to make the clause more guarded and more clear, it would only be necessary to introduce after "entitled" the words "subject to the provisions of this Act." Every modification and qualification would be thereby introduced into the section. He could not agree with the noble Duke in the other matter he referred to. The noble Duke said it was utterly repugnant to the idea of a lease that there should be engrafted in it any such provisions for compensation as were contained in this Bill. If it were meant that it was repugnant to the leases now in existence, he quite agreed with the noble Duke, because the Bill carefully guarded against affecting in any way any lease now in operation. But it would not be repugnant to the idea of a lease which might be made hereafter if the two parties to it agreed that these were proper provisions to insert, and that they would accept the offer contained in the Act of Parliament. If the parties did not like the provisions, they need not introduce them into the contract.

The Lord Chancellor

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY concurred to a great extent in what had been said by the noble and learned Lord in regard to leases. The object of this and kindred enactments was to offer to the tenant an inducement to keep up his good farming to the last moment of his occupation; and of course this object applied as much to leases as to yearly agreements. It was because Nature did not permit a tenant—especially in the case of high farming—to reap the whole benefit of his outlay before the termination of his tenancy that it became desirable to provide machinery by which to give him compensation. He thought a lease ought to be combined with a Bill of this kind, for under the present system, without the slightest dishonesty or unfairness, a tenant who farmed very high would, in the last three or four years of his tenancy, let his farm down from the high pitch of cultivation to which he had previously brought it.

LORD CARLINGFORD thought that nearly all the conditions and safeguards which the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) desired to see introduced into this clause were covered by and included in the general power of making agreements which the Bill was intended to confer. Perhaps an exception should be made of the question the noble Duke raised as to general lowness of rent distinct from low rent in consideration of improvements to be made by the tenant. For that he only knew one remedy, and that a simple one—when a landlord believed his rents to be unreasonably low he ought to raise them.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 6 (Description and three classes of improvements).

LORD HENNIKER moved an Amendment that the classes of improvements should be four, instead of three, as proposed in the clause, and for that purpose proposed a re-arrangement of the classes, and, also, a small addition thereto. The object of his Amendment was to make a juster arrangement than that contained in the clause in respect of the number of years during which an improvement should be deemed to be unexhausted. The Bill should lay down, at all events, a model agreement, and the classes, as they stood, allowed more than could be adopted in some cases; draining, for instance, should not be allowed for for more than 12 years, as a rule, and so on. The alteration was not very great, but he believed it would be of use. The first class would provide, under his Amendment, for compensation over 20 years, the second over 12 years, the third over seven years, and the fourth over one year only—namely, for the last year of the tenancy. It was very important that corn produced on the farm, or rather producible on the farm, and so producible in the neighbourhood, should not be allowed for in the fourth class.

Amendment moved, in page 2, line 11, leave out (“three”) and insert (“four”); line 13, after (“Act”) omit to end of clause and insert:—

FIRST CLASS.

Erection or enlargement of buildings.	Planting of orchards.
Making of gardens.	Reclamation of waste land.
Making or improving of roads or bridges.	Warping of land.
Making or improving of watercourses, ponds, wells, or reservoirs.	Construction of works for the supply of water for the purposes of a farm or farmhouse.

SECOND CLASS.

The drainage of land.	Making and planting of ozier beds.
Making and protecting of new fences.	Planting of hops.
Laying down of permanent pastures.

THIRD CLASS.

Boning of pasture land with undissolved bones.	Clay burning.
Chalking of land.	Claying of land.
	Liming of land.
	Marling of land.

FOURTH CLASS.

Application to land of purchased, artificial or other manure used for any green crop consumed on the farm.	Consumption on the farm of any cake and purchased corn of any description not producible on the farm, or other feeding stuffs of manurial value.
--	--

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he regretted that he differed from his noble Friend, who had paid great attention to this matter. In the first place, he preferred three classes to four, because the fewer the classes were the simpler would be the operation of the Bill. In the next place, the difference between the classes proposed by the Amendment of his noble Friend and the arrangement of classes in the clause was infinitesimally small. He opposed the proposition of the noble Lord mainly on the ground that it was unnecessary. Improvements coming under Class 1, as defined in the Bill, would include all the improvements set forth in the noble Lord's Classes 1 and 2, and as the period of exhaustion under the first class would extend over 20 years, it would be perfectly possible for landlords and tenants, by mutual agreements, to make any new limit within the maximum of 20 years which they might think desirable.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND made a few remarks, which were not heard.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY was glad the noble Duke proposed to retain the classification as proposed in the Bill. No doubt there were difficulties, but the lesser evil would be to leave the arrangement of the Government alone.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY thought it would be hard to prevent landlords and tenants adopting varying time limits in accordance with the different conditions existing in different parts of the country. All that could reasonably be done was to lay down a rule which was likely to be applicable to as many cases as possible.

On Question? resolved in the negative.

THE DUKE OF RUTLAND moved an Amendment, to strike out the words “Drainage of land” from the list of First Class improvements, and insert them in the Second Class.

The Marquess of BATH and The Earl of AIRLIE opposed the Amendment.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND also opposed the Amendment. He recollected that in former times it was calculated that drainage improvements exhausted themselves in 10 years.

LORD WAVENEY thought drainage of a superior nature should come under the first class, while the inferior kind should come under the second class of improvements.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, the difficulty might vanish if the House were clearly to understand that the periods mentioned in Clause 8 were only maximum periods, and not to be allowed in every instance.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND stated that the periods mentioned were intended to be maximum; but that if the language of the clause was not explicit enough he would insert words to make it so. He thought it would be best to leave the question of drainage improvements where it was.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, referring to the next item in Class 1, "Erection or enlargement of buildings," said, that 20 years was not sufficient to allow for exhaustion in improvements of this description. He should suggest the period of 30 years.

LORD CARLINGFORD thought it would be wiser to leave out buildings altogether, rather than restrict the period to 20 years.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND took the same view, remarking that the erection or enlargement of buildings was generally done by the landlord.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the proposal of the noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley) was only material in the case of limited owners, because if the owner of property was an absolute owner he could make what agreement he liked with his tenant. Now, this Bill recognized only the person in possession of the estate as the representative of all the interests in it, so far as what might be called "ordinary management" was concerned, and he thought excellent reasons could be shown for the adoption of that principle. The proposal of the noble Earl would defeat the whole object of the Bill, which was meant to be a practical working measure, and he therefore hoped their Lordships would not commit themselves to it. It might, perhaps, be necessary to introduce some safeguards in the case of trustees. It was considered, when the Bill was about to be introduced, whether it should not go further, and whether larger powers, in respect of agricultural leases and special agreements, should not be given to limited owners, and it was the intention of the Government at some convenient time to propose a measure which should deal with and probably extend those powers. It might be desirable to take into account whether the limited owner, with proper checks, might not be empowered to make such agreements as that to which the noble Earl referred, and under such agreement to charge the inheritance; but he trusted their Lordships would not enter upon this larger and very difficult subject in dealing with a measure of a limited purpose.

EARL FORTESCUE said, it seemed to him that the passing of the 3rd clause had estopped the House from going into that question.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, unless the effect of the Bill, so far as it related to the limited owner, would be injurious, he saw no reason for alarm as to what might happen to the remainder-man. He did not concur in the theory that this legislation was needed for what was called increasing the food of the people, but that was the ground on which the Bill was based by the Government, and nothing was, in his opinion, more essential to good farming than that permanent sound buildings should be provided. Now the very person who would not put up such buildings was the limited owner. It seemed to him, therefore, that if buildings of a permanent nature were erected and added to the letting value of the land, the tenant should be allowed sufficient to recoup him for his outlay, and the charge should be placed upon the estate.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH thought the limited owner possessed all the powers which were requisite, and, if not, he might apply to the Court of Chancery to obtain them.

After a few words from the Earl of DERBY, the words "erection or enlargement of buildings" were agreed to and ordered to stand part of the First Class.

Other items of improvements of the First Class agreed to.

Improvements of the Second and Third Classes agreed to, with Amendments.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 7 (Amount of tenants' compensation) amended, and agreed to.

Clause 8 (Time in which improvements exhausted).

Clause 9 (Consent of landlord for first class).

On the Motion of the Duke of RICHMOND the following new clause was inserted to follow Clause 9—

(Notice to landlord for second and third class).

"The tenant shall not be entitled to compensation in respect of an improvement of the second or of the third class, unless not more than 14 days before executing it he has given to the landlord notice in writing of his intention to do so."

Clause 10 (Restrictions on outlay on third class).

Clause 11 (Deductions for compensation for rent, taxes, &c.)

Clause 12 (Set off for benefit of tenant) agreed to.

Landlords' Compensation for Waste.

Clause 13 (Landlords' title to compensation for waste) struck out.

Clause 14 (Description of Waste).

Clause 15 (Amount of Landlords compensation) agreed to.

Procedure.

Clause 16 (Notice of intended claim).

THE MARQUESS OF BATH objected to the form of the clause as unsatisfactory, and suggested that the words "three months," defining the period of notice to be given by either party to the other of them, should be omitted.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR explained that the object of the three months' notice was to put the parties on their guard by letting them know before the expiration of the tenancy that a claim was to be made for compensation. It was only on the termination of the tenancy that the tenant could go to the landlord and make his claim. If the landlord disputed the claim, then came the provision under the 18th clause by which referees were to be appointed. If both parties concurred there might be a single referee; if they did not concur, each might appoint a referee; and if a referee died or failed to act after seven days' notice, and the party failed to appoint another, the County Court Judge was to appoint a competent and impartial person as referee. Then there were provisions for the appointment of an umpire and as to the time within which the referees and the umpire were to make their awards. Those various stages would altogether occupy about 11 weeks; so that the landlord would have sufficient time given him for examining into the matter.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 17 Compensation agreed or settled by reference) agreed to.

Clause 18 (Appointment of referee or referees and umpire).

THE MARQUESS OF BATH moved an Amendment extending the period for the referee to take action from 7 to 14 days.

After a few words from Earl GRANVILLE and the LORD CHANCELLOR, in opposition to the Amendment,

Amendment negatived.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH then moved an Amendment substituting the Inclosure Commissioners for the County Court Judge to appoint a new referee on failure of one of the parties to do so.

Amendment negatived.

Clauses 19 to 24, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 25 (Award to find time of improvement).

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND proposed to leave out the clause, and insert the following new clause:—

(Award to give particulars.)

"The award shall not award a sum generally for compensation, but shall, as far as reasonably may be, specify—

"The particulars of the several improvements, acts, and things in respect whereof compensation is awarded;

"The time at which each thereof was executed, committed, or permitted;

"The mode and extent in and to which each thereof adds to or diminishes the letting value of the holding; and

"The sum awarded in respect of each thereof."

Motion agreed to; original clause struck out, and new clause inserted.

Clauses 26 to 29 relating to costs, payment, and removal, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 30 (Appeal to County Court).

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY proposed to omit the clause.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY thought that an appeal ought to be allowed, and that, as a rule, the County Court would be the best tribunal to appeal to. In some cases, however, where very large sums of money were at stake, there ought to be the right of appeal to a more important Court.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH thought that the decision of a Judge of Assize would be more satisfactory than that of a County Court Judge, who would not have the assistance of able counsel. He would suggest to leave out the words "appeal against it to the Judge of the County Court," and insert "remove the same by due process into any of Her Majesty's Courts at Westminster."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR pointed out that, although in Common Law actions the jurisdiction of the County Court Judges was limited to a comparatively small sum, yet in cases of equitable jurisdiction it had been extended to £500; while in Bankruptcy proceedings, as well as in all cases where the parties to a suit consented, they might exercise an absolutely unlimited judgment. To what better tribunal could appeals under this Bill be referred? His noble Friend proposed a Judge of Assize; but it should be borne in mind that in most of these cases a very considerable body of evidence would have to be disposed of, and that numerous documents and intricate accounts would have to be examined. How could a Judge of Assize, with the Circuits adjusted as at present and whose time was limited, be able to hear all these cases in addition to the work he had already to get through? These cases would necessarily involve processes of account and examination of vouchers—no Judge of Assize could undertake to grapple with them, and in the result they would be referred to some other tribunal. Besides, if appeals were to be tried before a Judge of Assize they must be tried by a jury, and he could conceive nothing more dangerous than to submit differences arising between landlords and tenants virtually to the decision of tenants residing in the neighbourhood. A County Court Judge would have ample leisure to examine not only the witnesses, but also the papers and accounts, and come to a decision on his personal responsibility, instead of casting the responsibility on a jury.

EARL GRANVILLE said, if it was the opinion of the Committee that there should be an appeal, he did not see why an award under £50 should not be a subject of appeal as well as an award of a larger amount.

LORD DENMAN said, that, having made every order of reference in the Court of Queen's Bench for 12 years, in which the referee was sole judge, and which were very seldom questioned, he hoped that the decision of an umpire in all cases might be final, awards up to £50 being recoverable in County Courts, and beyond that sum in the Superior Courts; and he trusted that the County Court Judges, who were already very much overworked, would not be saddled with these appeals.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that if the Committee would affirm the principle of the clause, he would endeavour to amend it upon Report so as to make it more acceptable.

Amendment (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 31 (Recovery of compensation); and 32 (Costs, remuneration, &c., in the County Courts), agreed to, with Amendments.

Charge of Tenant's Compensation.

Clause 33 (Power for landlord paying compensation to obtain charge), agreed to.

Ecclesiastical and Charity Lands.

Clause 34 (Landlord, archbishop, or bishop, incumbent of benefice, trustees for charities, &c.) agreed to.

Notice to Quit.

Clause 35 (Time of Notice to quit).

THE DUKE OF RUTLAND said, that this clause, which provided that where a half-year's notice expiring with a year of tenancy was by law necessary for determination of a tenancy—not created by lease—from year to year, a year's notice should by virtue of the Act be necessary and sufficient for the same.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND trusted the Committee would pass the clause in its present form.

EARL GRANVILLE thought it inconsistent with the proposal made by the Prime Minister of a two years' notice.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND replied, that the suggestion made by his right hon. Friend was not on all-fours with the present case. His right hon. Friend, no doubt, suggested that one of the modes of settling the tenant-right question would be a two-years' notice; and that was under other circumstances quite capable of being supported. But a two-years' notice with a yearly tenant was clearly inapplicable.

LORD HATHERTON said, that as the theory of giving notice was changed he would suggest adding to the clause the following words:—"Nevertheless, if a tenant sublets any part of his farm the usual notice of six months shall be sufficient."

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he could not accept the suggestion.

VISCOUNT HALIFAX pointed out that one advantage of retaining the six months' notice to quit would be that an outgoing tenant would have no time to "play tricks with his farm" if he were so disposed.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY held that the object of the Bill ought to be the encouragement of the good, "improving" tenant, and therefore he did not think a year's notice too long.

Clause agreed to.

IRELAND—TRINITY COLLEGE, DUBLIN.—QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, What progress, if any, is being made towards maturing and carrying out the long-promised scheme for accelerating retirement among the Senior Fellows of Trinity College, Dublin; and, whether it is proposed to give any increase of power to the Academical Council in the government of the University?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PLUNKET): Sir, as to the first part of the Question, I am informed that various proposals have been made by the Provost, the Senior Fellows, and the Junior Fellows of Trinity College, with the view of creating a more rapid succession in the entire body, and otherwise promoting its usefulness; but as yet no plan has been finally adopted or agreed upon. The subject is still under anxious consideration, and I hope that before long some satisfactory solution may be found for the difficulty. As to the second part of the Question, it is not, so far as I am aware, intended, at present, at all events, to give any increase of powers to the Academical Council. No necessity has, I believe, been suggested for an alteration of the provision of the Queen's Letter, recently granted. The new constitution seems to work well, and the two bodies in which the government of the University and College is vested have co-operated harmoniously. My hon. Friend will understand that I have answered his Question as one of the Members of the University of Dublin. These matters have not been brought before me officially.

ANNUAL RATE OF MORTALITY—FRIENDLY SOCIETIES COMMISSION.
QUESTION.

MR. CHARLEY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he would state what are the actual numbers of persons living in England on which the average annual rate of mortality mentioned in the column headed "under one year," in the Table at page 136 of the Fourth Report of the Friendly Societies Commission is founded; and are such numbers contained in any and which of the published Reports of the Registrar General; does the rate of mortality shown in such column include all deaths registered as one year of age; do the local Registrars register deaths during the second year of life as one year or as two years of age; has the same system been employed in estimating the rate of mortality in the various places named in such Table as for all England; and, have any special returns been made showing in what localities the death rates are under the average for all England?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the data for calculating the average annual rate of mortality at the different ages for England were supplied by the Registrar General, but the calculation was made by the Royal Commissioners. The average annual rate of mortality in England at the age "under one year" was obtained from the mean of the population enumerated at the Censuses of 1861 and 1871, and from the number of deaths registered in the 10 years 1861-70, at that age. The facts and calculation for England, which will appear in the forthcoming Supplement to the Registrar General's 35th Annual Report are as follows and it will be observed that the result does not differ materially from that in the Friendly Societies' Report:—Mean population, 1861-71, under one year of age, 640,306, deaths registered in the 10 years 1861-70 under the age of one year 1,155,182; average annual rate of mortality in England, of children "under one year of age" to 100 living in the 10 years 1861-1870, 18·041. The rate of mortality in this statement does not include deaths registered as one year of age; they are the deaths in the first year of age. The local Registrars register deaths under one year of age as "under one year," and deaths aged one year and under two years are registered as "one and under two years." The same system has been employed by the Registrar General in calculating the mortality in the various places named in the Table as for all England. Special Returns showing the death-rate in England and in the various districts of England are published every 10 years; those relating to the 10 years 1861-70 will shortly be presented to Parliament.

PUBLIC HEALTH ACT, 1872—QUESTION.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, in continuation of the Reports (134) of the non-medical inspectors of the Board on their proceedings in bringing into operation the machinery of the Public Health Act of 1872, it is the intention of the Government to lay before Parliament Reports by the medical officer of the Board on the practical efficiency of the Act in promoting public health?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, : Sir, the Reports to which my right hon. Friend alludes were not laid on the Table by me, but were moved for last Session by the late President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Stansfeld) to whom they were addressed. They had reference mainly to arrangements for the first appointment of sanitary officers when the Public Health Act came into operation. I have not seen occasion to instruct the medical officer to report on the practical efficiency of the Act in promoting public health, and therefore I have no such Reports to produce as are suggested in the Question.

SPAIN—THE CIVIL WAR—QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government has received any official information of the cruelties reported to be committed on prisoners of war by both parties in the war now raging in Spain; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government will follow the precedent of 1835, when Lord Eliot and Colonel Gurwood were sent out as Commissioners to the head quarters of both armies to remonstrate against the barbarities practised alike by the forces of the Government and the forces of Don Carlos, which led to the Eliot Convention, so conducive to the interests of humanity?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, Her Majesty's Minister at Madrid (Mr. Layard) has reported that certain cruelties have been committed by both parties in the war in Spain during the last two years. Those cruelties have been inflicted upon prisoners of war as well as upon other persons. With regard to the second Question, I would remind my hon. Friend that the circumstances of the year 1834 are not parallel with those of the present day. In 1834, when the Carlist War broke out, a proclamation was issued by the Government announcing formally that they would treat as rebels all those who took up arms in favour of Don Carlos, and consequently the officers of the Government shot nearly every armed Carlist who fell into their hands. The Carlist Chiefs immediately retaliated, and put to death the officers and soldiers of the Queen's Army who became their prisoners. In the spring of 1835, the Duke of Wellington was Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and made an effort to put a stop to those atrocities. He drew up a Convention himself, and entrusted it to Lord Eliot—the present Earl of St. Germans—and Colonel Gurwood, and they proceeded to Spain with that Convention. Owing to the ability and tact of Lord Eliot, that Convention was signed by both parties, and no doubt it had a humanizing effect upon the war. But at the present time no such proclamation or announcement as that of 1834 has been issued by the Government of Spain, and although I fear many acts of cruelty have been committed, yet those acts are few as compared with those of the first Carlist War. Her Majesty's Government, therefore, are not at present prepared to follow the precedent of 1835; but I can assure my hon. Friend that they will lose no opportunity of bringing their influence to bear upon the parties in the war in favour of peace and humanity, whenever they think that their interposition is calculated to have a beneficial effect.

SCOTLAND—SAINT GILES' CATHEDRAL
EDINBURGH.—QUESTION.

MR. J. COWAN asked the First Commissioner of Works, Why the sum of £500, paid for the erection of a Royal Pew in the Cathedral of St. Giles Edinburgh by the Committee appointed for the restoration thereof, and recommended by the Commissioner, has been omitted in the Miscellaneous Estimates; and, whether this omission will be supplied when any Supplementary Estimates are brought forward?

LORD HENRY LENNOX, in reply, said, that no one appreciated more than he did the magnificent restoration of the Cathedral through the liberality and the public spirit of the citizens of Edinburgh. Last year a sum of £500 was inserted in the Estimates for the erection of the Royal Pew, but it was not paid; and he regretted very much that, owing to unavoidable circumstances, he was unable to re-insert the sum in the Estimates now on the Table of the House. He was afraid he could not promise that, if any Supplementary Estimate were issued, that item would be found among them, unless the Office of Works should find that the item would be allowed.

CRIMINAL LAW—COCK FIGHTS
AINTREE AND SUTTON COLDFIELD.

QUESTIONS.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to a report in "The Birmingham Morning News" of the date of Monday the 19th instant, headed Cock-fighting Extraordinary, and following which is the description of a cock-fight which took place or is stated to have taken place in the Grand Stand of the Aintree Racecourse, near Liverpool, on Wednesday the 14th instant (presumably), at which it is stated a considerable number of gentlemen were present; also to another account of a cock-fight said to have taken place at Sutton Coldfield (presumably) on Saturday the 17th instant; whether he has taken means or given instruction to find if the extraordinary allegation made in respect to the cock-fight said to have taken place on the Aintree Racecourse Grand Stand is true; whether he has followed a similar course in respect to the one alleged to have taken place at Sutton Coldfield; and, whether he will direct that every effort be made to discover and bring to punishment all the promoters, aiders, and abettors of these exhibitions, if the accounts be true? Would the Home Secretary take means to obtain the real instead of the fictitious names of those who promoted these disgraceful exhibitions?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, his attention had been called to the accounts of the cock-fights in both places. He believed that the accounts in each case were substantially true, with this exception—that as regarded the one stated to have taken place at Sutton Coldfield it did not take place in Warwickshire, but over the border, in Staffordshire. [MR. NEWDEGATE: Hear, hear!] He was happy to say that he had found it unnecessary to give any positive instructions in the matter, because the county authorities in both places had taken the most active steps to find out the offenders, and to a considerable extent they had succeeded. At Aintree the police interfered while the fighting was going on; they found about 100 persons assembled, and took names from many of them. Some of the names given were fictitious; but a telegram informed him that 13 of the offenders had been identified, and every precaution would be taken to insure convictions.

MR. MACDONALD gave Notice that he would move an Address to Her Majesty, praying that the names of those persons convicted should be printed and laid on the Table of the House.

CIVIL SERVICE INQUIRY COMMISSION—THE REPORT.—QUESTION.

MR. DUNBAR asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Government have yet arrived at any decision upon the recommendations contained in the First Report of the Civil Service Inquiry Commission; and, whether, if they are not prepared to cause the early adoption of the proposed scheme in the Civil Service as a whole, they will apply it, as a tentative measure, to some one or two of the larger Departments?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, the Government had been in possession of the Report of the Commission for some time. They recognized the extreme value of it; and he availed himself of this opportunity publicly to thank the right hon. Member for Edinburgh University (Mr. Lyon Playfair) and his Colleagues for the service they had rendered. The recommendations were of an important character, and the Government felt they ought to be carefully considered before any action was taken upon them, because they affected not only the public service as a whole, but largely the interests of a great body of persons. The feeling of the Government was that it would be desirable, before any decision was arrived at with respect to the application of the scheme, that the working of it should be tested by something in the nature of a tentative inquiry as to the mode in which it would accommodate itself to the wants of particular Departments. Special inquiries were now going on under the guidance of members of the Commission, assisted by officers of two Departments; he hoped inquiries would be conducted in another Department also, and that the results of those inquiries would be to enable them to judge more accurately what the actual working of the scheme would be. When the Reports of these inquiries had been received, the Government would be in a position to say what their proposals were.

CHINA—MURDER OF MR. MARGARY. QUESTION.

MR. WAIT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to a telegram in "The Times" newspaper of the 8th instant, to the effect that Mr. Wade, Her Majesty's Minister at Peking, had made application to the Chinese Government for an investigation into the deplorable massacre at Manwine of Mr. Margary and his servants; whether such telegram was correct in its information; and, whether the Government has received from Mr. Wade himself the result of his appeal?

MR. DISRAELI: The telegram in The Times newspaper quoted by my hon. Friend respecting the unfortunate events which ended in the death of Mr. Margary is of the 10th, and not of the 8th instant. On the 4th of this month we sent by telegraph instructions to Mr. Wade to call upon the Chinese Government to make strict investigation into the circumstances of the case. Mr. Wade has communicated by telegraph to us that he has made certain demands in consequence upon the Chinese Government. We have reason to believe that these demands have been acceded to;

but, in the absence of details, it is better for the public interest that I should not at present enter any further into the nature of these communications.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. ASHBURY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he intends to proceed with the Friendly Societies Bill on Thursday next; and, if not, whether it is likely to be taken before Whitsuntide?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he thought there was no chance of the Bill being proceeded with on Thursday next, as that day had been set apart for the discussion of the financial measures of the Government, and he took it for granted that the evening would be occupied with them. He was anxious to proceed with the Bill, and, if possible, to bring it on before Whitsuntide; but at present he was unable to fix a day when it would be taken.

RANGOON, WEST OF CHINA—REPORTS.

QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he has any objection to produce the following documents:—Copy of all Memorials, Resolutions, and Letters dated after the 17th day of February 1873 from Chambers of Commerce and Commercial and Shipping Associations to the Secretary of State for India or any other of Her Majesty's Ministers relating to the completion of the survey of the direct land route from Rangoon to Kiang-Hung, near the south-west frontier of China, and the several Replies thereto (in continuation of the Parliamentary Paper, "Rangoon, West of China," No. 258, of Session 1873)?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, there was no objection to produce the Papers in question, but he thought the majority would be hardly worth printing; but if the hon. and learned Member would select any that were essential for his purpose, they should be laid before the House, together with other Papers on the subject.

INLAND REVENUE—THE GUN LICENCE—TEN SHILLING GUN LICENCES.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN NOLAN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, How many ten shilling gun licences have been issued in England and Wales during the last year of which he has Returns; also how many ten shilling gun licences have been issued during the same period in Ireland?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that the number of gun licences issued in England and Wales in the year ending the 31st of March, 1874, was 116,586, and in Ireland it was 3,578. The accounts for the year ended the 31st of March, 1875, had not yet been made up.

MONASTIC AND CONVENTUAL INSTITUTIONS—LAWS OF FOREIGN STATES.

QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When further Papers descriptive of the Laws, &c. of Foreign States relating to Monastic and Conventual Institutions, in completion of the Return presented on the 4th of March last, will be in the hands of the Members of this House; and, whether Her Majesty's Government would object to presenting any information relating to Laws passed, or alterations of Laws effected, on the subject of the Address since its adoption on the 27th of July 1874, and if not in their possession to procuring such information?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, Her Majesty's Representatives at Munich, Stuttgart, Dresden, Darmstadt, and Baden were instructed, on the 3rd of this month, to furnish, with as little delay as possible, the additional information required respecting Monastic Institutions. A Report on this subject has been received from Her Majesty's Representative at Dresden, and is now in the hands of the printer; but I am unable to say how soon Her Majesty's Representatives at the other places specified may be able to send the information required of them. As to recent legislation in Austria, there will be no objection to lay the few Papers we have upon the subject on the Table, and I will endeavour to obtain further information for my hon.

Friend. One copy of the work by Dr. Rönne has been received from Berlin, and has been presented to the Library of the House of Commons.

PRIVILEGE—STRANGERS—REPORTS OF DEBATES AND PROCEEDINGS.

QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the present anomalous relations between this House and the public press as to reports of public proceedings of the House and of Committees, it is his intention to propose some reform which, while maintaining the due control of this House over publication of its proceedings, shall relieve the public press from the hazards at which it now discharges important and useful functions towards this House and towards the Country?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, it is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce at present any measure of the kind to which the hon. Gentleman refers.

MR. SULLIVAN: Sir, I beg to give Notice that, in order to prevent breaches of Privilege and to determine the present anomalous relations between this House and the public Press, and to relieve the public Press from the hazards at which, it now discharges important and useful functions towards this House and towards the country, I will to-morrow, in case I perceive any strangers in the vicinity of the Chair, call attention thereto; and that I shall do the same on every evening during the Session when I may perceive Strangers in that locality.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND)
BILL.

(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

[BILL 77.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

MR. BIGGAR, in moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice, said, he considered the Government were acting very improperly in introducing a measure of this kind, which was alike uncalled-for and unnecessary—as he would be able to prove when he came to speak of the condition of Ireland—not merely as regarded the particular localities which were the objects of exceptional legislation, but of the state of the country generally. He had listened with profound attention to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland throughout the long speech which he made in support of the Bill, and he (Mr. Biggar) had to express some astonishment that the right hon. Gentleman had throughout his speech dealt entirely in generalities. He set out by assuming that a measure of this kind was necessary, but he carefully refrained from furnishing the House with the data on which he grounded that assumption. In one part of his speech the right hon. Gentleman admitted that the present state of Ireland was one of perfect peace and tranquillity, and that this measure was only intended as precautionary; which was an admission on his part that the Bill was not required at all. The only argument in favour of the Bill offered by the right hon. Gentleman in his long address was that magistrates of Westmeath had declared that its provisions were necessary for the security of the public peace; but as he (Mr. Biggar) would presently endeavour to show, that argument was of no great weight. In the first place, the magistrates from whom the memorial in favour of the renewal of coercion proceeded sat with closed doors; and, secondly, the memorial was not the memorial of the entire magisterial Bench of Westmeath, but that of a select number well known to be prejudiced against the people, and without sympathy with them in anything which concerned their interests. A memorial proceeding from such an assembly as that ought not to carry with it any weight whatsoever. He did not deny that those Westmeath magistrates were very worthy gentlemen; but not being able to ascertain facts for themselves, they relied on those supplied to them by spies and informers, which were altogether worthless. Such being the information on which the Westmeath magistrates based their representations to the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Government, he contended, were not justified in bringing forward this measure to take away the liberties of the whole people upon such representations. Another argument which he would urge against the Bill was that the last Assize showed there did not exist in Ireland any organized conspiracy to set the law at defiance. In Meath everything was tranquil: at the last Assizes there was not a single case for trial: in Fermanagh there was only one case; and generally throughout Ireland the result of the last Assizes was to show that the country enjoyed a perfect immunity from crime. Again, the Roman Catholic Bishops and clergy, who had a more intimate knowledge of the habits, the feelings, and of the every-day life of the Irish people than any other persons whatever, had decided against the Bill, which they considered not only unnecessary, but as calculated to foster and keep alive those very feelings of hostility to the Government which it was the intention of the measure to suppress and eradicate. Those gentlemen could supply the most accurate information to the Executive, as to the real condition of the country; but he regretted to say the authorities chose to rely more on the reports and representations made to the magistrates by the police, and which were obtained from the most worthless sources, from informers and from spies. The Roman Catholic clergy were the well-known opponents of secret societies, and discountenanced them with all their influence. They knew of everything which took place in the country—he was not, of course, alluding to information obtained by them in the confessional—but from their personal acquaintance with the people who consulted them and acted upon their advice in all the relations of home. If a young man was leading an improper course of life, his parents were sure to call clerical influence to their aid; and thus those youths who might, perhaps, feel an inclination to join such societies as those to which he referred were deterred from so doing. Had the Government consulted those gentlemen, they would have found that there was no necessity for the renewal of the Coercion Acts, but that the rights and privileges of the Constitution might at once and with perfect safety, and with great advantage to the country, be restored to Ireland. He (Mr. Biggar) had communicated with several of the Roman Catholic Bishops of Ireland on the subject—the Bishop of Meath, the Bishop of Down and Connor, and the late Archbishop of Cashel—inquiring of them whether Ribbonism existed, or existed to the extent that was alleged in Ireland, and they replied that, as far as they could judge, it did not; and they were unanimously of opinion that the common law, if justly and impartially administered, was all that was required for repressing crime, and that no necessity for exceptional legislation existed. Dr. M'Dermott, Bishop of Raphoe, wrote that not a trace of Ribbonism or Fenianism was to be found throughout his diocese, and he added—

“I am decidedly of opinion that it is not desirable to renew the Coercion Acts, they seem to me to do very little good; and to pass them may do a great deal of harm.”

The Peace Preservation Act was originally brought in on account of outrages that had been committed, and which, perhaps, called for its introduction. But these outrages had entirely died out, and no new necessity for renewing its provisions had been shown. As for the Report of the Westmeath Commission, it was of no value. It declared there was a wide-spread conspiracy, fenced in by a most awful oath; yet although, if the representations of the witnesses were correct, thousands must have taken that oath, a single copy of it had never been produced. They were therefore asked to pass this Bill on the bare assertion of the Government that the Bill was desirable. In fact, Ireland was as peaceful a country as any in the world, and he said emphatically it was a great shame that the whole of the Irish people should be treated as a nation of criminals, tyrannized over and subjected to continual coercion. The propositions contained in the Bill were of a most frightful character, and the whole country seemed to be left entirely at the mercy of one man, the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who, on his part, might coerce the Irish people as he pleased. Powers, too, were given to the magistrates which were liable to continual abuse. [The hon. Member here read in a manner which made it impossible to follow the application, long extracts from the Report and Evidence of the Westmeath Commission, from the Catholic newspapers of Ireland, and from statements and resolutions of various public bodies, and meetings. The general purport appeared to be to denounce the necessity for any exceptional legislation in regard to Ireland, to assert the general tranquillity and good order of the country and the absence of Ribbonism, and to protest against the invasion of the liberties of the people.] Resuming his speech, the hon. Member was understood to say, that he, in the next place, objected to the Bill by which it was proposed that this coercive system should be put in force. The Bill was framed with the object of renewing and modifying detached portions of three or four previous Acts. He thought that even a practised lawyer would be puzzled to understand it. If persons were to be punished for breaking the law, it was only fair they should know what the law was which they were not to break; but he was satisfied that it would be impossible for persons of ordinary intelligence to understand this Bill. Then its provisions were conceived in so vicious a principle that it was difficult to tell which of them was the worst. The plan of imposing on localities where outrages had been committed a special charge for extra police was most unfair, for it might well be that the inhabitants were wholly blameless. The manner in which the coercion was to be carried out was without a parallel in any free country. Peaceable people were not allowed to have arms to protect themselves, while evil-disposed persons would get arms in spite of the law by running a little risk. With regard to the provisions against sending threatening letters, such letters were often sent more by way of a joke than anything else; and it was unreasonable to say that on account of the writing of those letters the police were to be at liberty to search people's houses at all hours of the day or night. In many cases great annoyance had been caused to innocent persons by the exercise of that arbitrary power. A man who intended to commit an outrage was not likely to give his victim any notice; and where a letter of that kind was sent at all, the object of the writer often was only to give annoyance and not to injure the person to whom it was addressed. With respect to the Act against secret societies, it was quite inoperative, although under its provisions Freemasons and members of the Orange Society in Ireland were liable to be prosecuted. It was improper to retain a law of that kind which it was not intended to enforce impartially against all, but which put it into the power of the authorities to punish severely a few persons, while the great majority of those who infringed it wholly escaped. The clause against secret societies ought therefore to be struck out of the Bill, and he did not see on what ground the Government could defend it. No doubt, as a whole, they were not, as a body, a very brilliant set of men; but, nevertheless, they should remember that it was for their own political interest not only to consider the people of Ireland, but to satisfy the democracy of England. He did not wish to see the Government now in power replaced by Gentlemen on the front Opposition Bench, until the latter had given some reason for the change, which they had not done hitherto. But Her Majesty's Government were wasting a great deal of time about questions of Privilege and Irish Coercion Bills which would prove perfectly inoperative. He did not see why the Government should waste not only the time of the House, but their own time, which was of very material importance, in having matters of this sort debated, and in passing a measure which would be looked upon as a stigma upon England as well as a stigma upon Ireland. There were questions of far more importance to which they ought to turn their attention—questions arising out of the Master and Servant Act, the Friendly Societies Bill, the relations between landlord and tenant in England, and so on. But if this Bill passed to-morrow, the effect of it would be not one crime the more or one crime the less committed in Ireland, it would simply subject well-disposed persons to annoyance at the hands of the police. It was said in support of the Bill on the second reading that it would be carried by an enormous majority. And so it was, but that majority was composed for the most part of persons who had not heard a single argument for or against the Bill, and to vote for Bills of this kind without hearing what was to be said for or against them was most improper. There was no reason why coercion laws should be directed against secret societies in Ireland, so far as Roman Catholics were concerned, because the clergy of that Church being altogether opposed to secret societies of any kind, very few Roman Catholics were members of such societies. The system of coercive Acts in regard to Ireland which had been carried out for more than a century was a disgrace to the English Government. From the beginning of the reign of George III., Act after Act had been passed, and the restrictions imposed repeated and augmented, and even in the Acts of the present time some of the restrictions of the Acts passed in the old evil times were preserved. [The hon. Member, who was almost inaudible, was understood to recapitulate some of the arbitrary enactments of older statutes, and to point out that they were in substance or effect reenacted in the various Arms Acts and Peace Preservation Acts of the present reign]. It was one of the great blots of this Bill that it authorized, on the warrant either of the Lord Lieutenant or of the Chief Secretary, the imprisonment without trial or any means of redress, not only of offenders against the law, but even of those who might be supposed to have a personal acquaintance with them. While so imprisoned they were prohibited from holding any intercourse, whether orally or in writing, with their friends and relatives outside. So extraordinary a power as that ought not to be vested in any one man. But his power of coercion did not stop there. If a crime was committed in any district, even although the criminal had no connection with that district whatever, the Lord Lieutenant could quarter an additional police force on the people, and this peace tax had been a source of great injustice. He appealed to the Government not to disgrace themselves, and not degrade the Irish people by forcing upon them a measure of this kind. As evictions had in former times been a fertile source of disaffection and disorder, and they were not likely to occur so often now that the land laws had been altered, there was all the less reason on that score why Bills should be passed of the character now under consideration. In his opinion, Dr. Plunket suggested a more sensible course of proceeding in 1871 than was now recommended by the Government. He said that if the ordinary laws were strictly enforced, they would be quite sufficient to repress crime in Meath, Westmeath, and King's County, the amount of which he thought had been greatly exaggerated; and he added that an improvement of the condition of the labouring population would be a much more powerful instrument in the cause of order than all the coercion Bills that were ever passed. The hon.

Member proceeded to argue that Ribbonism had its origin and its continuance in the desire of the people to deter the landlords from evictions and the capricious tyranny of the landlords, and for this purpose read numerous long extracts from documents and evidence; when—

Notice taken that 40 Members were not present: House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. BIGGAR continued. The Bill for giving a right to search for arms on a mere excuse, and often without even a pretence, the real purpose being to discover any papers that might give information about suspected persons. The hon. Member proceeded to read extracts from the evidence before the Westmeath Committee—as was understood;—but in a manner which rendered him totally unintelligible. At length—

MR. SPEAKER, interrupting, reminded the hon. Gentleman that the Rules required that an hon. Member, when speaking, should address himself to the Chair. This Rule the hon. Gentleman was at present neglecting.

MR. BIGGAR said, that his non-observance of the Rule was partly because he found it difficult to make his voice heard after speaking for so long a time, and partly because his position in the House made it very inconvenient for him to read his extracts directly towards the Chair; he would, however, with permission, take a more favourable position. The hon. Member accordingly, who had been speaking from below the Gangway, removed to a bench nearer to the Speaker's Chair, taking with him a large mass of papers, from which he continued to read long extracts, with comments. At length the hon. Member said he was unwilling to detain the House at further length, and would conclude by stating his conviction that he had proved to every impartial mind that the Government had made out no case for the maintenance of this monstrous system of coercion, and that their proposal was perfectly unreasonable. The hon. Gentleman, who had been speaking nearly four hours, then moved his Amendment.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA, in seconding the Amendment, said, that this was not simply a renewing Bill, but a Bill to renew certain portions of certain Bills, and to repeal certain portions of other Bills. In many respects the measure reflected credit on the Government. In so far as it was a repealing Bill it was good; but in so far as it was an enacting Bill it was a structure of ingenious confusion. The delay which he and his Friends asked for was in order that the Bill might be submitted to the House in such a shape that it might know what the Bill proposed to do. He would not pretend that he did not himself know what the Bill proposed to do; but he denied that anyone could make it out from a perusal of its clauses. One thing it was intended to do was to re-enact for two years the special Coercive Statute, known as the Westmeath Act, which was passed in 1871, based on the evidence taken before a Select Committee, which was accepted as proving sufficiently the existence of a wide-spread organized Ribbon conspiracy, bound to secrecy by the obligation of a terrible oath, the text of which purported to be in evidence before the Committee. He did not believe in the existence of Ribbonism of that nature or in that sense at all; and if he had believed it before the Committee of 1871 sat he could not believe it since he read the evidence it had taken. The Report of the Committee was founded upon evidence which, so far as it was even credible, rested on the foundation of hearsay and rumour alone. He had landed property in Westmeath for the last 20 years, and he knew the county well; the very nature of his property in that county was such as to render him sensitive to the presence of such an organization if it existed, for he paid a fee farm rent for his lands which were occupied by tenants who paid him a rack rent—his statement in that House was therefore as likely to be correct in this matter as that of any of those gentlemen who deposed before the Committee. He (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) disbelieved in toto that Ribbonism, or any secret organized confederacy of the nature imputed, existed. The witnesses who were examined before the Committee gave their evidence very fairly, and he had no doubt with a sincere desire to state nothing but the truth; but the Committee took for facts all that the witnesses said even when they gave merely hearsay evidence. The Ribbon Oath was read, and had a great effect upon their minds; but he could say that he had never read a document so obviously and patently fictitious as that oath was. It had been suggested that it was drawn up by a policeman; but he inclined to believe that it was a stupid hoax—however that might be, he (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) would unhesitatingly say that he never read a document so obviously fictitious. It was an insult to Irishmen, or to anyone who understood the Irish character, to ask them to base legislation on a document which was the production of some one in a humorous or half-lunatic condition of mind. He would now read from the evidence taken before the Committee the text of the oath, which being once accepted as genuine might account for the whole discrepancy between his belief on the subject of Ribbonism and that of the Committee. The so-called oath purported to be set forth in a paper headed "Obligations of a Ribbonman," which he would read. It began—

"The person is first asked by the Captain or Committee-man, Is it your wish with all your heart and mind to assume the heavenly act of Ribbonman or any other title you may get from the Board? The person answers 'Yea.' The Captain of the Committee then says—'Take the Book in your right hand and go down on your bare knees—you swear that you will never prosecute a Ribbonman or any other title he may get from the Ribbon Board before Judge or Jury or any man that can trust our system.'—The person then, if it is not his wish to receive the chief secrets, may rise and go away, but if he answers 'Yes,' the Captain orders him to bless himself and take the Book in his right hand, and he is then sworn as follows:—'By virtue of the oath I have taken, I will aid and assist, with all my might and strength, when called upon, to massacre Protestants and cut away heretics, burn British Churches, abolish Protestant Kings and Princes, and all others except the Church of Rome and this system, and by virtue of the oath I have taken I will think it no sin to kill and massacre a Protestant whenever opportunity serves: and by virtue of the said oath, if I know any of the members of this system to be backward in executing any of the aforesaid orders, I will immediately make it known to the Captain or the Committee-man belonging to the Ribbon Board; and by virtue of the oath I always will attend at one moment's warning to execute any commands belonging to the system, and that I will never see a brother hurt or abused by any not up to this system without assisting him, or will I buy anything from a Protestant at any terms if I can get it from a brother; and I also feel bound to believe that there is no absolution to be had from the Pope of Rome or any other authority belonging to that Church, on any part of this solemn test, or any favour in this world or that which is to come for a breach of this test.'"

Sir Joseph M'Kenna

Now, he would shortly observe upon that interesting paper that it was the most obviously fictitious and trumpery document of the kind he had ever read, and that its production as authentic stamped the whole theory of the existence of an organized agrarian conspiracy in Westmeath with the character of fiction; nevertheless, it certainly influenced the minds of the Committee from first to last; but, for his part, he would simply observe that until he believed—as not long since in a famous case they were asked to believe—that a Catholic gentleman would write an affectionate letter to his mother, concluding with a prayer “that the Blessed Maria might have mercy on her soul;” he would hold that the document which purported to set forth not only the Ribbon Oath, but the formulary of the Ribbon proceedings, to be either a hoax or a fraud. He would admit, however, that the Committee of 1871, although influenced by the alleged discovery of the oath, were not solely moved by it: the existence of a kind of secret society was proved, and it was quite true that some two years before the Committee sat the railway station master at Mullingar had been murdered. That crime was committed without provocation, or on the very slightest provocation, and would disgrace any country. He would, however, now deal with that fact. The Chairman of the railway, Mr. Cusack, was one of the witnesses examined before the Westmeath Committee: he (Sir Joseph M’Kenna) did not quarrel with Mr. Cusack’s testimony in the least; but he charged on the company of which Mr. Cusack was the Chairman—or perhaps he should more correctly say on the Canal Company, the management of which had devolved on Mr. Cusack’s company—that they (the Canal Company) had manufactured the Ribbon system which affected themselves, and had entered into very curious relations with it. Now he (Sir Joseph M’Kenna) would hazard no assertions on this matter, and wherever a fact required to be proved he would put it aside unless he could establish it on the evidence taken before the Select Committee. The hon. Member then explained to the House the origin of the Midland Great Western Railway Company about 30 years ago, and its amalgamation with the Royal Canal Company, which latter was incorporated so long ago as 1789. The Railway Company came to be also the owners and managers of the canal, and Mr. Cusack was the Chairman and head of both concerns. He would read Mr. Cusack’s evidence taken before the Westmeath Committee, with a view to show that the secret society with which the amalgamated company had to do was one recognized for a long time by the Company, and was not an agrarian conspiracy but a species of trades union.

“Question 1347.—Are you aware whether outrages have taken place upon the canal with which you are connected?—No, I think since I have been connected with the line there has been no outrage upon the canal, although it runs parallel to the line.

“Question 1348.—How do you account for that?—I account for it by their having a secret society among the men, and by their having been allowed for years to have all the appointments to themselves. As soon as a man dies or goes away the company are told who to put into his place. These people act as a sort of police, and protect the place.”

Now, he fully admitted there was evidence here of a secret organized society, recognized time out of mind by the Canal Company, long before Mr. Cusack’s time. He (Sir Joseph M’Kenna) would say confidently that there was no reliable evidence of any kind to prove that any organized society, other than this, existed in 1871, and he did not believe there was any other. But perhaps hon. Members might say that after all was a veritable Ribbon Society. They should, however, hear what Mr. Cusack had to say on that head—

“Question 1398.—With regard to the strange system of appointment which prevails upon the canal, have you reason to suppose that that is supported by the Ribbon conspiracy?—I do not say it is caused by the Ribbon conspiracy, because I think it existed for a long time before my time, but it certainly has the effect of keeping us all quiet upon the canal.

“Question 1399.—You have no reason for connecting that with the Ribbon conspiracy?—No, I have not.”

Now, could anything be clearer than that this the only organized secret society was, in fact, a species of trades union amongst the servants of the Canal Company? And when one reflected that the Canal Company and the Railway Company were one and the same corporation, did not the murder of Mr. Anketell, the station master, resolve itself into an atrocious attempt on the part of the servants, or hangers on of the Company, to get the upper hand on the railway as well as on the canal? Why should that act, base and atrocious as it was, be mixed up with the notion of Agrarian Confederations and Ribbon Boards and Committees, and Ribbon Oaths and Captains of Ribbon-men? They certainly found an account in the evidence of a Mr. Crofton, who was examined before the Committee, of a certain so-called Captain Duffy; but he (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) ventured to believe that Duffy was a captain without a company, like the Australian highwayman who was in the habit of terrifying isolated settlers by pretending to head a gang. At any rate, there was no evidence that Duffy had a company, except the style of "Captain," which was nothing more than a nickname. The idea of an agrarian conspiracy would be dispelled by a careful examination of the evidence of some of the most intelligent of the witnesses. Mr. Julian, the Crown Solicitor for the King's County and Westmeath, was examined. He said, in answer to Question 2497—

"Formerly, questions between landlord and tenant gave rise to agrarian outrage; but now if the Ribbon combinations waited for cases between landlord and tenant, they might, if I may use the term, give up business, as they are so very few in number the consequence is that almost all the recent cases can scarcely be called agrarian at all."

Quite right, and honestly deposed by Mr. Julian. So here again the case was brought back to the class of offences growing out of the system that had existed on the canal—a kind of irregular trades union—which the murderers of Mr. Anketell no doubt wanted to have extended to the railway. He hoped the House would bear with him whilst he read some portions of Mr. Rochfort Boyd's evidence which dealt with the system of fines inflicted on districts in which crimes had been committed. In answer to Question 1531, Mr. Boyd said—

"I look upon the area or the incidence of the taxation to be so faulty and so wrong as at the present moment to estrange the feelings and the loyalty of those who ought to be our best men—that is to say, the independent farmers of the country. It is within my knowledge now, for example, that at the present moment, from the taxes recently laid on certain districts for murder committed, and other outrages, there are some of the best conducted men in my county becoming fast reduced in circumstances, and if it goes on they will be utterly smashed, while those escape with impunity who are, in point of fact, the concoctors and the executors of the mischief which is perpetrated."

Now what he (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) had to say in respect to all this was, that those who were law-abiding and loyal should not be punished on account of others who had committed grievous outrages—would such a principle be applied in England? He meant, would the principle of the Coercion Law? Take the case of Lincolnshire, for instance, and suppose that it could satisfactorily be brought home that bands of poachers, who generally had an understanding with each other of a more or less intimate kind, had been engaged in desperate outrages upon persons or attacks upon property—would it be said that such a state of circumstances would prove a justification for placing a whole county or large district under a set of severe regulations? He ventured to say that nothing of the kind would be tried or ought to be tried. Why, because some outrages were committed, should a whole community be branded as if they were affected by a spirit of outrage? He wished to state, in the presence of the Prime Minister, the subject matter of the Resolution was to complain of the structure of this Bill—he and his Friends objected to the codification by means of one Renewal Bill, obscure in its meaning, of measures conceived in the spirit of the Coercion Acts. They asked that the Bill should be so framed as to show on its face what restrictions of the liberty of the subject it was intended to enact.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is inexpedient to proceed with the consideration of a Bill re-enacting and modifying detached portions of several statutes, until it is put into such a form as to show clearly and distinctly the provisions which are to form part of the continued and revised code,"—(Mr. Biggar,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. R. SMYTH: Whatever opinions, Sir, may be held on either side of the House as to the necessity and policy of the Bill now under consideration, I do not think that anyone can reasonably deny that it is the duty of Irish Members to make it the subject of serious challenge and debate. Whether the measure is right or wrong, it is, at all events, one of great importance to the people of Ireland, and of no less importance to the credit of Constitutional Government. This Bill avowedly puts in jeopardy or suspends the usual guarantees of the liberties of several millions of the people of the United Kingdom. Indeed, its only value consists in its doing that thing. Now, if such a measure were allowed to pass in silence through any one of its stages, it would hardly be creditable to the House itself, and still less to those Members who are specially intrusted with the duty of guarding the liberties and general welfare of Ireland. I therefore think, apart altogether from the merits of the particular Amendment which has been moved, that the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) was justified in raising a fresh discussion upon the Motion for going into Committee, and it need not excite surprise if, when we are in Committee, every clause and every line of every clause be subjected to the severest examination before it is declared to stand part of the Bill. What are we asked to do? Nothing, I am sorry to say, for which ample precedent may not be pleaded. I am sure that if, for the first time since the union between England and Ireland, a measure of this nature were introduced to the notice of Parliament, it would not only startle the people of England, but would awaken in them a sincere regret. English Members inside this House, and Englishmen and Scotchmen outside of it, are not our enemies. They want to be our friends if they only knew how; and I most truly believe that they have every desire to see Ireland happy and prosperous; for I cannot for a moment suppose that a powerful and generous nation like England—and which has a right to be generous because it is powerful, and because Ireland did not always fare so well at its hands as it has done in more recent days—should do otherwise than wish well to a country that is so intimately bound up with its own strength, honour, and fortunes. But hon. Members do not need to be reminded that good intentions pave the way in very opposite directions, and that it is the duty of legislators not only to intend to do the right thing, but to take every means of informing themselves what is the right thing to do. Now, an Englishman said to me not long since—"I confess Ireland is a great puzzle to me; I don't understand it at all." Of course, no English Member of Parliament would make such a confession; for if he did it would add greatly to the force of the arguments, and would give additional plausibility to the policy of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt.) And yet I do fear considerable misconceptions prevail about the causes of the discontent of Ireland. There may be hon. Gentlemen in this House who know little or nothing about the habits, the houses, and the real characteristic thoughts of the Irish people. They have not seen them on their farms or in their markets, and Ireland may possibly be to them a great and inexplicable mystery. I am confirmed in this opinion by calling to mind that no less a personage than the present First Lord of the Treasury once undertook to account for the discontent of Ireland on the supposition that the people had been driven mad by listening to the moaning of the Atlantic Ocean. That may have been only a droll remark; but I know it was made on rather a serious occasion, in connection with the proposal to disestablish the Irish Church, and if that be an idea that could be even comically entertained by the leading statesmen in this House what sort of theories may not be entertained by those who are not statesmen? If there must be Coercion Acts until the Atlantic Ocean is either dried up or silenced then our case is hopeless indeed, and the effective remedy for Irish discontent must be indefinitely postponed. On what assumption is this Bill based? The Government tell us that they cannot govern Ireland without it. Perhaps so. I dare say that is the case. But the whole fault may not lie with Ireland, for the further question must be faced, and will be asked over and over again within these walls—at least, so long as there are Irishmen here to ask it—why cannot you govern Ireland without suspending the constitutional laws of the country? Of course, you must preserve peace at all hazards. You may be quite justified in confining the patient to his own room while you are administering restoratives; but what restoratives are you administering? I admit—and in doing so I am only making an admission that would be as frankly made by the most ardent patriots of the House—that it is the duty of the Government to protect the lives and property alike of the highest and the meanest of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland, for no Government could hold its place, or ought to hold its place, for one day that failed in this duty. But, at the same time, it would surely be more creditable to a Government if it could somehow preserve Irish life and Irish property by the same means that this is done in England and Scotland. I believe it can be done. There may be occasions when a short cut must be taken to secure tranquillity, and when the well-doing inhabitants of the country may be reasonably asked to surrender some of their rights for a time, so that the ill-doing may be punished or put out of the way. The Government says that the condition of Ireland at this moment is a case in point, and in defence of the particular measure proposed—a measure which we know is not as severe as some that have come before it—we are told that the meshes of this net are so constructed that good men will easily pass through, and only bad men will be captured. I am not so sure about that; for I have observed in net fishing that you very often enclose fish you do not want, and that you have a short supply of those you do want. I am not here speaking at random. The hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) some nights ago amused the House by a reference to the patriotic misfortunes of Irish Members of Parliament. No doubt a good many Irish Members have been in prison, because so many people get into prison in Ireland who ought not to be there at all; whereas in some of the countries that might be named people can go to and fro in the earth a long time and write an immense deal of libellous rubbish before they have the slightest chance of getting into prison. The fact is if Irish constituencies excluded all candidates for Parliamentary honours who have been in prison, the area of selection would be inconveniently narrowed. But, now, may I ask what sent these gentlemen to prison? Not always the common law of the country; but they were generally sent there for crimes which had been specially created by Act of Parliament. They were caught by Bills such as that now before the House. The

Mr. R. Smyth

Habeas Corpus Suspension Act caught the hon. Member for the county of Limerick (Mr. O'Sullivan), and the Party Processions Act caught the hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Mr. Johnston); for the martyrs are not all on this side of the House; and as for the future it is not all unlikely that this Bill will bear a plentiful harvest in the next Parliament. Now, Sir, I am not to be understood as arguing against the right of the Government to seek and to obtain exceptional measures for repressing social violence; but what I complain of is that this is almost the only thing that is being done, and that the thorough remedial legislation which was so far advanced in the last Parliament is not being carried to completion in the present Parliament. I heard last Session an appeal from the benches opposite—an appeal made by an Irish Member from his place immediately behind the Treasury bench—I refer to the hon. Member for Donegal (Mr. Conolly)—to the Government to go on applying remedies of a permanent and substantial character to the condition of Ireland. We on this side do not set up for being special guardians of Irish interests. Conservative Members know perfectly well—and the speech of the hon. Member for Donegal last Session showed it—that finality has not been reached in the application of remedy and redress. There is no use in foisting Party comparisons into a debate such as that in which we are now engaged. I believe the present Government is as anxious as the late Government to promote the prosperity of Ireland on its good behaviour. But it was the avowed aim of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) and his Administration so to govern Ireland that it might arrive at peace through the avenue of prosperity; and it would be a source of much regret if now, or at any future time, the order of idea should be reversed, and it should be laid down as a maxim of Government that it must be at peace at all events, and be left to take its chance for prosperity. A forced peace will never lead to a satisfactory social condition. Why, Sir, the Irish people have been far too much accustomed to believe themselves at war with this country. It may have been their own fault; but the plain and undeniable fact is that war measures have generated in them a kind of feeling that they are, to some extent, justified in eluding them. They must be taught that the law is, and should be, the strongest thing in the country; but we ought to take care that the law, as far as possible, should be such as commends itself to the national instinct and conscience. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich was exposed to much hostile remark for saying that Ireland ought to be governed by Irish ideas, and the sentiment was caricatured by representing the shooting of a landlord as an Irish idea. It is nothing of the kind. The Irish know very well that it is a dreadful crime to assassinate anybody, and they have resorted to this abnormal iniquity as a recoil from, and a revenge for, what they considered the violation of their ideas. They have peculiar ideas like all nations; and one of their ideas is that human happiness is wrapt up in the possession of a piece of land and in living upon that land from generation to generation. [Mr. WHALLEY: Oh, oh!] The hon. Member for Peterborough says "Oh, oh!" by which I understand the hon. Member to signify that he is shocked at such an idea; but the hon. Member's alarms have frequently before been excited on common-place occasions, and this is only another illustration of his extravagant sensitiveness. The great difficulty in governing Ireland from your standpoint consists in this fixed and ineradicable idea—the land is the life of the people; deprived of that they are helpless and hopeless. You talk to an Irish peasant-farmer about political economy; but he acknowledges no political economy which puts him out of his farm. You can print what you please in books, but you cannot print theories of Government upon the human heart. We may be very sorry that people, millions of people, should have become so perverted in all their conception of things that they actually consider their own lives and the lives of their children superior to the laws of supply and demand, and even object to go to the backwoods of Canada, and to the prairies of Nebraska, in obedience to these laws. But, so it is, and what can you make of it? It would be out of place for me to say anything just now beyond this—that in repressing agrarian crime something ought to be done in the direction of a further amendment of the agrarian laws, not in any violent or revolutionary way, not invading the rights of property, but tending towards the utmost limits of indulgence; and if that is done you need not despair of making Ireland yet a strength and not a weakness to the empire. I will candidly say that, in my judgment, the social condition of Ireland is not at this moment such as would warrant the Government in dispensing with some special machinery for preserving the peace, and if the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cavan went in the face of that admission, I could not support it. But, as I understand the Amendment of the hon. Member, it only asks that the Bill shall be re-modelled, so as to show us clearly what we are doing—that everything vital and substantial should be put down at full length in the text itself, and that the liberties of Ireland should not be stolen away by the skeleton key of a schedule. Coercion by a clause may be legitimate; but I do not like coercion by a mere marginal reference. I dare say the lawyers who draft these Bills know best what is good for themselves. They are not a lazy race of men. They rather like taking pains to find out from an Act of Parliament what nobody else can find out. But the hon. Member for Cavan wants in black and white what it is that is being enacted—no more and no less. Hon. Gentlemen opposite will be slow to attribute any Party object to the hon. Member for Cavan. For though he generally sits on this side of the House, where, unfortunately, there is more room, he is known to be on occasions a loyal supporter of Her Majesty's Government. The Amendment is not aimed at the principle of the Bill; but reasonably puts in a plea for a modification of procedure. Now, I know enough of the North of Ireland to be aware that so long as party processions are sanctioned by law—and I am not saying that it was a mistake to repeal the Party Processions Act—it would not be prudent, as the shocking occurrence in County Tyrone on last St. Patrick's Day too well proves, to permit an unlimited supply of fire-arms to those who take part in such processions, or to those who take umbrage at them and try to stop them. We have, for instance, a remarkable state of things in the City of Londonderry and its neighbourhood. In that city there has been for a long period of time a tolerably well-equipped army of young men, called "Apprentice Boys," deriving their name and their political lineage from the 13 young colonists who shut the gates of Derry against Antrim's Redshanks in 1688. These young men—and I have not one word or thought against them—being of undoubted courage, are in the habit of defending Derry twice a-year from the armies of King James the Second. They had for a great many years a park of artillery, consisting of some 12 or 15 pieces of ordnance, which they discharged from the walls of Derry, and sometimes, of necessity, discharged them over those portions of the city inhabited by classes of the population who very much disliked these celebrations and proceedings. Bad blood was the result, and party spirit ran so high that the Lord Lieutenant felt it necessary to proclaim the city and district around. These pieces of cannon were not licensed afterwards, and, consequently, they had to be removed to some place of secrecy, where they have been silent ever since. But counter demonstrations have been organized, and the Roman Catholics—for I regret to say these matters are regulated greatly by denominational interest, or supposed interests—say that if Derry is to be defended twice a-year when there is nobody attacking it they will, at all events, go through the form of taking it, and of marching round the walls; and round the walls they do march, not twice, but once a year. That is all well enough so long as the cannon is out of the way. But it is now freely said that if the Lord Lieutenant's proclamation is withdrawn, and the cannon brought back, the Roman Catholics intend to have cannon also. Even that might do if the two parties will agree to attack and defend Derry at different seasons of the year—the one on the 17th of March and the other on the 18th of December; but I have my doubts whether such an arrangement would stand, or whether it would not come to be considered too dull an affair for courageous Irishmen. The Protestants would think that Roman Catholic artillery on the walls of Derry would be unhistorical, and the Catholics would reply that they were going to make new history of their own, and the last condition of our city would be worse than the first. The Government cannot safely forego its power to meet emergencies of this kind, and this is only one instance of the evils which spring—at least so far as the North is concerned—not so much from agrarian hatred as from party spirit, religious and political. I think, however, that there might be some relaxation of the rules for licensing fire-arms, especially in the case of farmers who require them for killing noxious birds and animals on their farms. I hope both sides of the House can take a reasonable view of the position in which we stand. I am quite sure that an extreme view on either side, however it may be dictated by conviction, will not promote the true and permanent interests of the country. It has sometimes been said that there are occasions when a Member of Parliament may discreetly gain for himself a little cheap popularity; but I think no popularity is cheap which requires a man to pay down his convictions as the price of it; and I will add that I have no reason to believe that there is any Member here from Ireland who would not do all in his power to save his country first of all, and then protect his seat afterwards. I trust this Parliament, conscious of its power, will resolutely advance in the path of indulgent legislation. Whilst bating no job of its claims upon the obedience of the people, let us not for ever keep our eyes fixed on the weakness and sins of the people of Ireland. They have also good qualities which may be fostered into a loyalty that will stimulate them to fight the battles of the Queen by sea and land as they have done before. The country grudges no power to the Government which may be needful to keep down disaffection; but when the end has been accomplished there remains still something to be done; and I can imagine few recollections that could or that ought to be more grateful to Ministers of the Crown and Members of Parliament than the remembrance that they had been instrumental in drawing aside the last veil and letting the full light of a happy National life break in once for all upon the care and sorrow of Ireland.

MR. O'CLERY gave his hearty support to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cavan. The most dignified course of opposing the measure as a whole was leaving the onus of discussing its details to the Government, which, by the great majority of Conservatives and Liberals which it had at its back that night, was determined to force on Ireland a measure so hostile.

MR. WHALLEY adhered to the opinion he had formerly expressed, that it was grievous hypocrisy on the part of the Government to endeavour to meet the difficulty of Ireland by coercive measures like this one. Was it to go forth to the world that the jurisprudence of this country, with all the power at its back, was unable to cope with ordinary combination, riot, murder, or agrarian outrage, which might occur in any English county? The real difficulty to be contended with was not the peasant's love of a bit of land, nor the attack and the defence of the walls of Derry, but a development of the world-wide conspiracy organized for the express purpose of assailing the free institutions of every Government that did not submit itself to domination. If there was one man in Europe who knew this, it was the Prime Minister; and it was outrageous that he, with the power he had, did not grapple with the real difficulty instead of coercing the people of Ireland. We knew it was the business and sacred duty of the Romish priesthood to organize the peasantry of Ireland and other parties there, not excepting the trades unions. They would not be true to the advice that had been given to them, and would not have as much common sense as he could pretend to himself, if they did not pursue that course, for Cardinal Manning had counselled them to subjugate and break the spirit of this country, and render the people subservient to the purpose they had in view. As the matter stood, however, he could not say he was going to support the Government by voting for this Bill. It was, in his opinion, an attempt to meet a difficulty known to history as a distinct organization which, under the pretence of religion, sought to keep the country in a state of turmoil and confusion. It was that with which they had to grapple, and it appeared to him that the honest and industrious people of Ireland ought not, under a mere pretence, be made to suffer by the provisions of such a Bill as the present.

MR. O'CONOR said, he need hardly assure the House that it was not his intention to reply to the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) in his attack on the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland. That hon. Member's opinions on the subject were well known, and it was unnecessary for him to occupy the time of the House by any answer. He confessed that if the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) had moved the Amendment of which he first gave Notice—that the Committee on the Bill be deferred for six months—he could not have supported him; because such a Motion should only be made when the speakers against a Bill had been refused a fair hearing, or when the opinion of the House had not been fairly tested. In the present case it must be admitted that every opportunity had been given to Irish Members to discuss the Bill on the second reading; but he (Mr. O'Connor) submitted that the Motion now before the House was of a different character from any which had previously been brought before it. If there was one thing more than another which was necessary in enacting these highly penal laws, it was that their provisions should be perfectly clear. It should be clearly shown to those who would come under the Act what really were their liabilities; and he ventured to say that it would take a large amount of study on the part of an ordinary Irishman—who did not trouble to closely consider all the Acts of Parliament passed on this subject of coercion—to know what he might do and what he might not do. It would be equally impossible for him to decide what control a policeman had, and how far his duties went. He was satisfied if Acts of Parliament were passed in this form they would have a state of things in Ireland which would give the Law Officers of the Crown the greatest possible trouble. He desired that the Bill now under consideration should be withdrawn, and that another measure should be introduced which should clearly lay down what powers really were to be given; and he was satisfied that if this were done it would not meet with the opposition which this Bill encountered. The hon. Member for Cavan had given Notice of another Motion which he had not pressed, and which was directed against the re-enactment of the Westmeath clauses of the Act of 1871. For his own part, he would rather support a proposal against re-enacting the Act of 1870; because, although it was in some respects less subversive of the liberties of the people, yet it was, in practice, far more irritating to the well-disposed persons in the country. He had opposed the Act of 1870 whenever its provisions came before the House, and he held that that measure had failed to carry out the objects it had in view. In order to establish this, he had only to refer to the speeches which had been made at the time that Act was passed, and what had since happened. The Bill of 1870 was not introduced in consequence of a general state of crime throughout Ireland, but because of the existence of crime in certain districts. The Chief Secretary of the day (Mr. Chichester Fortescue) himself said the Government did not rest the Bill of 1870 upon the condition of the whole of Ireland; but, on the contrary, they rested it on the condition of certain parts of Ireland, where the state of crime could not be successfully grappled with under the law as it then stood. In 1871 the noble Lord who was then Chief Secretary, and who was now the Leader of the Opposition (the Marquess of Hartington), came down to the House and proposed the appointment of a Committee, and what greater proof could they have had that the Act of 1870 had been a failure than that a year after it was passed a Committee of Inquiry had to be elected, and another Act passed to supersede it? The passing of the Westmeath Bill was clear evidence that the Act of 1870 had failed to carry out the objects for which it was introduced. That Act had subjected the loyal people of the country against whom it had been put in force to a great deal of unnecessary irritation, and it had done a great deal of mischief to innocent persons. Among other things, compensation was given to injured persons, and the amount of that compensation was levied upon those who had nothing whatever to do with the matter, and were in no way responsible for the injury. It was said truly that this was a return to the Saxon system of frankpledge, but he asked if that was any reason why, in the present state of civilization, they ought to revert to it? He should much have preferred voting in favour of a Resolution which would have condemned the Act of 1870, although he was aware there was also a great deal to be said against the Act of 1871. He was not going to argue that a case might not arise which could justify an Act such as this. He would go further, and admit that if coercive legislation was to be introduced at all, he did not know of anything which would do less harm than the power of arrest; but before they put it in force it must be shown that there was a necessity for it, and not be satisfied with dealing in general statements. Well, then, had that necessity been shown to the House? for it was the duty of the Government to make out their case. They had rested their claim upon reports they had received from the magistrates, the Clerk of the Crown, the police, and others; but was this class of evidence satisfactory? He maintained that it was not, because there was no doubt that those who had reported in favour of the Acts would like them to be continued because it rendered their duties much lighter than they would otherwise be. It was always a most unfortunate thing, but it was, nevertheless, the fact, that when measures had been forced upon a country for some years people got accustomed to them, and did not like to part with them. He, however, did not believe the House would assent to such a proposition as this without having the strongest possible evidence before them. In 1871 the Acts were passed after a Report by a Select Committee, but now there was no Report, and no sufficient evidence as to their necessity, or why they should be further prolonged? He should, therefore, vote against all the provisions of the Bill.

MR. JOHN GEORGE MACCARTHY, in opposing the Amendment, assured the House that life and property in Ireland were as dear to those who opposed the Bill as they were to those who had introduced it. To English and Scotch Members the Bill was a matter of political interest only—to Irish Members it was one of deep personal moment, and concerned their lives, their property, their families, and the future of their country. Irishmen were ready enough to admit that for sufficient reasons the Constitution might, in the interest of freedom itself, be usefully suspended; but they objected to the Government acting on mere suspicion and on secret evidence which was not laid before the House. He had declined to pledge his vote to his Colleagues or anyone else until he had had an opportunity of hearing from Her Ma-jeisty's Ministers what case they intended to make. He had had that opportunity, and he had listened to what the Government had to say. In their voice there had been a conciliatory tone which was more persuasive than eloquence itself; but this did not afford the House evidence that it was necessary to place in the hands of the Government the exceptional powers that had been demanded. That evidence either existed or it did not. If it did, why was it not laid before the House; and if it did not, how could it be said that the proposals of Her Majesty's Ministers could be reasonably maintained? So far as ordinary crime was concerned, Ireland, instead of being worse than any other part of Her Majesty's dominions, was much better. There was no evidence of conspiracy for special crime. It might be said that there was a suspicion of this; but was the Constitution to be suspended on suspicion? It was lately said by the Lord Chief Justice of England that no man—not even the humblest individual—should be convicted on suspicion. It might also be pleaded that the Government had private information; but were the liberties of the people to be whispered away? When Her Majesty's Ministers came into power, many of the Irish people had hailed their accession to office with some degree of pleasure, recognizing, as they did, the brilliant genius of the Prime Minister and the kindly spirit he had recently manifested towards them both in his speeches and his writings. They regretted, however, to find that the only boon Her Majesty's Government, after being a year in office, could present to them was a Coercion Bill. The feeling of the people of Ireland in reference to this House was that it was an alien Assembly. If the passing of the Bill depended upon Irish votes, it would not have the slightest chance of becoming law. The people of Ireland knew just as well as the Government that the majority of Irish Representatives were powerless to effect anything in that House except by leave of the British Members. They read, as hon. Members did, the comments made on that fact. They heard the observations made concerning a constitutionally elected majority of Irish Members. They heard this majority was so weak that they could not do anything to help them—that they had been described as pariahs in the House. He trusted this state of things would not always exist; that the time would come when Her Majesty's Government would not be so strong that they could afford to overlook the wishes and interests of the Irish people. He asked those in whose hands the Government of Ireland rested to use their power generously and gently, and he respectfully cautioned them that if they did not do so they would create rankling feelings of discontent.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, that having been a Member of the Westmeath Committee, he felt bound to address the House upon this matter. He considered that the Irish Members had great reason to complain of the manner in which this Bill had been introduced to the House. Last Session, when it was proposed to re-enact the four measures of coercion in the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill, the then Attorney General for Ireland (Dr. Ball) informed them that the Government had been in office for such a brief period that they had not had time to consider how many of them they should abandon, and how many they might renew in distinct Bills. The Prime Minister had given them a similar assurance, doubting at the same time if it would be necessary to retain any of them; yet here was a measure in which they were all blended into one, and a measure which originally applied only to Westmeath was insidiously extended to the whole of Ireland. He was not a man who hesitated to express his convictions, and if he thought there was the least necessity for the renewal of any one of those Acts, he would openly avow it, even though he might lose his seat in consequence of doing so; but, speaking with an intimate knowledge of the greater portion of the country, he could say that peace now reigned in Ireland. The Government ought to have inquired whether there was any necessity for continuing the Coercion Acts. The Peace Preservation Act had worked successfully in putting an end to agrarian crime, and ought now to be discontinued. It had been directed against three classes of crime: against Fenianism, against sectarian conflicts, and against agrarian crime. Fenianism was now dead in Ireland. There was nothing now heard of it there. Sectarian conflicts were confined to some portions of the Province of Ulster, and he could not see why the peaceful inhabitants of the other three provinces should be punished because of the illegal proceedings of the Orangemen in the North. In the South they lived in peace with each other, and no such thing as a party procession was ever heard of either in Cork or Limerick. He could not, in any manner, explain the grounds upon which the Government asked Parliament to give them these repressive powers. Their demand certainly received no support from the present state of the country in reference to crime. In the year 1874, there were only 216 cases of agrarian crime; but in 1869 agrarian crimes, in the shape of murders, attempted murders, firing into houses, and serious acts of that kind, numbered 1,360, and there were no fewer than 460 threatening letters. Yet it was under circumstances like these that the Government now came forward and stated that they required exceptional powers for maintaining order in Ireland, and that it was necessary that the Coercion Act should be renewed. The County of Cork was free from crime, but it had been proclaimed since the passing of the Act. The restrictions which those Acts imposed were of the most oppressive kind, and if English Members only knew what they were and how they operated, they would not be so ready to vote them as they appeared to be. He knew a gentleman who, going out for a day's shooting, had directed his servant to meet him with his gun. The man had not to carry it 50 yards to meet his master; but he was met by the police, and, as he had not a licence, the gun was taken from him. The gentleman lost his day's shooting, and could only get back his gun by writing to the Lord Lieutenant. Hon. Members might see from that one circumstance how thoroughly absurd and vexatious were Acts of this kind, for which, as he maintained, no sort of case had been made out. There never was, indeed, a case of less merit, or one less deserving the consideration of the House than that which had been submitted to it by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland, and he should give his hearty support to the Amendment.

MR. FAY observed, that it must, no doubt, be pleasant to the occupants of the Ministerial benches to sit there and say nothing whilst Irish Member after Irish Member rose to oppose the Bill. They might, if they pleased, treat their remonstrances with contempt; but that procedure would not gain for them the better feeling of the Irish people. It seemed to him a very questionable matter whether they would pursue the same policy in dealing with an English instead of an Irish question. He should support the Amendment, but from an entirely different point of view from that taken by his hon. Colleague in moving it. The object of the Amendment was a very proper one—namely, that the Bill should be so modified as to be brought into an intelligible form. All this coercive legislation for Ireland was in direct violation of the principles of constitutional government, laid down by so great an authority as Blackstone, whose writings, one would have thought, Englishmen could not so easily have forgotten. He would appeal to the Government and the House to abandon this course of coercive legislation, and relieve the people of Ireland of the stigma of being treated as incapable of being governed excepting by force of arms.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, he hoped the House would pardon him if on this occasion he did not enter at any great length into the principle of the Bill, or the reasons which had led the Government, while recommending a very considerable mitigation of the provisions of the existing law, to propose its continuance in certain particulars. He had listened to nearly the whole of this debate, and with special interest to the remarks which fell from the hon. Member for the county of Cork (Mr. Downing). He thought, however, that if that hon. Gentleman had been in his place when he addressed the House on previous occasions in reference to this measure, the hon. Member would have seen that the policy of Her Majesty's Government in this matter was one of gradual relaxation, not only in legislation but also in administration; and that he had fair reason to hope that, if the state of the county the hon. Member represented were as he had depicted it, it would before long find itself under precisely the same laws as any part of England. The hon. Member had referred to the promise made to the House last Session by the Prime Minister and the present Lord Chancellor of Ireland; but he was somewhat unfair in attributing to the Government that they had in any degree departed either from the letter or the spirit of that promise. As the House would recollect, this subject was discussed at considerable length when the Annual Continuance Bill was before the House last year. His right hon. Friend the Prime Minister then undertook that a separate Bill should be introduced this year dealing with the question, and that promise had been fully redeemed by the introduction of the present measure at an early period of the Session. The debate of that evening appeared to him to contrast somewhat unfavourably with that which took place on the second reading of the Bill. He did not complain that a debate on going into Committee had entered at great length not only into the principles of the Bill, but also into details which had far better be discussed in Committee; but he did think it was somewhat hard that their debate that evening should have been, he would not say enlivened, by a course of "readings" from Blackstone's Commentaries, from the evidence which was given before the Westmeath Committee of 1871, and from all the statutes that ever were passed on the subject of Peace Preservation in Ireland, interspersed with unusual and not very audible comments by the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar). He thought it was somewhat hard, while those on the Ministerial side of the House had given a quiet hearing to this unusual kind of debate, that they should be accused by the hon. Member who had last spoken of having treated the arguments adduced by those on his side with silent contempt, and of not having taken part in this discussion. Why, the fact was, that after speeches of four hours' duration there was no time for any one on the Ministerial side to discuss the question at all; and he must add that, in his opinion, any reply had been by no means needed, for although he had listened with attention to all that had been said that night, he had not heard one single fresh argument adduced into the debate which was not adduced and fairly met on the discussion upon the second reading of the Bill. The hon. Member for Cavan and the hon. Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) adhered to the remarkable theory that Ribbonism did not exist, at a time when a Committee of the House—the Westmeath Committee of 1871—after hearing lengthy evidence, reported that Ribbonism was never so prevalent as then in Westmeath and adjoining districts. Every shade of English and Irish opinion was represented in that Committee. That Committee unanimously reported that Ribbonism had existed in that part of Ireland for years past; that it was then more prevalent than it had ever been; that it had led to murders, and a consequent system of terrorism of the gravest description; and that it interfered not only with agrarian subjects, but with almost every relation of ordinary life. If the evidence which led the Committee to that conclusion satisfied the hon. Member for Cavan and the hon. Member for Youghal that Ribbonism did not exist, it was hopeless for him (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) to adduce any argument which was likely to meet with their assent. In reply to the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. O'Connor), who had treated this subject with fairness and moderation, he might say, as he had said before, that the reason why the Government deemed it necessary to propose a continuance of this special Westmeath Act was that they believed that Ribbonism still existed, and was only restrained from breaking out by the existing law; that they were confirmed in this belief by the opinion of the magistrates of the county, who arrived at a unanimous decision on the subject at a very largely attended meeting; by the charges given by the Judges of Assize; and also by communications of a confidential nature, which could not, therefore, be stated to the House. It was improbable in the last degree that a conspiracy so deeply and widely ramified, and so ancient in its origin, should have been entirely extinguished by an Act which had lasted four years. The Government, therefore, felt it their duty, taking all these circumstances, and others to which he need not then allude, into consideration, to propose, for the limited period of two years, a continuance of this Act. He need hardly dwell upon the restrictions upon the possession of arms. The hon. Member for the county of Londonderry (Mr. R. Smyth) admitted most fairly that in the North of Ireland, with which, of course, he was best acquainted, the restrictive provisions with regard to the possession of arms were absolutely necessary. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) ventured to say no one could charge the Government with having administered those restrictive provisions with any unfair bias towards any part of Ireland. The hon. Member for Londonderry seemed to advise the Government to substitute for this kind of legislation some sort of remedial measure. The hon. Member appeared to want a new Land Act. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) did not wish to discuss the advisability of such a measure; but he would remind the House that the existing Land Act of which the hon. Member spoke so highly was passed in 1870, and was followed in 1871 by such a crop of agrarian outrages that the Parliament of the day thought it necessary to pass the Westmeath Act to which he so strongly objected. That did not encourage the belief that, if the measure now before the House were dispensed with, a new Land Act would suffice to secure peace and good order in Ireland. It was not necessary to dwell at length upon the arguments which had been adduced on the other side of the House, many of them relating to points which might be fairly discussed in Committee, and others having been already met in the debate on the second reading of this Bill. The hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) had placed upon the Paper a Motion dealing not only with the merits of part of the measure, but also with the form in which the Bill had been presented to the House. Upon consideration, the hon. Member had thought it wise merely to bring forward that part of his Motion which dealt with the latter question; and he had listened carefully, but in vain, to the speech of the hon. Member for any defence of his proposal. He had no wish to excuse the Government by casting any blame upon the draftsman, who was responsible merely for putting into shape the intentions of the Government. Those who presented the Bill to the House were alone properly responsible for the form in which it was presented, and in reference to the present measure he took upon himself all the responsibility. If it were a new measure, or one for consolidating the law, there would be some force in the objections which had been taken; but, as a matter of fact, the Bill was simply one to amend and continue portions of existing Acts. The Government, in adopting what he must admit to be the somewhat involved provisions of one clause of the Bill, had simply followed the example set by their Predecessors in a section of the Act of 1873—a course which was rendered absolutely incumbent upon them by the fact that the Bill was one for continuance only. If hon. Members would turn to those points in which it was proposed to mitigate the existing law, or to repeal those parts of it which it was not thought necessary to re-enact, they would find the Bill clear and simple enough. When the hon. Member for Londonderry spoke of a skeleton schedule to steal away the liberties of Ireland, he made use of exaggerated language which was rather to be expected from below the Gangway than from the place which the hon. Member occupied in the House. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members might interrupt; but he thought he remembered having heard very similar expressions from the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) in the debate on the second reading of the Bill. He would remind the hon. Member who had used the expressions he had just quoted that the schedule contained nothing that could steal away the liberties of Ireland, but simply consisted of the titles of the sections of the existing Coercion Acts which it was proposed by the Bill to repeal. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) had Amendments upon the Paper which would again raise the question of drafting; but, as the Amendments were intended for Committee, he would not attempt to discuss them until that stage was reached. Upon the whole question before the House, he would say that no one had any desire to stop the free expression of Irish opinion upon a matter so important to Ireland. The course of the debate that evening and upon the second reading showed pretty fairly that when hon. Members from Ireland had anything to urge upon the attention of the House, the House was ready to listen to them, however much it disagreed from their opinions. There had been circumstances in the early portion of the debate that evening which made him express a hope that the readiness with which the House had listened to those expressions of opinion might not be taken unfair advantage of by hon. Members opposite. The House had listened, he was sure, with the greatest pleasure to the able and attractive speech with which the hon. and learned Member for Limerick concluded the debate on his side on the second reading, and he was confident that to similar speeches the House would always be ready to listen. Many Amendments appeared on the Paper to be discussed in Committee — some of them conflicting with the principle of the Bill, and therefore of a kind which the Government could not possibly adopt; perhaps to others they might be able to yield a ready assent; but he was convinced that all would be discussed fairly by the House, and that the arguments in their support would be treated with all the attention they deserved. Therefore, he asked hon. Members opposite whether they did not think they had already debated at sufficient length the general principle of the measure; and whether they would not do more real service to the country they represented, and more justice to the views which they held, by allowing the measure now before the House to be dealt with in the ordinary business-like manner, and, without further debate, arriving at a decision upon the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair?

CAPTAIN NOLAN drew attention to the fact that the Proposer and Seconder of the Amendment had finished their speeches at a quarter past 10, two hours ago, and if hon. Gentlemen disputed that he should recommend them to take a glass of the beverage which the Prime Minister advised them to take a few nights ago. The English Members did not like to get up and propose a Coercion Bill for Ireland; but some Irish Members of the Government did. They knew that this was not a popular measure in every part of Ireland; but they could hardly be dragged in to support it with their speeches. He made an exception in favour of the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) and his Colleagues; but the reason why they spoke was a very simple one. Their constituents were exclusive men, men who had got their degree of M.A., and they were a class representation — a class drawn from educated men; but the very fact that the Members for the University of Dublin were generally opposed to the wish of the population of Ireland was, he thought, the strongest argument that could be adduced against class representation of any sort or kind. The right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland had told them that no promises were broken, and that their Amendments would be fairly discussed in Committee. He (Captain Nolan) should like to know which of the promises to the Irish Members had been kept by the Government. He should like to know where was the Municipal Privilege Bill which they were promised last year should be passed. Several Irish Members on the other side of the House objected to that Bill, and although the House of Commons kept their promise, it was broken in the House of Lords, who rejected the measure. He totally denied that this Bill was a relaxation. He said it was the worst Bill ever introduced by any Government. He acknowledged that some of its provisions were a little advantage; but anything conceded in the shape of relaxation was more than made up by the extended duration of the Bill. The county constituencies received no benefit whatever under this Bill. The Chief Secretary had no right to bring in any measure which was to take away their liberties. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had told them that there were in England 116,586 10s. gun licences, while in Ireland there were 3,578; but if the licences in Ireland were in proportion to the population, there ought to be in that country 25,000, so that there were upwards of 20,000 fewer guns in the possession of Irish farmers than there ought to be as compared with the number held in England. According to the statistics given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, only one man in Ireland held a gun licence to six in England. This was a real grievance, and when the Irish Members went amongst their constituencies this sort of irritation was continually cropping up, and it would be a running sore throughout the whole country. When a free American landed in Ireland a stranger, he found that he was subject to a deprivation which was generally connected with slavery. History had recorded that the great difference between free men and slaves was that one was supposed to have free possession of arms, and the other was studiously deprived of them. How could the Government ask the people to rise en masse to fight for them when they had been deprived of arms, and would naturally plead that they were unacquainted with the use of them? Supposing the country had to pay a war contribution like France, the people who had been deprived of arms would naturally say—"Let the rich pay the whole contribution; why should we pay any share of it?" Again, might they not object, when they were deprived of acquiring facilities of defence, to pay even towards the armament of the nation. He admitted that the Government might annoy and irritate the Irish people with perfect safety, but the danger was this—that when they attacked the Irish people very hard, a certain percentage of those evils would always fall upon the English people. It could hardly be argued that the possession of arms arose out of a passion for game. In every age and every country they had seen the passion for game pushing on the privileged classes. This Peace Preservation Bill, so far as it was backed up by the Irish magistrates, arose very largely from a wish for game, and it was good for the keepers to have one gun instead of five or six. In the last debate the strictures made by the Irish Members on crime in England were taken rather hardly. They did not say, however, that crime in England was greater than that of the ordinary civilized nations of Europe, but that crime in England was less than that of Belgium, and that in Ireland it was less than in England. And although this was proved to be the case from statistics which could be regarded as trustworthy, it was proposed to re-enact a degrading law against the country in which crime was at a minimum.

MR. O'LEARY moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. O'Leary.)

MR. DISRAELI said, he hoped that after the debate of this evening, and the manner in which the Bill had been discussed upon the second reading, hon. Gentlemen would think it consistent with their duty to go into Committee. He observed that it was the same hon. Gentleman who moved the adjournment of the debate to-night that had moved the adjournment on a former occasion. That showed that the experience the hon. Gentleman had obtained by his former Motion had had some effect in improving his Parliamentary management. He hoped he might be as successful in the appeal which he now made to the hon. Gentleman to re-consider his Motion as he had been before. If the House went into Committee, they would not proceed with the Bill to-night; but it would advance the course of business without having recourse to any of those extreme measures which he did not think desirable, but which the state of the Public Business might require. If the hon. Gentleman would withdraw his Motion, and allow them to go into Committee, they should be able on Monday at the usual and authentic hour to proceed with the Committee, fresh and eager; and their progress would perhaps be satisfactory to both sides. He had not himself listened to the whole of the debate; but that portion of it which he had heard had been sustained on one side at least with considerable interest. He was far from not admiring the mode in which Members from Ireland were conducting things. He did not share some of the objections which had been made even to the remarkable speech of the hon. Member who opened the debate. He had heard there was some originality about it. But the hon. Member for Cavan might, he thought, be content with what he had done to-night, for his speech was longer than the speech De Coroná or Pro Milone, or any other of the great speeches that had come down to us. Hon. Gentlemen on the other side had had the whole evening for advocating their views, and though, as his right hon. Friend had stated, they might not have brought forward new arguments, they had had the immense advantage of repeating their views and increasing the impression which those views were calculated to make. He hoped, therefore, hon. Gentlemen would not insist on proceeding with the Motion for adjournment.

MAJOR O'GORMAN said, he should vote for the adjournment in order to give English Members an opportunity of speaking.

MR. BIGGAR said, he thought it desirable the debate should be adjourned, as a large number of Irish Members still wished to speak on the subject. He would never be put down by ridicule. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government some time ago told the House an absurd story about Prince Bismarck, and said it was not to that Prince he had referred in his Guildhall speech. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER reminded the hon. Member that the Question was that the debate be adjourned.

MR. BIGGAR observed, that the right hon. Gentleman did not tell them who he did mean in that speech.

MR. O'CONOR POWER joined in the complaints that had been made by other Irish Members that Members opposite had maintained silence during the debate, and regarded that as another Irish grievance. He should support the Motion for the adjournment of the debate.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON suggested that if the Members for Ireland objected to the debate being then concluded the House might be asked to sit somewhat later than usual in order to finish it. The speech of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) was a very remarkable one. Had such a speech been delivered from the other side of the House, or even from behind the front Opposition bench, it would have been received in a very different manner. But as it was, that speech was listened to with the greatest patience and the greatest consideration. He thought, therefore, the Irish Members should make some concession on their part, and endeavour to finish the debate that evening.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he had no objection to the debate being continued to a later hour on condition that some Member of the Cabinet should proceed to address the House. The grievance of the Irish Members was that the Government had refused to make out a case for the Coercion Bill.

MR. SULLIVAN, referring to a remark which fell from the noble Marquess, assured the House that the hon. Member for Cavan had spoken as he did, not from any pre-arrangement with other Irish Members, but totally on his own responsibility, and without having given them any previous intimation that he intended to address the House at such length.

MR. BUTT regretted the necessity for adjourning; but as several Irish Members had not yet been afforded an opportunity of explaining their objections to the measure, he should certainly support the Motion for adjournment. On the occasion of the introduction of the last Irish Coercion Bill there was a debate extending over 11 nights, and on the tenth evening the strongest speech against the measure was made by the present Prime Minister. That fact reminded him of one of the most interesting incidents in political history; for in the Life of Lord George Bentinck the author called attention to the Nemesis which befell Sir Robert Peel at the very time when the message came down that the Bill for the Repeal of the Corn Laws had passed the House of Lords.

Question put.

The House divided: — Ayes 63; Noes 245: Majority 182.

Original Question again proposed.

MAJOR O'GORMAN: Sir, I beg to move the adjournment of the House. The last time I spoke here I spoke in irony, but I do not do so now. I beg leave to acquaint the House, and to inform the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, that, if the liberties of my country are to be destroyed by a despotic and insolent majority, those liberties shall die hard.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn." — (Mr. O'Gorman.)

MR. DISRAELI: After the tragic address of the hon. Gentleman, I really do not think that the House would be in a condition to pursue this debate properly, and therefore I assent to the adjournment of the debate if the hon. Gentleman will alter his Motion according to the Form of the House.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

Debate adjourned till Monday next.

SHERIFF COURTS (SCOTLAND) (No. 2) BILL—SUMMARY PROSECUTIONS APPEALS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE LORD ADVOCATE, in moving for leave to bring in the two following Bills—a "Bill to alter and amend the Law relating to the administration of Justice in ordinary Civil Causes in the Sheriff Courts in Scotland," and a "Bill to alter and amend the Law relating to Appeals in Summary Prosecutions before inferior Judges in Scotland"—said: I have to ask the indulgence of the House while I make a brief statement of certain points which I consider it to be right that the public and the legal profession should have in mind when considering the provisions of these Bills. In 1868, when the present Prime Minister was in office, a Royal Commission was issued for the purpose of inquiring into the constitution and jurisdiction of the various Courts, civil and criminal, in Scotland. The Commissioners examined many witnesses during the next two years, and after having issued some interim Reports, they issued their final Report in July 1870. The result of their investigations and Reports was favourable to the procedure before the Court of Session. It had been made the subject of legislation in an Act passed in 1868 which I had the honour to introduce, and I believe that the opinion of the public and of the profession generally is that there is no immediate call for further legislation in regard to the procedure in the Court of Session; and I venture to say there is no Court in the United Kingdom in which there is less delay in obtaining a decision on the merits of a cause than in that Court. But the proceedings before the sheriff courts call for immediate improvement. The object of the first Bill is to effect such improvement in the direction of the recommendations of the Commissioners. I wish to explain why the Bill is limited to the proceedings in the ordinary civil court of the sheriff. I consider that to embrace in one Bill all the points connected with the sheriff court would make the Bill too large, and that there might be much difficulty in passing it through Parliament this Session. The Bill is, therefore, confined to the jurisdiction and procedure in the ordinary sheriff courts in Scotland, and does not deal with the small debt or other courts not coming within the ordinary civil jurisdiction of the sheriff. These will form the subject of legislation hereafter. The Law Courts Commissioners recommend that the sheriff should have power to appoint tutors and curators, factors loco tutoris and judicial factors, where the value of the estate, heritable and movable, is sworn not to exceed £1,000, and that the officers, when appointed, should be under the superintendence of the Accountant of Court. I have given much consideration to this recommendation, and am desirous, if possible, to give effect to it; but I have ascertained that there may be various practical difficulties which must be overcome before proposals giving effect to these recommendations can be laid before Parliament. I do not, therefore, intend to deal with these appointments in the present Bill; but another Bill will be required for the purpose of making some improvements with reference to proceedings before the Accountant of Court and also for extending his powers to judicial factors, and in that Bill, or it may be by Amendments in this Bill, I hope to give effect to the recommendation of the Commissioners to which I have just alluded. The Commissioners recommended that there should be an extension of the jurisdiction of the sheriff courts, by allowing them to judge in regard to titles and rights to heritable or real property—matters which are not at present within their powers. In most countries rights of real property have been reserved for the jurisdiction of the superior courts; but in the County Courts of England power has been given to the Judges in these courts, I believe, to entertain questions involving real property of the yearly value of £20, and I think the same power is vested in the Civil Bill Courts of Ireland. I propose that the sheriff courts in Scotland should have power to entertain cases involving real property of the value of £1,000, being about double the value admitted in England and Ireland. The defender may remove the litigation at the outset to the Court of Session, subject to the provision that even if successful in his defence he shall not recover a larger amount of expenses than that to which he would have been entitled if the litigation had proceeded in the sheriff court. The procedure clauses of the Bill follow the provisions of the Court of Session Act of 1868, which have given satisfaction and expedition in that court, and it is hoped may put an end to the considerable delays which exists in most of the sheriff courts. The second Bill which I move for leave to introduce is one in accordance with the English—Jervis and other—Acts, which permit appeals from Justices of the Peace and stipendiary magistrates on points of law submitted in a case approved of by the magistrate in regard to the facts held to be proved by him, and it also allows a case to be prepared by a magistrate before whom a summary case has been brought, when he feels a difficulty in disposing of the case, or when there are conflicting decisions before other jurisdictions. This measure is also in accordance with the opinions of the Law Commissioners, and will be of advantage in cases where ordinary appeals at present are excluded, and will remove the unpleasant state of matters which exists when opposite opinions, as is sometimes the case, are given upon the construction of the same Act. When the law is laid down by the Supreme Court, in such cases there will be a rule for the guidance of sheriffs and magistrates, and the same decision will be expected to be followed by inferior Judges.

MR. KINNAIRD asked when the Sheriff Courts Bill would be read a second time?

PRIVILEGE.

LORD DENMAN called the attention of the House to a portion of the Protest against the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, which complained that at least one of their Lordships had been unfairly reported. He complained that a quotation made by him on the second reading of the Act for amending that Act on 6th June, 1874, from a speech of the noble and learned Lord now on the Woolsack (a copy of which quotation he had directed to be given to one of the reporters in the Gallery) had been placed in The Times as a portion of his speech, which deprived the opinion of the noble and learned Lord (Lord Cairns), then a Lord Justice of Appeal, of the weight which the first impression, as to any substitution for the House of Lords, would have made on the minds of their Lordships. The speech in The Times of June 6th, 1874, was never made as his own by him (Lord Denman). He was glad that these remarks were made in that House, when few Peers were present; but it was impossible for him to overlook the unfairness with which the debates on this subject were reported. He was indifferent as to being reported at all, but must call attention to the incorrectness which he had pointed out.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE ACT (1873) AMENDMENT (No. 2) BILL.

(The Lord Chancellor.)

(NO. 48.) COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

LORD DENMAN said, that the inserting the Rules in the Bills instead of laying them (as was at first proposed) on the Table of both Houses of Parliament made Amendments possible, whilst if merely laid on the Table like the schemes for schools, they could only have been rejected altogether if disapproved of. He (Lord Denman) considered the Question of having only Scotch and Irish appeals in this House and excluding English appeals, could only be altered by a vote initiated in this House, and he believed that the mere suspension of the Act of 1873 was not sufficient. He had prepared Amendments to the 2nd clause and to the original Act, but would not press them to a division. He quoted also from Boswell's Life of Johnson—

“‘A reflection having been thrown out against four Peers for having risen in opposition to the opinion of the twelve Judges of the House of Lords as if that were indecent. Dr. Johnson said, Sir, there is no ground for censure—the Peers are Judges themselves; and supposing them really to be of a different opinion, they might from duty be in opposition to the Judges who were there only to be consulted.’ In this conversation his biographer fully concurred with him for (he said) unquestionably the Peers are vested with the highest judicial powers, and when they understand a cause, are not obliged, nay ought not, to acquiesce in the opinion of the ordinary Law Judges, or, even in that of those who from their studies and experience are called the Law Lords. He considered the Peers in general as he did a jury who ought to listen with respectful attention to the sages of the law; but if after hearing them they have a firm opinion of their own, are bound as honest men to decide accordingly. Nor is it so difficult for them to understand even law questions as is generally thought, provided they will bestow sufficient attention upon them. This observation was made by Boswell's honoured relation Lord Cathcart, who had spent his life in courts and camps yet assured him, that he could form a clear opinion upon most of the cases which came before the House of Lords, ‘as they were so well enucleated in the cases.’”

And with regard to the Appellate Jurisdiction, he (Lord Denman) expressed his opinion that there were abundant materials for an efficient Court of Appeal in their Lordships' House.

EARL GRANVILLE: I rise, not for the purpose of renewing the debate of last Friday, nor of delaying the Bill—I merely wish to offer an apology, and to give explanations as to certain facts. I have learnt, from the usual sources of information, that the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack complained—very good-humouredly complained—of my not having waited for his reply to a speech I made at the beginning of Friday evening. I might plead some circumstances in mitigation of my offence. I am not an old offender. After the noble and learned Lord, and the noble Duke the Leader of the Government, I may perhaps compare not unfavourably with many Members of your Lordships' House in the frequency and persistency of my attendance. I might urge that although I made an attack upon the Government for the withdrawal of the Bill, I showed a strong and sincere appreciation of what the noble and learned Lord had done up to that moment. I was replied to in two consecutive speeches by the noble Lord the Chairman of our Committees, one of the ablest debaters in the House, but also by the Secretary of State for India. I observed that, notwithstanding the great patience of the noble and learned Lord, he showed, perhaps unconsciously, by a very expressive pantomime, how tired and bored he was with the debate, which, by-the-by, entirely left the points on which my speech turned. And, lastly, I might observe that the absence of opponents did not appear to be a difficulty in the way in which the noble and learned Lord recapitulated our arguments and replied to them. But I admit that I was in the wrong, and accordingly offer my apologies to the noble and learned Lord. Having done this, I may be allowed not to refer to arguments used by us, or the replies to them, but to certain matters of fact. I mentioned in debate that although I could not previously tell whether any or many of my political Friends had been converted by the canvassing in and out of the House on the subject, I was glad to find that they had numerously come up in answer to a summons to support the Bill on going into Committee. The noble and learned Lord is reported to have flatly contradicted me—to have said that he could not see in the House the numerous hosts I had mentioned, and to have said that on one side of the House there were not 10 men on whom reliance could have been placed to support the Bill. I do not know on what authority that assertion was made. It happens that although we were not informed of the postponement of the noble Duke (the Duke of Buccleugh's) Amendment on the day when it was settled, in which case we could have spared several of our Friends the inconvenience of coming to town. One of those noble Lords who undertake honourable and useful service respectively for both sides of the House learnt the fact on the afternoon of the day, and posted it at a Liberal Club. The result was that several Peers did not come to Westminster, and others went to hear a debate of a sensational character "elsewhere." But, notwithstanding these defections, your Lordships would like to know whether there were or were not more than 10 Peers ready to support the Bill. A list is always kept by the Clerks of the Table of the number of Peers who attend each day. On that day there were 12 Peers who almost always vote with us, and of these the noble Lord to whom I have alluded assures me that there were only six of those present who would have voted against the Bill. I believe his statement to be perfectly correct, but even if there were double that number, what becomes of the quotation of 10 made by the noble Lord? There was another fact on which they were agreed, but the inference of the noble and learned Lord that the small number of Peers on the night of the withdrawal of the Bill showed a want of interest in the Bill was extraordinary. For the complaint made by him (Lord Granville) had been that the Bill was withdrawn without Notice, and that only three Peers on his side of the House knew that a statement was to be made, and none knew that that statement was to end in the withdrawal of the Bill. I was unwilling to leave your Lordships under the impression that I had made an inaccurate statement. But the matter is now over, and all that I desire to contribute is to the object which the noble and learned Lord has in view—the best possible means of securing the administration of justice.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I can assure the noble Earl that I accept with the utmost sincerity the apology which he has thought it necessary to offer for his absence during my remarks on the second reading of this Bill; but I must say, that as far as I was concerned, no apology was necessary. With reference to what I said about the attendance of noble Lords on the Opposition side of the House, the noble Earl misconceived my intended reference. I alluded not to the day when the former Bill was withdrawn, but to the day when the Amendment was to have been moved by the noble Duke (the Duke of Buccleuch) for retaining the Appellate Jurisdiction of this House; and certainly on this latter occasion I did not see 10 Peers on the Opposition side on whose votes I could have relied in opposition to that Amendment. Until I heard the explanation of the noble Earl, of course I did not know there was a reason why a larger number of the noble Lords who sit on that side were not then in their places.

LORD SELBORNE desired to give Notice that on the Report of the Amendments, he would enter at large into a vindication of the Judicature Bill of 1873, and of his reasons for declining to be a party to the 2nd section of this Bill, which suspended the operation of certain portions of that Act, and the 4th section, which provided for the constitution of the intermediate Court of Appeal. He would say "Not-Content" to those clauses; but as he did not wish to increase the difficulties in the way of his noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor), he would not divide the Committee.

House in Committee.

Clauses 1 to 3, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Constitution of Court of Appeal).

LORD COLERIDGE said, that while the scheme of an Intermediate Court of Appeal was unobjectionable under the circumstances in which his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack was placed by their Lordships' decision last year, he thought the proposal in the clause to remove from the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council two out of its four paid Members was open to objection. At present the Judicial Committee worked extremely well, and its decisions were received with general satisfaction. This was owing in no small degree to the fact that the Committee gave a great deal of time to the discharge of its duties, and that the paid Members were enabled to devote their undivided attention to the great questions which came before the Committee. But the effect of this clause would be to remove two of those Members from the Committee by making them two of the ordinary Members of the Court of Appeal to be constituted by the clause. He was aware of the Amendment which his noble and learned Friend intended to move with the view of compensating the Judicial Committee for the loss of those two Members. His noble and learned Friend intended to propose that one or more of the Lords Justices of the Court of Chancery might attend the sittings of that Committee. But it must be borne in mind that the two Lords Justices were to be Members of the Intermediate Court of Appeal which this clause would constitute. This Court would have to discharge a very large amount of business, and to this Court more than any other we should have to look for the moulding of the Judicature Act of 1873, and the bringing of it into good working order. Was it well, therefore, to weaken this Court by imposing on two of its Members the performance of duties on the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council? Perhaps this arrangement was forced on his noble and learned Friend; but even if that were so he could not but suggest to his noble and learned Friend that it was open to great objection. It was unadvisable to take two of the paid Members from the Judicial Committee, and the Amendment by which in compensation two Members would be taken from the ordinary Judges of the Court of Appeal provided by this Bill, only made matters worse. Without wishing to weigh Judges, he must express his opinion that the Lords Justices would bring great weight to the intermediate Court; and, therefore, he should regard it as unfortunate if their services were removed from that Court to anything like a large extent. He believed that his noble and learned Friend, like many members of the legal profession, thought that three Members were sufficient for such a Court of Appeal. His noble and learned Friend was, perhaps, somewhat misled on that point by his great and fortunate Equity experience. The Appeal Judges in the Court of Chancery were usually men of great judicial eminence; but it was not to be expected that another Court of Appeal could count on men of such eminence. Again, while in the Court of Chancery the appeal was from a single Judge to three Judges of great ability, in the Court under this Bill the appeal would be from an equal number of Judges, who—without wishing to weigh Judges—he might say would be of as great eminence as the Judges of Appeal themselves. Nay, more, the appeal to the Court under this Bill might be from two Courts; and it would not be satisfactory to have such an appeal reversed by a tribunal only equal in number to one of those Courts. Neither the Judges nor the Profession would be satisfied with the decisions of a tribunal such as his noble and learned Friend proposed to constitute, if he weakened the number of its Members in the way proposed. He should be glad that his noble and learned Friend could see his way to making a rule that in the Intermediate Court of Appeal there should be some Judges sitting from the Common Law side of the High Court and some Judges from the Equity side of the High Court. He disbelieved in the fusion of Law and Equity. He believed that Law and Equity were quite distinct; but he thought they might be concurrently administered, and he hoped they would be. He would call attention to one other point. In the Act appointing the four paid Members of the Judicial Committee it was provided that their services should be placed at the disposal of the State for any "Supreme Court of Appeal," which might be established. Now the Appeal Court constituted by this Bill was not a Supreme Court. The paid Members of the Judicial Committee did not complain of the proposal of his noble and learned Friend, nor did it enter his head to charge either the Government or his noble and learned Friend with anything like a breach of faith; but those right hon. and learned Gentlemen, while leaving the matter with Parliament, did think at the time of the passing of the Act under which they were constituted it was not contemplated that they should be called upon to give their services on any but a Supreme Court of Appeal. He asked his noble and learned Friend to look into this matter and consider the circumstances under which the paid Members of the Judicial Committee were appointed. He asked no more. The only object he could see for proposing to appoint those gentlemen Members of the Intermediate Court was to save expense. When he was in the House of Commons he had never shown a disposition to increase the public expenditure; but he was sure that the House of Commons would grudge no expenditure which might be necessary for the due administration of justice.

LORD HATHERLEY thought the intermediate Court should be made as strong as possible, with the view of diminishing the probability of cases being carried further; and he could not impress too strongly on their Lordships the necessity of having in that Court a strong infusion of both Equity and Law. The inconvenience of the present division was never more manifested than in an appeal that had come before this House during the present Session. It was a case in which the money at stake was as much as £40,000; but the question whether the person claiming had the right to receive the £40,000 never came before their Lordships' House at all. The question before the House was whether that person ought to have applied to a Court of Law or to a Court of Equity. He had applied to a Court of Equity, and their Lordships' House decided that he ought to have applied to a Court of Law. The last point referred to by his noble and learned Friend (Lord Coleridge) was worthy the consideration of his noble and learned Friend who had charge of the Bill. He had not then before him the Act appointing the four paid Members of the Judicial Committee, but he believed that it contained pretty nearly these words:—"To hold their office subject to any arrangement which Parliament may make for the constitution of a Supreme Court of Appeal."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was very anxious that the Court should be constituted in such a manner as to be as strong and efficient as possible, and his noble and learned Friend (Lord Coleridge) was right in treating this clause as the most important part of the Bill. He would discuss the constitution of the intermediate Court without reference to individuals—he preferred to speak of offices rather than of the persons who filled them. It was a mistake to say that this Bill proposed to constitute any Court distinct from the Court constituted by the Act of 1873. It took the Act of 1873, and it took what in that Act was the Supreme Court of Appeal, and it proposed to curtail the number of the Members which was to constitute that Court. By the second section of this Bill, the portion of the Act of 1873 which made the Appeal Court constituted under that Act a Supreme Court of Appeal was postponed:—the question of the Supreme Court stood over; but in all other respects the Appeal Court, the constitution of which was dealt with by this fourth section, was the Court of the Act of 1873. Instead of following the Act of 1873 and saying there should be no further appeal, that provision of the Act was left in suspense; and as that suspension made the Court of the Bill of 1873 an intermediate one, it was proposed by this Bill that it should be constituted of a smaller number. The clause provided that the Court should consist of five ex officio and five ordinary Judges. The ex officio members were to be the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls, and the three Chiefs of the Common Law Courts. The ordinary or permanent members were to be the two Lords Justices of Appeal in Chancery, two of the salaried members of the Judicial Committee, and one other person to be appointed by letters patent. In consequence of the abolition of the Exchequer Chamber and of the regulation by which a smaller number of the Common Law Judges could sit in banco, the three Chiefs thought that each of them would be able to sit in the Court of Appeal for not less than six weeks in each year, and the Master of the Rolls thought he would be able to sit for the same period. That gave 24 weeks for the ex officio members, not counting the Lord Chancellor. He thought, therefore, the judicial strength of the Court of Appeal might be regarded as equal to six members always ready to attend. Not fewer than three were to sit in appeal for final decrees, and two at least were to sit for the hearing of appeals in which only interlocutory decrees were sought. He did not want to revive the discussion of the question of what was the best number of members for a Court of Final Appeal; but it had always seemed to him that the choice lay between three and five. The late Lord Kingsdown had the strongest possible opinion that the best number was three; and he said that when he found three sitting in the House of Lords he thought it better not to add to their number by sitting himself. He might observe to their Lordships that the business in which interlocutory orders would be required came almost exclusively from the Court of Chancery, and in that Court it was found that two Judges were quite sufficient to deal with it. Here he might observe that while he hoped there would be in the Appeal Court always a sufficient number of Judges who were conversant with Equity and a sufficient number who were conversant with Law, and while that matter might be the subject of arrangement, no notice of such arrangement could be made in the Bill, because to make it the subject of legislative provision would be to again draw the line of demarcation between Law and Equity. As to taking two of the paid Members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, it would be most gratifying to himself personally not to interfere with the Judicial Committee in any way; but the question was one of obligation towards the public—obligation to make use of the materials at command. He put aside for the moment the question raised on the Act of Parliament appointing the salaried Members of that Committee, and he assumed that they would assent to their being made members of the new Court of Appeal; and he calculated that by giving the Judicial Committee the services of one or more of the Lords Justices, when their services were not required in the Court of Appeal, the business both of the Judicial Committee and of the Court of Appeal might be efficiently performed on the plan proposed in the Bill. He was desirous that next Session, when Parliament came to consider the question of the tribunal which ought to be charged with the hearing of final appeals, Parliament should have four salaried Judicial Officers unaffected by the provisions of this Bill. The object held in view in respect of these officers was that next year Parliament should have before it four great salaried Officers who might be utilized in carrying out whatever Parliament might decide upon. If Parliament decided to strengthen the Court of Appeal and make it the ultimate Court of Appeal, these four Officers would be available for that purpose. If Parliament should look elsewhere and propose to rest the responsibility of deciding appeals in the last resort in some other direction, and should require the appointment of salaried Officers for the purpose, there, again, would be four regular salaried Officers available. That was the object he had in view in leaving these four Officers intact. The only other observation he had to make was in reference to the proposal in the Bill to call on the several Members of the Judicial Committee to give their services to this Court of Appeal. He wished to speak upon this point with the greatest respect—the most tender respect—to the feelings of those eminent persons the salaried Members of the Judicial Committee. Some of them had long been his personal friends, and nothing would grieve him more than that he should be the means of making any proposal not agreeable to them. The Judicature Commission had, in fact, suggested the constitution of the Appellate Court, appeal from that Court being left to the House of Lords, as before. In 1873, Parliament provided for a Supreme Court. It provided, further, that one branch of that Court should have Appellate Jurisdiction, and that was the Court of Appeal spoken of in the present Bill, although it was not composed of the same number of members. He was bound to say that, according to the letter of the Act of Parliament, Parliament had called on these learned persons to afford their services to this Court of Appeal.

LORD SELBORNE said, on the present occasion he would not take the responsibility of proposing any Motion bearing on the constitution of the proposed Court, but he must say he quite sympathized with the eminent persons, the salaried Members of the Judicial Committee, to whom reference had been made, in their feeling, that the position in which it was now proposed to place two of them was different from that to which they had been led to look forward. At the same time, he could not say that he had himself at any time taken the view, that the Supreme Court of Appellate Jurisdiction in which, under the Act which regulated their appointments, they would be liable to be called upon to serve, must, upon the mere construction of the words of that Act, necessarily be one, from which no further appeal would lie to the House of Lords. But the Lords Justices were already members of the Judicial Committee, though not salaried members; and they already gave such assistance to the discharge of the business of that tribunal as was compatible with their other duties. He did not, therefore, think the Amendment with regard to the Lords Justices was necessary.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that, after mature consideration, it appeared to him convenient to make the provision contained in the Bill. He would, however, move, as an Amendment, the omission of lines 8 to 11 in Clause 4 in order to insert the following:—

“One or more of the Lords Justices of Appeal shall, as far as may be necessary, and as far as the state of business in the Court of Appeal may admit, attend the sittings of the Judicial Committee.”

LORD DENMAN thought their Lordships ought to consider the matter well before they abolished the Intermediate Courts of Appeal—namely, the Lords Justices Court and the Exchequer Chamber.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 5 to 15, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 16 (Rules in Schedule in substitution for 36 & 37 Vict. c. 66 s. 69 and Schedule).

LORD WINMARLEIGH wished to call attention to the clause, which it seemed to him was calculated to inflict serious injury on the county which he lately had the honour of representing (Lancaster). The Court of Common Pleas in Lancaster was a superior Court, possessing the same jurisdiction and authority as the Courts at Westminster. In the Judicature Act of 1873, Section 78, expressly reserved to the Court of Common Pleas of Lancaster all the privileges and rights it enjoyed at that time—for the simple reason, he believed, that the processes were much less costly than in the Courts in Westminster Hall. But the 16th section of this Bill would authorize new Rules contained in the Schedule that would abolish the rights and privileges reserved to the Court of Common Pleas of Lancaster by the Judicature Act of 1873. He had been requested to submit to their Lordships that it was not just to abolish those rights and privileges.

LORD SELBORNE said, with reference to the Rules, that nothing could be more inconvenient than for Parliament to review in detail the work of the Judges; but he still thought that more adequate provision ought to be made by this Bill for the local business of the County Palatine of Lancaster. The case of the Court of Common Pleas of Lancaster was as followed. It was in substance already a branch of the Superior Courts at Westminster, the Judges being the Judges of Assize, while appeals could be made to the Courts at Westminster on questions of law. But the local procedure was found sufficient for all the ordinary actions tried in that Court. That procedure with great facility enabled the local practitioners, without coming to London or employing London agents, to carry through the pleadings and preliminary proceedings, and to go on with the proceedings after judgment. The Act of 1873 contained ample power to continue the facilities referred to by the noble Lord opposite; and, in the two or three first drafts of the Rules made under that Act, exceptional provision was made for that purpose; but, in the final settlement of those Rules, the words relating to the Court of Common Pleas of Lancaster had been omitted; so that, under those Rules, an action commenced in the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster might, at the option of any one of the litigants, be removed from that Court to the Courts at Westminster; and all proceedings for discovery and interpleader, and all taxations of costs and other proceedings after judgment, might have to be taken in London. He hoped the noble and learned Lord on the Wool-sack would consider this matter before the Bill passed and communicate with the Judges, and it would be satisfactory to learn that he had been able to propose a modification which would in substance preserve to the inhabitants of the County Palatine the same facilities for local procedure which they had hitherto enjoyed.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, the preservation of this jurisdiction to the Court at Lancaster was desirable not merely for the convenience of practitioners, but for the interests of the commercial community.

LORD HATHERLEY said, he was as much opposed as anyone to the granting of privileges to one portion of the public which would not be enjoyed by the rest of the public; nevertheless, as experience had shown that these facilities for local procedure had worked well, he hoped the people of the County Palatine would have continued and secured to them the advantages they appeared to have had under the Act of 1873.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the view taken of the 73rd clause of the Act of 1873 by his noble Friend (Lord Winmarleigh) was that it left intact the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster in the position in which it stood previous to the passing of that Act. That clause he (the Lord Chancellor) thought did nothing of the kind. It merely took notice of the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster and certain officers connected therewith, and of certain rules for its procedure under Act of Parliament; and transferred to the body of Judges appointed under the Act of 1873, the power of making Rules for the regulation of proceedings in the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster. It was very obvious that any provision in the Act which rolled into one all the various jurisdictions of the country, leaving this single Court unassailed and unassailable, would have been entirely at variance with the spirit of the legislation entered upon at that time. The Schedule of the Bill contained Rules which had been approved by the learned Judges after long and anxious consideration. He had always been of opinion that considerably larger local power should be reserved to the Court of Common Pleas of Lancaster and that the District Registrars should have ampler powers than it would be right to entrust to Registrars in other parts of the country. He was not prepared to give an opinion as to what those ampler powers should be, but he would promise careful consideration to any suggestions which might be made by those who were interested in the question.

LORD WINMARLEIGH said, he would undertake that some definite proposal should be made to his noble and learned Friend.

PARLIAMENT—KIRKALDY DISTRICT OF BOROUGH RETURN.

AMENDMENT OF RETURN.

MR. SPEAKER called the attention of the House to the Return to the Writ for the Election of a Member to serve in this present Parliament for the Kirkcaldy District of Burghs, in the room of Robert Reid, esquire, deceased, by which it appeared that Sir George, of Edenwood, D.C.L., Knight of the Star of India, had been returned as Member for the Kirkcaldy District of Burghs; and a Member having stated, upon his own knowledge, that the Sir George, of Edenwood, D.C.L., Knight of the Star of India, mentioned in the said Return, was Sir George Campbell, D.C.L., Knight Commander of the Star of India, who had been returned as a Member to serve in this present Parliament, at the last Election for the Kirkcaldy District of Burghs:

Ordered, That the Deputy Clerk of the Crown do attend this House forthwith, with the last Return for the Kirkcaldy District of Burghs, and amend the same, by inserting after the word "George" the word "Campbell."

And the Deputy Clerk of the Crown amended the said Return accordingly.

PARLIAMENT—STRANGERS (PRESENCE AT DEBATES.)

NOTICE OF MOTION.

MR. DILLWYN gave Notice that on Tuesday he would move that—

"Whereas by the ancient custom of Parliament strangers are not to be admitted while the House is sitting; and whereas inconvenience has arisen from the observance of this rule; and whereas also a Committee of this House, the Report of which was, on the 28th day of March 1871, ordered to be printed, recommended 'that strangers shall not be directed to withdraw during any debate except upon a question put and agreed to without amendment or debate;' be it resolved, that in future strangers who may have obtained admission to the House in the usual manner shall not be directed to withdraw during any debate except upon a question put and agreed to without amendment or debate."

NAVY—REPORT ON CRIME AND PUNISHMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he will cause to be prepared and presented to the House of Commons, for the year 1874, a Report on Crime and Punishment in the Navy, similar to the Reports which were presented for the years 1862, 1863, and 1864; and, whether he will not continue such Reports yearly?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, the expense of preparing these Reports was very great, and the advantage to be derived from them was not so considerable as to induce him to continue them.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR gave Notice that he should call attention to the subject.

THE ASHANTEE EXPEDITION—HONOURS FOR SERVICES.—QUESTION.

DR. LUSH asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, having regard to the fact that in the distribution of honours and rewards after the Ashantee war combatant officers were rewarded in the proportion of about one in three of those engaged, medical officers in the proportion of about one in nine, he will give some assurance to the House that in any contemplated or fresh distribution of honours to the Army such a grave disproportion will receive his attention, with the view to its remedy?

MR. STANLEY: Sir, in the unavoidable absence of the Secretary of State for War, perhaps I may be allowed to answer the Question of the hon. Member. It is considered that the medical officers engaged in the Ashantee Expedition have received their full proportion of the honours and rewards bestowed on that occasion, and I am unable to hold out any definite assurance with regard to any future proceedings.

DR. LUSH gave Notice that on an early day he should call attention to the subject.

BURMAH—BRITISH SUBJECTS IN MANDALAY.—QUESTION.

MR. BROCKLEHURST asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether information has been received to the effect that the King of Burmah has refused to grant to the Resident at Mandalay a body-guard of one hundred soldiers for the protection of British subjects at Mandalay; and, in the event of the present negotiations with the King resulting in hostilities, if it is the intention of the Government to take such measures as may be necessary to secure the protection of the lives and property of British subjects in that city?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, no information has been received at the India Office to the effect that the Resident at Mandalay has asked the King of Burmah for the number of men stated in the Question. I think it more than probable that the present negotiations with the King of Burmah will end in a friendly settlement of the differences which have arisen between him and the Government of India. Should they, however, terminate otherwise, the Government of India will be prepared to adapt its action according to the circumstances in which it may find itself placed.

INDIA—THE GUIKWAR OF BARODA—PROCLAMATION OF THE VICEROY.

QUESTION.

MR. DUNBAR asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the report which appeared in the evening papers relative to the Guikwar of Baroda was correct?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, that it was true the Guikwar was removed last night from Baroda. A Proclamation of the Viceroy of India had been issued that day deposing the Guikwar and his issue from the Sovereignty of the State of Baroda, but continuing the Native administration by permitting the widow of Khundee Roa, the late Guikwar, to adopt a member of the Guikwar's family.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD ACT, 1872—FUSIL OIL IN WHISKY.—QUESTION.

MR. MOORE asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to the evidence of Dr. Cameron before the Select Committee on the Adulteration of Food Act, 1872, where he states, that in new whisky there is present amylic alcohol, commonly called fusil oil, a substance which he characterises as—

“A most objectionable ingredient, worse than any adulterant that can be put into whiskey;”

also where he says—

“There is this difficulty in new whiskey, that it contains fusil oil, and if you drink it when it is new the effect is perfectly maddening;”

and, whether he intends introducing any clause into the measure now before the House dealing with Dr. Cameron’s recommendation—

“That whiskey should not be allowed to be removed from the Government bonded stores until after the expiration of at least a year?”

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, his attention had been called to that paragraph in the Report of the Committee referred to. He was anxious not to introduce into the measure now before the House any provision applying to any particular article of food or drink; but the question of removing and retaining whisky in bond was under the consideration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had promised to inquire into the subject.

PRIVILEGE—REPORT OF DEBATES AND PROCEEDINGS—RELATIONS OF THE HOUSE AND THE PRESS. QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he rose to put a Question to the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), of which he had given him private Notice, and he must ask the indulgence of the House while he said a few words in explanation. The hon. Member for Louth had put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, Whether, in view of the present anomalous relations between that House and the public Press as to reports of public proceedings of the House and of Committees, it was his intention to propose some reform which, while maintaining the due control of this House over publication of its proceedings, should relieve the public Press from the hazards at which it now discharged important and useful functions towards that House and towards the Country? And the right hon. Gentleman was reported to have said, it was not the intention of

Her Majesty’s Government at present to introduce any measure of the kind referred to by the hon. Member. The result of the answer was that the hon. Member subsequently gave Notice that it was his intention, on the next sitting of the House, to call the notice of the Speaker to the presence of strangers. Before the hon. Gentleman put that Question to the Government several hon. Friends of his (the Marquess of Hartington’s) with whom he generally acted had formed the opinion that it was extremely desirable that an attempt should be made to place the relations between this House and the Press in respect to the publication of the reports of the debates and proceedings of the House on a more satisfactory, he might say, on a more reasonable footing. He understood that the Notice which the hon. Member for Louth had given was with the intention of forcing the House to take some further action in the matter. The subject was not altogether free of difficulty, as would be perfectly evident from the fact that it had been more than once considered in the House, and he believed once formed the subject of inquiry before a Select Committee, which, however, came to no definite conclusion on the matter. He was, therefore, not prepared at this moment to lay before the House the terms of any Resolution; but he could undertake to say to the hon. Member for Louth that he was prepared to call the attention of the House to the question; and as the Government had announced their intention of not dealing with it “at present,” which he concluded meant this Session, it was his intention to propose a Resolution on the subject. He therefore wished to ask the hon. Member for Louth, Whether, considering the peculiar character of the Motion fixed for that night, he intended to force the attention of the House to the anomalous relations between the House and the Press?

MR. SULLIVAN: Sir, I, too, will ask the indulgence of the House, though my sentences shall be very few indeed. These personal episodes and interludes have become almost too frequent and too disagreeable. I had not the remotest idea—indeed, it would be quite repugnant to my feelings—of “ballooning” myself into momentary notice by raising a question of this kind. I ask the indulgence of the House while I, in justice to myself, point out that I did not put such a Question to the First Minister of the Crown until circumstances of the gravest magnitude had shown us that a state of things which no Member of this House would venture to defend, sometimes called obsolete, always absurd, had been invoked upon the head of the Press of this country by an hon. Gentleman on the other side of the House. Reference has been made to the proceedings of the Committee in connection with the representatives of the Press in England. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Member that, in answering the Question put to him, he must not enter into any discussion of the matter.

MR. SULLIVAN: Sir, I desire to be held within what are the correct limits upon the present occasion, and I have not the remotest desire to prolong a scene like this. I wish to assure the House that in the Motion I made I was moved by the sternest sense of duty, feeling that this monstrous power given to one Member should be borne no longer. Nothing has been done, and, I believe, nothing would have been done for years to come, if I had not incurred the momentary unpopularity which I am perfectly sure I shall incur by this course. In view of the fact that one of the Leaders of this House, feeling the responsibility of his position, has given an assurance to the House, the country, and the Press, that this matter will be brought on at an early day—as by that, my whole object has been achieved, for I had no other object in view—I am prepared, Sir, to say that I shall not proceed in the course which I had stated it was my intention to take.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he had a Notice of Motion on the Paper on this subject; and he should be happy to withdraw it in favour of the Motion of the noble Marquess.

THE QUEEN v. CASTRO—

THE TRIAL AT BAR—ADDRESS FOR A ROYAL COMMISSION.

MR. DISRAELI: I beg to move, Sir, that the Orders of the Day be postponed until after the Motion relative to the trial of The Queen v. Castro.

Motion agreed to.

DR. KENEALY: Sir, I rise to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to be graciously pleased to appoint a Royal Commission, to consist of Members of both Houses of Parliament, to inquire into the matters complained of with respect to the Government Prosecution of The Queen v. Castro, and to the conduct of the trial at Bar, and incidents connected therewith, and certain incidents of the said trial which have occurred subsequent thereto."

I have thought it better, Mr. Speaker, on due consideration of all the circumstances connected with the case, to move for a Royal Commission, which shall consist of Members of both Houses of Parliament, rather than to move for a Select Committee. I am afraid the public generally—it is not for me to say whether rightly or wrongly—have an impression that there is a large, an overwhelming, probably I might not be wrong if I said almost an unanimous body of hon. Members in this House who have formed a very strong opinion upon the case, and therefore a Select Committee, appointed by this House, would not command so much confidence, or give so much general satisfaction to the English nation as would a Joint Committee consisting of Members of both Houses. I am anxious, therefore, that into this Royal Commission the element of the Lords should be introduced, because I have seen or heard nothing to justify me in supposing that there is the same strong opinion formed in the Lords as I am afraid is formed in the Commons. There is another reason also why I should like some of the most eminent Members of that House to be joined in the Royal Commission. It has been my lot, as it has been that of most lawyers, to study the decisions of the House of Lords; and I think I may safely say that no decisions in the world ever commanded, or have been worthy to command, such universal approbation as the decisions of the House of Lords. When one contrasts those decisions with those given in what are called the Inferior Courts, it seems like travelling from darkness into sunlight. I am anxious therefore, if there should be a Royal Commission granted, that it should be one which would command the very greatest amount of faith in the country, because of the Members of whom it should consist; and I believe a great portion of that faith would be affected if there were not Members of the other House joined in it. Now, Sir, I do not intend on this occasion—nor did I ever intend—to re-try the Tichborne Case in this House. I do not intend to deal with any of the puerilities or the technicalities of the law that occurred in that Case. I do not intend to take a Nisi Prius view of it—I leave that to any little lawyers who may follow me. I wish to draw the statesmen of the House into the controversy, because I believe this is a matter for statesmen and not for pettifoggers. If the statesmen on both sides of this House were as well aware as I am of the mighty feeling throughout the nation which this great issue involves, I am perfectly certain they would reserve the discussion of it for themselves, because it is they only who are likely to solve this great and momentous issue. I presume it will be conceded that I ought to know something about this Case. There are a great many hon. Members here who, no doubt most conscientiously, have come to a definite conclusion in the matter, and fancy they know more about it than I do. If I might offer very respectful counsel to those hon. Members, I would ask them to consider for a moment and to ask themselves whether it can be possible that any private individual in this House, no matter what his opportunities may have been, no matter how carefully he may have studied the newspaper reports, can possibly have that knowledge of the Case which I, fortunately or unfortunately, possess. I have not brought forward this matter, nor have I taken any very active part in its discussion throughout the country, from any wonderful admiration which I had for my client. Everybody knows that while I endeavoured to do my duty to the man, I made no secret that he was no hero in my estimation. Therefore, I hope it will not be imagined for one moment that any false sympathy with him, or undue admiration for his character, is the reason why I have taken a prominent part in this agitation. I have taken it up simply and solely as a matter of duty, as a matter which I believed I was bound to take up, unless I was a traitor to every principle of honour and justice. Therefore, I hope that Gentlemen will listen to me, not speaking here as an advocate—I am not one—but as a man who knows thoroughly the history of that prosecution, and who feels it his bounden duty to bring the conduct of that prosecution before this Grand Inquest of the nation. Although I never was vain enough to imagine that I could meet with unqualified success here, still I do sincerely hope and trust, for the sake of the high character which the House of Commons ever has maintained, and ever must desire to maintain, in the country, that it will not rashly or harshly decide in its refusal to grant a Royal Commission. No harm can be done by inquiry; on the contrary, a very great deal of good may result from it, because if the matters which are now agitating the minds of so many millions of the people are false and groundless, the Royal Commission which I ask for will demonstrate their falsity and groundlessness in a very short time, and in the most conclusive way. There will then be no subject-matter for complaint whatever, and the precedent of the Tichborne Case, which so many people now challenge, will be one of which we ought afterwards to be proud, and not ashamed to follow. The opinions that have been formed here have probably been formed in a great measure from reading what are called summaries of the trial in the newspapers. There is no doubt a very great number of persons in this country—I have met them myself—who have followed with great care the evidence taken from day to day, and who are masters of that evidence to an extraordinary degree. Nevertheless, I can hardly imagine that the large body of Gentlemen here have all followed that evidence with the amount of precision which would be required to form an accurate judgment of the Case. In all probability they are engaged in business or fashion, or in other pursuits during the day, and have contented themselves with deriving their knowledge of the Case from the summaries in the newspapers, and assuredly if they found their knowledge on those summaries I can assure them that they are untrustworthy in the highest degree. Some hon. Members, as I understand, are very much struck by the fact that there is in this Case a concurrent verdict of two juries. But it is within the experience of every Gentleman here that the verdicts of juries are set aside every day on the ground that they are wrong or against evidence, or on some other equally satisfactory ground. We ourselves do not require to be told that over and over again the Home Secretary has taken upon himself the responsibility, often with the sanction and approval of the country, of reversing the opinions of juries. The right hon. Gentleman very recently reversed the decision of a London jury in the case of the Countess de Civry, who was convicted and sentenced by a most learned Judge after she had been most ably defended and after evidence had been given, I think, on both sides. But circumstances came to the knowledge of the right hon. Gentleman which convinced him that the jury were wrong, that the Judge ought not to have received their verdict, and that justice would be best done by his interfering and liberating the lady. As to the Tichborne Case, without meaning to cast any imputation upon the right hon. Gentleman, it would appear as if he were ready to re-open every case but that. Probably, the right hon. Gentleman has had no time to enter into its particulars, merits, and details. I do not know what may be the reasons which may be operating upon his mind; but I think even he will hardly deny that he is thoroughly sick of it from beginning to end, that he looks with a species of dismay upon any new Motion or Petition in the matter, and that he would gladly get rid of it by some means if he could do so consistently with a sense of duty and honour. I trust that the right hon. Gentleman will aid me in getting a Royal Commission. I am perfectly sure that no decision which the House may come to to-night adverse to the Motion will ever content the people of this country; and if the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues really wish to quell what I must almost call the growing dissatisfaction in the country upon this matter; to reconcile all Englishmen together as if in one holy and fraternal bond, his plan will be to have the matter inquired into which has been made the subject of so many Petitions by our countrymen from all parts of the nation, and thus allay for ever any discontent or dissatisfaction which may be felt throughout the country. That is what statesmen have done in former times, and what I hope statesmen will always be prepared to do. Certainly, a more statesmanlike or dignified course than that of granting me the Commission for which I ask I can scarcely conceive.

I do not know how it is, or why it is, that in the Tichborne Case there should be a general impression that justice has not been done. As a rule, we all know perfectly well that there are no people in the world who are so fond of abiding by the decisions of our legal tribunals as the English people are; and it must be, indeed, some extraordinary state of things which produces the ferment we now see raging all around us. A fact not unworthy of consideration, as I mentioned to hon. Gentlemen the other night, is that the German nation agrees with the English people generally that justice has not been done; and I myself have received numerous letters from various parts of America showing that there is a widespread feeling in the United States also condemnatory of the manner in which this case has been conducted. The intense disaffection that prevails in the country has not been caused by me, as has been falsely pretended. That disaffection has existed from the time of the first trial in the Court of Common Pleas. Everyone knows that during that trial great discontent was expressed. I do not mean to enter into the merits or demerits of that trial, nor is it my purpose to show whether that discontent was wisely founded or not; but certainly the conduct of the Chief Justice then did provoke frequent remonstrances from the unhappy Claimant when he was under cross-examination. With those remonstrances a large body of the people sympathized, and we know quite well that after the failure of the Claimant's case in the Common Pleas, when he made various journeys through the country, he was received almost like an Emperor or King in the large towns, followed by thousands and thousands of people who were convinced that justice had not been done to his case. From that time the discontent has been gradually increasing. From that time the discontent, which may be said to have risen as a mountain stream has now grown into a mountain torrent, which is rolling over the land. This I mention for the purpose of repudiating, as strongly as I possibly can, the false idea attempted to be propagated, that I am answerable for the present disaffection throughout the country. On the contrary, it was in a great degree the conduct of the late Government which was the cause of this disaffection. It was the extreme, the almost Russian, measures of despotism and apparent persecution which they adopted in the prosecution of this matter that, in my humble judgment, first gave the impetus to that which has grown, as it were, into an overwhelming ocean. It was that conduct which has seated right hon. Gentlemen on the benches opposite, and placed the Members of the late Government in the cold shade of Opposition. My client has been, in fact, the best friend which the present Government ever had. I do not say that their entire success has been owing to the extraordinary behaviour of the late Government in reference to that prosecution. I think those right hon. Gentlemen were entitled to the respect and gratitude of the country for having passed the Reform Bill of 1867, and they will still more entitle themselves to the gratitude of the country if they continue in the course they have hitherto pursued, and give no countenance to the Judicature Act, and things of that kind. Another reason why, in my humble judgment, there is such a powerful feeling in this country is, that it is the reaction against the Reign of Terror which was set up by the Court of Queen's Bench before and during that trial. I need hardly call the attention of hon. Gentlemen to the feeling then generally experienced that the doctrine of Contempt so-called was pushed to an extent that had never been known, or thought of, or contemplated in any free country before. That every Court should have a right to punish Contempt committed before it no lawyer will dispute. I believe it was the Court of Chancery which first pushed the idea that they could punish for Contempt that was not actually committed before their eyes; but the Court of Queen's Bench went a length that no human being ever dreamt of, and established a system in this country which, in my humble judgment, is subversive of the Constitution and entirely destructive of the rights of the British people. Therefore, the feeling that is now existing among so many millions is a powerful and just re-action against that Reign of Terror, and I should be ashamed almost of the spirit of my countrymen, if they did not, as it were, constructively rebel—of course, I mean it in a constitutional manner—against a doctrine of that nature, which during the trial muzzled all free thought and free expression of language in England; which made us for the first time in our lives almost dread to say our souls were our own, and against which, I am sorry to say, no Member of the late Government had the courage to rise up and enter his protest. Everybody seemed at that time cowed and muzzled. I do not know why, because I am sure the power that thought to do it was not strong enough to succeed, if it had been resisted at the moment; but now you have a re-action, and a most proper re-action, against that state of things. The British mind was chained and fettered; the people were prevented from expressing their thoughts during that time upon what they conceived to be the unparalleled wrongs of that trial, and I do not wonder if they are now banded and united together as one mighty man, for the purpose of raising a powerful, I hope a successful voice, against the doctrine of Contempt of Court as carried into practice by the Court of Queen's Bench. There is one great trial which the Members of this House will perfectly remember, and it had analogies which they ought to apply to the present circumstances—I mean the trial of Lord Cochrane before Lord Ellenborough. The two cases of Cochrane and Tichborne seem to me to be pretty much analogous. Cochrane received very little justice from Lord Ellenborough, and I am prepared by-and-by to show what justice Tichborne received from his Judges. But there was an outcry raised against Cochrane in his day, as there is an outcry raised now against Tichborne, and Cochrane was made the victim of that wicked outcry, and he was convicted and punished, and expelled from this House. And what subsequently took place? After the services of that great and glorious hero—because a hero he was in the truest acceptation of the term—had been lost for a whole generation to his country, the country, when it was too late to do him tardy justice, reversed the whole of the abominable judicial proceedings of which he had been made the victim, reinstating him, as it were, although only partially, in his rights; but it never could recompense him for the 30 years of his life that had been lost, and for the misery that he had suffered. If the trial and verdict in Lord Cochrane's case were bad, and false, and disgraceful to the country, let not the present House of Commons, in the name of justice, allow those who shall come after us to brand by the same name, the equally-infamous trial and verdict in the Tichborne Case. If the House does not enter into a full inquiry now, posterity will brand it in the same way as all honest and righteous men brand the shameful proceedings in the trial of Lord Cochrane. As some precedent for this language may be wanted, I hope I shall be pardoned if I read a passage from the speech of Mr. Edmund Burke, which he made in the House of Commons, December 6th, 1770, when Serjeant Glynn moved that a Committee be “Appointed to enquire into the Administration of Criminal Justice, and the Proceedings of the Judges in Westminster Hall, particularly in cases relating to the Liberty of the Press, and the Constitutional Power and Duties of Juries.”

At that time, as I need hardly remind the House, it was taken as the accepted law of the land, and was laid down indeed by the Judges in their usual infallible way, that in cases of libel, the jury had nothing whatever to do with the question whether the matter complained of was libellous or not. The only issue left to the jury, was whether there had been a publication or not. That had gone on, unchallenged, though not unmurmured at for a great many years; Judge after Judge laying it down as a matter of absolute and unquestionable law. The feeling of the country at length rebelled under so unconstitutional a perversion of the rights of the people: and Serjeant Glynn, as the mouthpiece of the country, moved for the Committee, and thus struck the first blow at the abominable and most illegal declaration of the law which His Majesty's Judges had propounded: and he eventually succeeded in placing the law on its present footing. On that occasion Burke said—

“Have not the greatest lawyers, the profoundest casuists, and the staunchest patriots erred? Why, then, should the Judges be thought exempted from the common lot of humanity? Why should they be deemed infallible more than other mortals? Believe me, the wisdom of the whole nation can see farther than the sages of Westminster Hall. . . . Sir, my reverence for the Judges, against whom the popular cry is now so loud, will not deter me; because I know all Judges are but men. Not only former Judges, but juries have erred. Why not the present? Yes, Sir, juries have erred, and they may err again. When they do, I shall be as ready to inquire into their conduct as I am now into that of the Judges. Gentlemen may talk of their great respect for juries, and their readiness to acquiesce in their determinations; but I am not disposed to be so complaisant. I will make no man, nor any set of men, a compliment of the Constitution. It is too valuable an inheritance to be so lightly relinquished. When the actions of juries are praiseworthy, let them be applauded; when they are criminal, let them be punished. Popularity should not be bought at so high a price. For my own part, let the malicious and the ungenerous say what they will, I am a blind follower of no man, nor a bond slave to any party. I have always acted according to the best information of my judgment, and the clear dictates of my conscience. On this occasion I solemnly protest before God, that I entertain no personal enmity against any man, nor have I any interested schemes to promote. My sole object in supporting the proposed inquiry is the public welfare and the acquittal of the Judges. For I am satisfied that an acquittal will be the consequence. In acting thus, I think myself their best friend, because no other plan will clear their character. Till this step is taken, in vain do they pretend to superior sanctity; in vain do some Gentlemen tread their halls as holy ground, or reverence their Courts as the temples of the Divinity. To the people they appear the temples of idols and false oracles, or rather as the dwellings of truth and justice converted into dens of thieves and robbers. For what greater robbers can there be than those who rob men of their laws and liberties? No man here has a greater veneration than I have for doctors of the law; and it is for that reason that I would thus render their characters pure and unsullied as the driven snow. But will any of you pretend that this is at present the case? Are not their temples profaned? Has not pollution entered them, and penetrated into the Holy of Holies? Are not the priests suspected of being no better than those of Bel and the Dragon, or rather of being worse than those of of Baal? And has not, therefore, the fire of the people's wrath almost consumed them? The lightning has pierced their sanctuary, and rent the veil of their temple, from the top even to the bottom. Nothing is whole, nothing is sound. The ten tables of the law are shattered and splintered. The ark of the covenant is lost, and passed into the hands of the uncircumcised. Both they and ye are become an abomination unto the Lord. In order to wash away your sins, let Moses and the prophets ascend Mount Sinai, and bring us down the second table of the law in thunders and lightnings; for in thunders and lightnings the constitution was first, and must now, be established. Let the Judges mount up to the source of precedents and decisions, and trace the law clear and unpolluted along the stream of time, and the silent lapse of years. Let them march in procession to this House, ushered in by a long train of precedents, and opinions, and lay them all in a bundle in the middle of the room. Then, and not till then, will they stand justified. In vain do you trust to the virtue of the furred gown, or to the magic of that bauble, as Cromwell truly called it. They confer neither real power, nor, what is often its parent, a fair character. These desirable possessions are acquired by an upright conduct, and the confidence of the people."—[Hansard, Parl. Hist. xvi. 1267-8-9-70-71.]

I hope that Gentleman will bear in mind that lofty language, for it is considered, at present, a species of blasphemy to utter a word against the supposed infallibility of the Bench. I trust that those words of one of the greatest of men will not be forgotten, but will be carefully borne in mind, when they come to consider of the decision which they are asked to give in the present case. Serjeant Glynn failed, it is true, in his Motion, as I shall probably fail in mine, but he sowed the seed from which sprang up afterwards a glorious tree; and in the result, though beaten for the moment, he established the rights of juries, and maintained the liberty of the Press. Sir, before I enter into the matter to which I wish more particularly to call the attention of the House, I think I ought to be permitted to state one or two of the reasons—I shall be as brief as I can—which have convinced me that my client was truly the man whom he represented himself to be. In the first place, a more perfect gentleman than Tichborne never crossed a drawing-room. I do not now merely give my own opinion on the matter, but that of Noblemen and Gentlemen of high position in society with whom that unhappy man was accustomed to live in familiar intercourse. I myself may not be a very wonderful judge of these things; but I suppose and hope I have some judgment, and I must say that he impressed me from the very first moment of my intercourse with him to the last as being in all externals of grace and manner as complete a specimen of a gentleman as I ever met. I never heard a low or vulgar sentiment from his lips, nor one which was not consistent with the highest feeling of honour. I never heard him, although we all know how sorely pressed and attacked he was, use one expression of reprehension or abuse against his too numerous adversaries. On the contrary, every word that fell from him bore the impress of high birth and high breeding, and even what might have been expected from a nobleman or gentleman of the highest position in the country. Another reason for my faith in him was the undying confidence of Lady Tichborne in his identity. She never faltered in the belief that he was indeed her son. I am not now going to trouble the House with any sentiment or romance; but I am sure that many Gentlemen who hear me know that Lady Tichborne was a woman of a cool, cautious, and sensible temper, and a person who exercised the greatest possible amount of circumspection in forming her judgment before she came to a conclusion. We know that she lived in the same house with my client for nearly a year, during which time she must have had constant opportunities of penetrating into his whole life, and of discovering from daily intercourse whether he was an impostor or the true man. And when I find that Lady Tichborne lived in the faith that he was her son, and that when she died, almost her last dying words had been to give him the blessing of a mother, I must confess that those circumstances produce a most powerful effect on my mind. There was another circumstance which powerfully influenced me, leading me to the irresistible conclusion that he is the true and genuine heir. The House will remember that it was always insinuated during the course of the trial that this man was "Red-haired Orton," and was perpetually dyeing his hair. A lock of hair of unmistakably—shall I call it—auburn colour, had been sent home from Chili by some suspicious person there, and the defendant's statement to me was that his attorney (Mr. Holmes) had pressed, had even compelled, him to recognize it. That lock of hair was produced in Court by order of the Chief Justice to Mary Ann Loder, and she and one or two others swore that it was the exact colour and description as Orton's hair. Whether or not that circumstance had great weight with the jury I cannot say; it certainly was dinned into the public ear that this man's hair was naturally auburn, but that he disguised it by the daily use of a dye, and one story was, that after he was sent to Millbank he was discovered to be Arthur Orton, because his hair had then become unmistakably red. Sir, there never was a more untrue statement. I myself saw the man in Millbank months after he had been sent there, and when he had no means or opportunity for using dyes with his hair, and when it was not possible that his hair could be made different from what it had been in the Queen's Bench; and I can state that there was not the slightest streak of red in his hair, which was as black as that of any Gentleman in this House. But there is another matter, and a more wonderful one still, to be noticed. When the Rev. J. Rigby came up from Stonyhurst on the 5th of June 1873, he spoke in these terms in reply to examination—

“Do you remember Roger sufficiently to remember his appearance?—I remember it, I think, perfectly. Will you describe it?—First of all, he was very thin; his features were small, and his eyebrows dark. His hair, to the best of my recollection, was a rather dark brown, and I distinctly remember his habit of turning his head round when combing his hair. He used to comb it on one side. He wore it rather long; it often fell down, and he jerked his head that way to throw it back again. When he so threw it back, I certainly remember distinctly that the under hair was more of a brown than the surface hair. Do you mean that it was lighter or darker?—I mean that it approached a reddish brown, and when his hair was combed on one side, the under portion showed more redness than the upper, which was dark brown.”

Now, when that evidence was given, I looked at the defendant, who sat under me, and his hair presented exactly the aspect which has been described by Mr. Rigby; and I believe that if the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department will make inquiry at Dartmoor, he will receive a report from the authorities there to the effect that the prisoner's hair now presents the appearance described by Mr. Rigby, the upper portion of the hair being darker than the lower, which is of the reddish-brown described by that reverend gentleman. That I think was the most remarkable circumstance of the trial; but there was also the malformation of the thumb which was shown in the Paris photograph, and in that of Chili of 1854, both presenting the same appearance. These facts were enough in my mind to convince me that he was the undoubted man. I now proceed, Sir, to arraign the conduct of the late Government with respect to the prosecution. I say that that conduct was of such a nature that it led to the course which was pursued towards him at his trial. I need hardly say that upon the personal honour of the Leader of the late Government I cast no reflection whatever. I think it will be quite enough for my purpose to say, in modern and fashionable phraseology, that his conduct was unwise. I do not think he ever entered into the Case. The right hon. Gentleman always reminded me of the famous magician described by Washington Irving, who was lulled into slumber in the palace of the Alhambra with beautiful damsels on each side. The damsels by whom the right hon. Gentleman was fascinated were Theology on his right side and Greek Literature on his left, and I believe those bewitching companions led him quite astray from any serious contemplation of the Tichborne Case, so that he was quite ready to adopt the views of anybody who told him that Tichborne was an impostor. I can easily understand somebody one day rushing into his study when he was thus engaged, and saying—“I can give you a conclusive proof that Tichborne is an impostor.” The right hon. Gentleman might ask—“What is it?” “He has forgotten the letters of the Greek Alphabet.” The right hon. Gentleman, forgetting that Sir Walter Scott had confessed that he himself had forgotten the letters of the Greek alphabet, would say—“That is perfectly conclusive to my mind. Any one who forgets his Greek must be both a butcher and an impostor.” That must have been the sort of reasoning which actuated the right hon. Gentlemen when he allowed his Government to commit itself to the prosecution of that unhappy man, Tichborne, and I really do think that the way in which I have ventured to describe his conversion from a belief to a disbelief was probably the true mode in which he became an Ortonite rather than a believer in Tichborne. And here, Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to challenge the statement that because the Judge committed a prisoner for trial, the Government was necessarily bound to prosecute that prisoner to the bitter end, and if anybody advised them that that was law, they had very bad advice. They ought to have left the matter to the ordinary course of law, and there were weighty reasons which ought to have made these Gentlemen pause and consider before they embarked upon that unexampled expedition. If they had only seriously considered the matter, they would never have entered into it in the spirit in which they did—because, first of all, the violent, the strongly-partizan language of Sir John Coleridge, their Law Officer, ought alone to have prevented them from taking up that position. He had converted the position of an advocate into that of a private and malignant foe, and he was, therefore, utterly unfit to act as counsel or adviser for the prosecution. There was another reason why, as it seems to me, they ought to have shrunk with horror from entering on the prosecution, and that was the production of the Pittendreigh forgeries by their own Law Officer. That production was a crime without parallel in the annals of the trials of our country since the days of Elizabeth and James, when such devices were common. Those forgeries were made, and they were known and almost proved to be forgeries before ever they came into Court. They were issued by the counsel knowing them to be forgeries, and when all those facts were brought to the knowledge of the Government, the Government should have shrunk back in horror from the suspicion of attaching themselves to a cause which was supported by false documents. If there ever was a period when a Government should have withdrawn with abhorrence from a path upon which it had once entered, it was in this Case. But the Government seemed to have abandoned all those high and chivalrous ideas altogether which are believed to have ruled the conduct of the ruling powers for the last half-century, and they took the forgers and their forgeries to their arms. They cherished them and they fondled them, and they stood up for them in this House and elsewhere, and would hardly allow a Question to be asked concerning them. I remember, and hon. Gentlemen will also remember very well, that if a Member got up and asked a Question, he hardly ever got a civil Answer in reply, but was snubbed down or sneered down, and was treated with contempt, being looked upon almost as a man who ought to have been a sort of exile from society because he questioned the policy of the Government. These things also had entered into the heart of the people. They were watching the conduct of the House in this matter, and they are watching it still. They were not satisfied with it then, and it rankled in their hearts, and it rankles there yet, and that is one of the other numerous reasons why there is this powerful and tremendous ferment of feeling in the country. The people compared the conduct of the late Government with regard to the Gurney case with that which they had pursued in the Tichborne Case; and they thought the Government had declined to prosecute in the former case for political and not for honest reasons. They felt that the Gurneys had brought misery and poverty into innumerable families, and had destroyed the happiness of a thousand homes, and they were convinced that the Government abstained from action for political reasons. They remembered that case, and they believe so still. The Government gave also in their conduct a very evil example. Those persons who saw the Government defending forgery may have thought—"Forgery is right and proper, and why should not we too resort to it?" One of the reasons why I am going to ask for a Royal Commission to inquire into this question is this, that after the fullest and completest examination I have now come to the conclusion that every one of the letters produced on the trial purporting to be the letters of Arthur Orton was a distinct and positive forgery. I wish the authenticity of those documents to be made the subject of inquiry by a Royal Commission, that they were fabricated documents. It did not occur to me at the time, and I am sorry that it did not; but I really never had time to master that tremendous Case, and it never occurred to me that those documents were forgeries; but now I have gone carefully through them, I have come to the conclusion, which remains unaltered, and will remain unaltered until irrefragable proof is brought to the contrary, that every single document produced at that trial, except probably one, was as deliberately a forgery as the Pittendreigh documents themselves were. At the trial we were so pressed for funds that there was no money to call in the aid of an expert. It was sneeringly said that I had to be my own expert, and it is probable that I made but a poor expert; but whether they were forgeries or genuine documents, we at that time had no money to provide experts, and we were deprived of the opportunity to get money by the unjust and wicked conduct of that Court, as I think I shall demonstrate before I sit down. There was another document connected with that case about which I wish to speak. There was printed and published all over London a little forgery, to which at the time the attention of the Government was called, and it was one which most undoubtedly originated with the Government itself, or in some treachery or evil device of some person connected with this trial. My hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley), in a letter which he addressed to the Treasury on the 14th September, 1872, called the attention of the Government to this, and said—

“The paper I enclose is publicly sold in shops, and exhibited in windows, and in so far as it purports to be a fac simile of the writing of Arthur Orton is a false and wicked forgery.”

Now, Sir, I hold in my hand a Parliamentary Paper, printed by Government on the requisition of the hon. Member, and hon. Gentlemen will bear in mind that the documents of which it is a photograph were documents supposed to be in the possession of the Government, and supposed never to have got out of their hands. How they got into the hands of the persons who executed the forgery I do not know. Probably a Royal Commission will ascertain. It is a fact of no small moment, for the letters were both written by the same man, my unhappy client; but the person who forged them headed one “Arthur Orton to his sister,” as if he were the genuine Arthur Orton himself, and on the opposite page wrote “The Claimant to the Dowager Lady Tichborne,” so that everybody passing a stationer’s window, believing these letters to be genuine and true documents, compared the handwriting, and concluded that that attributed to Arthur Orton and that attributed to the defendant were the same. The only falsehood was, that they said that one was written by Arthur Orton, when they knew perfectly well that it was written by the Claimant. I should have thought this was such a serious matter that when it was brought under the notice of the Government, they would have done something for the defence of their own honour and the honour of their servants or agents, and would have repudiated the parties who were guilty of such a crime as that. But they did nothing. They never gave facilities for information to anybody connected with the defendant as to how these forgeries were brought before the public, and I do say that conduct of this description must have unquestionably encouraged other persons to forge documents in the subsequent proceedings, and must have tended to colour the minds of a great many persons against the unhappy defendant. My theory is, and I hope it will be examined into by lawyers on the Commission, with the assistance of experts, that the handwriting of the Claimant having by some means, I do not know how, got for a time into the possession of the defendants in the Common Pleas, the documents purporting to be the letters of Orton, were forged and produced at the trial. Whether or not this House thinks the forgery serious enough to be inquired into by a Royal Commission it is not for me to decide. In making those allegations I am stating that which I believe will turn out to be true, and I shall rejoice if this particular matter is made the subject of inquiry before a Royal Commission. I think we shall not be very wrong or harsh in our judgment if we come to the conclusion that the parties who were engaged in doing not one, but two forgeries would not hesitate to fabricate other documents and pretend that they were the handwriting of the defendant. There is another matter which I think ought to be inquired into, although we have unfortunately lost one main source of information on the subject, the party in chief having been lately drowned. It was stated that a Dr. Wheeler had a long and powerful affidavit, which, if true, established that the Claimant could not be Arthur Orton. It was stated that that person was taken under the auspices of the Government, and sent out of the country. Now that anybody in high office would be connected with such an act as that I do not for one moment believe, or that anybody in personal communication with the First Lord of the Treasury at the time could have sanctioned such a proceeding cannot but be untrue; but it is the curse of all Governments to have persons around them who think that by committing any act that will benefit the Government, they thereby help themselves and their cause, and so it came to pass that Dr. Wheeler, who had made an affidavit, suddenly had a Government appointment and left the country, and could not be present at the trial. I believe I am not wrong in stating that the affidavit of that gentleman is now in the office of the Home Secretary. I dare say his attention has been called to it, and if it has, he, as a lawyer, will know the value of that evidence, and if a Royal Commission be not appointed, the right hon.

Gentleman himself may think it well for the sake of justice to make some inquiry into the extraordinary circumstances to which I venture to call attention. Those things did not seem in any way to influence the Government; they relaxed and relented in nothing; and accordingly the trial came on, and at the trial was discovered another most extraordinary fact, which Her Majesty's Government certainly ought to have attended to. The way in which it seems to me all these things are relevant, and very relevant, is this—that certain persons connected with the late Government, however unwittingly and unconsciously, were the means of encouraging a good deal what took place at that trial, which, in my humble judgment, was against every principle of justice. When Mr. Chabot was called at the Claimant's trial, he was asked a few questions as to the Pittendreigh forgeries. I could not have conceived that such a thing could have taken place in England as that a respectable lawyer would produce forgeries in open Court. But Mr. Chabot, on being questioned, took the forgeries in his hand and said two of the documents were genuine; and, he believed two others were forgeries. He said he put them into the hands of Mr. Dobinson, the solicitor, and told him they were forgeries. I think Mr. Chabot entitled to great respect: he is a man who has some peculiar theories of his own in respect of handwriting, but I do not believe that he would intentionally deceive any tribunal. Certainly, he behaved in an honourable manner in that case, for he satisfied, indeed he convinced, Mr. Dobinson, the lawyer who had produced the two forged documents, that they were really forgeries. When I was commenting on the case to the jury I thought it my duty to call attention to the fact of Mr. Dobinson producing these forgeries, because anyone who would do that would do things equally as bad, and it was part of my case that there was a combination on the part of various persons to convict this man. I entirely exonerated the Solicitor General from any knowledge whatever that these documents were forgeries. I said it was impossible for any member of the Bar to commit himself to a crime of that description, or to a consciousness of its existence. I poured out the vials of my wrath on Mr. Dobinson, exonerating Sir John Coleridge. Mr. Dobinson is dead, but Mr. Geare, his surviving partner, wrote a letter to Sir John Coleridge, expressly calling his attention to the fact that he knew these documents were forgeries when he used them. I shall read a passage from the letter of Sir John Coleridge. It is dated—

“House of Commons, July 24.

“My dear Hawkins,—I feel bound to trouble you with a few words with reference to the attack made on Mr. Dobinson by the counsel for the defendant in the case now going forward in the Court of Queen's Bench. It is my duty to say that the purport of Mr. Chabot's report was communicated by Mr. Dobinson to me.”

Therefore, he knew perfectly well at the time he used those documents as genuine documents in the Court of Common Pleas that those documents were forged. There is his own language—

“It is my duty to say that the purport of Mr. Chabot's report was communicated by Mr. Dobinson to me, and no misleading instructions were at any time given or misleading questions suggested to me by him.”

Well, Sir, that certainly seem to me to be a matter—[SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: You have not read all the letter.] If the hon. and learned Gentleman wishes it, I will do it with great pleasure. It continues—

“It is true that all through the case at Nisi Prius I had the inestimable assistance of yourself and other distinguished men, most generously rendered; but for any imperfect or inaccurate execution of the instructions I am alone responsible, and I am quite prepared to defend my conduct in every part of that cross-examination if it really needs defence.”

I shall ask the Royal Commission to afford an opportunity for that defence which has never yet been afforded. The letter goes on—

“Mr. Dobinson, however, who has been attacked, is dead, and during the continuance of the trial I knew of no means open to me to vindicate from an utterly mistaken charge the character of a man of singular integrity and honour, and for whom I had the highest regard, except writing to you these few lines to be communicated, if you will be so kind as to take the trouble, to the Lord Chief Justice and his colleagues, and to the counsel for the defendant,—Believe me, my dear Hawkins, yours always, most truly,

“JOHN DUKE COLERIDGE.

“H. Hawkins, Esq., Q. C.”

The House will see that I did not intentionally suppress any portion of the letter. I should be ashamed of myself if I were to put before the House any part of a document which was controlled or contradicted by the remainder. That matter occurred in open Court, and there was even then no repudiation whatever by the Government of this extraordinary conduct of their Law Officer who had been guilty of it. I am now going to read the shorthand writer's notes of the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech in the Common Pleas, February 19, 1872. He said—

“ Well, gentlemen, imputation upon the plaintiff, a man who has made the statements he has made, and who has taken in Mr. Scott and all the rest of it, that he should try and get hold of one of Mr. Dobinson's copying clerks, is a very venial business indeed, and not worth while to take up time with. The observation upon that is that it is a ‘shabby, dirty thing,’ but not ‘more shabby and dirty than a hundred other things he has done,’ therefore I do not want to spend time in breaking the fly upon the wheel.

... Well, Mrs. Pittendreigh would have been a very important witness, and I should have trusted to her oath, but for this circumstance, knowing everything I did of the plaintiff, and thinking it an excessively likely thing. You recollect that she had furnished us with copies of her ‘supposed’ answers, and the copies of those supposed answers to the plaintiff's answers, were put to him, and the plaintiff said, ‘Oh! no, those are not her answers to me; I have her answers somewhere,’ and her answers were produced and shown to be totally unlike the copies shown to us; therefore, it became clear that Mrs. Pittendreigh was a person on whom no man in his senses, or an honourable man could place any reliance. She had gone first of all apparently to the plaintiff, or got into communication with him under circumstances infinitely disgraceful; because, although Mr. Pittendreigh was not a confidential clerk—I overstated that in examination—he was a copying clerk, and that was bad enough, in Mr. Dobinson's employ, entering into negotiations of some kind or other with the plaintiff in the action. That was disgraceful enough, but when it turned out besides that Mrs. Pittendreigh has been actually putting on us copies of letters which she said she had written to the plaintiff, and when the originals were produced, it turned out that they were not a bit like them, why, it is perfectly clear that Mrs. Pittendreigh—I suppose, if she could keep in with both sides—‘had been deceiving us grossly, deceiving both sides.’ She had deceived Mr. Dobinson in a gross way, giving him a perfectly false account of what she had written, and after, I am convinced that she put upon us copies which turned out, when produced, to be false, no man in his senses, and certainly no honourable man, would say she was a person you could place reliance upon at all, apart from any fact which can be proved aliunde, which she has been the means of bringing to light. Therefore, wherever there is a doubt, I am not going to insist upon her for a moment. She is a person who has written herself down knave by her conduct, and she is, as far as she is personally concerned, one to be entirely separated from the body of the defendants. ‘She has taken us in, in a most disgraceful manner;’ but you know there may be, nevertheless, apart from her character, certain facts which aliunde admit of proof, which she has been the means of bringing to light, and then only in that way I bring her before you. ‘Now, I drop the two last letters. I have a notion upon them, and you might, if you look at them, have notions upon them—you might think the two last letters were the composition of the plaintiff, if not written by him; you might think that there had been pencil marks underneath, and a tracing over.’ I think in one of them it is tolerably clear that there have been pencil marks; and that the tracing was a tracing by some one over those pencil marks.”

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is as clear as anything can be that at the time Sir John Coleridge was using this language in the Court of Common Pleas, Mr. Dobinson had given him information as to the real state of the case. Yet here is a suggestion to the jury, that they may, if they think fit, draw the conclusion that these two letters were written by the Claimant, when the learned Gentleman well knew that they were not. But I resume my extract from his speech, commencing as it did in page 4,779—

“ All I am concerned to point out now is that the case, as far as Mr. Dobinson is concerned, had a perfectly genuine and bonâ fide look when it was presented to him. We had never seen Mrs. Pittendreigh's real answer; she imposed upon Mr. Dobinson just as much as upon the other side. Mr. Dobinson, naturally, as anybody would, believing he had the whole correspondence before him, the copies of letters sent, and the originals received, viewed it in a totally different light than he would have viewed it by the light of the real letters.’ All I am anxious to do is to separate ourselves with Mr. Dobinson from any connection whatever with Mrs. Pittendreigh. There is the correspondence; there are the two genuine letters; you must place any construction on them you like. Two she gave us as genuine, and you must be judges as to whether she was right on that subject or not. It may be that we have not got to the bottom of it—whether we have or not does not seem to me important at this stage, because the evidence dehors that, is overwhelming on the subject of his connection with the Orton family. ‘Of course, I shall call Mr. Dobinson, he will tell you how he got those letters, and will say he was completely imposed upon by her, as she imposed upon the plaintiff at the time, and I ought to say, of course, that long since all connection with Mr. Pittendreigh and Mr. Dobinson has terminated altogether.’ There are persons on whose word he could not place the slightest reliance, and with whom he will have nothing to do, and he has long since left his office, and all connection of any sort or kind has ceased.”

So that you see it is suggested that Mr. Dobinson was deceived by Mrs. Pittendreigh. Well, I do not believe that Mr. Dobinson would have been guilty of the wickedness of getting into the box and swearing that Mrs. Pittendreigh had deceived him. But I do, and must, say that all these things are calculated to injure the course of public justice and public virtue, and as I trust we have still a regard for public justice and public virtue, I hope that if a Royal Commission is granted that it will for ever put an end to acts such as this, and prevent the promotion to an honourable place of a man who has been guilty of conduct of this description. Now, when there was a vacancy in the Court of Common Pleas by the death of Chief Justice Bovill, this man came to me and said—"I know I shall be acquitted in this court, but how about my action in the Court of Common Pleas, which I shall recommence when I am acquitted? They are going to appoint Sir John Coleridge to be the Chief Judge of the Court, and I want you to write to the Lord Chancellor to complain of it." I told him that the appointment was with the Prime Minister, and that I saw no harm in his writing to him, and accordingly he brought me a letter which he intended to send to the First Lord of the Treasury. Knowing the irregular habits of the man, and that he was as likely after he left me to light his cigar with it as to post it, I got him to leave it with me to send, and I posted it myself. The letter was addressed to the right hon. W. E. Gladstone, Esq., M.P. That is, I suppose, an additional evidence that this man is Orton. The letter was dated the 14th of November, and was as follows:—

"34, Beesborough Street, 14th Nov., 1873.

"Sir,—I have waited for some days in expectation of an answer to the letter which I did myself the honour to write to you on the 4th instant, and a duplicate copy of which I sent also to the Lord Chancellor. I am informed that the appointment of Chief Justice of the Common Pleas is in the hands of the Prime Minister. If you look at the correspondence between Sir John Coleridge, Mr. Hawkins, and Mr. Geare which was published on the 25th of July last, in all the newspapers, Sir John admits that at the time he used the Pittendreigh Letters at the late Trial in the Common Pleas, he had been informed by Mr. Dobinson that they were forgeries; yet Sir John used them as if they were genuine. I distinctly charge him, therefore, with uttering these documents knowing them to be forged. This is a crime of great magnitude, and one which is confessed by himself; it is a crime never before avowed by any one who was afterwards made one of Her Majesty's Judges, and if this appointment should be made, I will take measures to have it brought before Parliament. I have no desire to annoy you; but I must ask you to pause and consider whether you will make yourself responsible for such an act. At the

O'Connell Trial, in 1848, the then Attorney General (the right hon. T. B. C. Smith), one of the greatest lawyers in the Kingdom, goaded to irritation by the remarks of one of the counsel for the defendant sent him a challenge to fight. This was considered so great an offence that Sir Robert Peel did not venture to appoint him Chief Justice, but gave him the very inferior post of Master of the Rolls; for it was felt that if Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench he never could, with propriety, adjudicate upon criminal informations calculated to cause a breach of peace, when he had so grossly committed himself. How then could Sir John Coleridge ever try a prisoner charged with forgery, or with uttering forgeries, when he had himself been guilty of the same offence. I trust to your honour, to your public character, and to your love of justice, therefore, never to make such an appointment. —I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient servant,

"R. C. D. TICHBORNE."

"P.S.—I have sent a duplicate of this letter to the Lord Chancellor."

That letter failed to produce any effect. The learned Gentleman (Sir John Coleridge) was appointed to, and still occupies, the place of Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, and I think it a matter deserving of public inquiry on what grounds it was that he was appointed to that office under the circumstances that were brought to the knowledge of the Government. There is another thing that deserves inquiry. It has been thought all along that the new Chief Justice was quite satisfied that the Claimant was Orton, and consequently that he was not entitled to any particular sympathy from anybody; but it appears by a memorandum made by four of the constituents of the junior Member for Bristol (Mr. Morley) that they waited on him and that he declared in their hearing that it was merely a private opinion of his, but that, in his opinion, the Claimant was not Arthur Orton but an illegitimate member of the Tichborne family, as he could not else have obtained such an intimate knowledge of the affairs of the Tichborne family, and that he was supported in this by the late Attorney General having stated that that was his opinion also. So that we have this gentleman telling the Member for Bristol that he believes the Claimant to be an illegitimate member of the Tichborne family.

MR. MORLEY: I rise to Order, and ask permission to state that this is absolutely untrue.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Stoke is in possession of the House, and the hon. Member for Bristol will have an opportunity of explaining by-and-by.

DR. KENEALY : Of course, you will understand when I state these matters that I give my authority for them. I myself have no personal knowledge of the hon. Member for Bristol or of his affairs. I merely state these things on the authority of four of his constituents with whom I have been in communication, and I believe the hon. Member himself has been in communication with them on the matter, and whether it is true or whether it is false, the hon. Member and his constituents must settle among themselves. I have nothing to do with that. Now, Sir, I say that these circumstances which I have brought before the House entitle me to ask on good grounds for the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into this breach of public duty, I may almost say of public law. I consider that the appointment under these circumstances was a public crime. I consider that the whole conduct of the Government in attaching themselves as they did to that particular prosecution deserves the most full examination, and if that Commission find that there was nothing extraordinary, or unusual, or wrong, in their conduct, in attaching themselves to that prosecution, I am sure I shall not shed any tears over it. I bring the matter before the nation on national grounds, for I believe the whole of their conduct has been productive of evil example, and has lacerated the English heart into rage and fury. It is in that point of view that the seriousness consists. I believe that a great deal of the agitation which exists has been brought into being by the conduct of the Government. Undoubtedly, for the sake of public tranquillity, these things ought to be inquired into. If a careful investigation by a Royal Commission, consisting of noblemen and gentlemen, without fear and without reproach, should exonerate them from all blame in the matter I shall be most glad, for I myself am a thoroughly loyal and constitutional subject, and I am anxious to see a constitutional Government receive the support of the people. I am not glad—I am deeply and sincerely sorry—when anything occurs to injure even in the slightest degree, the old and splendid fabric of the Constitution, and it is for the sake of that Constitution that I beg of this House to give me this Royal Commission, so that these gentlemen may be rendered free from any reproach, and may be able to give that clear and conclusive answer to these things I should wish to see them do, and which I am sure they would be glad to do. The next matter to which I have to call the attention of the House is a matter which I think ought to be inquired into by a Royal Commission, and that is, with reference to that part of the Notice of my Resolution at which the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, in his humorous way, rather laughed. The right hon. Gentleman, who is undoubtedly a very acute critic, might be right in objecting to the words “certain incidents of the late trial which have occurred subsequent thereto.” Well, perhaps instead of using the word “trial” I should have said “question;” but what I wanted to convey was, that certain incidents had come under my observation, and they ought to be made the subject of a Royal Commission. Now, I really do not know what to do here, because I know very well that hon. Gentlemen are always very impatient when documents are read; but I have here before me six statutory declarations, one made by a man named Rochett, a man named Willoughby, a lady named Alexander, and three men named Locke, and Deacon, and Flinn. These statutory declarations were all made out in Australia. They are the testimony of persons who, if the Claimant had had money, would have been brought over by him; but having no money, of course he was unable to bring them. I may be told that I might send these statutory declarations to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, and that he would very carefully read them; but I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will not think I am casting any imputation upon him when I say that I would rather bring the people themselves before a Royal Commission to be held here. The question of money ought not to be brought into the matter at all. This is a case such as will not occur again in a lifetime. There has been no trial which has so awakened the feelings and affections of the English people, and Scotchmen and Welshmen also, since the trial of Charles I.; and there is a general opinion which, whether well-founded or not I shall not venture to ask in the presence of so many Gentlemen who have formed their own particular conclusions on the subject, that justice has miscarried, and that it would be forwarded by the production before a Royal Commission of these, and perhaps other, witnesses. The mere cost of bringing these witnesses over will not, I am quite sure, enter into the minds of hon. Gentlemen. They spend half-a-million of money in an armour-plated vessel which, very soon after she gets into blue water, turns upside down and goes to the bottom. Nobody grudges the cost of that, and if we are so extremely generous in matters of that kind, we ought not to mind money spent for the purpose of securing justice, and quieting the minds of the people of this country. I am quite certain that hon. Gentlemen know of the disquietude as well as I do, because there are daily reports in the newspapers giving accounts of the state of feeling amongst the people, not amongst the lower classes only, but amongst the more important and intelligent classes of individuals, who may be numbered by millions, there is only one general spirit of discontent. The word "discontent" can hardly describe it. Nothing has ever been equal to it in England. All faith in the administration of public justice is shaken, if not destroyed. This is a most melancholy state of things—particularly in England—the most law-abiding country that perhaps the world ever saw. I fancy that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary must have had many reports from the police with reference to it. The great thing to be admired in the people is that, notwithstanding their evident discontent and dissatisfaction, there has never been a single breach of the peace at any one of the numerous and immense meetings which have been held. There has never been anything but the greatest concord and good nature exhibited, coupled with the strongest resolve that the question should be inquired into. Now, I really do not know what to do with reference to these statutory declarations. I have no desire to weary hon. Gentlemen, but if I read them I cannot fail to do so. ["Read, read!"] I feel very greatly indebted to hon. Gentlemen who have called out to me to read. It is another proof, if that were wanted, of their willingness to sacrifice their own convenience to the interests of justice. [The hon. Member accordingly read the declarations in a summarized form. The first declaration, that of Mr. Rochett, upwards of 20 years pilot of the port of Melbourne, gave an account of the arrival of the men saved from the Bella, at that port. The writer's attention was particularly directed to one young man who had been a passenger in the Bella, who was thin, and and looked ill, and who—the hon. Member added—I say was Roger Tichborne. The second declaration was by Captain Willoughby, who was then mate of the Comet steamer in the port, who spoke of a number of shipwrecked men arriving, amongst whom was a young gentleman who had also been saved from the wreck. The third was that of Anna Maria Alexander, who said that in the year 1847 and 1848 she was well acquainted with Roger Charles Tichborne in England, and that in 1855 she met a man named Thomas Castro who was the same person. The original of this declaration was forwarded to the head of the late Government, from whose hands it passed into the Treasury, and he was sorry to say it could not now be found. The declaration stated that Castro was wrecked in the Bella, and that he was not tattooed. The hon. Member then stated the substance of the declaration of a Mr. Locke, as to the trial of Castro and Orton on a charge of horse-stealing, and also similar testimony of persons named Flinn, Wheeler, and Deacon.] Those, Sir, continued the hon. Member, are the circumstances connected with the first and last portions of my Resolution; and I humbly submit to the wisdom of the House that I have given sufficient reasons for an inquiry with regard to them. I now come to the middle branch of my Resolution, and in dealing with it I shall endeavour to be as short as I can. I am perfectly sensible of the indulgence which has been awarded to me, and I am shocked that I have been so long addressing the House. I have now to speak of the conduct of the trial. There are two Acts of Parliament bearing on this subject to which I wish to call attention, the first being the 12 & 13 Will. III., c. 2; and the second, the 2 Geo. III., c. 23. 12 & 13 Will. III., c. 2, sec. 3, enacts—

"That after the said limitation shall take effect as aforesaid, Judges Commissions be made, Quamdiu se bene gesserint (as long as they shall well conduct themselves), and their salaries as—certained, and established; but, upon the Address of both Houses of Parliament, it may be lawful to remove them."

2 Geo. III., c. 23, sec. 1, enacts—

"That the Commissions of Judges for the time being shall be, continue and remain in full force, during their good behaviour, notwithstanding the Demise of His Majesty (whom God long preserve), or of any of his Heirs and Successors."

"Provided always, and be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, that it may be lawful for His Majesty, his Heirs and Successors, to remove any Judge or Judges, upon the Address of both Houses of Parliament."

These Acts define the position and duties of the Judges, and provide for the manner in which they may be removed. As regards the latter point the statute does not say that a Judge may be removed for corruption, or wickedness, or villany, or anything of that kind; it says that he shall continue to be a Judge during "good behaviour," and how the words "good behaviour" are to be construed must be a question for any tribunal which enters into an investigation of the conduct of a Judge. Now, I wish at once to state to the House that I am not here as an accuser of the Judges at all. I am bringing before the House matters which, as a humble Member of this House, I think demand inquiry. If the House accords me that inquiry well and good; if it does not think an inquiry is called for I shall acquiesce in their decision. I am bringing forward matters which have been related to me. Everything that I say on the authority of others, I shall give chapter and verse for; what I say on my own authority I think I can corroborate, if it shall be questioned, by an appeal to the shorthand writer's notes of the trial. Now, Sir, I was brought into this case by Lord Rivers, who, as this House knows, has taken very great interest in the cause of the Claimant. When Lord Rivers waited on me, he called my attention to the fact that at the time Petitions were actually prepared, which were signed by large numbers of the people, praying that Sir Alexander Cockburn might not preside at the trial of the Claimant. At that period a report had been widely circulated that the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench had unfortunately committed himself to certain opinions with regard to the Claimant. It is obvious that I, who have been charged with all the crimes that have been committed, from the murder by Cain of his brother Abel downwards, could have nothing to do with all that, because it was done by the Claimant's friends before I came into the case. I do not know whether it was correct or not, but I was told, Sir, at that time, that you yourself had been consulted with reference to the presentation of those Petitions, and it was related to me that you had said they must be received, though you hardly fancied that the House would entertain them. I merely mention this to show that at that time there was a widespread feeling that prejudices existed in reference to this subject. My attention was also called to a letter which was sent to the Lord Chief Justice by one of his old constituents at Southampton, calling his attention to the existence of this widespread feeling, and asking him whether there was any ground for it, or whether it was merely an imaginary delusion, founded upon what the Lord Chief Justice called the other night "wild stories." Well, no answer was vouchsafed to the writer of that letter. I have a copy of it here, but I will not trouble the House by reading it. The Claimant himself, Sir, undoubtedly shared in the feeling which so many of his friends entertained; for among the other words for which he was brought before the Court for contempt in January, 1873, were the following, which were read in open Court:—

"Four years ago the Lord Chief Justice of England publicly denounced me as a rank impostor at his club. I know of others (occasions), but cannot prove them, so will not. But I can prove that he subsequently, within these last two months, at a party where a lady friend of mine was, distinctly turned round to those ladies, and said it was a disgrace to mention my name in decent society. ["Oh, oh!"] I think I have a right to call on him to answer for contempt of Court. I do not suppose they would grant the rule, but rest assured I will apply for it. And I maintain, ladies and gentlemen, that he had no right to sit on that Bench (to-day). At St. James's Hall my friend, Mr. Onalow, stated that the Lord Chief Justice was not a fit Justice to sit on my forthcoming trial. He gave as his reasons those I have mentioned, and that he had also, during the late trial, while sitting by the side of Judge Bovill, written on a piece of paper—'Had I been Judge, and you leading counsel, we would have had this fellow in Newgate long ago.' He was a party concerned, and if he had had the slightest delicacy for his honour he would never have sat on the Bench (to-day). So much have I heard, that I intend to petition Parliament against his sitting on my forthcoming trial. No doubt I shall be able to prevent him. If I do not, I will go into that Court without counsel, attorney, or witnesses, and let him crush me as he thinks proper. ["No, no!"] If the Lord Chief Justice has got to sit and adjudicate on my case, I will offer no evidence, but throw myself on the country." [Applause.]—[Criminal Law Cases, xii., 347.]

I must again entreat the House to remember that this language was publicly used by the Claimant, and language similar to it at numerous large meetings throughout the country, many months before I ever became acquainted with him. This is a complete refutation of those false speakers who charge me with having been the fount and origin of the present wide-spread spirit of rebellion. And the above words were used in St. James's Hall, London, some time in the year 1872. When, therefore, Lord Rivers came to me, and questioned me as to whether it would be desirable to present Petitions which had been numerous signed, praying that the Chief Justice should not, because of these prejudgments, officiate as Judge at the forthcoming trial, I at once said, that if such a design were seriously contemplated and carried out, I should decline to act as counsel for the defendant. I made a note of the answer which I gave, and with the permission of the House I will now read it. I said—

"It is impossible that in a case like this, the Chief Justice will be led away by his bias, or prejudice, or preconceived opinions. He aspires to an honourable place in judicial history. He seeks to rank with Holt. I will stake my life upon his integrity. He will set a grand and shining example to the world and to all future times of the most serene and perfect impartiality. It is the last great cause that he will probably try, and he will be glad to retire with unsullied glory from the Bench where he has sat so long. If he has committed himself to any opinion here, or there, think nothing of it—that very fact will make him more scrupulously careful, more zealous of his fame. The eyes of the world will be upon him; and he will behave like the very impersonation of Justice herself; and from the first moment of the trial till its end, you will see such a spirit of honour, equity, and fairness, as will exalt his name for ever."

I added to these words, that I should be no party to the presentation of these Petitions, as I thought it would be a public scandal and an evil of the worst kind to call upon Parliament to prevent a Judge from presiding in his own Court. And I asked for a pledge that it should not be done. Lord Rivers was not thoroughly convinced, and he proposed a consultation with the Claimant, asking my permission to introduce him to me within a day or two. I, of course, assented, and then it was for the first time that I met this most unhappy and unfortunate of men. At that interview there were mentioned the names of several persons to whom the Lord Chief Justice had stated in conversation quite enough to make anybody think that he was approaching the case with a highly prejudiced mind. And I am at this present moment quite satisfied in my own mind that notwithstanding any apparent denial that might be given to these alleged facts, that those denials would vanish away into mist upon examination by a Royal Commission, no matter from whom these apparent denials came. That is all I think it necessary at present to declare, and I say it upon my responsibility as a gentleman, a man of honour, and a Member of Parliament. The whole matter was fully discussed at that interview. The Claimant, much to my pleasure, and I must say my astonishment, and I think likewise greatly to his credit, agreed with me, observing that he was perfectly certain, not only that Sir Alexander Cockburn would try him fairly, but that he would come round to his side, and instead of being against him would be for him. The evidence, he said, was so strong that he was sure it would convince him, and there must be no further talk of Petitions against the Lord Chief Justice. There the matter ended, and we went into Court perfectly satisfied that justice would be done. I myself never for a single instant doubted that if there was a model of equity, justice, and fairness, it would be exhibited at that trial. How I have been disappointed and deceived the world knows. I regret that I must now call attention to what happened on the 13th day of the trial. The name of a hon. Baronet, a Member of this House, is mentioned in the memorandum I am just going to read, and therefore I wrote to him yesterday, begging him to be here. On the 13th day the defendant put into my hands the following extract from his diary, dated the 8th May, 1873:—

"Mr. Whalley has just told me that Sir Robert Peel told him yesterday that Lord Chief Justice Cockburn told him I was sure to be convicted, and that they had already made up their minds to give me fifteen years' penal servitude. Mr. Hendricks was present."

Now, Sir, I express no opinion upon that matter. I have and can have no knowledge of it; it lies between the hon. Baronet and the hon. Member for Peterborough. But if that statement be correct, I shall be curious to hear what can be alleged by any ingenious person in defence of the Judge of whom it is made, and I shall be curious to know how a matter of that kind can avoid being brought before the Royal Commission. If that be true, and I have no reason whatever for supposing that it is untrue, it demands inquiry; while if it arose from a misunderstanding or a misapprehension, it ought to be cleared up. I can conceive nothing of greater or more serious import than that a Judge who is about to try a case of great magnitude should declare on the 13th day of the trial, that the man would be convicted, and should even go the length of saying that the Judges had made up their minds as to his punishment. I received a letter dated the 22nd September, 1873, from a gentleman of position, whose name I am not at liberty to mention, but I have no doubt at all that if there should be an inquiry, he will come forward and substantiate everything contained in this letter. In it he says—

“If there should be any further discussion about the right of the defendant to make remarks in public as to his innocence and identity, I beg to submit to you that it would be a very proper rejoinder that he has quite as much right to do so, as the Judges who were trying the case, and who had openly made in society such remarks as—‘It is all over with the Claimant now; he is sure to be convicted. The Lord Chief Justice, to my knowledge—’”

[“Name!”] I cannot give the name. This is a private letter written by a gentleman of position, and I have always understood that it is perfectly Parliamentary for a Member to read a letter of the identity of which he pledges himself, although he cannot pledge himself to its accuracy. He says—

“The Lord Chief Justice, to my knowledge, and Mr. Justice Mellor, to my belief, have been making remarks of this kind for months past.”

That letter, taken in conjunction with the memorandum which I have just read to you, will be quite sufficient grounds for urging that further inquiry should arise out of this matter. Now, Sir, amongst the incidents of what I call the misbehaviour of the Court, was the pushing of the doctrine of Contempt to the outrageous lengths to which it was advanced. There is a belief in the public mind that the doctrine of Contempt was pushed to that length for the purpose of injuring the Claimant's cause, and undoubtedly it was used for the purpose of repressing the Claimant's friends. Mr. Whalley and Mr. Onslow were brought before the Court early in the January term, and were fined large sums of money, and reprimanded in very strong language. Mr. Skipworth and the Claimant were brought up during the same term, and Mr. Skipworth was fined £500, and sent to prison for three months. It was on that occasion that the statement of the Claimant that the Lord Chief Justice had publicly denounced him as an impostor at his club was read. I think, Mr. Speaker—and I say it with all deference to this House—that the Lord Chief Justice, knowing that language was going to be brought before the Court as a matter of Contempt, ought to have been present. He was not; he allowed the other Judges to sit in his absence, Mr. Justice Blackburn presiding for him. If I had had the honour of filling the Chief Justice's place on that occasion I should not have thought it beneath my honour, or unworthy of my place, for the sake of the public, to have come down to the Court, and when that language was read, to have denied it openly in Court. The Lord Chief Justice was of opinion that the Claimant was so bad and disreputable a person that it was beneath him to deny anything that he had said; but I put it to the House whether that was a proper reason for a Judge to advance. A Judge, it seems to me, ought to form no opinion at all upon the merits of the case, or the character of the man, he has to try. He ought to look upon every man as innocent until he is proved to be guilty, and he has no right to treat him as a man whose allegations are unworthy of attention. But that, I understand, is the way in which the Lord Chief Justice justifies to himself his not coming down and openly denying the allegations made openly before the world against him. Sir Alexander knew the feeling throughout the country. He must have been aware that he had incurred a great amount of obloquy and contumely for the unfair way in which he was supposed to have tried the Claimant. Allegations of this kind had been made throughout England, Scotland, Wales, and I believe a great part of Ireland, and I think he would have rightly consulted the dignity of his high office if he had come down, and when this language was read had solemnly denied it. However, it has never been denied, as far as I know, up to the present time. The Claimant was let off on that occasion as a piece of great benevolence; he received no punishment, though Mr. Skipworth did. Yet what he said was a thousand times a greater Contempt of Court than that which had been attributed to poor Skipworth. But now see how we are treated. In the course of the following term, Mr. Routledge published a book called The Tichborne Romance, which probably contained as frightful a series of libels and misrepresentations as were ever published within the two covers of a book. For that, when I complained of it to the Court, I could hardly get any redress at all; it was only after labouring a considerable time, and quoting passages which might bear upon the trial then going on, that the Judges consented to give me a rule. But what could be a greater contempt of law and public justice than, when a trial was about to come before the public, to write a book defamatory of the defendant, and representing him as a scoundrel and a liar from the beginning of his existence? Because it was calculated, above all things, being sold at every railway stall, to prejudice the mind of every reader against the unfortunate man, and teach them to believe that he was all that the writer alleged him to be. And yet, though I brought some of those terrible and dreadful passages before the Court, I could get no redress whatever until I showed a certain passage in the volume which by a remote possibility might reflect upon the trial, and then after great difficulty and in the most ungracious manner ever known I got a rule. That rule, however, was never served, because we thought from the way in which it was given it would be perfectly absurd to do so. If I show that the Court acted unjustly and unfairly in this matter of contempt; that it heaped all the punishment upon one side and gave all the rewards, as it were, to the other, that, I submit, is such misbehaviour as was contemplated by the two statutes to which I have referred. It is a mistake to suppose that corruption is the only ground for removing a Judge, and our wise forefathers, no doubt, after due consideration, used the extremely mild and gentle word "misbehaviour" which may mean anything; something very bad, and something not very bad; but yet sufficient to necessitate the removal of a Judge. I shall mention to the House a few instances of those cases, in which the Judge gave the Claimant no redress when he had been libelled by his adversaries. All the punishments and penalties were inflicted on one side; but neither was accorded to the other—the unhappy Claimant's side. We brought before the Court a Mr. Appleyard, of Farringdon Street, who had published some caricatures with reference to the defendant, calculated to do him the greatest possible harm. Mr. Appleyard pleaded that only 200 had been sold, and that the rest had been destroyed; but although 200 might have got into the hands of men likely to be on the jury, yet the Court visited him with no punishment whatever. I next brought before the Court the case of The Cosmopolitan, which had said that the defendant had been guilty of forgery and perjury, but there was no punishment for The Cosmopolitan. I next brought before the Court The Western Daily Mercury, which said that the defendant dyed his hair—a matter of the greatest possible importance—and it subsequently got so into the minds of the jury that they were perfectly satisfied he was a red-haired man, who dyed his hair black every day. There was, however, no punishment for The Western Daily Mercury. I next brought before the Court The Times, for what I called a libellous article, but there was no punishment for The Times. I brought The Times a second time before the Court for an article which I complained of, but there was no punishment for The Times. In the meantime, an unfortunate gentleman down in the country, a Mr. Cochrane, was brought before the Court and fined £150 for saying that the defendant was not Arthur Orton. Then came what seemed to me one of the worst and most scandalous incidents of this trial, one which cannot be defended, and which has entered most deeply into the minds of the English people. The defendant was a perfect pauper. His mother had £2,000 a-year, and she allowed him £1,000 while she lived, but when she died her affairs went into the Probate Court, the will was disputed, and the defendant was left penniless. He, therefore, had no means of getting any money, except by going about the country exhibiting his wonderful skill in shooting, and large sums of money used to be raised for him by persons fond of sport, not only for the purpose of seeing one of the best shots in the world, but of seeing a man who had excited so much public wonder and mysterious inquiry. He appeared at these shooting matches, as he was entitled to appear, in his name of Roger Tichborne. I should like to know in what name he was to appear. Was he to call himself John Smith or Arthur Orton? How was he to appear at these meetings, if not as Roger Tichborne, the man he professed to be? Yet because he dared to go to a public meeting as Roger Tichborne the Court said they would send him to prison if he went to any further meetings. I conceive that to be about as great an act of tyranny and injustice as was ever perpetrated. The man had no money to bring forward his witnesses, some of whom were in France, Australia, and very remote places. To deprive him of his money was to deprive him of his witnesses, and to deprive him of his witnesses was to deprive him of his liberty and, I may say, his life. That is a matter which should be inquired into and justified, if it can be justified. Again, for contempt of Court, Mr. Whalley was brought before the Court and fined £250 for simply saying that Luie was a true witness. That was the head and front of Mr. Whalley's offending, and if the House of Commons overlooks conduct of that kind, I certainly shall be very much surprised. Mr. Lewis was employed as an attorney for Luie, and because he made some remark in justification of his client, the Court absolutely threatened him with their censure. There is another matter of which I complain, and that is, that the Judges themselves gave evidence in the course of the trial. I will only mention one or two cases. The height of the defendant was a most material matter. Arthur Orton was measured when a growing lad of 18, and at that time his height was 5 feet 9½ inches. The defendant's height at the present time, according to the measurement of a person connected with the Horse Guards, is 5 feet 9 inches. A witness named Mr. Hobson, who had been a midshipman in the Navy, was in the box, and I asked the Judge to ask the witness whether seamen are measured in their stockings for their height. The Lord Chief Justice said—"It is one thing in the Royal Navy, and in the Commercial Marine another." There was a piece of evidence given by the Judge upon a matter of the most material kind. The inference sought to be conveyed to the minds of the jury was, that in the Royal Navy men are measured in their stockings, and that in the Commercial Marine they are measured with their shoes on. What was intended to be insinuated was that Arthur Orton was measured with his shoes on, and that so measured he would appear to be 5 feet 9½ inches, and the defendant measured with his shoes off was 5 feet 9 inches. In my judgment, it is misbehaviour for a Judge to give evidence. Again, two of the learned Judges visited the village of Tichborne. They visited a place there called "the Grotto." A photograph of the Grotto was produced in Court, and the Chief Justice, having inspected this Grotto, said from the Bench, in the hearing of the jury—"I think it reflects the highest shame and discredit upon the man who concocted that photograph." I could not cross-examine the learned Judge, and the jury took the impression from the Judge that the photograph was false. A very indignant letter was sent to the Chief Justice by the photographer, but he did not think it right or proper to call attention to that letter. It had also been insinuated that Mr. Onslow had been guilty of manipulating this photograph, and he likewise wrote a letter. The Judge said he would deal with it when he came to the evidence regarding Lady Radcliffe, but he never alluded to it, and Mr. Onslow remains under the imputation cast upon him of having been guilty of the crime of being a party to manipulating the photograph, though I believe him to be as completely innocent as the child unborn. I am glad that I am coming to a close; but there is another matter to which I must allude, and which gave great dissatisfaction. In consequence of the expression of public opinion respecting the payment of the prosecuting witnesses by the Treasury, it was promised that similar assistance would be given to us, and, after a great deal of exertion on our part, it was understood that our witnesses were to be paid. We accordingly brought up several witnesses, but the Chief Justice said that five or six would do as well as fifty, and, after hearing these witnesses, his Lordship stated publicly from the Bench that their expenses would not be paid, thus intimating to the jury that he did not believe their evidence. I ask, could there be anything more subversive of the interests of justice than an intimation from the Bench to the jury that he did not believe certain witnesses? Then our witnesses were treated rudely—I need not weary the House with cases—it will take my word when I say that many of our witnesses were treated very rudely, very insolently; but how can I go through the cases of so many witnesses in a reasonable time? There is another matter of which I deeply complain; I mean the manner in which the witness Thomas Castro was dealt with by the Court. Castro came from Melipilla to give evidence as to the identity of the defendant with Roger Tichborne. I saw him in the gallery, and he seemed to be a respectable specimen of a sensible Spanish gentleman. He looked down upon the defendant, and seemed to be in a state of agitation. He kept his eye fixed upon him, and walked up and down the gallery as if something were pressing on his mind. When the time came for examining Castro, we were told that he was raging mad. A medical man connected with the police was then called, and asked whether Castro was suffering under any delusions. The medical man said he was not, and then Mr. Purcell, a barrister, who had taken an active part in the prosecution, and had been out to Chili, was asked whether it would be safe to call Castro as a witness, and he said certainly not, thus contradicting the medical man. I was not allowed to see this witness who was reported to have gone mad, and in this denial I think that a very extreme amount of judicial power was exercised. I think that the jury should have seen the man, and have judged for themselves; but if he could have proved the defendant to be Roger Tichborne I can understand why the prosecution was not willing that he should be examined. I submit that it was an extreme stretch of judicial prerogative for the Chief Justice to refuse me permission to examine this man. Another point, in my judgment, was of great importance. I allude to the palliation of falsehood by the Chief Justice. Lord St. Lawrence had said that he made certain statements to the defendant for the purpose of leading him into a trap, and ladies had wrapped themselves up, and gave wrong names, for the purpose of puzzling him. I said—

“I have already expressed my opinion to you about ruses and equivocations, and I need not repeat what I think of a person who would be guilty of a falsehood. I see no difference. If any man or woman would deceive me by what is called a ruse, they would deceive by an untruth. I would have no faith in them ever after.

“The Lord Chief Justice: Suppose a man met you on the highway, and put a pistol to your brows, and told you to give up all you had about you, and you had concealed about your person a thousand-pound note, and you gave him your purse with ten shillings in it, and he asked you whether that was all you had, would you not tell him it was.

“Dr. Kenealy: No, my Lord, I should not.

“The Lord Chief Justice: Then you do not agree with Dr. Johnson, who was one of the greatest moralists that ever lived, that there are occasions when persons have no right to expect the truth from you, and that you have a right to tell a falsehood.

“Dr. Kenealy: I repudiate such language with horror, and I am sorry that Dr. Johnson should have committed himself to it.

“The Lord Chief Justice: I am not.

“Dr. Kenealy: It is opening the door to any amount of equivocation and fraud.

“The Lord Chief Justice: It is simply this, that every rule, however sacred, may have some special exception.

“Dr. Kenealy: I do not think there can be any exception to the question of truth.

“The Lord Chief Justice: I do not agree with you.”

Here was palliation of falsehood coming from the highest judicial authority in the land, and which, being circulated throughout the country was calculated I think to bring discredit on the Bench. As to Dr. Johnson being our greatest moralist, if this be a specimen of his morality I can only wish it were better. But I cannot believe that Dr. Johnson spoke thus; it must have been that Boswell in his half-whisky toddy moments misrepresented his patron. However, I cannot go further into detail. I state in my place in Parliament, and on my responsibility, that these things have taken place, and I have to add, pledging myself as a man of honour for the truth of my statement, that the summing-up of the Judge was most elaborate against the defendant. Everything that told against him was put forward in the most prominent light, whilst whatever told in his favour was left in obscurity. I will not say that the latter were not alluded to, but certainly they were not put in such a shining light as the incidents on the other side, and this I shall be able to prove when we obtain a proper Court of Inquiry. At present I can go no further. I cannot do impossibilities. I cannot expect hon. Members to follow me line by line through the summing-up of the Chief Justice; but at the proper time I hope to be able to prove that it was one-sided from beginning to end, and if I am able to do so, that will serve my purpose. And now, Sir, I have done. I have gone through a most ungracious task. It can be no pleasure to me to bring before this Court, the great high Court of the nation, a gentleman with whom I once lived in habits of intimacy and friendship, and for whom I entertained as sincere a regard as one man could entertain for another. I went into his Court with the strongest conviction on my mind that the man I was defending would receive justice. My interest was not to quarrel with the Judge, for every one knows that to be on bad terms with the Judges is fatal to the career of a barrister. I submitted, therefore, as long as I could, until the question lay between my duty and my interest. I might, by sacrificing my client, have kept on terms with the Bench, but I decided to sacrifice interest to duty. I did sacrifice myself to honour. For that which I have done in that Court I have been ruined in my profession, but I entertain no feeling in bringing forward this Motion—no feeling apart from a desire to do my duty. This unhappy man was never a hero in my estimation, although at the same time I differ from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, who described him the other evening as a man unworthy of our sympathies. The right hon. Gentleman will believe me when I say that for his conduct towards me in this House, I have no feeling but one of gratitude. But the country is not coming forward in behalf of this man, because they believe he is worthy of sympathy in himself, but because they believe he has been wronged.

I admit it is no light thing for three Judges who tried this case to find themselves arraigned as they have been. It has been said in the newspapers that I have gone about the country abusing the Judges. It is utterly false. Whatever I have said about the Judges remains in manuscript, and every word of the language I have delivered remains exactly as it was read, and there is no word of abuse of the Judges in that lecture from beginning to end. I have stated such matters as I have stated this night. Matters for which I have had to rely upon my own knowledge I have given upon my own authority; where I had them upon other authority I have given my authority. The whole question, as it now stands before the House, is a question of the law and the justice of England. If this House does not interfere, this man, who may be Roger Tichborne—whose mother lived and died in the undoubted belief that he was Roger Tichborne—this man may and must rot in gaol. I am sorry that the hon. and learned Gentleman whom I see sitting opposite to me, the Attorney General to the present Government, did not think it right or expedient to grant a Writ of Error in this case. I am sure that that hon. and learned Gentleman knows perfectly well that I have no feeling towards him but a feeling of admiration of his honour and his character; and he will not be offended when I say that he was brought up in the school of Equity, and that he cannot be supposed to be perfectly learned in Common Law. I think he could not in the refusal of that Writ of Error have acted upon his own judgment; and, if he has acted upon the judgment of others, it is to be lamented. There was, on the part of Tichborne's supporters, the most perfect desire from the beginning to the end of this trial that everything should be conducted in the purest and strictest way. It was not until the refusal of the Writ of Error—which, I say, would have been a Writ of Right in this case—by the hon. and learned Gentleman that discontent began to make itself manifest in this matter with any rapidity. An action was brought against an officer in the Petty Bag Office, to try whether the refusal to grant the Writ of Error could be justified, and I am sorry to say that that action was stopped by the order of a learned Judge. And therefore we are denied our Writ of Error by the dictum of only one man, and we are denied our appeal against that dictum by one Judge, and we have now no remedy but in an appeal to this House. I stated the other night that I should never again be allowed to bring on this Motion; and though the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham appeared to dissent from that, I believe, from the particular form which this Motion has taken, I shall never be able to bring it on a second time. Well, then, are we to have a Royal Commission or not? There are millions of people who, without such an inquiry, will refuse to believe that this trial was fairly conducted. There are witnesses upon witnesses whom we had no opportunity to produce at the trial. We were laughed at, and we were sneered at, in that trial, because we spoke of an old Hotel de Louvre in Paris. Witness after witness among those French priests said they had never heard of such a place; but now I am told that there was such a place as the old Hotel de Louvre, and that it can be proved by irresistible evidence. Now that is a most important matter, and if it be true that there was such a place, it could only be known to Roger Tichborne, and could never have been known to Arthur Orton, who was never in Paris in his life. I would implore hon. Gentlemen opposite in no spirit of hostility to them—because I have none—but in a spirit of most anxious desire that they should occupy the very highest position in the estimation of their countrymen—I would implore them to grant this Commission. Do not, I beseech you, in the face of justice and common sense, set yourselves against the almost intense and passionate desire which our people have at this moment for a further and a fuller investigation of the case of this unhappy man. Now or never is the time. I believe I shall not again be able to bring forward this Motion. I told the right hon. Gentleman the other night, and I repeat it now in the most sincere language of my soul, that if this appeal be disregarded, there will be a feeling of dismay and rage throughout the country. The intense and passionate love of justice on which Englishmen have always prided themselves seems wounded to the very tenderest core. I am convinced that nothing right hon. Gentlemen can accomplish can do more for the public good than will be done by according the Commission I ask for. The obstinate refusal of it will only increase the present feeling. Nobody can stop that feeling, nobody can tell where it will end. I myself look upon it as the most serious and grave feeling possible. I, myself, know the feeling there is among the soldiers of England. I do not believe or imagine that it will ever come to anything serious, because I believe there is quite enough common sense on the respective benches of this House not to do anything that will provoke the feeling of the people. The people of England were never more serious than they are in this matter, and I again implore that the Commission I have asked for may be granted. I will now conclude by thanking the House for the honour it has done me in according their attention to what I have said, and beg to move the Resolution.

MR. WHALLEY seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to be graciously pleased to appoint a Royal Commission, to consist of Members of both Houses of Parliament, to inquire into the matters complained of with respect to the Government Prosecution of The Queen v. Castro, and to the conduct of the Trial at Bar and incidents connected therewith, and certain incidents of the said trial which have occurred subsequent thereto.” — (Dr. Kenealy.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL was about to address the House, when

MR. MORLEY, interposing, said: May I ask permission, as my name has been mixed up with a gross mis-statement in the speech of the hon. Member for Stoke, to make an explanation? The way in which it occurred was in connection with a meeting at Bristol. A few weeks ago I was in Bristol, and was invited by the secretary of the Kenealy and Tichborne Association to grant an interview to four members of that society. I granted that interview—perhaps unwisely—but it fortunately took place at the office of one of the leading firms of solicitors in the city of Bristol—Brittan and Sons—and there were present a member of the firm, and Mr. William Terrell. I conversed freely upon the subject, especially with reference to the presentation of a Petition on the subject of the appeal made to-night, and I consented to present any Petition from Bristol which was worded in conformity with the Rules of the House. In conversation, the name of Sir John Coleridge was mentioned, and respecting that conversation, I was greatly surprised to see subsequently a statement, which appeared in a Bristol paper, and had appeared originally, I believe, in The Englishman, that I had represented Sir John Coleridge as having stated his opinion that the Claimant was not Orton. I am not disposed to rest my denial upon my own assertion, which I can assure the House is truthful; but the two friends to whom I have referred inserted a short note in The Western Daily Express—

“To the Editors of The Western Daily Press.

“Gentlemen,—We have before us a letter which has appeared in The Englishman, purporting to be signed by the four members of the Bristol Tichborne and Kenealy Association who formed the deputation that waited upon Mr. Morley. In this letter they insist upon the statement previously made by the secretary of the Association, that Mr. Morley told them that Lord Coleridge had given it as his opinion that the Claimant was not Arthur Orton. The conversation referred to took place in the office of Messrs. M. Brittan and Sons, and we were the only persons present besides Mr. Morley and the deputation. We are quite sure that the gentlemen who have signed the letter are under a wrong impression as to what actually passed at the interview in question, as our recollection is distinct that Mr. Morley did not attribute any such opinion to Lord Coleridge, but only referred to what his Lordship had said as to the exceeding cleverness shown by the Claimant in his cross-examination.

“We are, gentlemen, your obedient servants,

This letter was signed by the two gentlemen to whom I have referred. It states the exact truth of the case, and I have only to add that the statement of the hon. Member for Stoke is absolutely untrue.

MR. MILBANK: Mr. Speaker, I hope you will allow me to make a statement to the House. I wish to say that last Thursday week the Prittlewell Petition was read in this House, but I was unable to be in attendance from illness. It was not until the following day that I heard such Petition had been read to the House. The Petition, if the House will allow me to read, contained in one of the paragraphs a gross misstatement and falsehood—that is—

“That the Lord Chief Justice said to Mrs. Milbank, the wife of Mr. Milbank, Member for the North Riding of Yorkshire, several months before the trial of the Claimant took place, that he would send him, if he came before him for trial, to penal servitude.”

There is not one word of truth in that statement. I can give the words made use of. In the first place, Mrs. Milbank spoke to the Lord Chief Justice at a dinner party, and she said these words to him. She asked him a question concerning the trial—this, mind, was before the first trial ever took place at all. The Lord Chief Justice on being asked the question, replied—“I cannot give any opinion as I may have to try it on appeal.” On another occasion—if I could call that an occasion at all—Mrs. Milbank spoke to the Lord Chief Justice about three or four weeks after the first trial took place. The date was the 19th of June, 1871. I ask the House to remember the date, because it is insinuated by the hon. Member for Stoke—who has gone stumping the country through from one end to the other, telling the public—gulling the public—that this statement was made after the first trial, and, in fact, after the Lord Chief Justice was appointed to try the case at bar. Now, if the House will allow me, I will read the words that took place, and the House will then judge for themselves. Mrs. Milbank said to the Lord Chief Justice that Lord Rivers believed so firmly in the Claimant that she believed he would never give him up, even if he was found guilty. The Lord Chief Justice then said—and the House may believe in a laughing and joking way—and the Lord Chief Justice did not know Lord Rivers at the time—

“Present my compliments to Lord Rivers, and tell him that in that case, he may probably have to accompany his friend to penal servitude.”

Unfortunately these words were told to Lord Rivers, who happened to call next day, also as a joke. On these words, spoken long before there was any idea of the second or criminal trial, the hon. Member for Stoke has founded this disgraceful charge, which he has made in his speeches throughout the country. I thought it only fair to make this statement. I was ready for the hon. Member for Stoke, but you will observe that in his speech he never said a word about Mrs. Milbank or myself. I ask him now why did he not? I ask him now, did he this morning receive a letter from Lord Rivers, and will he, or dare he read it to the House from beginning to end? [Dr. KENEALY was about to rise.] I will not, however, trouble the hon. Member to do so. I have got a copy of it here. Lord Rivers sent me a copy of it this morning. [Cries of "Read, read!"] I will read you the letter. In it he says—

"To the Member for Stoke,—I received your telegram by post this morning"—he thought he had got into a scrape—"and send this to London that you may receive it early on arriving there to-morrow. I went to London on Monday, and accidentally called on Mrs. Milbank, whom I found very angry at the mention of her name in the Prittlewell Petition. Mrs. Milbank said she had this day seen the Lord Chief Justice, and reminded him of the conversation, which he at once admitted, and therefore Mrs. Milbank's letter to The Times was meant as denial of the accuracy of the statement and not a denial of what I told you. As, however, by the wording of the letter, the latter appears to be the case and you call upon me for an explanation, I am bound to give it that I may not appear as having told you an untruth. I must at the same time express my surprise at the unjustifiable use you have made of Mrs. Milbank's name and the breach of faith you have thus been guilty of towards me. When I gave you the statement I coupled it in confidence with the name of the lady who expressed her willingness to swear, if necessary, to the truth of the assertion before any one the Lord Chief Justice might appoint in private, but naturally objected to her name being made public use of. I certainly had a right to expect that the usage among gentlemen and men of honour would not have been departed from by you, and that a private communication, especially in which a lady was concerned, would have been held sacred. On the contrary, there is scarcely a platform in the kingdom or an issue of The Englishman in which there has not been a direct violation of the promise made to me by you."

DR. KENEALY: I beg to be allowed to answer the hon. Member although I have spoken before.

MR. SPEAKER: I may remind the hon. Member that he will have the opportunity of replying. ["Now, now!"] If the hon. Gentleman desires to make a personal explanation he is at liberty to do so.

DR. KENEALY: I feel much obliged to the House for allowing me to make a personal explanation. The exact words of Lord Rivers in the first or second interview with me when giving his reasons why the Petition should be sent in I will read as follows:—

"Mrs. Milbank: You are going to try the case of a friend—of an old friend of mine.

"The Lord Chief Justice: Who is your old friend?

"Mrs. Milbank: Lord Rivers.

Mr. Milbank

"The Lord Chief Justice: Who is your friend's friend?

"Mrs. Milbank: Sir Roger Tichborne—the Claimant.

"The Lord Chief Justice: Give my compliments to your friend Lord Rivers, and tell him I shall send his friend to penal servitude."

These words were published on the 1st of August, 1873. Lord Rivers saw them immediately on their publication, and Lord Rivers, after their publication, accompanied me to Milbank to see the prisoner there, and he never remonstrated with me that the version which I gave different from the present version, and never until this morning, when I received that letter had I the least idea that Lord Rivers was going to give a different explanation of it. I have received letters from him in the interval of a friendly character, which I can produce, if the House will allow me, but in no letter did Lord Rivers ever tell me that I had misrepresented what he told me. I asked Lord Rivers myself before the subject was printed in the paper—I sent him a copy of this very thing—I saw Lord Rivers the next day, and reminded him of it, and he said it was substantially correct. Therefore, I think it extraordinary that an entirely different construction has been put upon it in the letter that has just been read. I take the liberty, Mr. Speaker, of reading to the House two letters which I addressed to Lord Rivers, which I think are evidence of bona fides on my part. I may add that it is absurd to suppose that there could be anything confidential in a matter which was to be made the subject of a Petition to Parliament. That view of it is too ridiculous for comment or denial. On May the 21st I wrote—

"My dear Lord Rivers,—I sent you a telegram to-day of which the following is a copy:—'I hear by telegram Mrs. Milbank contradicts in Times your Lordship's narrative to me. Kindly let me hear upon this.' I sent the above to Princes Gardens; but not having heard from you in answer, I fear it may not have reached your hands. I am perplexed by this, knowing your usual accuracy; and cannot understand why the lady should have delayed until now her contradiction of what has been before the world since August last. I distinctly challenged contradiction the other night in the House; but none was vouchsafed. It may be that Mr. Milbank was not there; but surely he must have known of this long ago, and ought not to have allowed the report to be circulated without immediate denial. This is a matter of which the outside world will form its own opinion. I have mine. I am anxious to hear from your Lordship as to what I should do on Friday, when the case comes on, as I shall be sure to have the question raised in some way or other by Mr. Milbank or his friends. I can, of course, only refer to you as my authority for the statement. If you have anything to say upon it, I shall be glad to know.—Yours sincerely, “E. V. K.

“P.S.—I fully agree with what Onslow tells me he said to you—that where Tichborne's life or death are in issue, we must not, out of false delicacy, spare the over-nice feelings of any one. Am I right in saying the lady is a connection of yours by marriage?”

To that letter I have received no answer. I then wrote again—

“My dear Lord Rivers,—Not hearing from you in reply to my telegram, I suppose you are out of town and have not seen Mrs. Milbank's extraordinary letter in The Times of yesterday, April 21st. I looked into The Times of to-day, the 22nd, expecting to see an answer, or an explanation from you. I cannot understand the lady or her denial. If the statement was inaccurate, she ought to have set it right some time ago; but I fancy she must be under some mistake or want of recollection. The matter must be referred to by me to-morrow night in Parliament, and I shall have to refer to you as my authority. I shall leave here in the morning, and shall be at Gray's Inn from 1 to 3. At the latter hour, to the moment, I shall leave for the House where I wish to get a good and early seat. I hope to have the honour of hearing from or seeing you when I get to London or before I leave for Parliament. You always told me that when it came to the point Mrs. Milbank, though unwilling to be mixed up in such a matter, would boldly speak the truth. What am I to say or think now after her denial?”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the hon. Member for Stoke had at length had an opportunity of bringing under the notice of the House those circumstances of the trial of “The Queen v. Castro,” which, in the opinion of the hon. Member, supported his view that the trial had not been a fair one, and justified him in his application for the appointment of a Royal Commission, and he did not think that the hon. Member had any cause to complain of want of attention on the part of the House to the observations which he had felt it his duty to make. It would be an ill compliment on his (the Attorney General's) part to the hon. Member were he to suppose or suggest that the hon. Member had not brought under the notice of the House all the circumstances connected with the trial that appeared to him to be of importance for the purpose which he had in view. He did not forget that the hon. Member had, in the course of his speech, stated that there were certain other matters of a character similar to those which he had brought under the notice of the House, but which he had refrained from referring to; but he did not understand that the hon. Member intended that it should be supposed that he had omitted to bring forward any points which were material to his case. He (the Attorney General) was consequently entitled to assume that all that could be urged had been urged by the hon. Member; and at some risk of being classed with the little lawyers and pettifoggers to whom the hon. Member had referred, it would be his duty to examine and to analyze the statements and assertions which the hon. Member had made, and to see how far they justified his application for the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the various circumstances of the trial. Notwithstanding the disclaimer which the hon. Member had made at the commencement of his speech, he (the Attorney General) ventured to assert that the question which the hon. Member had brought forward amounted in substance to an appeal from the duly constituted criminal tribunals of the country to the judgment of the House. The prisoner Castro, after a trial of unprecedented duration, was convicted and sentenced upwards of 12 months ago; in the exercise of a right which he was entitled to assert, he applied to the Court of Queen's Bench for a new trial, and, so far as his advisers thought it necessary or expedient, he brought under the consideration of that Court, which comprised other Judges than those who presided at the former trial, all the circumstances that might have a tendency to show that his conviction had been contrary to the evidence, or that might otherwise indicate that his trial had not been a fair one, and the result was that his application for a new trial was unanimously refused by the Court. The hon. Member had referred to another incident that had occurred since the trial, and which more particularly affected himself (the Attorney General.) The hon. Member was quite right in his statement that the law imposed upon the individual who held the office of Attorney General for the time being the duty of considering the propriety of granting or rejecting any application that might be made to him for a Writ of Error; and such an application had been made to him (the Attorney General) in his official capacity on behalf of the prisoner Castro. That application was based upon various grounds, which were drawn up with great deliberation and care by Mr. M'Mahon, a gentleman who had been the junior counsel for the defence at the trial, who had formerly been a Member of that House, and who possessed great experience and astuteness, and he was confident that every point that could with propriety have been urged on behalf of the prisoner was stated in the Memorial which was laid before him. He (the Attorney General) must altogether decline on the present occasion to enter into any justification of the decision at which he had arrived in the matter, further than to state [that, in refusing that application, he had discharged what was a judicial duty, and a painful judicial duty, to the best of his ability: as, however, the hon. Member had suggested that the refusal of such application had deprived the prisoner of a right which, if it had been granted, he would have had of disputing the fairness of the trial, he (the Attorney General) must beg permission to point out that the grounds of error which were brought under his notice were purely of a technical character, such as that a portion of the original trial at which the alleged perjury had been committed had been held in the Westminster Sessions House instead of in Westminster Hall; that the case was tried by a Middlesex instead of a London jury; and that adjournments of the trial had occurred which were not justified by the rules of the Court, and various other grounds of the same character; but there was no statement referring to the merits of the case, or alleging the injustice of the trial, or misconduct on the part of the Judges who presided over it. The prisoner Castro having thus availed himself, without success, of the privilege to which he was entitled in the ordinary course of law, of endeavouring to obtain a new trial, had now, through the aid of the hon. Member for Stoke, brought the matter under the consideration of the House of Commons. The hon. Member for Stoke had an undoubted right to bring under the consideration of the House any question that involved injustice, oppression, or even mistake on the part of our legal tribunals; but the House trusted to hon. Members to exercise a discretion in such matters,

lest a valuable privilege should be perverted into an engine of mischief. He also felt bound to point out the great inconvenience that must inevitably ensue if the time of the House were taken up in retrying criminal cases that had been determined by the ordinary tribunals of the country. The constitution of the House and its mode of conducting business were ill adapted to the determination or consideration of complicated or controverted facts, and made it difficult for it to arrive at a right conclusion. But there was a still stronger reason, and it was this, that in the exercise of that freedom of speech which every hon. Member was entitled to in matters that were under discussion, it would be almost impossible to avoid being guilty of injustice towards absent parties who could not answer for themselves. With respect to the specific propositions of the hon. Member, he had proposed that the inquiries of the Royal Commission, for the appointment of which he had asked, should be directed to three classes of subjects — first, to the matters complained of with respect to the Government prosecution of "The Queen v. Castro;" secondly, to the conduct of the trial at Bar, and the incidents connected therewith; and, thirdly, to certain incidents of the said trial which have occurred subsequent thereto. The hon. Member had dealt with the first and third of these subjects in the first instance, and had postponed his observations on the second to the last, and he (the Attorney General) would follow the same order in replying to them. The hon. Member had introduced the first of these subjects to the House by expressing his own personal convictions as to the identity of the Claimant with Sir Roger Tichborne, and he assigned his reasons for entertaining those convictions. He spoke of his former client as being a perfect gentleman, of his having been recognized by Lady Tichborne as her son, and of the colour of his hair. But the hon. Member appeared to forget that all these facts, which appeared to him be of such great weight, had been laid before the jury by whom the case was tried; not one word had fallen from the hon. Member imputing any corruption to the jury, or alleging any incompetency on their part to understand the case, and yet they had decided against the prisoner in the face of the facts on which the hon. Member founded his present application. He (the Attorney General) thought that the House would be hardly justified in appointing a Royal Commission because one of the counsel said that he believed that the person charged was an innocent man, though he had been found guilty by the jury. Again, the hon. Member declared that popular opinion, to the extent of the belief of millions, was in favour of his former client, and that everybody believed that he was the real owner of the property of which he sought to recover possession; but that portion of the people to whom the hon. Member referred had not had the same opportunity of forming a just estimate of the merits of the case as the Judges or the jury had, and in all probability they had not read and studied the evidence given in the case with much care. When the hon. Member spoke about the existence of strong popular feeling on this subject, it must not be forgotten that the minds of the people had been much excited with reference to it by various publications and by speechifying, which had been carried on all over the country. That was the groundwork of the popular opinion, and that popular opinion had been created for a special purpose. The hon. Member, in the earlier part of his speech, had quoted some passages from a speech made by Burke, as long ago as 1770, upon a Motion by Serjeant Glynn for a Committee to inquire into the administration of Criminal Justice. The passages quoted by the hon. Member in support of his views that the conduct of Judges formed a proper subject for criticism in this House were eloquent and oratorical enough, but they contained very little argument. The hon. Member had called upon the House to remember the words of Mr. Burke, but he (the Attorney General) would ask the attention of the hon. Member and of the House to some passages in the speech of Mr. Fox, which immediately preceded it, and which appeared to be particularly applicable to the matter now under consideration. Mr. Fox spoke as follows:—

“We are told by the abettors of this motion that jealousies, murmurs, and discontents increase and multiply throughout the nation; that the people are under terrible apprehensions that the law is perverted, that juries are deprived of their constitutional powers, that the courts of justice are not sound and untainted; in a word, that the judges, like a dozen of monstrous Patagonian giants, either swallowed, or are going to swallow up both law and gospel. And how do they prove the truth of these allegations? The manner is pleasant enough. They refer us to their own libellous remonstrances, and to those infamous lampoons and satires, which they have taken care to write and circulate. They modestly substitute themselves in the place of the nation, and call their own complaints and grievances the grievances of England.”—[Parl. History, xvi. 1264.]

Such were the views of Mr. Fox, and the House would form its own opinion whether they or the passages quoted by the hon. Member from the speech of Mr. Burke were the more applicable to the present question. After having made some general observations as regarded his own personal share in the exciting of public feeling throughout the country, the hon. Member proceeded to indulge in some remarks which it was extremely difficult to follow. He appeared to attribute to the late Government some corrupt idea of securing the conviction of this man but for no assigned or comprehensible purpose. The hon. Member had used expressions which accused the Government of conniving at forgery, of having been the abettors of fraud and wickedness, and of having entered into a conspiracy to defraud this man of his rights. He charged them with having stuck at nothing to make certain persons hostile to the Claimant, and he asserted that one man who had intended to be a friendly witness had been converted into a foe by the gift of a Government appointment. He went into a long tirade on the conduct of Sir John Coleridge in reference to the trial, and suggested that he owed his promotion—which he said never ought to have occurred—to his present post—a post which he filled with much dignity and with great advantage to the country—to what he had done in opposition to the Claimant. In addition to all this he asserted, or at least suggested, that their conduct in relation to this trial had led to their ejection from office. He (the Attorney General) was utterly unable to understand the gist of the argument of the hon. Gentleman in that part of his case. He would, therefore, pass on to the third reason assigned by the hon. Member for the appointment of a Royal Commission—namely, that it was desirable to inquire into certain incidents connected with the trial, but which had occurred subsequent thereto. He had been curious to know what these incidents were. It appeared from the statement of the hon. Member that certain declarations appeared to have been made by parties in Australia, and possibly by some in England, which were not before the jury at the time the original trial took place, and it was intimated that want of money was the cause of their not being forthcoming. But if he (the Attorney General) recollected rightly, the evidence of one or two of the witnesses mentioned by the hon. Member had been produced at the trial, and the evidence of others might have been adduced if it had been deemed prudent to do so; he believed also that the junior counsel for the defendant had been in Australia himself, and had taken the evidence of witnesses. The hon. Member appeared to attribute much importance to a horse stealing case, as to which it would appear that upon a particular occasion two men, going by the name of Orton and Castro, were tried for horse stealing, and the inuendo of the hon. Member was that as Castro and Orton were both tried at the same time, they could not be the same persons, but it was no uncommon thing for persons engaged in that kind of occupation to change their names; and, therefore, to prove that a man named Orton or a man named Castro had on a certain occasion been convicted might be no evidence whatever of the identity of either. This seemed to be the nature of the materials which the hon. Member had referred to as having come to hand since the trial. His (the Attorney General's) impression was, that evidence of a similar kind had been given, but perhaps it had not been thought worth while to produce the whole. Under the circumstances, it was difficult to find in the incidents which had occurred subsequent to the trial sufficient reason for appointing a Royal Commission. Doubtless the hon. Member thought he was reserving his best shot for the last, and therefore postponed the consideration of his second reason for asking for a Royal Commission until after he had dealt with the first and third. With reference to the conduct of the trial at Bar, he had brought forward a variety of charges, the greater part of which seemed to depend solely upon the allegation of the hon. Member. In particular, he complained of certain statements which were said to have been made by the Lord Chief Justice to different persons, and which it was contended showed that that learned Judge had prejudged the case. As one instance he cited the authority of the Claimant for something which the latter said the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) had told him the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) had been heard to say he had been told by the Lord Chief Justice. That was a specimen of what the hon. Member treated as evidence and upon which the House was asked to act in the appointment of a Royal Commission. The hon. Member further told them that they were to treat any assertion made by the Claimant as though made by a man who was worthy of credit, but surely if a person had been convicted of perjury, as this man had been, without saying that he was utterly to be disbelieved in everything that he stated, the fact of his conviction went a great way to establish that what he said was not necessarily to be accepted as true. It was well known, moreover, how statements which were of the utmost insignificance, when spoken by one person to another, often became of great importance when the story had been constantly repeated by different persons. Another of the hon. Member's statements would illustrate this. A lady had happened to say that the Lord Chief Justice had once said to her that he believed the Claimant to be guilty—at least this was the allegation of the hon. Member—and although no doubt the words if used had had reference simply to a hypothetical case, they had been distorted into a statement that the Lord Chief Justice was determined, whatever might happen, to send the man to penal servitude. Other assertions of the same kind would probably be found on examination to shrink into nothing. Another allegation was that the Court of Queen's Bench, in the course of the trial, had, in an extreme degree, exercised its powers of committal for contempt of Court, as against the Claimant and his friends, while the prosecution were enabled to commit much greater offences without having to answer for them; but when offences of this kind had been committed, the offenders were punished, not so much for their comment on facts, as for the manner and the place in which those comments were made. When a mere country newspaper made a simple allusion or remark to the subject-matter of the trial, without any indication of ill-feeling or ill-will, it might no doubt be guilty of a technical contempt, but it was not to be punished in the same way as others who were actuated by different motives. If hon. Members would take the trouble to look back into the reports of the trial, they would see the difference between the cases in which punishment was, and those in which it was not, inflicted. The hon. Member had brought forward as one of the strongest instances of misconduct in the course of the trial, the prohibiting the Claimant from going about the country to the various shooting matches which took place for the purpose of raising money for the defence, but surely the hon. Member could not have forgotten that the occasion of those shooting matches was not availed of for the purpose of shooting only, but for the purpose of discussing the trial then pending, and that platform speeches were made by the Claimant and others in which persons in authority were brought into contempt, and that it was in consequence of the language used at those places that the Claimant was prohibited from going about the country. Then the hon. Member was severe on what he called "the conduct of the Judges in giving evidence;" but it must be well known not only to legal Members of the House, but to others, that there were certain matters of which a Judge must take cognizance, as being clearly within his knowledge, although not in the evidence before him. There might be circumstances which it was in the interest of everybody to have clearly explained, and which it might be in the power of the Judge to explain. The hon. Member, however, had not attempted to point out any of the instances in which he said the Judges had given evidence, with the exception of the circumstances attending the Grotto, and that, in regard to one point in the evidence, the Lord Chief Justice had mentioned that one class of sailors were measured in their shoes, and another in their stockings only; and surely if that well-known fact served to explain the evidence, it was right for the Judge to mention it. However that might be, it was difficult to find in such conduct any ground for instituting an inquiry by a Royal Commission. The hon. Member further charged the Lord Chief Justice with the palliation of falsehood from the Bench, and he read certain passages—which of course it was somewhat difficult to follow as he read them—in support of the assertion. No one who knew the Lord Chief Justice could suppose for a moment that he would palliate a falsehood, and he (the Attorney General) ventured to say that there was nothing whatever even in the passages which had been read which afforded the slightest foundation for such an allegation. The hon. Member asked the House to accept his statement, based on his recollection, of what had occurred on the trial, but he (the Attorney General) thought he was justified in asking the House to give the three Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench—with respect to whom not a breath of suspicion had ever before been raised with regard to their integrity, their honour, or their impartiality—some credit for having exercised sound judgment and discretion and common honesty in the exercise of their judicial duties, and he thought that the House would be of opinion that the questions before the Judges and the Jury had been properly disposed of. He did not know that he need occupy the time of the House further. Following the line of reasoning adopted by the hon. Member in support of his Motion, he had endeavoured, as far as he could, to analyze the arguments he had used in the course of his speech, and it appeared to him that the hon. Member had utterly failed to assign any good reason for the granting of a Royal Commission. Indeed, it appeared to him that on no one of the several points which he had urged had the hon. Member made out a case. All the hon. Member had said was, in effect, that if he were given a Commission he could call witnesses who might be able to dispel the mists which hung about his strange story. It was not, however, the custom, even in the Superior Courts of Law, to grant a new trial merely on the supposition that something might come out which might alter the complexion of the matter; and, even if the House of Commons were regarded as a Supreme Court of Appeal, he thought it would never adopt such a course as the hon. Member suggested, unless some most important and most cogent matters were brought forward for its consideration, and unless it was perfectly satisfied that there had been a miscarriage of justice. The hon. Member had referred to the case of Lord Cochrane, but the circumstances of that case, which occurred 60 years ago, were very different from the present. Lord Cochrane, having been tried and found guilty of an offence, a Motion was afterwards made for his expulsion from the House: that Motion was met by a proposal for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the facts of the case against Lord Cochrane, with the view of seeing whether what had been treated as proved in the trial could be controverted, but the feeling in the House was so strong against interfering with the decision of the Court that had tried him that the proposal was withdrawn, and the Motion for his expulsion was carried by a large majority; a subsequent Motion, made after his expulsion, was merely an application that, in consideration of the very great services he had rendered as a naval officer, the ignominious portion of his punishment—namely, standing in the pillory—should be remitted; but in the meantime the Crown, in consideration of the distinguished services Lord Cochrane had rendered to the State, remitted that portion of his sentence. Lord Cochrane was a Member of the House and of high and distinguished reputation in the noble profession to which he belonged—a man whose acts of heroism and bravery were in everybody's mouth; but even in his case, there was nothing which could be regarded as a precedent for the Motion before the House. In conclusion, he the (Attorney General) would only repeat that the hon. Member had had the opportunity, for which he had expressed himself to have been so long desirous, of bringing the case of The Queen v. Castro before the House. He had done it that evening, if he (the Attorney General) might be allowed to say so, in a manner and in a temper with which nobody could find fault. He had brought the matter calmly and dispassionately before the House, although, at the same time, he had expressed his views very strongly, as he had a right to do, if he believed in the justice of his case and the truth of his assertions. On the other hand, he (the Attorney General) had endeavoured fairly to meet the arguments which the hon. Member had adduced, and he submitted to the House that no case whatever had been made for the appointment of a Royal Commission.

MR. WHALLEY said, that the hon. and learned Attorney General, although a Chancery barrister, had answered the speech of the hon. Member for Stoke in a purely Nisi Prius speech; but he (Mr. Whalley) did not think that course of proceeding was at all the proper way to meet this great question, or one in accordance with the wishes of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham, who was looked up to with so much respect and reverence, he might say, in that House, or those of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, who had greater responsibility in this matter than he at present seemed to be aware of. Both those right hon. Gentlemen wished the matter to be discussed in that House, and as they said, settled and disposed of. The hon. and learned Attorney General had referred to public opinion, and he said the public feeling on this question was due to some such causes as gave rise to public disaffection at a remote period. He (Mr. Whalley) did not think that was a just view to take of the matter, and he emphatically denied that the feeling that had been aroused in the country in favour of the Claimant was in any material respect due to anything that the hon. Member for Stoke could have said or written. That hon. Gentleman had been severely spoken of on former occasions in that House about The Englishman, and he had been treated there very much in the same manner, in the opinion of the public, that he was treated in the Queen's Bench. There could be no doubt that the case of the Claimant was weakened by the advocacy it had received in The Englishman, and he referred to it as strengthening the application for a Royal Commission, knowing that the feeling of the public in favour of the Claimant arose from an honest conviction that he had not had a fair trial. He paid the expenses of the last 50 witnesses that were examined for the Claimant out of his own pocket, and it was not from the want of witnesses or money to bring them up, as alleged by the hon. Member for Stoke, that the public believed he had not had a fair trial, and had been unjustly convicted, but from the exercise of the power of Contempt in the suppression of public discussion, preventing the man going to private meetings, and to the course pursued towards his advocate, which rendered it impossible that the advocate, under the fire of rebuke and obloquy to which he was exposed, could do justice to his client. He was not there to arraign or defend the hon. Member for Stoke. If the man was innocent, and he had been found guilty in consequence of the hon. Member for Stoke having at an early period of the trial come into collision with the Bench, and that the jury could not find a verdict without appending to it a censure on the hon. Member for Stoke, was quite sufficient for the Motion. The hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) had denounced him (Mr. Whalley) as a mountebank. He accepted the compliment. He never felt more proud at anything he had ever done than the part he had taken in this trial. Seeing a man overwhelmed, as he thought, by a great power, and believing from circumstances within his own knowledge that he was the victim of a conspiracy, he supported him. The Claimant had been prosecuted under circumstances never before known, and he challenged the hon. and learned Member for Taunton, who had got up this case, to show a single instance where a man had been prosecuted by Government under similar circumstances. So convinced was he that the Claimant was the right man, that he would appear on every platform in the country, and beg from door to door for money, that he might be defended. It was from his attending many of these meetings that he ascertained that the feeling of the public in the Claimant's favour was based upon the broad facts of the trial, and not from any speeches that he had made, or any personal influence that he possessed. On none of these occasions was there a feeling that the Claimant had had a fair trial in the Common Pleas, or at all events in the Queen's Bench. It was absurd to suppose that this state of feeling was produced by the lampoons which had appeared in The Englishman. The House must be pleased to condescend to consider that they were not in all respects a competent body to decide upon this question, and that the end of forcing on the Motion would probably fail to be attained, for the House was a judge in its own cause. It had ordered the prosecution under circumstances never before known. Sir John Coleridge was counsel for the family in the case before the Common Pleas, and urged, or, at least, sanctioned the action of the Judge in the Common Pleas, and upon that evidence the Claimant was sent to Newgate, instead of a preliminary examination before a magistrate being allowed. The reason assigned by the public for that course being pursued, was that he was thereby not entitled to have any allowance for his witnesses. Subsequently, when questioned in that House, the hon. and learned Gentleman threw the responsibility of the prosecution on the Home Secretary and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and disclaimed responsibility himself, because he had been counsel in the cause. The present right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had, in like manner, refused to give any explanation concerning the expenses of that prosecution. In that case the House of Commons was responsible for a departure from common sense for allowing their officials to act on such information, and the House could not throw the blame from itself. Again, when last Session, having read a letter from the Lord Chief Justice respecting his being sent to prison, he moved that the subject be referred to a Committee of Privileges, the Prime Minister took upon himself the whole responsibility of proposing the Committee and nominating the Members. That Committee did not think the matter he brought before them sufficiently pertinent. The matter was simply this—because he had ventured to express an opinion that a man who had been committed for perjury was not guilty, he was fined £250 and sent to prison, because he declined to pay the money until he had some opportunity of explanation. This statement was contained in a letter written by him, but not published with his consent, in answer to what he believed was one of the most atrocious conspiracies by the detective officers of this country that was ever brought to the notice of the public. Subsequently, when he was about to submit the matter to the consideration of hon. Members, the House was, by the connivance of both parties, counted out. He mentioned these circumstances to show that the House ought to exercise some degree of special consideration before it rejected the Motion of the hon. Member for Stoke. He would now call attention to the letter respecting himself, written by the Lord Chief Justice a few days ago. In that letter, which was written to the hon. and learned Member for Ipswich (Mr. Bulwer), the Lord Chief Justice complained of a statement made by him (Mr. Whalley), imputing to the Lord Chief Justice that he had addressed to the hon. Member for Stoke language to this effect—"What would happen if the defendant should not be found guilty? What a moral and social disaster it would be if these high personages were convicted of perjury!" The learned Judge emphatically denied, and he was confirmed in that denial by the other two learned Judges, that he had made use of any such language; but all he (Mr. Whalley) had to say was that he did not condescend to make any personal explanation in answer to the Lord Chief Justice. With regard to the letter of the Lord Chief Justice, he recognizing the ring of that learned Judge's voice when the letter was read to the House the other day; but as he found himself, on reflection, seated on the benches of the House of Commons, and not in the Court of Queen's Bench, he felt considerable relief. What he wished to point out was the animus and tone of the language in that letter, which deserved the attention of those hon. Gentlemen who had charge of the Privileges of that House. He had consulted Sir Erskine May's book with reference to the question, and learned from it that to insult a Member of Parliament for what he had done in the discharge of his duties was a high crime or misdemeanour. What did the Lord Chief Justice say in that letter? He spoke of the "statement made by Mr. Whalley to the House of Commons" as being "so preposterously absurd and ridiculous that it carries with it its own refutation." The Lord Chief Justice, instead of using such language as that, might have simply said that the statement was not correct. Why should he say "preposterously absurd and ridiculous?" Why disparage an unfortunate Member of Parliament in that way? Besides, the statement was not "preposterously absurd and ridiculous." Since that letter was read, he had been inquiring into the matter, and Mr. Guildford Onslow had written him on the subject, a reply which the House, to whom that gentleman was not unknown, would hesitate to disbelieve. Mr. Guildford Onslow sent him a copy of a portion of the report of the learned counsel's speech as given in The Daily News, Dr. Kenealy had just before undertaken to prove that the whole story about the tattooing was a pure and wicked invention, and then followed this remark by the Lord Chief Justice—"Remember well the moral influence that the conviction of those high personages of perjury would have upon the country;" to which Dr. Kenealy replied—"Moral influence, my Lord, is not to be considered in a criminal case." But he had besides a letter to the same effect from the hon. Member for Stoke himself, and an affidavit from Mr. Harding, who acted as a secretary to the Claimant, and always sat by his side in the Court. The letter then went on—"It is not only untrue from beginning to end, but absolutely destitute of the slightest shadow of foundation." Were these Judges paid for exercising great volubility of language? Surely, they had a better field for the exercise of their powers than in vituperation, and in assailing Members of Parliament. The letter went on, in effect, to say that he (the Lord Chief Justice) could not suppose Mr. Whalley would intentionally misrepresent him in what he had done in the discharge of his judicial functions, for the purpose of damaging his judicial character. That, of course, deprived the Lord Chief Justice of the slightest excuse for using the language now complained of. The letter further stated that it was "difficult to suppose any one possessed of common sense could have been imposed upon by a statement so extravagantly absurd as he (Mr. Whalley) had made." The letter of the Lord Chief Justice was countersigned by Mr. Justice Mellor and Mr. Justice Lush, who said,—“We fully confirm what has been said by the Lord Chief Justice. Mr. Whalley's speech is entirely without foundation.” The hon. Member for Stoke, however, would no doubt be able to say whether the statement in question was without foundation or not, and he confidently appealed to the hon. Member, whether with his own ears he did not hear the words which he (Mr. Whalley) had attributed to the Lord Chief Justice. If the Government refused to furnish the House with copies of the shorthand notes of the trial, it was impossible for him to point out the particular statement to which he referred. He had, however, in his possession the affidavit of his friend (Mr. Guildford Onslow); but he could not search through that hay-rick (referring to documents) to find that particular needle. Let the hon. and learned Member for Ipswich himself look for what he wanted. But, in any case was it true—was it not palpably untrue, deliberately false, on the part of the Lord Chief Justice—[“Oh, oh!” and “Order!”]

MR. ONSLOW rose to Order. He wished to know whether the remarks which had just fallen from the hon. Member were not out of Order?

MR. SPEAKER: The language of the hon. Member, though strong, is not out of Order, not being applied to any Member of the House. I hope, however, that he will restrain his language.

MR. WHALLEY regretted that the hon. Member for Guildford had not allowed him to finish the sentence. He would act upon the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair, and would only say that if he had transgressed, he must plead excitement consequent upon indisposition as the explanation and excuse of his strength of expression. The real issue was not merely whether the man was guilty or not guilty; but if not guilty, why there existed a conspiracy—a great and outrageous conspiracy—a social and religious or political influence at work—which had so contrived to make its power felt on the justice seat, in Parliament, and even with the Government, to such a degree that public money had been used to prosecute him in a manner utterly unprecedented. That was the issue. Was it destitute of the shadow of foundation? He was himself personally placed under suspicion, not of having been cognizant of the man being an impostor, but of conspiracy; and paragraphs got about in the newspapers immediately after the trial that he and his friend Mr. Guildford Onslow were to be indicted. Detective officers were even sent over to Brussels to make inquiry of his own proceedings there, and the result was that one unhappy lady, of most respectable character, was absolutely ruined by the inquiries that were set on foot. One result of that debate would be, if the Commission were not granted, that those who sympathized with him would form an organization to discover the conspiracy which undoubtedly existed on the other side, and to discover it, too, without the aid of any paid detective or injury to anybody whatever, for a more deliberate conspiracy was never concocted in this country than the one to which he referred, the object of it being to deprive a man of his own property. That conspiracy was due to the religious influence of the parties concerned, who considered it expedient that the Claimant should be kept out of the estate. It was a contest with the law of England to see whether that influence—which was the religious influence directed by the great Catholic families of Norfolk, Arundel, and others, should prevail or not. That was his belief at the outset, and it was for that reason that he took up the matter, and he would never rest until the conspiracy was found out. Not merely for the sake of the man who was in prison. There might be others in prison on account of a miscarriage of justice; but the Claimant was there a monument of disgrace to the law of England; and he would either remain there, or he would come out. He was suffering under that subtle influence whereby many people were blinded and deluded. It was also those in high places upon whom the net of the Catholic and of Jesuit influence was exercised. It was on this platform that he should endeavour to keep alive the interest which was taken by the public in this question. The hon. Member for Stoke had been disbarred and deprived of his status as Queen's Counsel for his conduct on the trial. [“No, no!” and “Question!”] Perhaps the hon. and learned Member for Denbigh who said “No,” would rise and explain on what ground the hon. Member for Stoke had been disbarred. It was most important that the night should not be utterly wasted, and he wished the hon. and learned Member to explain on what ground the hon. Member for Stoke had been disbarred. The public looked to the matter with great interest, and considered the Government responsible for the origin and management of the prosecution, and yet the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) refused to give the House an account of the expenditure which had been incurred in carrying on the proceedings. The hon. Member was, as he had said, responsible for refusing the information that was asked for as to the amount paid to the witnesses, distinguishing those who were called and those who were not called. The hon. Gentleman, moreover, would not produce the affidavits which had been made in confirmation of what had been stated by the hon. Member for Stoke about the systematic forgery which had been committed in this case—showing that the jury were furnished with letters purporting to be written by the sisters of Arthur Orton which were never written by them at all. He had refused to furnish the House with those affidavits, and with the shorthand writers' notes which had been asked for. He would not further intrude upon the attention of the House than to remind hon. Members that the debate had been forced upon the House at the instance of the Government, with the sanction of hon. Gentlemen opposite to them, for the purpose of putting an end to the excitement and agitation which prevailed out-of-doors. On former occasions, it was stated that there was no necessity for discussion, and now it was stated that the House was constituting itself a Court of Appeal, in order that the decision might be final. Now, he thought that the course of the debate could not carry that conviction to the minds of the people. The entire point had been misrepresented by the hon. and learned Attorney General, who had represented that the agitation was entirely due to the hon. Member for Stoke. Now, he (Mr. Whalley) must repeat it was nothing of the kind. The conviction of the innocence of this man had been by every possible means placed before the public by Mr. Guildford Onslow and himself, when they were endeavouring to obtain the means of providing for his defence. Nobody disputed the evidence of the man's presence, demeanour, or language; or if they did so, they were soon convinced of their error. Having pointed out the origin of the agitation, the Attorney General was entirely under a misapprehension in supposing that the excitement exhibited by the public was attributable to the conductor of The Englishman. Before concluding, he wished to call the attention of the House to one circumstance, which, perhaps, might have some effect in inducing the hon. and learned Gentleman to do justice. The hon. Member for Stoke had referred to a species of forgery; but he did not fully explain the species of forgery which had been perpetrated on the public in regard to the exhibition and sale in the shops in London of certain autograph letters—one supposed to be written by Arthur Orton and the other by R. C. D. Tichborne. These letters were obviously in the same handwriting, and there could be no doubt that they were written by the same person. They first came to his (Mr. Whalley's) knowledge when attending a meeting at Oxford. He immediately went to Mr. Guildford Onslow and the Claimant, and asked what was the meaning of that. The Claimant said that the letter signed Arthur Orton was written by himself, at the dictation of a man who was sent over to meet him at New York. He (Mr. Whalley) made that statement to the meeting, and he also communicated the fact to the Government. If that explanation was true, he had this question to ask of the hon. and learned Gentleman. These letters were in his hands, and were placed by him in the custody of the officer of the Court of Common Pleas, who was responsible for them. Now, how did they get out of his hands and become exhibited in the public streets? After the Oxford meeting, a meeting was advertised to be held in the St. James's Hall. Endeavours were made to prevent the holding of that meeting, by means of an injunction in the Court of Chancery; and when the parties failed in obtaining that injunction, a shorthand writer was sent to take down what Mr. Onslow and himself might say, and out of that arose the proceedings for Contempt of Court. This House might enfold itself in the confidence of its own supremacy; but they might depend upon it that out-of-doors they would not be satisfied with the verdict of this House. It would only increase the excitement and agitation, and deepen and intensify the public scandal of the hitherto untainted and unsullied administration of justice. He would only add that so far as the hon. Member for Stoke and himself were concerned—as well as all the other fools and fanatics who took the same view of the question—they would be perfectly prepared to abide by the result of the inquiry for the institution of which they now asked.

CAPTAIN POLHILL-TURNER said, that as a brother officer of Roger Tichborne, he wished to be allowed to make a few observations. He wished on his part and that of his brother officers of the Carabineers, who had given evidence on the trial, to say that they had done so under the deepest sense of responsibility. He begged, he might add, to tell the hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for Stoke that evening, as he had informed him at the other side of Westminster Hall, that he did not believe in his client, who, in his opinion, had never been in the Carabineers, or even a soldier at all, and who, in fact, had told a great many lies on the subject. He should be the very last person to like to see a man who had been his brother officer where the Claimant was now; but he was of opinion that he was an impostor from the very first moment he saw him in 1867, and to that opinion he had ever since adhered. He had not the same hair as Sir Roger Tichborne, and certainly not the same nose. It was also remarked that his hair seemed to grow darker from day to day as the trial proceeded. No doubt, a good many soldiers gave evidence in the Claimant's favour; but they had not the same means of judging of the man that the officers had, and he believed that only two officers were found in his favour out of 16 or 17. Since the trial, he had seen no reason to change his opinion, and should be ready to give the same evidence which he gave on the former occasion in any Court of Justice. He believed that the Claimant had a full and fair trial; but the weight of evidence was against him, and he was convicted, and he thought that the verdict of the jury would be endorsed by every right-thinking person in the country. He would say, in conclusion, that he thought the Claimant as Arthur Orton in Dartmoor Gaol was "the right man in the right place."

SIR HENRY JAMES: Were there not, Sir, special reasons on my part why I feel it my duty to address the House I should have preferred to have remained perfectly silent in this debate. When a few nights ago the hon. Member for Stoke said he had been treated since he entered this House as a Pariah, perhaps those words fell with little meaning on the ears of most hon. Members, but to me they gave cause for reflection. For 20 years or more we had followed the same profession, travelling on the same circuit; and with regard to those years, I trust he will have memory now of nothing but amenity that ever passed between us. I fully appreciated his ability. I envied his great learning—and yet when he entered into this House I could offer him no welcome, I could give him no greeting. I do not tarry now, for there are serious questions before the House, to explain why I took that course; but I hope the hon. Member will think it was from no ill-will towards himself, and that every observation I make to-night will be affected by some recollection of our old acquaintance. I think I am justified in saying we have serious matters before us to-night, and if what is told us of what is occurring outside these walls be true, we ought, indeed, to treat this question as a serious one. I feel, in the first place, that the House ought to express itself as emphatically as it can that it has every desire to afford all opportunity for the reception of Petitions from subjects calling attention to grievances they believe to exist. Those words can scarcely be repeated too often. It cannot be expressed in too emphatic language that there is no hon. Member of this House who wishes to see the doors of it closed against Petitions that tell us of a grievance. I also trust it will be known to the country as the general feeling of this House, that it is the very right of the subject, if he has cause of complaint that there has been corruption on the part of a Judge, or that any Judge is unfit to fulfil the duties of his office, to place before us cause to address the Crown to remove that Judge; and if the hon. Member for Stoke had come to-night with a circumstantial statement of corrupt conduct on the part of any Judge—if he had shown grave misconduct sufficient to justify the removal of any Judge from the Bench—I believe his Motion would have received full consideration from this House. But if for one moment we depart from the principle of claiming that such a case shall be established before we proceed to investigate the conduct of Judges, let me point out to the House what would be the effect of the Motion of the hon. Member for Stoke. I must for one moment call the attention of the House to the circumstances under which it has now to approach the consideration of this Motion. I must say—although I do not think the form of the Motion reflects heavily on the hon. Member for Stoke—it is, as a matter of Parliamentary procedure, subject for regret that it should have appeared on the Paper in such a state; so general in its terms that no one could anticipate what matters would be touched on, or against whom accusations would be made, or whether corrupt conduct would be charged, and those who have to reply, can only do so on the same scanty materials. But, taking the Motion as it is framed, I will endeavour to deal with it according to the several heads into which the hon. Member himself has divided it. The most serious part of the Motion is the imputation on the conduct of the Judges. It is a charge against them of misbehaviour in their high office; and, whilst I will not discuss with the hon. Member for Stoke the meaning of that word “misbehaviour,” let the House consider what it is that must be shown before it can grant any inquiry into the conduct of the Judges. Now, Sir, the House will remember that there was a time when the Judges were the mere servants of the Crown, removable at the will of a Ministry, and it was not for the protection of the Crown, or for the protection of the Judges themselves, but for the protection of the subject, that the Judges were allowed to hold their office by a different tenure. It was in order that a majority, at the command of a Minister, or yielding to popular clamour, should not be able to interfere with the conduct of the Judicial Bench, that the Judges were allowed to occupy their offices so long as they conducted themselves properly. Then was taken away from the Crown, or those who represented it, the power of criticizing the conduct of a Judge, unless the Judge’s conduct unfitted him for his office; and when the term “misbehaviour” is used, it means not that the conduct of a Judge has been such that the House may disapprove of it, perhaps for words idly spoken, but that there has been corruption or some other conduct which equally unfits the Judge for his office. It is only upon that being shown and the charge established, that this House has the slightest right to interfere; and unless the result of this Motion is that the House will be prepared to move in conjunction with the other House of Parliament an Address to the Crown for the removal of a Judge, it is not the duty of this House to take action. What would be the result if the contrary were to be the case? Take, for instance, times of great political excitement. Take a time when there had been a political trial. It would be in the power of the Ministry of that day to demand from this House of Commons censure on a Judge’s conduct. Who would suffer then? It would not be so much the Judge as the subject who would suffer. Take, too, the case, not of a Minister, but take the case of a popular clamour demanding the punishment of a Judge. Take it that those who form part of this Assembly should be influenced by the demands of their constituents, or, what would be worse, by the clamour of the mob pressing around us, and then, yielding to such demands, by a vote we should ask for an inquiry into the conduct of a Judge who had tried a particular case in which he had defended the liberty of the subject. Who, then, would suffer? It was by the statute of 1700 that the liberty of the subject was protected by rendering the Judges above the criticism of Parliament. That statute protected the Judges from being interfered with in their official capacity. Then, Sir, the Judges were saved from one power—the vultus instantis tyranni—but there is the still greater power which we are contending against to-night—the civium ardor prava jubentium—and it is the rejection of this Motion which alone can defeat that still more evil influence. Dealing with these matters in relation to the Judges—before I refer to the other matters to which the hon. Member has called the attention of the House—I think, Sir, I have the right to ask this House what have been the charges made against the Judges who have tried this case to which reference has been made? Have they amounted to corruption? The hon. Member for Stoke says he makes no such charge. What, then, is the nature of the charge we have to investigate? Is it one of partiality, such as an advocate on one side very often thinks he sees in the Judge when he is trying a case? I will not consider the case quite in that way, because charges have been carefully and seriously made in this House, and the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) has used language that certainly conveys charges of grave misconduct against the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench. I have a right to ask, in the first instance, against whom are those charges made? They are made against Judges who for years have been subjected to criticism of different descriptions. They are made against Judges who are subjected, in the first place, to the severe criticism which the Bar ever affords to those that sit upon the Bench; and, whilst I have no right to speak on the part of my profession, I can say this, that I mingle much amongst my fellows, and I have not heard one syllable of condemnation of any act or word of the Judges proceeding from them in relation to any matter connected with this trial. I know that the charge has been made that the Bar is not prone to judge—[Dr. KENEALY: Hear, hear!] —is not prone to judge the Bench as they ought to be judged. [Dr. KENEALY: Hear!] I should like to quote the opinion of one man, in which, speaking of Sir Alexander Cockburn, he says—

“This volume is most respectfully inscribed by one who shares in the profound admiration, honour, and regard which the whole Bar feels for the Judge, jurist, and the scholar.”

Those are the words of the hon. Member for Stoke. He says, too, at the conclusion of a preface—

“And, having now rescued these productions from that species of oblivion to which nearly all Magazine literature is subject, and having been graciously permitted to send them forth on their adventure under the auspices of a name universally loved and honoured, I bid the final farewell to the muse to whom I have played truant.”

It is true those words were written some 10 years ago, and there may have been a change of opinion since then; but, if so, it is the change of opinion of one man only. As the hon. Member then wrote, the Bar of England feels now. The honour of the Bench is the very birthright of the Bar, and those who watch every act and closely scan every act of the Bench would be the first, if they saw a cause of complaint, for their own sake to denounce it. And now the charge must be, if this quasi-corruption, this misconduct, be true, that the Bar are making common cause to support the

Bench in a course dishonourable and disgraceful to itself, and one which I presume it is impossible to suppose could have passed unnoticed by them. There is another mode of criticism to which the Bench is now subjected beyond that of the Bar. It is the criticism of the Press. Has that power entered, too, into a conspiracy to pass unheeded any act of impropriety on the part of the Bench? It is also subjected to the criticism of a greater power, and that is the watchful care of the jury. Certainly, then, so far as the circumstances of this case occur, the Bar, the Press, and the jury must be subjected to one common attack because they have not been censors of the Bench. Before I refer to the treatment of the jury by the hon. Member for Stoke, let me point out to the House what would be the result if, upon a matter so stated by the hon. Member, we were to grant this Commission and to summon these Judges. What would be the answer of the Judges to the demand that they were to appear before a Commission—that they were to be arraigned before a public tribunal—that they were to have witnesses called against them, and to give answers to the charges? I imagine that no Judge would subject himself to the investigation—at least, he would not consent to remain a Judge at the time he did so. I should hope that, for the independence of the Bench, the same answer would be made that Lord Holt gave to the House of Lords when they summoned him before them to answer for a judgment he had given as Chief Justice in the Court of Queen's Bench. He said—

“I acknowledge the thing. I gave my judgment according to my conscience. We are trustees of the law. We are to be protected and not arraigned, and are not to be asked to give reasons for our judgment; and therefore I desire to be excused from giving evidence.”

In the same way now, if the Judges' conduct in relation to that which they may have said or done—is to be arraigned before a tribunal of this House without our having cause to ask for their dismissal, can it be conceived that Judges of independent authority will be willing to submit to such investigation? I know that it has been said in the course of this debate—“Why, if there be any ground of suspicion in the mind of so large a number of the community, why not grant an inquiry?" What does that mean? It means that we are to find a true bill as grand jurors against the Judges. We are to present them as guilty of an offence for which they can never afterwards be tried. And so now, because a popular cry has been raised by means of the false statement that there has been some irregularity in the opinion of the advocate engaged in the cause, we are asked, without one precedent for the Motion to be found on the Journals of this House, to cast this indignity on the Bench without its being suggested that any further step should be taken against them. It is not only an attack on the Bench, but also an attack on trial by jury. Twice has this cause been investigated by juries; twice have juries arrived at the same determination and result. I will not discuss the composition of the jury. I will read to the House the view of the Member for Stoke on the capacity of the jury who tried the last cause. On the 58th day of the trial he said—

"There is hardly any of you, if I may presume to say so, who did not come into the box with his mind inclined to a certain extent, prejudiced one way or the other. But although that is my belief—and you could hardly be men if you did not come here so inclined—I am bound to say, from what I have heard of you, I believe that twelve men more able to do complete and perfect justice in this case could not be assembled in the jury box; twelve men from whom (pardon me for saying—I do not mean to flatter, because I am above so base and mean an art) twelve men who could have paid more attention to this case in a more obvious desire to do their duty fairly and honourably, it would be impossible for any plaintiff or defendant to have had. Therefore, whatever your verdict may be, I have no doubt it will meet with the approbation of your country, because everybody must know and will testify to the whole world if necessary,"

May I ask the hon. Member for Stoke some day to bear this testimony?—

"That you are as good a specimen of an English jury as was ever presented, that you will do your duty between the Crown and the defendant without fear, favour, or affection."

A hundred days passed on, and on the 158th day of the trial, when the hon. Member was bringing his observations to a close, he said, addressing the jury—

"The attention that each and all of you have paid to this trial considering its enormous length, considering its multifarious variety, has been something remarkable, has been something most glorious and honourable in the annals of England. I have heard observations now and then expressly directed against the cause I represent. Nevertheless, I have had faith in you, and ever will have faith in you!"

Yet it was of a jury so composed and who had so treated him we now hear of their being venal and corrupt. When the hon. Member appealed to the Home Secretary whether he had not had cause to reverse the decisions of juries in criminal cases, I think it will be his experience, and that of every hon. Member of this House, that there never has been an instance where the verdicts of two juries, approved in both instances by the Judges who tried those causes, have been interfered with by a Minister of the Crown; and after the testimony borne to the jury who tried this cause by the hon. Member for Stoke, there can be no reason why an exception should be made in this case. May I now call attention to the view which the hon. Member took of the conduct of the Judges who tried the cause? On the 10th of March, 1874, some two or three days after the cause was finished, there appeared this paragraph in The Times—

"At the request of Dr. Kenealy, we withhold from publication the letter which, as we mentioned yesterday, he sent us on Saturday. Dr. Kenealy explains that, on reading over his letter in print, it appeared to him that it might be open to the construction of imputing partiality to the Judges who tried the case, and that nothing could be further from his intention than to make any such insinuation."

If he did not approve of that statement being made on his behalf, why did he not contradict it, and why was it sent forth to the world with his express approval, without his saying at the time that he intended to arraign the Judges on the first opportunity, either in public meeting or in the House of Commons if he obtained that position, for the very partiality to which the disclaimer was given? There are, however, one or two topics which nobody could have anticipated the hon. Member for Stoke would have brought before the House. I will not enter into the small matters of a Judge giving evidence, the propriety of a Judge visiting the locality—a common matter among Judges who desire to perform their duty—and whether a Judge used a particular word or not. Those matters, however, formed the ground for a Motion for a new trial. The hon. Member made that Motion; he brought these grounds on which a new trial could be granted before the Court of Queen's Bench, but it was refused, and, therefore, to the names of the three Judges who tried the case must be added the names of Mr. Justice Blackburn and Mr. Justice Quain. So, if any wrong has been done, if there is anything in the Motion which can induce the House to accept it, we shall have to sit as a Court of Appeal not only from the Judges at Bar, but from all the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench. Are we a fit tribunal for such a purpose? Have we any constitutional right so to act? What power have we to determine the numerous points that have been mentioned, beyond the great and inherent power which a Court of Law must have? What power should we have to act on any determination we might come to? Is it possible to conceive a more useless inquiry for this House to undertake than to determine whether the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench was right. But there are one or two topics referred to by the hon. Member for Stoke which I think require some answer. In the first place, the hon. Member attacked the late Government, and the right hon. Gentleman at its head. I cannot conceive the possibility of a Court of Inquiry to determine whether or not it was the duty of that Government to institute the prosecution; but if the question is to be determined by this House, can there be a doubt of it? If the unfortunate man was guilty, he was a criminal, who had been guilty of great and gross deception. I think it unbecoming to express any opinion on the matter one way or the other; but if he were guilty, surely he was an offender deserving heavy punishment; and are we to be told, because it was a difficult case to try, that the State should shrink from bearing a share in the expense which it assumes in respect to every criminal prosecution throughout the country? When the Judge committed the man for trial, was the Government to shrink from an expense which no private family could bear in bringing a criminal to justice? Although, upon the whole, the accusation against the late Government was light in its character, yet there was one grievous charge against it, which was that they had aided, abetted, and cherished an act of my noble and learned Friend (Lord Coleridge). This imposes on me a task which no one could have anticipated—to say one word in defence of the honour and truth of my noble and learned Friend. But the charge has been made with circumstance and in detail, and in language that is not capable of two constructions, that he uttered a forged instrument for the purpose of placing false testimony before a jury. Without any notice that this charge would be made—not even within the terms of the Motion put on the Paper—my noble and learned Friend has been arraigned and charged with an offence that seems to me exactly the same as that of a person who issues a fraudulent instrument, knowing it to be fraudulent. The incidents of this charge did not take place on the trial at Bar at all; but in the previous trial, and we ought to have been told something more than that the incidents of the trial at Bar would be brought before this House. But for an accident, my noble and learned Friend would have stood in this position—that without the slightest notice being given to him, minute details would have been entered into, and his very words read, without his having any opportunity of answering the charge. By mere accident, however, I have had an opportunity of conferring with my noble and learned Friend; and, with his sanction, I make a very simple and short statement of his conduct in relation to the dealings with those letters which have been referred to. In the course of the first trial four letters purporting to be written by the plaintiff were placed in the hands of the legal advisers of the defendant who were instructing my noble and learned Friend. They were submitted to an expert, Mr. Chabot, for an opinion as to their authenticity. He reported as to two of them that he was certain of their being the plaintiff's writing; as to the third, he had doubts whether it was the plaintiff's or not; and as to the fourth, the original had been written in pencil which was over-written in ink, and he could form no opinion as to its authenticity. That report was not seen by my noble and learned Friend, but the purport of it was communicated to him; and, finding that doubts did exist, he used the letters to this extent—not as the hon. Member for Stoke has stated by putting them before the jury as genuine, but he placed them in the hands of the plaintiff, and asked him to state if they were his letters or not. The plaintiff stated that they were his letters; and, having admitted their handwriting, he was asked as to their contents, until, looking at one or two of them, he expressed a doubt as to their genuineness. As soon as these doubts were expressed, it was brought to the knowledge of my noble and learned Friend that there might have been some deception in the matter, and he withdrew the letters from the consideration of the jury, and they were never placed before the jury again. That is the only statement I have to make on my noble and learned Friend's authority, and I ask the House—and may I not almost appeal to the Member for Stoke himself—is it fair or right, if his object is only to obtain the release of an innocent man from custody, to make such a charge against a public man behind his back—to charge him with uttering a forgery, when he has done no more than any advocate would have done, and when he has not been guilty even of an indiscretion in the course he took? I have almost to apologize to the House for entering into this detail; but I fear that if it had not been done, it would have been supposed—if not here where my noble and learned Friend is known—"elsewhere," that there is some shadow of foundation for a charge against that distinguished Judge, which, if there were any approach to truth in it, would render him unfit to administer justice in this land. And now, with regard to the Motion, respecting which it is said there is reason to believe that the defendant is innocent. Even if it were so, the House of Commons has no power to re-try him by Commission. It is not within their power to grant a Commission to try the innocence or guilt of a man; and I say the hon. Member for Stoke can find no authority by way of precedent or principle for such a proposal. The demand that the House shall re-try the guilt or innocence of a man is a demand against the liberty of the subject; it is a request to revise the verdict of a jury; it strikes hard home against the institution of trial by jury; it is a demand that the House of Commons shall, by a majority, at any time—by a majority commanded by any means, set aside the verdict of a jury at its own will and pleasure. When the hon. Member claims that he desires to protect the liberty of the people of this country—when Magna Charta is invoked, is it trial by jury that is to be invaded by the House of Commons? Are we to grant Commissions on the statement that fresh evidence can be obtained, or that the jury has misunderstood its duty in relation to the construction of evidence, and to set aside this verdict for that which might be said of any verdict—namely, that some may think there is cause to be dissatisfied with it? If we do, we shall strike a blow, the result of which can scarcely be appreciated. The power will be assumed now, for the first time, under circumstances which can scarcely commend themselves to our apprehension, and it is a demand which I trust the House will not entertain. The consideration of the smaller topics to which the hon. Member referred ought to be avoided, for if hon. Members do so, they will be forming themselves into a tribunal to review the decisions of the Bench and of juries. We are told that certain persons have made statutory declarations; but on what ground are we to consider them? Some eight years have now elapsed since the first investigation commenced, and there has been ample time and opportunity to procure every witness, and bring every question before the jury. Is it, therefore, not trifling with the House to say that upon the mere chance of some further evidence being produced we are to interfere? Why should the two subjects of the corruption of the Judges and the due administration of justice be mixed up together? If the Judges are corrupt, they ought to be removed; but take a proper and fitting course, such as will justify a joint Address, asking for their dismissal, by both Houses, and not such an unreasonable one as to ask for inquiry, first into their misbehaviour, next into the conduct of my noble and learned Friend, then into the power of the Judges in respect of Contempt of Court, and, finally, into the guilt or innocence of this man. If all these things are to be mixed up, what can be the function of such a Commission? I challenge the hon. Member for Stoke to say if there can be found any precedent for such an inquiry as this, and whether, since the year 1700, except in a case in which corruption was established, there has been any inquiry into the conduct of the Judges? The Resolution is an appeal to us to grant what, after all, it is not in our power to give; and I hope the House will feel that the demand is not an appeal to our justice, but that it is an appeal to us to depart from precedent, and to attack alike the position of the Bench and the strength of trial by jury. We were told a few nights ago that we stood upon a volcano, and that he who often lingered on the crater's brink bid us listen to the rumblings within. We have almost been told that if this Motion is refused to-night, before to-morrow's sun shall set there may be rebellion breaking out among a law-abiding people. I have no belief in such a dark prophecy. But should such outbreaks occur, we can gauge the limit of the evil, we may foresee the result of the disaster. But far worse than all such evil—more injurious than all such disaster—will be the result if the English House of Commons, yielding to ignorant clamour, shall vote away the independence of the English Bench and the proper and stable administration of the law.

Sir Henry James

MR. DISRAELI: The hon. Member for Stoke, Sir, will probably not be advised by Gentlemen of the long robe, and as no one has arisen except such hon. and learned Gentlemen, it may not be considered an inopportune interruption if, before the discussion closes, I make a few observations upon the Resolution. The Motion is made in consequence of an alleged miscarriage of justice; a miscarriage due to corrupt means and corrupt Judges, and there can be no more important question brought under the consideration of the House of Commons than a case of that kind if it be well founded. I have listened with much attention and interest to the hon. Gentleman, and I have acted as impartially as one can do upon matters which for a considerable time have necessarily occupied the attention of everybody in the country; and I am bound to say, having listened to the hon. Gentleman, he does not appear to me to have brought forward a case which would in any way authorize the interference of the House of Commons. I have not heard alleged any ground for that interference which has not been mentioned before, and which should have been mentioned on those authentic occasions which the law and institutions of the country provide for those who believe they are suffering under the grievance of a miscarriage of justice—such, for instance, as a Motion for a new trial, on which every particular the hon. Gentleman has adduced to-night might have been adduced and considered by the ablest Judges of the land. Then, again, with regard to other means by which a miscarriage of justice might have been prevented—namely, by an appeal for a Writ of Error, my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General has assured us that such an application was made to him; that he gave to the Petition the most sedulous consideration, but that he did not feel himself justified in advising Her Majesty to accede to its prayer. He has, however, this evening favoured the House with all the particulars of the Petition, and none of them were such as the hon. Gentleman the Member for Stoke has adduced on the present occasion in support of his Motion. On the contrary, all of them were, as we have heard, of a technical nature. Well, then, we find that on this occasion the House of Commons are called upon to take a step most unusual and which I think upon reflection we must feel to be pregnant with great dangers to the liberties and laws of this country. We find that the hon. Member had the opportunity of moving for a new trial, of which he availed himself, and on which occasion he might have adduced every argument which he has brought forward this evening, in order to prevail upon us to adopt a course of a most unusual and unprecedented character. We find that he had recourse to a Petition of Right, and that in that Petition not one of the circumstances he has brought forward now were included; but in which the merits of the case as then viewed by the hon. Gentleman consisted only of technical points which, as narrated to the House, must have been considered by every hon. Gentleman as of a most unimportant character. And my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, giving to the consideration of the matter the whole of his attention, found that he could not, with a due sense of responsibility, recommend the Crown to grant that Petition of Right. I may, remembering these two circumstances, remind the hon. Gentleman that he has never himself appealed to the Secretary of State against the conviction of Orton; yet appeals to the Secretary of State against convictions are not infrequent;

nor has the hon. Gentleman at any time ever appealed either to the Lord Chancellor of the present Government or to the Lord Chancellor of the late Government against the conduct of the Judges. The hon. Gentleman, however, now comes to the House of Commons complaining of a great miscarriage of justice. He has a day selected for hearing his case. He has an opportunity of stating it fully and completely, without any interference, if not to a friendly, yet I must say to a most courteous audience. He cannot, therefore, say that he has not been able to do justice to his case, or that he has appealed to those who have not had the candour to give him their calm attention. Yet what do we find? What is the result of all these great and solemn preparations? Why is the House of Commons arrested in the progress of its labours? Why are we threatened throughout the land with horrible catastrophes and impending revolutions? For what? To listen to a thrice-told tale, and if it has been told not without force, we must remember that it has often been repeated, and that the hon. Gentleman comes this evening with all the advantages of a practised actor who, after the provinces, comes to seal his reputation on the metropolitan stage. Perhaps I may be only about to repeat what has been stated before and in a more able manner; but I scarcely think it due to the question and to the circumstances that I should be silent. Let me, then, remind the House what are the three chief allegations which after all this preparation the hon. Gentleman has made. First of all, there is the charge against the late Government. One would suppose from the manner in which the hon. Gentleman expressed himself, and the mysterious air with which he alluded to this head of the charge, that the late Government had been concocting some plot worthy of Titus Oates; and that they had formed some deep and dark design which the hon. Gentleman indeed has not explained to us, but which the hon. Member for Peterborough has occasionally by dark inuendoes shadowed forth. What is the charge really brought against the late Government? Why, that they performed a duty which every Administration under the circumstances must have fulfilled—and they would have been liable to the gravest imputations if they had remained silent and passive. And yet this is the head and chief charge which has been made this evening—the most important in its character, the most material in its substance—the charge—namely, against the late Government of the country of combining in a dark conspiracy, in order to bring about a state of affairs which would have outraged the laws and Constitution of the country. Well, there has not been the slightest evidence adduced by the hon. Gentleman on the subject. He has only proved that the late Administration did that which would have been the duty of the present Administration had they been in their place, and which would be equally the duty of any Administration responsible for the due administration of justice in this country. The second great head of the hon. Gentleman's charge appears to me to be really the most trivial that can possibly be conceived. It is with reference to that strange expression, my just criticism upon which he has acknowledged this evening—namely, “the incidents of the trial which subsequently occurred thereto;” that is, as explained, the offer of evidence which would of course establish or strengthen the case of the client of the hon. Gentleman, but which he had not at his command on the occasion of the trial. My hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General destroyed in a moment that flimsy allegation. It appears—and of course it would happen under any circumstance when a trial of this importance has long engaged public attention—that after the trial there were offers of evidence in favour of the defendant. Well, there are always offers of evidence after a trial. The “day after the fair” is a proverb, and after a trial there is always evidence which ought to have been brought forward. After a division in this House, the minority would always have won only some were snowed up in the country. The minority, however, have not the power next day of counting the Members who did not arrive, and if evidence is to be heard after the verdict of a jury—often, probably, collected a considerable time after the verdict is given—legal controversies never would terminate. But what are the facts of the present case? A Commission was sent out during the trial to obtain evidence from Australia. They were there some considerable time. They made extensive investigations, and

I believe that some of the members of the Commission returned with very different opinions of the merits of the case from those with which they left this country, but on which side they changed their opinions it is quite unnecessary now to dwell. Well, as I understand, and as I understood at the time, there were certain statutory declarations made by certain individuals in Australia. They were not witnesses whose evidence was considered of sufficient importance and weight to bring over to Europe; but the statutory declarations arrived. Probably some of them may have arrived even after the trial, and this is the ground which the hon. Gentleman dwells upon as so important for the vindication of his client, and this is the evidence to obtain which in an authentic manner the House of Commons is called upon to interfere after the verdict of two juries in this great case. Well, now, Sir, there is but one point really important in this matter, and that is the third point, because it is one which if it were proved—if it rested on any real ground of substantial evidence, it would be of a very grave character. And no doubt the statements and misrepresentations—whether they were intended to be misrepresentations I will not now say—which have been made on this head out-of-doors have affected—and to no inconsiderable degree—the public mind, and that is the allegation that the Judges have been partial and corrupt in their conduct—because their misbehaviour would amount to corruption—and that by their arbitrary and corrupt behaviour a false verdict has been given in this issue. Well, I would now call upon the House to observe that against two of these three Judges not the shadow of an allegation is made. The name of one has not even been mentioned, and the name of another was only added on to that of the Lord Chief Justice in a supplementary whisper. It is against the Lord Chief Justice of England then that this charge is made. It is against his corrupt misbehaviour that the country has been agitated. What is the evidence that has been brought forward to-night by the hon. Member for Stoke, in order to substantiate a charge which never ought to be ventured upon unless it can be vindicated by testimony of the most irresistible nature? Why, Sir, we know something about Lord Chief Justice Cockburn. He is a man of transcendent abilities. He was for a considerable time a Member of this House. He did not belong to the political connection of which I am proud to be a Member; but I was proud always of being a Member of the House in which Lord Chief Justice Cockburn sat. His eloquence is remembered in this House, and when he left us to ascend to the highest tribunal almost within the Realm, he sustained the reputation which he had attained here and in the Courts of his country with learning and majesty. But it is not only as an eminent Judge that he has distinguished himself. He has shown himself a jurist and a publicist of the highest character—a man who can be trusted with the most important national interests; and who at a critical period vindicated those interests and sustained the honour of his country. But we must look to the idiosyncrasy of individuals when we have to decide upon questions like the present. The Lord Chief Justice, although he is a man of great learning, although he is a man equal to the exercise of the highest functions, and has employed a great portion of his life in the gravest and most responsible pursuits, yet he is a genial and social being also. He is not one of those individuals who enter saloons with Rhadamanthine gravity; he seeks, and properly seeks, some distraction from the cares and labours of a most exhausting profession and position; and is it to be endured that misrepresentations of the casual conversation in society of such a man are to be brought forward on no authority whatever, and to be made the foundation of the gravest charges in one of the greatest Assemblies in the world? We know very well—there is nothing on my mind more to be deprecated than the introduction of this private gossip of private life here. I have often—the House will pardon me for saying it—heard what I never heard when I first entered this House, of observations and opinions that have been expressed by hon. Gentlemen on either side in the Lobby repeated in debate. That I look upon as a most loose and unmannerly proceeding. One of the most brilliant Members of this House, the eloquent and amiable Mr. Shiel, was subjected to a most horrible persecution, because when the great debate was going on upon the Coercion Bill of Lord Grey, in which Mr. Shiel took a leading part, of course in opposition to it, while he was dining at his Club—the Athenæum, I believe—and solacing himself for the moment with a cutlet and a glass of claret, a dull man of the House of Commons came to his table and insisted upon gravely talking upon the Coercion Bill, which for the moment the brilliant Shiel had hoped he had forgotten. Wishing to get rid of this dull intruder who was unfortunately a Member of the House, he made one of those playful observations such as the Lord Chief Justice is said to have used. Upon which, this Gentleman came down to the House, and on the earliest opportunity impugned Shiel for insincerity, and made what is called a personal statement, which, I believe, cost the House of Commons two or three nights before it was settled—agitated England, and confirmed them for a long time in the belief that Mr. Shiel was the most insincere of politicians, because he had endeavoured to extricate himself from the toils of a bore. And so to-night, because the Lord Chief Justice goes to a party and meets—I regret that the name of the lady has been unfortunately introduced—one whom everybody acquainted with her knows to be a most charming lady—I hope she will not be too much mortified by her introduction into this ruder society—but because she being interested in the question pressed the Lord Chief Justice for an opinion, which, evidently, by the first account, he desired to avoid, and tried to parry with some of that gay fun which is permitted under the circumstances, all England is to be agitated. We are advancing upon a volcano, revolution is to happen to-morrow, and if a certain Resolution is not carried this evening, on the chance of which I will venture to give no opinion, to-morrow is to be marked with the darkest fate, and probably even this House of Commons may never again assemble. This, Sir, is one of the most preposterous things—I am not talking of the trial, I am not alluding to that singular history which posterity will not easily forget, and which it will philosophically criticize, but I am speaking of this interlude, or rather this second piece, this divertissement, as being the most preposterous, the most absurd, the most flimsy business that ever occupied the attention of the House of Commons. I only regret that a Gentleman like the hon. Member for Stoke, who is a man of talent and is, as I know, a scholar, should have by some hallucination wilder than has ever influenced a public man, destroyed a position and reputation which he himself created, which no one wished to injure or envy; and who, if he had only exercised a discretion equal to his ability and learning, would probably have found in due time his place in this House, and have secured many opportunities of vindicating those Constitutional principles to which he seems so devoted, and all the blessings which accrue from them, which he is ready by his own account to imperil, and, perhaps, to cause the destruction of to-night, by carrying this infernal machine, which he has described in the Motion before us. Sir, I will venture, before the House divides, to express my belief that the state of England and of the House of Commons, is not so terrible as the hon. Gentleman has intimated. Unfortunately, my excellent Colleague the Secretary of State for War is prevented by indisposition from attending here; but I do not think his indisposition is such that he would have concealed it from me if there were that danger of general mutiny in the Army which has been referred to by the hon. Member. My right hon. Friend, too, the Secretary of State for the Home Department has not broken to me the news which the more candid Member for Stoke has communicated to the House; I hope I may get home in safety to-night. But, Sir, what I do regret is this—that the people of England whom I have described before, and whom I shall describe again as the most enthusiastic people in the world—there are people more excitable, but none more enthusiastic—should have their fine and noble sympathies wasted on such a case; should be influenced by such misrepresentations, and be directed to such mischievous ends. Let the House for a moment consider what would be the consequence of the adoption of this Resolution, throwing aside all those melodramatic foreshadowings as to the probable consequences of its rejection. What must be the practical result if the House were to adopt this Resolution and were to act upon it? The House of Commons would become a great Court of Appeal, and we should at last have secured that object which has baffled the ingenuity of the most distinguished Law Reformers "elsewhere." There is not a case that could be tried in this country, the issue of which would not have to be decided here; not a question of master and servant that would not certainly be brought before this Assembly. It might become a great Court of Appeal, but it would soon, under such circumstances, cease to be a House of Commons. I trust that the House will show to-night in a manner that cannot be mistaken—will show the country that it has treated this question in the spirit which it deserves, and that we have availed ourselves of this opportunity which has been given to the hon. Gentleman in a manner becoming this House, and I hope, re-assuring to the country. The hon. Gentleman has had his occasion, he has been before the assembled House of Commons in no slight numbers, he has stated his case with ability and art, he has had every opportunity of marshalling his facts and managing his inferences, he has put forward his strongest points, and what have they amounted to? They have amounted to this—to bring conviction to the minds of everyone who has heard him that all this agitation, all this tumult that has disturbed the country for months had no solid foundation; that there has been no miscarriage of justice, and that England and Englishmen may still be proud of their institutions and confident in the administration of the law.

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, since the hon. Member for Stoke has taken his place in this House, I have felt it my duty more than once, in some sort, almost to interpose on his behalf. I have done so, as I trust the House has seen, from no other object than to show that every man who comes within these doors shall receive the most perfectly fair and generous treatment among us. I am unwilling, however, that this debate should close without stating some reasons why I cannot agree with the hon. Member in the proposition which he has submitted to the House, and why my name will be found among what, I trust, will be a very great majority against that proposition. I must confess I was rather disappointed by the speech of the hon. Member. I fancied, nay, I almost believed, that we should have had some very serious charges made against the

Judges. There certainly have been charges against the Judges brought forward in the speech of the hon. Member; but I am happy to feel that they have been of no important character, and cannot affect the judgment of this House in arriving at a determination with regard to the characters of the Judges impugned. But as the hon. Member proceeded with his speech, it was clear that what he wished to do was to bring into review and to obtain a reversal of the verdict in the late trial, and a reversal altogether of the sentence and punishment, because he declared his firm belief—and, in fact, if he had not had that belief it is difficult to know how he has taken the course he has taken—in the innocence of his client and not only in that innocence, but in the gross injustice of the trial. I want to put this question a little as it has appeared to my own mind, with the view that, by some good chance, I may affect the opinions of some persons outside this House. It seems to me a most monstrous thing to say that this case has not been fairly tried. Why, there has been no trial in this country so long—indeed, since the days of the trial of Warren Hastings, it is a trial of a length perfectly without example, but to that I will come by-and-by. Four Judges, one of them the Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, another the Lord Chief Justice of England, and two other Judges of a reputation equal to that of any Judge upon the Bench, have had the case under their consideration, and their judgment has been perfectly unanimous. It has been under the consideration of two juries chosen in the most fair manner; indeed, no one has suggested that the juries were packed, and it is impossible to look at the names, or, rather, at the occupations of the jurymen, without seeing that it is quite impossible, in our mixed society, to summon jurymen of a more representative and a more impartial character than were upon these juries. I noticed that on the last jury there was one country gentleman—I give no names, and, in fact, I have not got the names with me—and one city merchant; another was a draper; another was a publican—and I am not sure that there not two who followed that occupation; one bootmaker, whose knowledge of his trade was of great use at one part of this case; another, I think, was a man in the position of keeping a respectable lodging-house; another was a hair-dresser and perfumer; and another was connected with a business which has been very much before this House lately—that of selling milk. Now, I might safely leave it to the hon. Member for Peterborough himself to say that there was not the slightest suspicion that any of these gentlemen were in any way influenced by the Jesuits, and I might appeal to the hon. Member for Stoke to say that upon the face of this list, there is no reason to suspect that they were influenced in favour of the rights or claims of aristocratic and territorial families. In fact, I think that these 12 men formed a jury such as the English Constitution intended and expects shall be called upon to decide great questions of personal rights and liberties. On the occasion of the first trial the jury stopped the case, after hearing a prodigious amount of evidence in favour of the then Claimant, and they stopped it on evidence of a very important character, which the Claimant's counsel was unable to meet. I am not much versed in legal matters, but I understand that if the Claimant's counsel had chosen to go on, the trial might have concluded in the ordinary manner; but Mr. Serjeant Ballantine, who was the principal counsel for the Claimant, elected to be non-suited, and in that way the trial was concluded. On looking back to that trial, we do not find that anybody ever heard that Mr. Ballantine abused the Judge who presided over it, and I have not heard that he has condemned the jury, but he allowed the matter to pass. He had been unfortunate and unsuccessful, as the most powerful advocates may be, and, as one hopes that they will always be when their case is not perfectly good. Now I come to the second trial. It has been charged against the person responsible, who I suppose is my right hon. Friend the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, that no liberality was shown by the Government in the matter of the payment of the witnesses for the defence. But the Court was in favour of the payment of the witnesses for the defence. The three Judges whom the hon. Member has denounced as being partial, and as having made up their minds that the trial would end in a conviction and in a sentence of I do not know how many years' penal ser-vitute, were in favour of the payment of the witnesses for the defence. It was not to be expected, however, that the Government was to bring witnesses from all parts of the earth, of whose probable evidence no man had the slightest knowledge, and to pay all their expenses. But in the cases in which the Court refused to pay the expenses of any witness, the matter was argued in open Court; and I undertake to say that no impartial person who reads the account of this trial would say that the decision of the Court, not to pay certain of those expenses, was otherwise than perfectly just. The hon. Member for Peterborough has just now told us that those who were conducting the defence had no money, and that, therefore, they could call no witnesses; but he told us the other night that he himself had contributed £200 towards the defence. But I should like to know, if they did not call all these witnesses who, it is stated, were prepared to give evidence for the defence on account of the expense, why they did not call the two sisters, I will not say of the defendant, but of Arthur Orton—who, I understand, stated both before and after the trial, and, for anything I know to the contrary, may say now, that the defendant was not their brother—if he was not really their brother. The reason why they were not called was not because the defence had no money, neither was it on account of the distance they had to be brought; they lived in the East End of London, I suppose, and therefore it was not in consequence of want of funds that they were not called. Had they been called they might have made another link in that extraordinary chain of evidence by which a verdict was given and a conviction was obtained. I am not about to deny to the hon. Member for Stoke that there is a large amount of opinion outside this House in favour of the view he takes of this trial—that the defendant was convicted without due consideration. But it is not very difficult to create an impression of that kind. The hon. Member for Peterborough said, upon a late occasion, that the jury were wearied out, and that they had sat so long and heard so much that at last they gave a verdict so as to get away. That is a view I cannot accept, but still, when this trial has proceeded for so long a time, I am not at all surprised to find that many persons should be unable to follow the train of evidence. Consequently, if such statements are made persistently, I am not surprised at many persons outside the House being influenced by them. If the hon. Member for Stoke and one or two of his friends in addressing public meetings say over and over again to their audiences—"Do you believe that it is possible for a mother not to know her own son?"—that is a question likely to have a great effect on some people. But we in this House know perfectly well that it is a fair presumption in most cases that a mother will know her own son, yet it is possible to produce an amount and accumulation of evidence that will absolutely destroy that presumption. Many persons appear unmindful of the fact that in a claim of this nature it is not what a man remembers, but what he forgets that is most likely to be of importance in determining his identity. Nothing is more easy than for a man to remember a good many things about another man which somebody else has told him. It is quite possible for two or three persons to tell me certain things about any hon. Member of this House which may enable me for a time to pass myself as being that other Member; but in the case of a conspiracy of the kind alleged to have occurred in this case, no circumstance could make a man forget that which he forgot in the sense of forgetfulness shown by the defendant. That which he forgets if it be important, and if the facts be numerous, is that which he never knew. The effect of that forgetfulness is a hundred times more strong to condemn him than the effect of a few curious small matters which he may, by possibility, seem to remember, but which may have been communicated to him by somebody else. The House will pardon me if I go into or two points of detail with regard to this matter. The hon. Member for Stoke has done so more largely, and therefore I think I have some right to do it, and perhaps my doing so will be of use to some of the people who will read the proceedings of this evening. Nothing was more clearly proved than that the defendant knew almost nothing of his life till he was 16 years of age. He did not remember the names of his tutors—excepting one. He did not remember that he had ever had more than one tutor. I venture to say there is no man in this House who could not tell a good many things about his tutors, some of them not of a very agreeable character perhaps. Look at our own experience. We have all had a long life from the time we were 16 years of age; but every one of us could write a volume of the incidents of our young life, from the age of 5 or 6 up to 16. But in this case there was no memory. It was a blank. There were no persons who could give the information. The memory could not be cultivated. The whole thing was a forgetfulness which could not have come from conspiracy, but must have come from the fact that the person was assuming to be something which he was not. When it is asked, as it is in these meetings in the country—"Do you think that a mother can forget her own son?" I answer—"Do you think that a young man, who lives almost entirely with his mother till he is 24, when he gets to 35 or 40 can be totally ignorant of his mother's name?" But more than that, do you think that a young man who, up to 24, has spoken ordinarily and perfectly the French language, and can scarcely speak English so as to be fairly well understood, can at the age of 35 or 40 not only be unable to speak the French language, but can be ignorant of the pronunciation or meaning of a single word in it? He knows so little of it that he is advised not to attempt even to speak it. Now, I should like to ask any one, whatever may be the opinion he now has of the case, whether these facts—the absolute ignorance of all that happened till the age of 16, the total forgetfulness of the mother's name, and the entire disuse and total forgetfulness of the language spoken till the age of 24, and, in addition to this, I may say, the multitude of contradictions in which the statements he made were involved, for it is notorious that everything which he said while in Australia about his enlistment or engagement in the Army was directly and flatly contradicted in every particular by that which he said about his military life when he came to England—I should like to ask any man whether these facts are not conclusive against the claim which was set up? The hon. Member blames the Judges. Four Judges agreed, and he condemns them all. He does not seem to me very much to condemn the juries. Perhaps, like the hon. Member for Peterborough, he thinks they were wearied out, and would rather despise them than condemn them. I believe that juries not unfrequently make mistakes; but I believe also that in the main they honestly intend to do their duty according to the evidence given before them; and I think no person could read the transactions of that trial—I speak particularly now of the last trial—without being struck by the remarkable intelligence displayed by the jury whenever there was a call for any expression of their opinion. I was very often surprised to see how minutely they appeared to have in their memory all that had passed before, and how clear was their comprehension of the whole question as it was being offered to their view. And here let me tell the hon. Member for Peterborough that he must, I think, admit that the jurymen were not members of great families—that they were not allied to the aristocracy, that they were not even allied to the Jesuits. They were men as intelligent as he is with regard to their duty as jurymen, and I have no doubt he will admit, for I am sure he wishes to be fair, that they were honestly disposed to do their duty. Now, what should the House do? This jury was in the box—I forget how many days the trial lasted—every day and every hour. Some person wrote to me, or wrote of me, that I would not express a certain opinion if I had read any portion of the evidence. Well, I confess that I read all the evidence, so far as I could find it in the newspapers, and I read all the long speeches and all the summing-up of the Chief Justice. Therefore, I ought to be moderately well acquainted with the case. But I do not pretend to put my opinion against the opinion of that jury. Those 12 men are my countrymen, they are those to whom the law and the Constitution gave the power of adjudication in this case. They are as honestly-minded as I can be, and they sat in that Court every hour and every minute the trial occupied, and listened with intense attention to all the statements made by all the witnesses. Well, shall I set up my judgment against their unanimous judgment, or how shall the hon. Member for Peterborough or any one who takes his view set up his judgment against the judgment of that jury?

Mr. Bright

MR. WHALLEY: I rise to Order. ["Order, order!"] The right hon. Gentleman has misrepresented what I said. ["Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman is in possession of the House.

MR. WHALLEY: There were forged letters—that is all I said. ["Order, order!"]

MR. BRIGHT: I do not mean to say that he at all supposed or wished the House to suppose that the jury was not perfectly honest. All that he said against the jury was, that the trial was long and they were weary, and, in point of fact, they became almost incompetent to take a fair view of the question.

MR. WHALLEY: I said they had forged letters before them.

MR. BRIGHT: Now, I ask the House—I ask the hon. Member for Stoke—I ask the hon. Member for Peterborough—whether, with these facts before us—and I think that in no criminal trial could there be less reason to quarrel with the facts than in the present case—I ask whether it is right, whether it is tolerable, that great multitudes of people should be taught that the defendant had not a fair trial? If you go among the people and teach them that there was some dark design in this—some dark and mysterious conspiracy—I say you do a great harm to them, you mislead them, you wound them in their dearest interests. You turn them against the institutions which exist only for their guardianship and their good. I confess I am not squeamish about criticisms on the conduct of Judges or juries. I do not think that either Judges or juries are immaculate; but I say that, considering the facts I have stated—and they are but a very small portion of the facts which might be stated in support of the view I am urging upon the attention of the House—it is a great public injury, it is a great wrong, that Gentlemen of education, and occupying the position of Members of this House should seek to convince persons who could not by any possibility have had so good an opportunity of judging of the matter as the Judges and jury whose conduct is condemned—I say it is a great evil to teach such persons what I believe to be utterly untrue, that the Judges were partial and corrupt, and that the jury were mistaken in the view which they took. Sir, I can take no such view. I can take no part in such conduct. I would uphold the institutions of this country in the main as they exist with regard to the administration of justice; I think the poorest in the land has at least as great an interest in that being done as the richest in the land; and it is because I think this, that I cannot for a moment think of giving my vote in favour of the proposition of the hon. Member for Stoke.

DR. KENEALY, in replying, said, that he had, indeed, listened to much eloquence, but that when there was a very sympathetic audience, high flights of oratory became comparatively easy. He had paid great attention to what had passed, but not greater attention than the case and the speakers called for; but he was sorry to have to add that, although there had been fine specimens of oratory, it had been oratory merely. None of the facts which he had brought before the House—most important facts, in his humble judgment—had been grappled with from the beginning to the end. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had, no doubt, made an exceedingly clever speech on the matters which had been brought to the notice of the House, and he (Dr. Kenealy) had listened with great attention to the speech, but had been unable to discover in it any answer to his argument. It might be distasteful to the feelings of hon. Gentlemen to have a lady's name brought into a discussion of that kind, and more especially so, when it was apparently done for the purposes of prejudice; but he begged the House to remember that if a lady's name had been so brought in, it was not done by him. Her own husband it was who dragged her into notice. In connection with that incident, he could not understand the conduct of Lord Rivers, nor did he think the outside world would be able to comprehend it. But let those things pass. The hon. and learned Gentleman the late Attorney General had defined the offences for which a Judge could be removed from the Bench to be corrupt conduct and gross misbehaviour. He quarrelled with both those definitions; they were not in accordance with the law, and the hon. Gentleman ought to have known better. The law did not lay down that a Judge must be either guilty of corrupt conduct or gross misbehaviour before he could be removed from the Bench. The framers of the statutes on the subject simply adopted the word "misbehaviour"—a very elastic word, having great width of meaning. If a Judge went on the Bench in a state of open intoxication, that would be a kind of "misbehaviour" that would compel the House to interfere. In the same way, it was one of the charges against Chief Justice Scroggs that he was in the habit of cursing and swearing on the Bench—a practice which would be quite enough to justify the removal of any Judge in our time. Anything that was calculated to bring the judgment-seat into contempt was such conduct as ought to cause a Judge to be removed. Could anything be more calculated to bring the judgment-seat into contempt than the statement which had been made on the authority of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth, and which had not been denied, and as he believed could not be denied? Could there be a grosser scandal in the administration of justice than that a Judge on the 13th day of the trial, when not more than six or seven witnesses had been examined, should have stated publicly and openly that the defendant was certain to be convicted, and that even then the Judges had agreed on his punishment? If that fact stood alone, he was entitled to the passing of his Resolution. Were the House judging of the matter in a dispassionate manner, without that sympathy for the Lord Chief Justice which the speech of the First Lord of the Treasury had excited, bringing before them reminiscences of his genial temper, his love of fun, and all those qualities that made him so popular in fashionable society, he believed the House would have looked on conduct such as he had described as compelling them to cause an inquiry to be instituted. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government told them that nothing whatever had been adduced against two of the Judges; but what stronger thing could be adduced against them than the statement made by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth? In that agreement upon the sentence to be pronounced, made before the man had been tried at all, they were all equally compromised; all equally guilty. At the end of that remarkable summing up, which lasted so many days, the other Judges said they agreed in every syllable spoken by the Lord Chief Justice. He was told that there was no precedent for a Motion of this kind. He answered there was no precedent for conduct of that kind; and if there was no precedent, the House ought to make one. No harm could be done by inquiry. The right hon. Gentleman used an argument of an ad captandum kind, when he said this was an attempt to destroy trial by jury. On the contrary, he (Dr. Kenealy) was trying to uphold that institution. No one who read the summing-up could doubt that the jury in the verdict they gave were coerced. ["Oh, oh!"] The jury were not free agents; they were coerced. ["Oh, oh!"] They were misled by the language of the Chief Justice, who led them just as a fisherman might lead a fish with a hook in his mouth. He denied he had ever charged corruption on the jury; but while admitting they had exhibited an independent judgment during the trial, he declared they surrendered it in the end. He had heard with great astonishment the statement that the Judges would dare to refuse to obey a Resolution of that House, and he looked upon this as one of the greatest insults ever offered to that Assembly. They could not accept the authority of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister on matters of law, and, indeed, nothing could be more wild or wandering than the suggestion that he should have brought forward these complaints in a motion for a new trial. Such an idea struck one as more suited to Arabian tales of magic than to that Assembly. Equally wandering and wild was the notion of a Writ of Error embodying those complaints. He was sure the right hon. Gentleman did not get that idea from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General. Another wonderful argument used by the right hon. Gentleman with great power was, that no appeal had been made to the Secretary of State. Why, as far as he (Dr. Kenealy) was able to ascertain, the Secretary of State had hardly anything else to do except answering letters relating to the Case. Another astonishing argument put forward by the right hon. Gentleman was, that no appeal had been made to the Lord Chancellor against the Judges. They might as well appeal to a bootcleaner in the street as to the Lord Chancellor, who had no power whatever to regulate the conduct of Her Majesty's Judges. Then stress was laid on the circumstance that he did not call the two sisters of Arthur Orton. Why, what a ridiculous position he should have occupied if he had called those sisters! Mr. Hawkins or the Lord Chief Justice would have said in the blandest and most fascinating way—"Gentlemen of the Jury, these are two sisters of Arthur Orton. Of course, you cannot expect them to tell the truth; because, if they do so, they will convict their brother. You must, therefore, make every allowance for them." He was perpetually challenged by the Bench to put those women into the box, but he determined not to do so, and he did not regret that decision. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) laid down another very extraordinary proposition—namely, that there were certain cases in which certain facts could destroy the recognition even of a mother. He (Dr. Kenealy), at all events, never heard of such cases, nor was he able to imagine them. He did not deny that this was one of the most mysterious cases ever known. Indeed, he could not pretend to solve a thousand mysteries in it, nor to enter into the extraordinary mazes of that man's mind; but, as the right hon. Gentleman mentioned a fact which weighed very powerfully on his mind, he would mention another fact which weighed very powerfully on his own mind. He was present one day at the first trial when a long letter written by the undoubted Roger Tichborne was put into the hands of the Claimant. There was one word in that letter which had puzzled the experts and everybody to whom it had been shown, but as soon as the Claimant saw it; he said—"I wrote that letter, and the word is Correio," as, in fact, it proved to be. In conclusion, he wished to say he had no cause whatever to complain that he had not been listened to on that occasion with candour, patience, courtesy, and attention. If he had failed to convince any hon. Member that his Resolution ought to be carried, of course that was his misfortune and his fault, but if he could get any support he should divide the House.

THE QUEEN v. CASTRO—THE TRIAL AT BAR—DR. KENEALY'S MOTION.

THE DEBATE IN THE COMMONS. PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

LORD COLERIDGE: My Lords, I have most unwillingly to ask your Lordships' attention for two or three minutes to a matter personal to myself; and, being a personal matter, I have had great hesitation in determining whether or not I should trouble your Lordships with it at all. But I believe that a matter which concerns the honour and character of any Member of your Lordships' House, however insignificant, ought to be, and I have no doubt is, a matter of interest to the House at large. Other noble Lords, on other occasions, have felt it their duty at once and publicly in your Lordships' House to repel attacks made upon them, and when, perhaps, the consequences of remaining silent under them would be far less mischievous than they might be in my case. My Lords, last Friday night, in another place, the Member for Stoke-upon-Trent, in the course of some observations which he was making in moving for a Royal Commission, to consist of Members of both Houses of Parliament—

"To inquire into the matters complained of with respect to the Government Prosecution of The Queen v. Castro, and to the conduct of the Trial at Bar and incidents connected therewith, and certain incidents of the said trial which have occurred subsequent thereto," took occasion to make a long and elaborate attack on conduct of mine. My Lords, the substance of that attack was this: That when I was Attorney General, and when I had the conduct of the case of young Sir Henry Tichborne, in the civil action which was tried in the Court of Common Pleas, when his estates were sought to be recovered from him by the person who is now undergoing penal servitude in Dartmoor Prison for perjury committed by him on that trial, I put forward documents—false and forged documents—which when I put them forward I knew to be false and forged; that I asked the jury to act upon documents which I knew, when I so asked them to act, were false and forged documents; and that I had under my own hand written a confession that I did know them to be false and forged when I so dealt with them. That, my Lords, was the charge which was made in another place on Friday night. Nothing had been previously said or done by the Member for Stoke-upon-Trent which had suggested that any attack was about to be made upon me, and I need hardly say that I had no personal notice of it whatever. Indeed, I was addressing your Lordships on the subject of the Judicature Bill when the charge was made. It was made at great length and with considerable detail. It is true that I had heard from time to time that attacks of a like nature, and upon the same subject, had been made in a paper called The Englishman, purporting in its first page to be edited by Dr. Kenealy, one of Her Majesty's Counsel. But, my Lords, I do not see or read The Englishman. I have never seen above three or four numbers of The Englishman. I have treated, and shall continue to treat, anonymous slander with the silence of disdain. But, my Lords, it is another matter when an attack is made by a Member of Parliament, no matter who he be, and when it is addressed to the audience to which that Member made it. Now, my Lords, my hon. and learned friend Sir Henry James did all that was possible to do under the circumstances. He let me know the circumstances of the attack; he got from me as well as he could a statement of the facts; he made a powerful and eloquent use of those facts; and I am able to say with profound thankfulness, that I understand he stated them to the absolute satisfaction of the Assembly which was at the time his audience. But, my Lords, I state—and state with perfect truth—that if the slander had been true I should have been perfectly unfit for the station which I have the honour to hold, and that my right hon. Friend Mr. Gladstone would have been extremely to blame in advising Her Majesty to appoint me to any such station. Now, my Lords, the facts of the case are simply these—A certain Mrs. Pittendreigh was the wife of a copying clerk in the office of Messrs. Dobinson and Geare, who were the attorneys for young Sir Henry Tichborne in the civil action, and who were my clients. Mrs. Pittendreigh got into communication with the person who was then called “the Claimant,” and the Claimant's wife—how I do not know, nor is it in the least material to inquire.

Lord Coleridge

She brought to Messrs. Dobinson and Geare what purported to be a correspondence between herself and the Claimant, consisting of four apparently genuine letters from the Claimant himself, and a number of copies of letters which she said she had addressed to him, the originals of those letters of course being in the Claimant's possession. They represented a simple, natural, and harmonious whole, and they showed most unmistakably a knowledge of and an interest on the part of the Claimant in the fortunes and persons of the Orton family. Certainly the letters of the Claimant were most important evidence, if genuine. These letters—the Claimant's part of them—were submitted by Mr. Dobinson to the examination of Mr. Chabot, and Mr. Chabot, I believe, reported on them in writing. That report I never saw; but Mr. Dobinson told me what he understood to be its purport. Mr. Dobinson was a man of great honour and great intelligence, and I have no doubt that what he told me he told me truly. The substance of it was this—that as to two of those letters, Mr. Chabot was satisfied they were in the handwriting of the Claimant; that as to a third he had considerable doubt; and that as to a fourth it had been written over pencil marks, the pencil marks remaining in many places, and who had written the pencil writing it was impossible for him or for any one else to say. At that time there was no suspicion of Mrs. Pittendreigh's part of the correspondence. Her copies of her letters and the supposed originals of the Claimant's presented a harmonious and intelligible whole. There was a great similarity between the handwriting of the letters which Mr. Chabot believed to be written by the Claimant and those as to which he had doubts; and in the Claimant we had to do with a person who had before admitted that on other occasions he had written letters in a feigned name and in a feigned hand. Under these circumstances, my Lords, I formed the opinion that it was at least likely that the whole of this correspondence might be genuine. We had the tendered oath of Mrs. Pittendreigh, against whom there was at that time, though she had done an unhandsome thing, no serious suspicion. I had the resemblance of handwriting; I had a consistent, harmonious, and intelligent correspondence, and against that there was nothing but the doubt of an expert—that expert being Mr. Chabot—as to the handwriting of two of the letters. Now, my Lords, such being the case, I thought then and I think still that it was my duty to test the truth of the whole of that correspondence by doing what I did; and I think I should have ill discharged my duty by my young client if I had done less. What I did was this—I put the letters one after the other—one by one—into the Claimant's hands, and I asked him, one by one, if he had written each of those letters; and at first he admitted that he had written the whole of them. I then cross-examined him as to the contents of the letters; and after some time he recalled his first admissions, and while admitting that he had written two of them, denied that he had written the other two; and he also said, as well as I remember, as to one of the two which he admitted to be written by him, that it had been altered and an important word inserted in it. That is the impression made upon my mind, and was the impression upon my mind then, of the result of a number of inconsistent and contradictory answers. I then cross-examined him and pressed him with the contents of Mrs. Pittendreigh's part of the correspondence, putting to him that his letters appeared to be answers to those letters of hers, with copies of which she had furnished us, as being her side of the correspondence. He denied that he had ever received the originals of which these purported to be copies; and on my asking him whether he had received letters other than the originals of these letters, and whether he could produce them, he said he had, and would produce them. Later in the same day, or next day, he did produce letters from Mrs. Pittendreigh, and then it appeared that the copies Mrs. Pittendreigh had furnished to Mr. Dobinson as copies of her original letters were no sort of copies at all, and that her original letters did not fit in, as her professed copies did, with the supposed letters of the Claimant, to which they purported to be answers, and to form part of the same correspondence. It was plain that Mrs. Pittendreigh had deceived us—that she was a person upon whom no reliance could be placed; and when I came to address the jury on the case I withdrew every one of the letters I had put in, about which there could be the slightest suspicion, because they had come to us from a tainted source. I thought then, as I think now, that very likely the whole correspondence was genuine, but it was not worth while to enter into the question, because the only person I could have called to prove the letters was a person upon whose evidence nobody could be expected to act. Now, my Lords, all of that was stated to the jury by me. My speech was taken down in shorthand, and was published, and it was before the Member for Stoke-upon-Trent on Friday night when he made that statement in the House of Commons. My Lords, I can only say that if this thing were to be done over again, I should do it over again. I think no man in my position would have discharged his duty to his client if he had not done as I did upon that occasion. The letters never were put to the jury; they were never insisted upon by me to the jury; and they were withdrawn as soon as I myself was satisfied that they were evidence upon which the jury could not be expected to act. My Lords, I was leading counsel in that case, and I hold it to be unmanly to attempt to share my responsibility with any of my colleagues. The responsibility was mine, and I accept it. But, my Lords, I had colleagues. I had colleagues who knew what I did then, and who know it now. Those colleagues were Mr. Hawkins, Sir George Honynman, Mr. Chapman Barber, and Mr. Charles Bowen. They were my friends then—they are my friends now—some of them my intimate and affectionate friends. My Lords, one other word and I have done. When subsequently, during the criminal trial in the Court of Queen's Bench, Dr. Kenealy attacked Mr. Dobinson in no measured language for his conduct in respect to those letters, I wrote to Mr. Hawkins a letter, which has been published in the public prints, taking upon myself the whole responsibility of what I had done. Mr. Dobinson was dead; Mr. Dobinson had been my friend; he was a man of high honour and absolute integrity, and I did not wish, if I could help it, that he being dead should be blamed for a matter as to which—if there was any blame in connection with it—I thought myself at least as blamable as he was. And, my Lords, I am thankful that Mr. Dobinson's family, and those who value Mr. Dobinson's honour, do not blame me in any degree for the course which I thought it my duty to take on that occasion. Now, this, my Lords, is the whole of my connection with these so-called forged letters. This is the answer that I make to the slander of Friday night. I forbear from comment; I will not stoop to retort. I leave it to your Lordships and to my profession—among whom I have practised long and largely, and, I hope, with unstained honour—to say whether I have done anything which ought to cause my friends to blush for me, or my foes, if I have them, to rejoice. My Lords, I thank you very much for being kind enough to listen to what I had to say. I am perfectly aware—no man knows it better—that so far as claim of ancient descent or lofty rank is concerned, I, one of the people and sprung from them, have no claim to stand among your Lordships as an English nobleman; but I do claim, in point of honour and integrity, to be the perfect equal of the proudest Peer in your Lordships' House. My Lords, I have made these observations because I felt that when thus attacked it was my duty to meet the charge once and for all, and to satisfy your Lordships—as I hope I have—that at least on this score your Lordships have no reason to be ashamed of the last man whom the profession of the Law has sent by the grace of the Queen into this great Assembly.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I am not surprised that my noble and learned Friend has desired to make to your Lordships the statement he has now done; but not because the charge made against him could have for one moment been entertained by anyone whom he has addressed in this House. My Lords, all who know the personal character of my noble and learned Friend, and those who know his public and his professional character, could not have hesitated—would have been perfectly certain—that the charge made against him was not only without foundation, but that it had not a tatter or a shred of foundation. My Lords, I go further—I venture to say that any person who dispassionately considered what that charge was could not have failed to arrive at the conclusion that the charge on the face of it was ridiculous and absurd. But, my Lords, the charge was made, and made in a place where charges of that kind are not accustomed to be made without reflection; and the charge having been made against one who occupies one of the highest judicial positions in the country, I am not surprised that my noble and learned Friend should take the opportunity of referring to it, and of giving to it the most indignant denial in your Lordships' House. My Lords, I wish I could think that this charge, having now been made—not privately, not anonymously, not in the columns of a newspaper—but publicly and in the face of day, and having now been contradicted with publicity equal to that which accompanied it when it was made, and that not only it but the other charges by which it has been accompanied have been met and have been repudiated, and have been shown in public discussion to be incapable of being sustained—I wish I could think that we had now heard the last of them. But I can only say that if charges of this kind continue to be repeated they can only recoil upon the heads of those who make them.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND—CHURCH BUILDING AND RESTORATION
—THE RETURNS.—QUESTION.

LORD HAMPTON asked the Lord Steward, Whether the Return ordered by this House last Session of the number of churches built or restored at a cost exceeding £500 since 1840 is likely soon to be presented; and asked, further, whether there is in the Home Office or other Government offices any system by which reasonable assistance may be afforded to those persons whose duty it may be to furnish such Returns as are from time to time ordered by either House of Parliament; if not, whether it is not desirable that arrangements should be made for affording such facilities?

EARL BEAUCHAMP, in reply, said, it must be borne in mind that the Returns to which the noble Lord referred were voluntary Returns, and that therefore the Government could not exercise much pressure in obtaining them. When moving for them the noble Lord had not asked that the Government should make any special arrangements for procuring them. The course taken was this—the Home Office had communicated with the Archbishops, and he believed that in such cases the usual course was for the two most rev. Prelates to communicate with their Suffragans. The Bishops communicated with the Archdeacons, these with the Rural Deans, and the latter with the clergy. Returns had been received from 13 dioceses in the Province of Canterbury, and he believed that progress was being made in the Province of York. As to the latter part of his noble Friend's Question, as he did not understand the meaning his noble Friend attached to the word "facilities" he was unable to give an answer.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, that in the case of many churches consecrated by him, those by whom they were built had frequently desired that the full extent of their munificence should not be known, and it might turn out that the information desired by his noble Friend could not be furnished. He and his clergy would endeavour to make the Returns as complete as possible; but it was a matter for consideration whether, looking at the value of the Returns and the great expense incurred, the House should not make such an Order as should guide the clergy in making better Returns, if the present Order was not precise enough.

RAILWAY TRAINS REGULATION BILL.

(The Lord Redesdale.)

(NO. 50.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD REDESDALE, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time said, that he had introduced it in consequence of the action of the Midland Company in doing away with second-class carriages; but Parliament having given the Railway Companies a monopoly of the passenger traffic, he considered it to be also the duty of Parliament to see that the conditions on which that monopoly was given were fully and fairly carried out. The Midland Railway Company had recently, as he had said, come to the determination to abolish second-class carriages. If they were justified in doing that, they would be equally justified in abolishing first-class carriages also, or third-class, and saying they would run one class only. There was no actual law compelling a railway company to have three classes of carriages; but clearly it was the intention of Parliament that there should be three classes on all lines—otherwise why should there be a maximum of three several scales of fares in railway Bills? If it was not intended that there should be three classes of carriages one maximum for one scale would be sufficient. It might be said that the maximum of three several fares was in the Bills when promoters came to Parliament. That was true, but Parliament accepted that arrangement as one of the conditions on which it gave those Bills its sanction; and that arrangement was in strict accordance with the expectation and habits of the people, and had been in use many years to the great public convenience. He believed that first-class passengers had more to complain of than either of the two other classes in respect to the change on the Midland. The third-class had no complaint at all; and the second-class had perhaps not much; but he believed that first-class passengers were not as well satisfied with the existing arrangement for their comfort as they had been with those which had prevailed before the change. It might be argued that Parliament ought not to interfere in details of this kind, and that if they would let things alone they would right themselves. But he thought that when Bills came before their Lordships, and were passed on the distinct pledge that there should be three classes of accommodation, and maximum fares, it was not right to leave the performance of these conditions to the operation of chance. As to Parliamentary interference, there was no novelty in it. Parliament had already interfered to insist on what were called "Parliamentary trains," and quite recently "Workmen's trains" were insisted on as a condition in many Railway Bills. Why, even in the old coaching days, Parliament had interfered to regulate the number of passengers that might be carried inside and out. As to the loss of accommodation to first-class passengers, it might be said that Pullman's cars might be attached to every train. But everyone did not like Pullman's cars; and as to those who did, there was nothing in this Bill that would prevent them from using them. And as to the argument that "the matter will right itself"—if it righted itself by the Midland Company going back to the old plan of three classes, then the Bill would do neither that Company or any other any harm whatever. If it righted itself by the other Companies following the example the Midland had set in abolishing second-class carriages, legislation such as that which he now proposed, would come rather late. He did not see what possible objection could be raised to the Bill in point of principle; but he felt that if aggressions of this kind were not met promptly they would be carried to an extent which would make Parliament interference far more difficult when it no longer be avoided. Therefore he thought it the duty of Parliament to interpose in time and to secure that the travelling public should have in future what they had before the change made by the Midland Company—first, second, and third-class carriages on every line. The object of the Bill was simply to provide that there should be three classes of passenger carriages; but power was granted to the Railway Commissioners to grant licences for the omission of classes in cases where for five years there had been no class of the particular description in use.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Redesdale.)

LORD HOUGHTON said, he could not agree with his noble Friend the Chairman of Committees in the inference that when three classes of maximum fares had been settled by Parliament it was intended that the regulations in the particular form to which he referred should be lasting. In fact several railways had been in operation for more than five years in which there never had been any second-class carriages at all, yet no complaint had been made by the public. He would ask their Lordships not to be influenced by any feelings of comfort or discomfort which they might have experienced, but to reject the Bill on totally different grounds. This Bill would interfere unnecessarily with the free action of Railway Companies, and in a manner entirely contrary to the spirit of legislation during the last 20 years. It was obvious that the division of trains and all other matters affecting their arrangement must depend very much upon local and particular circumstances, and if a measure of this description were passed it would be easy to evade its provisions by certain regulations—such as giving particular names to certain trains or portions of trains—the result of which would be that the Bill would work only very partially. The noble Lord did not allege that the action of the railway companies had been averse to the public good; and there was now instituted a Railway Commission which was empowered to determine any complaint in which it was alleged that a company was adopting a course detrimental to public utility. He submitted that by passing such a Bill as this, Parliament would be interfering unnecessarily with the liberty of management by the railway companies which had been productive of so much public advantage. He begged to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment moved to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day six months.")—(The Lord Houghton.)

THE EARL OF DUNMORE said, the objections he took to the Bill of his noble Friend the Chairman of Committees were many, as regarded both the principle of the Bill and as regarded its details. First of all, Parliament had not yet thought it expedient—when by the private Act of a Railway Company the maximum and minimum charges which it was authorized to make had been fixed, and when a railway had once been opened for public traffic, after due inspection by a Government officer—to interfere in any way with the amount to be charged or with the facilities which were to be given by the Railway Company in exchange. This Bill of his noble Friend was a Bill of compulsion, for the noble Lord, by the provisions of his Bill, proposed to compel every Railway Company in the United Kingdom to attach carriages marked "First Class," "Second Class," and "Third Class" to every train, unless they got the sanction of the Railway Commissioners to run trains omitting some one class of carriages. The first question which appeared to him to arise was this—what were first, second, and third class, and how were they to be defined? This measure—which was practically directed against the Midland Railway Company—as none of the other Companies had adopted the same scheme—proposed that there should be carriages of three distinct classes; but the noble Lord did not tell them in his Bill how those carriages were to be fitted up to carry out the distinction. Practically, therefore, any Railway Company would fulfil the requirements under the Bill by simply painting "First Class," "Second Class," and "Third Class" on the carriages, and by making the maximum charges authorized by Parliament. It would doubtless be in the recollection of many of their Lordships that a Bill was introduced by Mr. Plimsoll in the other House of Parliament some years ago, the provisions of which were to supply foot-warmers in the carriages for the benefit of the third-class passengers. Mr. Plimsoll was at once met by an objection to the principle of his Bill—philanthropic though it might have been—for the same reason which applied in his (the Earl of Dunmore's) estimation in very much greater force to the Bill of the noble Lord—namely, that the Railway Companies had obtained their Acts of Parliament subject to certain conditions which had been well weighed and well considered both with regard to public as well as to private interests. The bargain had been concluded, Parliament had already sealed its conditions, and the shareholders had already invested their capital under those conditions, and it would not be right to impose additional responsibilities upon them. Well, that Bill of Mr. Plimsoll's was defeated in the other House of Parliament by a large majority; and since that time no measure had been brought before either House of Parliament interfering in any way with the details of the working of Railway Companies until this measure of the noble Lord which was before their Lordships' House that night. The objections raised in the other House of Parliament to such a small measure as that of Mr. Plimsoll's naturally applied with much greater force to the Bill then before their Lordships. The real question at issue was this—At what point should Parliamentary interference with the details of the working of railways commence? Should Parliament think it desirable to alter the course hitherto adopted and to impose conditions upon Railway Companies, would it not be well that the contest between the public and the Railway Companies should not be taken on a question so insignificant as that of convenience to a few, but rather upon the far more important and significant question of the safety of all who travel on the many lines of railway which intersect the United Kingdom? The Bill of the noble Lord was directed avowedly to secure the convenience of the comparatively few persons who were in the habit of travelling first-class. But it must not be forgotten that a very few years ago the greater number of trains which ran consisted only of first and second class carriages, and he thought the Railway Companies might say, and with some fairness—"As long as we ran trains which provided for the convenience of the minority, Parliament was not asked to interfere in any way; but now that the arrangements we have made are supposed in some way to be unsuitable to the comfort of that small class of railway travellers who wish to pay high rates, Parliament is at once requested to depart from the practice it has always adopted since the commencement of the railway system, and to interfere directly with the detailed management of Railway Companies." The noble Lord asserted that if a stand were not made now, Railway Companies would gradually provide less and less accommodation for the convenience of the travelling public. But he (the Earl of Dunmore) did not think that the experience of the last few years would bear out that argument. He thought noble Lords would agree with him when he said that every succeeding year gave the travelling public a better and more comfortable railway carriage. There was another reason—and he thought a good one—why Railway Companies should not be compelled by Parliamentary legislation to make up a train in any particular manner. In addition to the increased expenditure which must necessarily be occasioned to the rolling-stock and permanent way of Companies by trains of unnecessary length and weight being constantly used, he thought there was a more important point yet to be considered—namely, whether by having fewer classes of carriages and fewer carriages of each class in each train, we were not enabled to have short trains, which are much more easily handled, by which greater punctuality was secured, and which, therefore, would tend very much to the increased safety of that large portion of the British public who travel by rail. He hoped their Lordships would oppose the second reading of this Bill and vote for the Amendment of the noble Lord opposite.

LORD BELPER said, the question was whether a case for interference had been made out by his noble Friend who had introduced the Bill. He was at a loss to understand what was the particular grievance of which his noble Friend complained. It could be no grievance to first-class passengers to have their fares greatly reduced whilst they continued to enjoy the same accommodation as before. Nor was it a grievance to second-class passengers to have the advantage of very superior accommodation without any increase of charge. Did the noble Lord propose to compel the Company, in the one case, to charge higher fares than they were willing to take, or, in the other, to refuse accommodation which they were willing to give? There could be no doubt that, under the new system, the number of carriages in each train, and consequently the weight of the trains, would be diminished, which would contribute both to punctuality and to safety. He thought the changes which had recently been made were for the benefit of the public, and certainly he considered that no case had been made out for interference.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he was glad that the Government had not only refused to support the second reading of the Bill, but had refused to support it on the ground taken up by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Dunmore)—namely, that they should lay down no principle which should debar them from interfering on sufficient grounds with the proceedings of Railway Companies. He quite agreed that there was no sufficient case for interference in the present instance. The noble Lord the Chairman of Committees talked as if Railway Companies from the beginning of railways had been constantly running first, second, and third-class carriages; but that was far from being the case. Until very lately, third-class carriages were not run except with a limited number of trains. That was a grievance which did not concern their Lordships very much, but it concerned other classes of the public. But did Parliament step in and say to the Railway Companies they must run third-class carriages with all their trains? On the contrary, Parliament interfered in the most tender and cautious manner. It required the Railway Companies to make some provision for third-class passengers—but, certainly, the provision was very limited; and when Parliament went a step further, they did not proceed by way of compulsion, but by offering advantages by way of bribe—it promised that on the fulfilment of certain conditions in connection with the running of third-class carriages with a greater number of trains, a portion of the tax on railways would be abated. As to the Midland Company, he did not believe the second-class had been abolished; it was really the first-class that had been discontinued. What the Midland Company had done reminded him of an American newspaper, which put forth an advertisement that on a certain morning they would issue a second edition, but there would be no first edition. But Parliament had always been cautious in interfering with the detailed arrangements of railways. When it was proposed that Railway Companies should be compelled to provide foot-warmers for the comfort of all classes of passengers, it was replied that it would be more for the comfort of all classes of passengers if they were provided with travelling rugs and brandy-and-water. The Midland Company had announced the abolition of the second class, but they really abolished the third-class. He hoped the power of Parliament to be exercised on sufficient grounds would not, as it were, be frittered away by their Lordships sanctioning this Bill.

EARL DE LA WARR said, he did not think there was a demand, of sufficient strength, from the travelling public to warrant their Lordships in passing this Bill, and, therefore, he should vote against it.

LORD REDESDALE, in reply, said, they ought to insist upon the Railway Companies supplying the different classes of carriages according to the provisions of the Act of Parliament. He certainly thought there was a case made out for the interference of Parliament, and he should, therefore, divide the House.

On Question, that ("now") stand part of the Motion? their Lordships divided:—Contents 24; Not-Contents 56: Majority 32.

MUSICAL ENTERTAINMENTS BILL.

(The Duke of St. Albans.)

(No. 49.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE DUKE OF ST. ALBANS said, that those of their Lordships who were in the habit of attending Exeter Hall and St. James's Hall might be somewhat surprised to hear that they had been frequenting places which came under the operation of an Act to deal with disorderly houses. Such was, however, the case; and in 1866 the Middlesex Magistrates issued notices that the Licensing Act of George II. would be strictly construed. Under its third section, no place kept for public dancing, music, or public entertainment of the like kind in the Cities of London and Westminster could be open for such purpose before five o'clock in the afternoon, and an action had been actually brought against the proprietor of St. James's Hall on this account by a common informer early in the present year. He believed the Lord Chamberlain was advised that his licence could only avail to cover this within the City of Westminster, while two eminent counsel—Sir Henry James and Mr. Poland—doubted his power even to this limited extent. Therefore he asked Her Majesty's Government before Easter whether they would include in their promised course of legislation this year the Amendment of the Act 25 Geo. II. c. 36. He was told they would do nothing of the kind. In consequence the present Bill was prepared, and he had the honour to introduce it; but while it was on the Paper for the second reading he was agreeably surprised to see that the noble Earl who represented the Home Office (Earl Beauchamp) had brought in a measure to deal with the matter. His (the Duke of St. Albans') Bill would give to the magistrates who now had the power of granting music licences, the further power of saying at what hour any licensed place might open. The Bill of the noble Earl, on the contrary, laid down a hard-and-fast line with regard to the hour of opening—namely, that it should not be before the hour of noon. It was desirable that there should be immediate legislation on the subject, and, acknowledging the advantages of the Government in this respect, he would not now enter into the merits of his own Bill or of its rival. The noble Earl, he believed, was prepared in Committee to introduce a condonation clause to cover those places which in the uncertain state of the law might have erred, and to make it clear that the words "shall not open before noon" did not mean that while St. James's Hall escaped from the Scylla of being unable to give a concert before 5 P.M., Willis's Rooms were landed in the Charybdis that a ball must close at midnight. If the Government would give this assurance he should not persevere with his Bill, but would postpone the second reading till he was assured of the success of the Government measure.

PUBLIC ENTERTAINMENTS (HOUR OF OPENING) BILL—(No. 51.)

(The Earl Beauchamp.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

EARL BEAUCHAMP, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that its purpose was in some degree similar to that which had just been postponed by the noble Duke (the Duke of St. Albans). The discussion in their Lordships' House early this Session brought out the anomalous position in which music-halls were placed under the existing law in not being able to open before 5 o'clock in the afternoon. In buildings like Exeter Hall or St. James's Hall the performance of Handel's oratorios before that hour would not merely be illegal, but would subject the proprietor to forfeit his licence. Whatever might have been the state of society when the Act of George II. was passed, there could be no objection at the present day to music in the afternoon, and therefore the present Bill proposed to alter the limit of time from 5 o'clock P.M. to noon. But in this case as in others where you dealt with one part of an existing system, you affected some other part; and therefore if the Bill was read a second time he would in Committee propose the insertion of a clause with regard to the hour of closing—he thought that question might very well be left to the discretion of the licensing magistrates. He would also propose a clause by which the Bill should take effect from Michaelmas, 1874. The result of that would be that in cases where the provisions of the Act of George II. had been transgressed no forfeiture would be entailed in that respect. The Bill would relieve music-halls in Westminster from the necessity of taking out a licence from the Lord Chamberlain.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl Beauchamp.)

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY said, he had listened with great attention to the noble Earl who introduced the measure, and was much disappointed to find that the scope of the Bill was so limited. He had hoped that the noble Earl would introduce some comprehensive measure which would put an end to the present anomalous condition of the law; but what was his disappointment to find a measure introduced of the most infinitesimal proportions, dealing only with the very smallest portion of the subject, and affecting only a small part of the metropolis. The noble Earl had told them that if once they touched a stone in a crazy old edifice, they found themselves obliged to meddle with other parts, and he had far better do so than try to patch up the present system. What he wanted to see was the introduction of a general measure, dealing with the whole subject of the licensing of theatres and places of public amusement.

THE MARQUESS OF HERTFORD said, the anomalies connected with this subject arose from the licensing jurisdiction being in the hands of so many Benches of magistrates besides the Lord Chamberlain. There was at present no special machinery for regulating such places; but if the subject were taken up in the large and comprehensive manner desired by the noble Earl, they would have to appoint a Minister of Public Entertainments, with a large staff, and at a great expense.

After a few words from The Earl of MORLEY,

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

Earl Beauchamp

RAILWAY COMPANIES (ROLLING STOCK).

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

Moved that there be laid before this House, Return of the Rolling Stock of the Railway Companies in the United Kingdom; showing the number of vehicles that run with passenger trains or otherwise which have the tyres fastened on to the rims of the wheels by bolts, set screws, or rivets, or by any other species of tyre fastening, specifying the same. [Then a tabular form of Return is set out.]—(The Earl De La Warr.)

LORD COLVILLE said, if the noble Earl had been as assiduous in his attendance at the meetings of the Railway Commission as the Duke of Buckingham its Chairman had been, he might have known that the very information for which he now asked had been in many instances obtained by the Commission. The Return would be valueless unless it was extended to the waggons belonging to the colliery owners and other traders of this country.

THE EARL OF DUNMORE was willing, on behalf of the Board of Trade, to undertake, on condition of the noble Earl withdrawing his Motion, to move for a Return more full than that which was asked for in the Motion before the House, but not so full as was desired by the noble Lord who had just addressed the House.

EARL DE LA WARR said, that after what had fallen from the noble Earl he should not persist in the Motion he had brought forward.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

BOSTON ELECTION.

JOINT ADDRESS.

COURTS OF LAW (SCOTLAND)—JUDGES OF THE SUPREME COURTS—SALARIES.—QUESTION.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR asked the Lord Advocate, Whether the Government intend to bring in a Bill, indicated in his answer to a question on the 16th of July last, to give effect to many of the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Courts of Law in Scotland, including an increase in the salaries of the Judges of the Supreme Courts?

VOL. CCXXIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

THE LORD ADVOCATE: Sir, I do not think my right hon. Friend quite accurately describes the Answer which I gave to him on the 16th of July last. On referring to the usual source of information, I see I stated that—

"It is intended to give effect to many of the recommendations of the Royal Commission next Session, and the matter of the increase in the salaries of the Judges of the Supreme Courts will be submitted for consideration."—[3 Hansard, ccxxi. 121.]

I did not then indicate, as I had no authority to do so, that the Government would during this Session bring in a Bill providing for an increase in the salaries of the Judges of the Supreme Courts in Scotland. At the same time, it is proper I should say that I have submitted for the consideration of the Government many of the recommendations of the Royal Commission, including those relating to the increase of the salaries of the Judges of the Supreme Courts; but I have not yet received authority to propose to Parliament any legislation, except upon the matters dealt with in the two Bills relating to the Sheriff and other inferior Courts in Scotland which were read a first time on Friday last.

THE NEW LAW COURTS.—QUESTION.

MR. GOLDSMID asked the First Commissioner of Works, What is the reason for the slow progress made with the building of the new Law Courts, and whether he cannot take any measures for expediting the work?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: Sir, I am sorry the progress has not been what I hoped and expected; but the delay has arisen in a great measure from the very severe weather which prevailed during the four winter months. The east block is up to the first floor. Considering the magnitude of the work, great indulgence is due to the contractors at the commencement of it. I am informed that since the fine weather has set in, the contractors are pushing on with greater vigour.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT, 1872—PUBLIC TEACHERS ON SCHOOL BOARDS.—QUESTION.

MR. STEVENSON asked the Vice President of the Council, If he can state how many Teachers of Elementary Schools are at present Members of School Boards; and, if it is intended under the new Clause in the Education Code to withhold the annual Grant earned by a School if the Teacher continues to occupy his seat on a School Board, to which he has been duly elected?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, in reply to the first part of the Question, we have no information as to the number of teachers of public elementary schools who are members of school boards. We do not believe that there are many such cases in England, and in Scotland, as the hon. Member is probably aware, teachers are forbidden by the Act of 1872 to be members of school boards. I am glad, with respect to the second part of the Question to have the opportunity of stating that it was never our intention to require a teacher already a member of a school board to resign his seat before the end of the term for which the board was elected; but I must add that if, after the present Code has come into force, a teacher is elected upon and joins a school board, such an act would rank with any other infringement of the conditions of the Code, and would disqualify the school to which the teacher belonged from receiving a Government grant. The rule was laid down with no want of appreciation of the characters of the teachers, but solely to avoid the great inconvenience which would arise from teachers combining the two offices at the same time.

THE ROYAL COURT, JERSEY.

QUESTION.

SIR HENRY DRUMMOND WOLFF asked Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in the absence of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true that when a soldier stationed at Jersey is charged with any offence before the Royal Court of that Island, the proceedings are conducted in French, and the soldier is not allowed the assistance of an interpreter?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, he had received a telegram from the Governor of Jersey, to the effect that the language of the Royal Court of Jersey, in civil and criminal cases, was, and always had been, in French. A soldier, on being brought before that Court, was treated in the same way as any other person. If he had not chosen an advocate, the Court assigned him one, and the duty of that advocate was to watch the proceedings and conduct the defence, and to give to the party all the assistance that he could. There was no sworn interpreter to the Royal Court, and as the person who was brought there would have an advocate, it was not usual to employ an interpreter. There was, however, no objection to one being employed, if application was made to the Court.

INDIA—MASSACRE OF MR. MARGARY AT MANWINE.—QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If it is true, as stated in a telegram in "The Daily News" of 22nd April, that "the Chinese Government have appointed a person of inferior position as Commissioner to investigate" the circumstances connected with the murder of Mr. Margary; and, when the Despatches of Her Majesty's Minister at Peking, in reference to this subject, are expected, and whether he will take an early opportunity of laying them upon the Table of the House?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, as regarded the first part of the Question of the hon. Member, the Government had not received any information from Mr. Wade with respect to the statement in the telegram referred to. That gentleman's despatches were not expected to arrive in this country for some days to come; but they should be at once placed on the Table of the House, should the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs be of opinion that that could be done without injury to the public interest.

ARMY—FORTIFICATIONS AND LOCALIZATION OF FORCES.—QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he would state to the House what is the estimate for expenditure on account of Fortifications and Localisation of the Military Forces in the current year?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I have not yet received any precise estimate of the estimated expenditure for this year; but, so far as the information at my command goes, I apprehend that the sum which it will be necessary for the Treasury to borrow for this purpose this year will be somewhere between £750,000 and £1,000,000, but I cannot name the precise sum.

THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION—THE CHAPLAINS.—QUESTION.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the crews of the two ships about to sail on the Arctic Expedition are not likely to be composed largely of Presbyterians; and, if so, whether it would not be expedient, instead of appointing two Episcopalian Chaplains, to appoint one Episcopalian and one Presbyterian?

MR. HUNT: Sir, I have no reason to suppose the crews will be composed largely of Presbyterians; I have not the slightest idea how the crews will be composed as regards religious opinions; but I have already appointed two Episcopalian Chaplains to the Expedition.

PARLIAMENT — THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS.—QUESTION.

MR. TREVELYAN (for Mr. DILLWYN) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in view of the discrepancies now existing between the duties, as compared with the salaries, of the Chairman of Committees of the House of Lords and the Chairman of Ways and Means in the House of Commons, he will this Session take any steps to rectify the anomalous position of the latter officer?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, the subject had been under the consideration of the Commission of which the Speaker was Chairman, who were charged with the duty of looking into questions connected with the administration of both Houses, and a general conclusion had to be arrived at that the discrepancies were such as ought not to be continued. It was, therefore, the intention of the Government to make a proposal to raise the salary of the Chairman of Ways and Means to the same amount as that of the Chairman of Committees in the House of Lords.

THE QUEEN v. CASTRO—THE TRIAL
AT BAR.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Sir, I wish to ask the kind indulgence of the House for a few minutes, while I refer to a statement made on Friday evening in the course of the speech of the hon. Member for Stoke. That statement directly affects me; but more than that, if there were any foundation in fact for it, which I can show there is not, it can only be intended to prejudice in the mind of the public the character and position of a high and honourable Judge. So long as that statement continued to be made in the pages of a print called The Englishman—so long as it was repeated in a number of Petitions, which as I understand from the Clerk at the Table were received, but not laid upon it—I was content to let it pass unheeded upon the advice of my solicitors, and treat it with the contempt and disgust that every man must feel at the continuance of libels which have been heaped without end upon men of far higher position than I can claim to be. But when I find that the statement of The Englishman newspaper has been transferred to the floor of the House of Commons by a Member of this honourable House, I have no alternative but to appeal to the House of Commons with every confidence and trust in this matter. I was unable accidentally, from circumstances over which I had no control, to be in the House of Commons on Friday evening, else I should then have taken the opportunity of repudiating the statement to which I now refer. It is true I received a letter from the hon. Member for Stoke. It was dated on Thursday evening; but I did not receive it until Saturday morning, and I was quite surprised to find that he was going to introduce my name in any way into the debate on Friday evening. At least I may say this, that as the hon. Member for Stoke intended to introduce my name, it would have been more courteous on his part if he had given me two or three days' notice, that I might have made arrangements to be present. Now, what is the charge, or rather I might say what is the statement, of the hon. Member for Stoke? I will read the words. He had been alluding to the Lord Chief Justice of England, and said they had been discussing whether it would be well to have the Lord Chief Justice to try the case. He said he had an interview with the Claimant, and that it was decided they should not oppose the Lord Chief Justice trying the case. Then, the hon. Member for Stoke said, the 13th of April came, and he said he had an interview with the Claimant, who read to him an extract from his diary. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Peterborough is in his place at the present moment, but this is the extract—

“Mr. Whalley has just been to me and has told me that Sir Robert Peel told him yesterday that I was to be convicted, and that the Judges had already made up their minds to give me 15 years’ penal servitude. Mr. Hendricks was present.”

It does not so much concern me, but from my intimacy with, and from the very high respect I have for, the Lord Chief Justice, I consider it my duty to bring this matter before this honourable House. Well, there is not the slightest shadow of foundation for the hon. Member for Peterborough making such a statement as this. It is on the face of it literally impossible that the Lord Chief Justice should have told me during the hearing of a case before a jury, that he and the two other Judges had made up their minds to give the Claimant 15 years’ penal servitude. It was stated by the hon. Member for Peterborough, to get a stronger hold upon me, that Mr. Hendricks was present. Now I have a letter from Mr. Hendricks this morning, who says it is absolutely false that in his presence I made any such statement as that which Mr. Whalley is said to allege, and which it was falsely stated, was made in Mr. Hendricks’ presence. I wish now to say a word with regard to the hon. Member for Stoke. I do not know why the hon. Member for Stoke should so persistently have laid hold on me in this matter. I do not know that I ever spoke to him in my life. I do not know that I ever met him, yet for weeks and months my name has been dragged before the public in The Englishman. Yes; I did meet him once, at dinner—at the table of his kind friend and patron, Lord Chief Justice Cockburn. That was the only time I ever met the hon. Member for Stoke. Well, I do not know why he should so persistently have introduced my name into this matter, because he, as a lawyer, must know that it is absolutely impossible for a Chief Justice sitting with two other Judges, before a cause had been tried, to have told me that the result would be what the hon. Member had stated. The hon. Member for Stoke said—“I express no opinion,” but he has expressed an opinion over and over again. Announcements of this nature have appeared—“Read Dr. Kenealy’s newspaper!” I presume that The Englishman is Dr. Kenealy’s newspaper. The hon. Member for Stoke says he expressed no opinion, but he was curious to learn what would be said in defence of the Judges. There would be nothing more monstrously absurd than to suppose that the Lord Chief Justice should have held such language, or that I should have made such a statement. It all rests upon that one statement alleged to have been made by the hon. Member for Peterborough, and which is directly contradicted by Mr. Hendricks. Now I put it to the House, and I put it to you, Sir, whether you will not vouchsafe to me your belief that the statement I have made is true, rather than that which has for months past appeared in The Englishman newspaper, and which has now been transferred to the House of Commons? I give it the most direct and perfect contradiction. The entry in the diary alluded to by the hon. Member for Stoke and the assertion there made are manifestly untrue and monstrously—I was going to say—false.

MR. SPEAKER: Does the right hon. Member apply the term “false” to a Member of this House?

SIR ROBERT PEEL: No, Sir; I applied it to the diary. I say that the entry in the diary which was referred to by the hon. Member for Stoke is manifestly untrue, and I am confident that the House of Commons will not hesitate to endorse the opinion I have now expressed.

BILL—[BILL 77.]

(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [22nd April], “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair;” and which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words

“in the opinion of this House, it is inexpedient to proceed with the consideration of a Bill reenacting and modifying detached portions of several statutes, until it is put into such a form as to show clearly and distinctly the provisions which are to form part of the continued and revised code,”—(Mr. Biggar),

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

Debate resumed.

MAJOR O’GORMAN said, that the Chief Secretary for Ireland had informed the House that he was not at liberty to state the information which he had received from the magistrates and the police in Ireland; but he (Major O’Gorman) would like to know if the right hon. Baronet had consulted the parish priests and Bishops of the Roman Catholic Church there with respect to the state of the country, for, if he had, he would then be able to give the House some valuable information on the subject. If he had consulted the Rev. Dr. Nulty, Bishop of Meath, he would have received all the information he could give him on the subject. At present the right hon. Baronet prided himself on the secrecy of his information; but he should like to ask him whether he was perfectly certain that the information he had received came from a perfectly reliable source? If it did, it would, of course, to some extent guide the House. Was he, in the slightest degree, quizzed by any of his correspondents? Had he heard of the celebrated Westmeath Ribbon story? He would relate it briefly. A gentleman living in the county of Westmeath, possessed of considerable property and very fond of field sports, had a daughter, who disliked living in the country; she found the country very stupid and dull, and repeatedly asked her father to remove to Dublin, where he had a house. He refused to do so, as he was so fond of his field sports, and was much beloved by his neighbours. Soon afterwards he received a threatening letter. A few days later he received another, but he thought little of either. Some days afterwards there came another threatening letter, and not only that, but one in which his coffin was delineated. He then became alarmed, and sent for the stipendiary magistrate, the county dry nurse. He attended at the gentleman’s house, saw the letters, and placed himself in communication with that sink of iniquity, Dublin Castle. Scores of detectives were sent down to the district, and domiciliary visits were paid to the houses of all the poor people, who were most roughly treated by the stipendiary and his myrmidons. But nothing could be detected as to the authorship of these threatening letters, though they still came pouring in. Nobody knew who wrote them, nobody knew anything about them, and the gentleman became seriously alarmed. He gave up his establishment in the country and removed into Dublin. His daughter was a very beautiful girl, just such a girl as could only be produced in his own Green Isle—blood, bone, and beauty, and plenty of it. She was universally admired, and had not been long in Dublin before proposals of marriage were made to her by a man who was fit for her. The wedding came off, and after the usual breakfast, when the young lady came down to take her departure, she threw her arms round her father’s neck, and said to him—“Go down to the country, father; nobody will touch a hair of your head. You are beloved by everybody around you. Nobody wrote those letters but one person, and that person was myself. I wrote you every one of those threatening letters, and it was I who delineated that coffin. I found the country very dull; I asked you to leave it 20 times and come to Dublin. You refused, and, as it was very fashionable, I adopted the Ribbon scheme, and it completely succeeded.” Did the right hon. Baronet ever hear that story? Most probably not; and why not? Because it was a story in favour of the people, and the right hon. Baronet did not go into the class of society that was favourable to the people, but only into that class that was hostile to them in every respect. He did not see him in his place; but he ventured to say that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the county of Dublin and Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster—save the mark!—could have made the right hon. Baronet perfectly acquainted with that story, and several others. He (Major O’Gorman) would tell them another. The Protestant Archbishop of Dublin rushed one afternoon into the bedroom of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, at 4 o’clock. The Lord Lieutenant was a man of great talent, and of great sloth. The Archbishop called to him—"Oh! my Lord, we shall have our throats cut. The country's up! the country's up! the country's up!" "Oh!" said his Lordship, "what time of day is it?" "My Lord," said the Archbishop, "it is 4 o'clock P.M." "Well," said the Lord Lieutenant, "t'is time for everybody to be up now." His Lordship got up, and found that the country was not up; but that it was as quiet as it was now, and as it had been proved to be by the Irish Judges, many of whom had declared that it was so at the last Assizes and at the Assizes before. He thought there was no reason whatever why that Bill should pass. It was his firm belief that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had no heart in it. He thought the right hon. Gentleman would rather that the Bill should not pass, or at all events that he had satisfied himself that the people of Ireland were perfectly quiet, perfectly well conducted, and perfectly obedient to the law. Surely the right hon. Gentleman, the foremost man of all the world, could well afford not to take over a legacy of this description from those blockheaded Whigs. He was strong enough not to do so. There were dozens of hon. Gentlemen behind him who would gladly see that miserable scrap blotted out. He entreated the right hon. Gentleman to cut it short at once. They would soon be in the season of sacrificing innocent Bills. But this was a guilty Bill, and not an innocent one. He besought him to despatch it, and to believe that he would never be sorry for it. Let him destroy that guilty Bill. He entreated him once more to do so. The altar was before him, and he entreated him to commence the immolation at once.

MR. PARNELL, in supporting the Motion of the hon. Member for Cavan, observed, that no arguments had been advanced against the Amendment of his hon. Friend. The hon. Member for Derry (Mr. R. Smyth), although he agreed with the principle of the Bill, said he should vote in favour of the Amendment as being a just and proper one. The Chief Secretary for Ireland, as an open foe, had, of course, opposed it, and so also had the noble Marquess who was supposed to lead the Opposition in that House. What reason had the hon. Member for Derry given for approving the principle of the Bill? It was this, that some coercion was necessary in his district to prevent Catholics and Protestants flying at each other's throats. But was that any reason why 30 other Irish counties should be placed under Coercion Laws? It had been said that some half dozen Irish landlords had given it as their opinion that without coercion they could not exercise the rights of property. What did they mean by the rights of property? He always noticed that when a Coercion Bill was to be passed through the House, they heard a great deal about the rights of property, but very little about its duties. Their views as to the rights of property were sometimes a little curious. He had seen Irish landlords sitting in polling-booths as agents for the Conservative candidate, hearing illiterate voters record their votes, and their tenants trembling when they came to vote against that candidate. That was an exercise of the rights of property of which he did not think Englishmen would approve. There had not been threatening letter writing of late, or shooting, or agrarian crime, and was that, he asked, a time to bring in a Coercion Bill? Was that a proper time to stop all discussion on the measure, when Irish Members were telling the House what the wishes of their constituents with regard to it were? The hon. Member for Derry had told the House that the Irish tenant-farmers of the North were convinced that some remedial measures were necessary for the restoration of tranquillity in that part of their country, and had said that if a promise of a Land Bill was held out, whereby small holders would be secured in their holdings, Ireland, instead of being a source of weakness, would be a source of strength to England. He (Mr. Parnell) did not profess to speak on behalf of the Irish tenant-farmers, but he did not believe that Irish tenant-farmers, even those living in the Black North, were so locked up in self-interest as to be inclined to give up the interest of their country to serve that of their class. When the proper time came, perhaps it would be found that he was as true a friend to the tenant-farmer as even the hon. Member for Derry, and he said this, knowing well the importance of securing the tenant in his holding, but knowing also that in the neglect of the principles of self-government lay the root of all Irish trouble. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had found fault with the language which had been used by the hon. Member for Derry; but he (Mr. Parnell) did not know who had appointed the right hon. Gentleman the censor of the language used in that House by hon. Members. He thought that the facts of the hon. Gentleman were well put, and he only wished he was with them on their (the Home Rule) benches of the House. Perhaps the Chief Secretary for Ireland detected a sort of terror arising in the hon. Member's mind, that the time-honoured and ancient Whig hack would no longer be able to carry matters with a high hand in Derry County, and was holding out to him a helping hand in the event of his thinking of changing his side of the House. For his own part, however, he did not think that the hon. Member was likely to turn his coat, and he was convinced that he would always be found where he believed that the interest of his country required him. He trusted that the time would arrive when the history of the past would be forgotten, so far as it reminded England that she was not entitled to Ireland's confidence, and when she would give to Irishmen the rights which they claimed—the right of self-government. Why should Ireland be treated as a geographical fragment of England, as he had heard an ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer call it some time ago. Ireland was not a geographical fragment, but a nation. He asked the House to regard Ireland as anxious to defend England when her hour of trial came; and he trusted the day might come when England might see that her strength lay in a truly independent, a truly free, and a truly self-supporting Irish nation.

MR. R. POWER said, he could see no reason whatever for the passing of the Bill. The county of Waterford, with which he was intimately connected, was free from agrarian outrage, the best relations obtained between landlord and tenant, and he defied the Chief Secretary for Ireland to say that a portion of the Ribbon Association had ever extended to that county. At the last Assizes the Judge on circuit offered his congratulations on the marked freedom of the county from crime of all kinds, and beside that it was not three weeks since a learned Judge had congratulated the Grand Jury of the City of Waterford upon the lightness of their work, and under such circumstances he protested against such a city and such a county being placed under these Coercion Laws. The Bill itself, in fact, was unjust and uncalled for, and was the result of the Government having been guided by private sources of information, instead of having obtained it openly and freely. Many remarks had been made on the length to which the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) had extended his speech; but he (Mr. Power) was bound to say, in justice to him, that he had begged him not to make a short speech; and his reason was the policy of silence by which they had been met on the Government side of the House. He knew there was in the House a majority that was beyond all argument; but he would for all that add his public voice to the representations made by those around him in reference to Irish sentiment and Irish liberty. Ireland was governed as a conquered country which was repugnant to the people of the country. It was a system that was unjust, uncalled for, and impolitic, because it was fraught with danger to the best interests of the Empire. Beyond that, no just cause had been given for suspending the Constitution of the Empire.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he had been unable to discover from the speeches of the Chief Secretary and the Solicitor General for Ireland what were the real reasons for the introduction of this measure. Various grounds had been alleged by the hon. and learned Gentleman, such as the existence of Fenianism, agrarian and sectarian differences and jealousies. But it was admitted almost in the same breath by the right hon. Baronet that Fenianism had almost disappeared; that the country, as a whole, was never more free from crime; and as to Sectarian differences and jealousies, would a Bill of this kind have any effect whatever in allaying either? Would the Government or the House propose such a Bill for that purpose to apply to England, where there were also sectarian differences and jealousies? No. In England they must tolerate: in Ireland they coerced. It was said by the Chief Secretary that the Bill was necessary because the ordinary Courts of Law could not deal with crime and secure the attendance of witnesses and convictions. That ground, however, could not be maintained against the fact that in Ireland 75 per cent of the crimes committed the offenders were brought to justice, while in England the percentage was 50. But in what respects would the Bill facilitate the getting of evidence? There was power given by a clause of the Act of 1870, now submitted for re-enactment, to hold a general inquiry in regard to a crime, in cases where no one was accused, and to summon witnesses as in an ordinary judicial investigation. The exercise of that power would either lead to men being forced to incriminate themselves, a thing which was quite opposed to the law of England—or to the crime of falsehood being added to the other crime. It had been proposed as one mode of securing the administration of justice that any locality in which more than the ordinary average of crime was found should pay the extra costs of prevention and repression; but the right hon. Baronet had himself admitted that it was not likely to have the effect of inducing persons to come forward to give evidence. None of the clauses seemed to him likely to effect their professed objects, or remove the discontent of the Irish people which was alleged to exist. So long as there was a just and a righteous cause for that discontent it would continue. The only justification of the Bill he had really heard was the suspicion of the existence of Ribbonism in Westmeath. He said suspicion, because although the Government said they had information which justified them in proposing the Bill they had not given any tangible grounds to go upon. Indeed, he might say that the speech of the Chief Secretary was an admission that Ribbonism in Westmeath was dormant, if not extinct. Yet in regard to that county it was to be remarked that the severity of the legislation of 1870 was not mitigated in one iota by the present Bill. If it was not extinct, why did the Government liberate Captain Duffy and take him into their employ as a spy? A fear had been expressed lest the Government should become despotic. For his part he had no such fear. He knew from the writings of the Prime Minister that the right hon. Gentleman disliked that Bill in his heart as much as he did, but the right hon. Gentleman was, no doubt, outvoted in his Cabinet. Therefore, when he blamed the Government

he excluded the Prime Minister altogether, for he had too much regard and reverence for him to believe that he would willingly assent to that measure; but the Government were making themselves odious by those violations of the Constitution. They had promised Ireland conciliation, and had given her coercion; they had promised them bread and had given them a stone. They were wearing out the patience of the country by the effete measures they had introduced, and by the flippant and flabby replies they had offered to the arguments brought against them.

MR. D. TAYLOR said, he could not agree with the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath in many of the views he had expressed. He (Mr. D. Taylor) shared the great dislike which existed on the part of Irish Members to a Bill of that kind; but he could not vote with the hon. Member for Cavan, if he pressed his Motion to a division, for he did not believe there was any disposition on the part of the House to deal otherwise than fairly and liberally with Ireland, and sufficient evidence of that fact was afforded by the legislation of the last Parliament in regard to that country. He had not the honour of a seat in that Parliament; but he highly approved of the Church and the Land Bills as measures which were proposed and carried in a sincere spirit of conciliation, and with a strong desire to remove discontent. But they must take into consideration the past history of Ireland, and the feeling of different sections of the population towards each other. With regard to that legislation there was still a strong feeling that it had not freed Ireland from agrarian crime to the extent which he believed it was calculated to do. But the fact was that Ireland had been too long neglected, especially with reference to its commerce and trade of every description, and too long represented by men who were of a different race from their constituents, and did not sympathize with the general body of the people. It would, therefore, take some time before such measures as those he had mentioned could produce their desired effect; still, he believed their good influence would, before a distant day, entirely remove agrarian crime from the country. It was only for agrarian crime, the perpetrators of which were seldom brought to justice—not from the sympathy of the people with such offences, but because they looked upon the part of an informer as odious—that he thought a measure like the present was needed. He was sure the Government brought that Bill forward with reluctance; but the question was, could the peace and safety of the country be maintained without its provisions? Looking at the decreasing crime and the growing prosperity of Ireland, he would suggest to the Chief Secretary, who dealt with Irish questions with a care and a zeal which did him the greatest credit, that he might limit the duration of the Bill to two years, at the end of which time he hoped and believed it would not be necessary to renew it. If the Chief Secretary for Ireland took that course he believed that many Irish Members would waive their objections to it.

MR. DUNBAR said, he differed from the hon. Member for Coleraine (Mr. D. Taylor), and would suggest that these Acts should continue only for a month longer, instead of two or five years. The Bill was one of the most complete specimens of everything that was objectionable, and its object seemed to be to conceal from the people the law under which they lived. They had heard a good deal about the faulty framing of Acts of Parliament, and at that moment a Committee was sitting up-stairs to consider the mode of drawing statutes and the improvements that might be effected in their language and style. Well, he thought the Bill now under discussion should be submitted to it, for it was about as complete a specimen of everything that was objectionable in form as any Act that had been brought before them for many years. He gave the Government credit for what they had done in relation to legislation in Ireland; but he would admit that if any measure of coercion was necessary, there were some very objectionable provisions in the Bill. If enforced, it would affect every man in Ireland, and the law would be so plain that every magistrate and every policeman who had to carry it out should clearly understand their duty in regard to it. The subject should be placed before the House fairly and in a complete form that they might know what they were doing, and if that course were pursued, he thought they would have no hesitation in rejecting it. He particularly objected to the 3rd section, which instead of stating directly what was proposed to be enacted, recited the Acts of 1870 and 1871, which were to be continued; and it was impossible in Committee to make any Amendment on those Acts. This was not carrying out the engagement made by the Government last Session, and the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cavan ought to receive the sanction of the House.

MR. CLIVE said, he knew nothing of the county of Westmeath; but as the owner of property in the counties of Mayo and Tipperary, of which he knew a great deal, he begged to thank the right hon. Baronet opposite for bringing in that Bill. His speech clearly proved that he had a practical knowledge of the subject. It was true that the drafting of the Bill might have been more successful; but, on the whole, that was not a matter of much material importance. He gave the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath every credit for his ingenuity and ability, but he was deficient in practical knowledge of the subject. It was said that no reason had been given for the introduction of the Bill. He would commend to the attention of hon. Members below the Gangway an extract from an Irish newspaper which belonged to a former Member of that House whom they all respected—the late Mr. Maguire. The Cork Examiner of August, 1874, said—

“It is an unfortunate fact that among us for some time back it has been safer to commit murder than any other offence. We see constantly walking out of the dock free men and free women, persons whom no human being doubts had committed atrocious and cold-blooded murder. Crown prosecutors have now almost abandoned the idea of obtaining a conviction for murder. The clearest and most convincing evidence can at the best secure only a disagreement of the jury. Juries seem to have been inspired by a namby-pamby compassion which is reserved entirely for the person in the dock, for they seem to have none for the individual whose throat was cut, or whose drink was poisoned, or whose brains were battered. There seems to be far more commiseration for the murderer than for his victim. Jurors forget that in setting a murderer free they in all probability help to cut the throat of some new victim; for if the escaped criminal himself does not commit murder, the ease and safety with which he has got off lends temptation to some one else.”

Baron Dowse mentioned that there had been nine or ten cases of murder in Tipperary. All knew how difficult it was in Ireland to detect the perpetrators of agrarian crimes, and there was, therefore, the greater necessity for exceptional legislation, which there could be no doubt had prevented many crimes and outrages. He admitted that such legislation caused discontent in some parts of Ireland; but that was stirred up by speeches of hon. Members in Ireland and in the House of Commons, and speeches which, if not delivered in the House, were sent to Ireland and published as if they had been delivered. There was no doubt that there was a considerable credulity and ignorance in some portions of the Irish people; but if the prosperity of Ireland went on increasing, and if the people became more intelligent and less credulous and savage in their nature, the necessity for these measures might gradually disappear.

MR. RONAYNE said, he took exception to the extract referred to by the hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House, and maintained that it did not apply to the county with which he (Mr. Ronayne) was connected—the county of Cork; for on recent occasions the Cork juries had been thanked by the Judges for their verdicts, and that persons who had escaped elsewhere had been sent to Cork to be tried, and had been convicted. He wanted to know to what part of the country the extract read by the hon. Member applied. [MR. CLIVE said, he read an extract from The Cork Examiner.] It probably applied to England, and perhaps to the county of the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary, where a grand jury recently found a man guilty, and insisted on his being sentenced without his going before a common jury. That was in the county of Devon. [SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: That is not my county.] At all events, he complained that, for the purpose of supporting this Bill, the charge alleged against that county was cast like a shadow over all other parts of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland taunted the Irish Members with not bringing forward new arguments; but the answer must be that the Government adduced no new facts, and did not repeat the old ones. He (Mr. Ronayne) had been three Sessions in this House, and in that time three Coercion Bills had been brought in for Ireland. On each occasion the Government of the day considered it necessary to make a parade of certain facts—number of agrarian outrages, charges of juries, resolutions of grand juries, reports of magistrates; but on this occasion they did nothing of the kind. The right hon. Gentleman rested his case in support of this Bill upon secret letters addressed to Dublin Castle bearing upon the prevalence of agrarian crime, and which he refused to produce; but it was a fact that when this Bill was brought in in a former year, there was not any agrarian crime then in Ireland to justify the Government in introducing it. He would, in support of that assertion, refer to and quote the charges of the Judges of Assize in Ireland, showing that there was then no agrarian crime in the country. Mr. Justice O'Brien, in his Charge in the county of Cork in 1870 said, to the Grand Jury—

“No cases of agrarian crime will be brought before you, and no crimes but those of an ordinary character.”

He was glad to say, looking through the calendar, that since the last Assizes no crime of an extraordinary character had been committed in their county. Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, in like manner, bore testimony in his Charge to the Grand Jury of the city of Cork to the light state of the calendar, and to the freedom of the city from Fenianism, and of the surrounding country from agrarian crimes. In the West Riding there was, he said, only one crime that called for notice; and in the midland district or East Riding, which was as large as some counties, the Act need not be applied. Yet, notwithstanding that, the Coercion Bill was applied in that district. [The hon. Member then read statements of the chairmen of quarter sessions in the city and county of Cork, indicating the peaceful state of the places and surrounding districts where the sessions were held. Mr. Ferguson, chairman of the quarter sessions at Bandon, received a pair of “white gloves,” marking the freedom of the place from even a solitary case of crime on that occasion. “Last year, he said, “we had only one crime, and this year we have none.” Mr. Keane, chairman of quarter sessions, also spoke of the great freedom of the city from crime. Tralee was also remarkably free from crime. Then, with regard to the cases of murder recently committed in the South of Ireland, they were committed for “money,” and they were called by the people—he did not mean to speak offensively—“English murders.” One man who murdered a woman for money was hanged, and another was banished for life, and condemned to penal servitude.] From those statements, it appeared dishonest to credit the Coercion Acts with having stopped or prevented crime where it never existed, and in continuing these enactments the Irish people felt naturally indignant that they should be treated as a nation of savages unfit to participate in the privileges of the British Constitution. The noble Lord the Member for the County of Waterford (Lord Charles Beresford) told the House last Session, on the second reading of the Bill for the Repeal of the 10s. Licence on guns, that if that licence was done away with, he and others would not long be Members of that House. Yet there had not been an instance of agrarian murder in Waterford for 30 years, and the noble Lord's brother, the Marquess of Waterford, was so deservedly popular that if every man in the county had a gun he might walk through the county at midnight unharmed. Again, the Member for Kerry was a supporter of the Bill, but he would ask him if there had been a single instance of such crime there during the last 20 years? He blamed the Irish Executive for putting the Act upon the South and other parts of Ireland where there was no necessity for it. The noble Marquess who sat on the front Opposition Bench, on introducing the Motion for the Secret Committee on Westmeath, expressed the greatest horror at having to propose such a measure. He pleaded ignorance of Irish affairs, and he (Mr. Ronayne) was surprised that he could advocate the present Bill without a blush on his countenance. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Fortescue) who was then Chief Secretary for Ireland stated that if the Irish Executive put the law in force where there was no necessity for doing so, they should be arraigned before this House for so doing. Now, with respect to Waterford, Cork, and Kerry, he defied the right hon. Gentleman to bring forward any cases to justify the enforcement of that Act. It was, in truth, kept up by the magistrates as a game law, and nothing else. He had been asked why, as a sportsman himself, he could possibly oppose an Act that so admirably succeeded in putting down poaching. It should be called, in fact, a Game, and not a Peace Preservation Act. The Irish Executive had put the Westmeath

Act into the middle of it, and thus the whole of Ireland obtained credit for the crimes alleged to be committed in Westmeath.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he was not sure that the Irish people had not accomplished a great deal when they saw the manner in which this Bill was received by the House. Hitherto Coercion Bills for Ireland had been brought in by eager speakers and carried by bristling majorities; but Irishmen had now won half the battle, for they had struck the conscience of their foes. The Prime Minister and even the Chief Secretary were ill at ease in carrying this Bill through the House, and dumbness and languor prevailed on the Treasury Bench. There were a dozen or more eloquent followers of the Prime Minister entertaining the doctrines which prevailed amongst hon. Gentlemen opposite, who refrained from speaking out in consequence of knowing the universal will of their countrymen. The hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Olive), who spoke in such de haut en bas style, advised Irishmen from his lofty eminence to free themselves from Coercion Bills by ceasing to be savages. Now, Irish Members were told that Coercion Bills were called upon to repress exceptional crimes, meaning thereby crimes which were not common, because exceptional crimes existed in Ireland and not in England, and because in Ireland, criminals were objects of popular sympathy, so that they could not be brought to justice. Coercion laws were said therefore to be necessary for Ireland. Dr. Lankester, at a recent inquest, had called the attention of the jury to the frequency of cases of child-murder, but, as these were not exceptional crimes, no Coercion Bill was thought to be necessary for England. Referring to the frequency of child-murder in the metropolis, The Pall Mall Gazette said, it was a disgrace to the metropolis that not one per cent of the murderers were brought to justice. An hon. Member on one occasion, speaking on the same subject in that House, had stated that no fewer than 276 children were found dead in the streets and areas of London in one year, and that not one of the murderers had been discovered. Was that or was it not exceptional crime? But who had ever heard of a Coercion Bill for England? It had been asserted that time was wasted in the debate by the Irish Members. He denied that such was the case. He and those who were with him were determined, weak as they were as a minority, that while one word could be said by a man to give utterance to the feelings of the people, it should be said to protest against a bill like this passing through the House, because it was only by rendering it unpalatable to the Conservatives and distasteful to the Government that they, a small minority, could hope to do any good. Why was it that after centuries of connection with Ireland this country had to resort to the tactics of Bismarck in Alsace-Lorraine, and to the carpet-bag legislation of the Southern States of America, in the present Bill, the name of which ought to be altered, for it would enact "That in the opinion of Parliament it is better that twenty innocent men should suffer than that one guilty should escape." Was there an Englishman here who did not know that it was one of the proudest boasts a countryman of his could make of his country's Constitution that it maintained it was better that ten guilty should escape rather than one innocent should suffer. It was one of an Englishman's boasts, also, that his house was his castle; but, in Ireland, a man's house was the policeman's, and a man was guilty until he was proved innocent, which was also opposed to the English rule. Another great fault he had to find with the Bill was that it would teach a lesson which was most fatal when taught to a half-educated people—namely, that the Lord Lieutenant, the Chief Secretary, or the Solicitor General for Ireland might break the law with impunity. While Pat Mooney must be sent to prison for belonging to a secret society, the hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. W. Johnston) might in perfect security remain a member of an Orange Lodge, and the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland continue to be a Freemason. To show how harshly the Bill would operate he would refer to a letter he had received from Mr. Kyle Knox, a Protestant Conservative gentleman of the North of Ireland, who considered the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government the greatest statesman of the age. His correspondent pointed out that a sum of £500 was presented by the Grand Jury, owing to the murder of Stephen Church, to be levied in 10 instalments from the tenants of the townland on which the deceased had been shot, the total rental of which was £270. The writer added that he could not see Conservatism, common sense, or common justice in fining men ruinously for having bad neighbours. Even the laws of Cromwell with reference to Ireland were milder in many respects than the coercive measures of our English Parliament of the present day. In Cromwell's time a district in which an Englishman was murdered was not fined if the criminal were given up to justice; but now, if all the men, women, and children joined in hue and cry after a criminal, and handed him over to justice, that would not save the district. This Bill was about to be forced through Parliament, not at the dictation of a spirit of law, but at the dictation of a spirit of vengeance, the same spirit which had induced the Danes to trample on the Saxons and which had induced the Normans to trample on both. Its continuance was a declaration of hostility to the country, and it was not with any great hope that his feeble words would much affect their decision to-night that he appealed to the House to pause before they forced this Coercion Bill on the Irish people. But, whatever determination the House might now arrive at, he was satisfied from what he had seen and heard in the course of this discussion, that if Irishmen stated their case fairly and fought the battle of their country openly and manfully, a feeling was at work in the minds of hon. Members which must eventually bear fruit in favour of Irish liberty. Let it not be supposed that those who opposed the passing of this measure did not yearn for the day when all their Representatives and the mass of the people of Ireland could put themselves at the beck of the law of the land, because every right-minded man must suffer when he found himself placed in opposition to that law. He protested, however, against the people of his country being taught political lessons out of this bloody and brutal code. He admitted he felt indignant when the miscreants in the Westmeath crime stained their country. But there was no country in which there were not epidemics of crime—moral epidemics, perhaps, which lasted for a season, and then disappeared. Take England, for example; at one time there was an epidemic amongst people to commit suicide by throwing themselves from the Monument; at another time for drowning themselves in the Thames; at another time some other form of suicidal mania ran for a few years, and then disappeared. A few years since the crime of garotting was rampant in the country, but it had now disappeared. In Westmeath they had such a moral epidemic. He felt, and many of his friends felt, a great desire to go down to Westmeath and constitute a volunteer force in Ireland to stamp out the brutal enmities in Westmeath. And why did they not go? Because the Legislature had put them in a false position, and the Government trusted the police, who whispered away reputations and disregarded the protests of the men who had condemned, and still condemned, the passage of Coercion Bills. In conclusion, he felt confident that, although the Prime Minister would have to go through his bitter task that evening, and force the Bill through the House, yet, if Irish Members did their duty to their country, at no distant date the right hon. Gentleman would rise in his place, and put an end to that detestable régime of coercion.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, that Irish Members were determined to oppose the measure at every stage, because they felt that there was no necessity for it; and that its only object was to preserve game and wild fowl in Ireland at the expense of the country. The grievance in regard to arms was in some degree sentimental; but the reality of it could not in any way be denied. For his own part, he was fond of carrying a gun for the purpose of sport; but he would rather debar himself from that pleasure for the rest of his life, than ask a magistrate to compliment him by granting him a licence. He held that every man was entitled to have a gun if he chose, for the protection of his person—it was a Divine right for a man to be able to protect himself, of which the Government had no just power to deprive him. He would tell the House a case which would show that the Bill was used for the protection of game more than for the protection of the peace of the country. A constituent of his had a gun since he was a boy, and got a licence for it when the country was proclaimed, but some great man in the neighbourhood found out that this Murnane was a good shot, and occasionally killed some rabbits and hares, so he determined that the gun should be taken from Murnane. Well, no charge could be brought against him; but it happened that a very distant relation of Murnane's was charged for firing at another party—though the charge was never proven—so the authorities concluded that it must have been out of Murnane's gun that the shot was fired, and for that imaginary offence he was deprived of his gun. That would show them that the Act was used more for the protection of game than any other case. He would therefore feel it his duty to oppose it in every stage through which it had to pass.

MR. MELDON said, he would wish to re-call the attention of the House to the real question under discussion, and that was whether the Bill in its present shape was such as any Government could ask Parliament to pass. Admitting, for the purpose of the discussion of this question only, that coercion was necessary, such coercion should be rendered as little oppressive as possible; but in this case the Bill was so unintelligibly drawn that it would seem really intended not only to leave the people in ignorance of what the law was, but even to render its interpretation by the magistrates and persons who would be called on to administer its provisions next to impossible. He was a lawyer himself; but he was bound to confess that owing to the extraordinary confusion of the Coercion Code, as proposed to be enacted by this Bill, he had altogether failed in his attempts to frame Amendments on its provisions. Government had been guilty of a breach of faith in not fulfilling a promise given last Session—that on any future occasion the measure would be brought forward in a plain and intelligible form. If, indeed, there had been the same clearness in the Bill as in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who introduced it, there would have been little ground for complaint in this respect. One of two causes must be looked to for an explanation of the introduction of the measure in its present shape—either an inefficient draftsman had been employed, or Government had desired to preclude, if possible, the discussion of the details of the measures which it was proposed to re-enact. The first could not be the case, for it would have been much easier for any draftsman with a pair of scissors to have cut out of the existing Acts the provisions intended to be re-enacted and pasted them together, than to have drafted the present crude and unintelligible Bill. The other explanation must therefore be accepted; but he was glad to think the object would not be attained, as a glance at the proposed Amendments would show. It was exceptional legislation, it enacted a criminal code, and its terms should be simple and easily understood by the people, for it must be remembered that it was a measure which would have to be administered for the most part by magistrates who were not lawyers, and that it would be necessary for these magistrates to have 12 or 13 different Acts before them, in order to arrive at a decision under it. As matters stood, however, it was impossible to make out what the Government intended or what the people were expected to do. The Preamble itself presented a muddle such as was not to be found in any existing Act of Parliament, mixing up as it did a number of Acts together in such a way as to render it quite impossible for any one clearly to ascertain what was meant. The object of the Government—namely, to exclude discussion—having failed, he earnestly implored them, in the interest of the entire country, if there must be coercion, at least to put the law in such a state that its administration would be easy and its enactments intelligible. Let the existing Acts be repealed, and re-enact such portions as it was considered desirable to retain as law. That would have been a plain and simple course, and every one then would have been able to understand its provisions; but now it was impossible to ascertain, except with extreme difficulty, what was to be the law. There might be some reason why the House had heard no discussion on the other side; but he thought the real secret of it was, that hon. Members had no argument to offer against the proposition that the Act ought to be introduced in an intelligible form. Having said so much on the question immediately before the House, he could not sit down without protesting in the strongest manner against the proposed legislation. Ireland for many years had not been in so peaceful a condition or so free from crime. He most indignantly denied that such a condition was due to the tyrannical laws at present in existence, and ascribed the existing state of affairs to the exertions and advice of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt), who had succeeded in convincing the people that a constitutional agitation for "Home Rule" was to be preferred to the violent agitations of former times. He considered that bringing forward the Bill at such a time was a grave political mistake on the part of the Ministers, who now had an opportunity of proving their goodwill to Ireland and of convincing the people of their wish to govern constitutionally never before offered to any Government. To this House the Irish people had returned a large majority of its Representatives pledged not to the disintegration of the Empire, but for the purpose of cementing the Union between the two countries upon a basis equally advantageous to England and to Ireland. The Constitution of Ireland was filched away from her by fraud and vices of the grossest kind. He believed that if the magistrates all over the country had been consulted on this subject, they would have told the Chief Secretary that the continuance of such legislation was totally uncalled-for, while at the same time it was demoralizing in its effect on the people. A large number of Members had been returned to assist the present or any other Government to secure peace in Ireland; they came to Parliament and assured the Government that Ireland was peaceful and desired to abandon all violent agitation, that her people wished for the goodwill and friendship of England, and asked for nothing that was not strictly constitutional and just, and what was the result? The Government would not have confidence in the Irish people. They would not say to hon. Members—"Use your influence to keep the country in the state of tranquillity which now prevails." If they would do so, these Acts would never be required. If a little more consideration was given to the views and the expressions of opinion on the part of the Irish Members in the House, they would not be called upon to enact measures which interfered with the rights of the Irish people. Never had there been a time in the history of the country when there had been such an absence of crime, and as there was not a tittle of evidence to show that that would not be a lasting condition of affairs, he contended that there was no valid ground for reinforcing these coercive measures. It was not too late to adopt a different policy towards Ireland. Let the Prime Minister say to us, "Gentlemen, you say Ireland is peaceful and free from crime and coercive measure are not necessary. I am willing to accept your assurance; but, remember, if my forbearance is abused, coercion must be again resorted to." If that was done the House would find that such confidence in the Irish people would not be abused, and there would not be any excuse again for renewing these unconstitutional measures. The Chief Secretary alluded to meetings of magistrates at which a renewal of the most stringent of these coercive enactments were advocated; but no person who was aware of the constitution of those meetings could attach any weight to their recommendations. If the opinion of magistrates was considered of importance, why did not the Government consult the magistrates throughout Ireland? The Chief Secretary dared not do so, for they would have told him that the continuance of such legislation was quite uncalled-for, while at the same time it was most demoralizing to the people. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had alluded to a case in which several men witnessed a murder, but would not pursue the murderer. He believed the explanation of their conduct was that, as the law did not allow them to possess arms, they were afraid to face an armed man. By depriving the people of arms they were cowering and demoralizing them to such an extent that it was no wonder crime was undiscovered. In conclusion, he would contend that the peaceful state of Ireland was due, not to the operation of the Peace Preservation Acts, but to the advice which the Irish people had received, and the example of moderation which had been set before them by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick and others who acted with him; and to the prospect that the country was about to enjoy again its liberty in the same way as the other parts of the Kingdom, and unless they did so, it could not be expected they would rest satisfied.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, that he had no sympathy with crime; but that nevertheless he intended to vote for the abstract proposition before him. It had been his lot to have lived in Ireland at a time when there was considerable disturbance and danger, and nobody who knew his antecedents would suspect that he had any sympathy with crime, agrarian or otherwise; but for the abstract proposition put before the House by the hon. Member for Cavan County, he could have no hesitation in recording his vote, as a protest against the shape in which the Bill had been introduced by the Government. At the same time he would suggest to the Government that it would have been far better that the Act should have been continued for two years instead of five years. This might remove objections which many Members might otherwise feel.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 155; Noes 69: Majority 86.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Short title), agreed to.

Clause 2 (Repeal of certain parts of Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1870.)

MR. BUTT, in moving as an Amendment, in page 1, line 26, to leave out "the parts of" said, the evil had already been pointed out of introducing a number of Bills in one measure of this kind. The right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary himself said that the objection would be a good one if that were a consolidating and amending Bill. He failed to see what it was if it did not come under that head, for it proposed to deal with provisions that were scattered through three or four separate Acts of Parliament. There was first the Act of 1848; that was slightly modified by the Act of 1856; that was materially altered by the Act of 1870; that was again altered by the Act of 1871; and now it was proposed to alter that again by this Bill. For the first time it was now proposed that that Coercion Code should be administered by petty session Courts, the magistrates of which would not have exactly the same facilities for deciphering its hieroglyphics as the Judges of a Superior Court. Four clauses of the Act of 1870 were repealed and only three retained. But the simple way would be to repeal the Act of 1870, and then the three clauses which it was proposed to retain could be put separately before the Committee, so that important Amendments could be made upon them. Indeed, it would be well to make the much more moderate Act of 1856 the basis of the present legislation. With regard to the licence for arms, in the first Act there were only two kinds of licences, one for having arms in the house, the other for carrying them abroad. But, subsequently, a special licence was required for revolvers, and there was another clause which related to the carrying of arms on one's own land. Persons would be compelled to go to two or three different Acts of Parliament in order to know the law on this subject, and that was a most objectionable mode of legislation. The effect of his Amendment would be to simplify the construction of the Bill when it came into operation.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 26, to leave out the words "the parts of."—(Mr. Butt.)

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) said, the effect of the Amendment would be to place them as nearly as possible in the state in which they were in 1856. There would be this disadvantage from it, that very useful provisions would be repealed, such as those relating to search-warrants, the power to arrest absconding witnesses, and the power to grant compensation to injured persons. If the Amendments which the hon. and learned Member had placed on the Paper in reference to the clause were carried, nothing whatever would be left of the Bill, except the interpretation clause. He thought the best course of proceeding would be to wait until the clauses were respectively brought up for consideration. He could not accept the Amendment.

MR. BUTT said, it was a matter of principle, and he must divide the Committee upon it. Here was a measure which would re-enact by implication, and in a way only to be understood by the careful examination of a lawyer, some of the most oppressive parts of the Act of 1870. His hon. and learned Friend was not capable of a trick; but, in previous legislation, there had been a trick. By the Act of 1856 the warrant for search for arms could be executed only in daylight; but in 1870, stealthily, and by surprise, it was enacted that it might be executed at any time of the night. The right hon. Baronet proposed to retain that power. If it were to be retained, let it be done openly and not by implication. If they chose to keep this Bill involved and confused he could not be a party to its passing. It was a disgrace to modern legislation. He did not want certain stringent and highly objectionable laws passed by a side wind, but wished to have each definitely and openly re-enacted. Let each clause be put plainly before the House, and be open to Amendment. He did not propose to repeal the clauses, but simply to make them new legislation. Why should they shrink from discussion on these questions?

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING thought the Government could not do better than agree to the Amendments of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Limerick, and also to those of the other Irish Members. He (Mr. M'Carthy Downing) submitted that the Act of 1870 ought to be repealed in toto, because it was only brought in for a short time, to meet agrarian crime, which was entirely suppressed.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he thought it was most unfair in the Government to press Irish Members to accept this measure upon grounds which were entirely untenable. He considered the Bill unnecessary, and that the Amendments of the Irish Members ought to be agreed to. The right hon. Baronet opposite must see that many English and Scotch Members did not take part in these discussions, and only attended to support the Government. Those Members when, on the division bell ringing, they came in to vote, would find an utterly unintelligible issue before them, and should it be allowed to go forth to Ireland that these English and Scotch Members—in all upwards of 200, he should think—simply voted upon the ipse dixit of the right hon. Baronet? If the Amendment were accepted, the subjects on which the votes would be taken would be known to these hon. Members. He urged the Government to give the proposal further consideration.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, that whatever might be the case with regard to English and Scotch Members,

Mr. Butt

Irish Members had shown themselves perfectly capable of understanding the Bill. He would say this shortly with regard to the whole question—he did not see how they could possibly do anything more plain than state in the Bill, as they did state, the sections of the existing Acts which it was proposed to repeal, the sections which it was proposed to re-enact, and the modifications to be made in those sections. Hon. Members asked them to repeal all the existing law, and to begin ab initio. That was no new Bill; it was a Continuance Act, and it was dealt with in the same way as every other Act of the same kind that had ever gone before. He believed that if the course the Government had taken had not been pursued, night after night would have been taken up with speeches charging them with the intention of making the Peace Preservation Acts permanent, because they had departed from the ordinary custom. What was the point raised by the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick? The hon. and learned Member proposed to adopt the Act of 1856 as the basis of legislation, and merely to re-enact the special clauses of 1870, which it was proposed still to retain. That might have been all very well if the existing law had been mainly contained in the Act of 1856; but the law had been so altered by repeal of sections and other modifications between 1856 and 1870, that the Act of 1870 had become the principal embodiment of the law. The Government were willing to meet some of the proposals of hon. Members opposite; but they could not accept this one, which was practically aimed at the very root of the Bill. Indeed, if the Amendment were passed, he did not see how they could continue the discussion, and therefore he should resist it. He hoped that they might shortly pass from the principle of the Bill, and the mode in which it had been presented to the House, and enter upon the discussion of its details: and then the hon. and learned Member would find that the Government were ready to treat the Amendments which he and the other Irish Members had placed on the Paper, in a spirit of fairness and with due consideration.

THE O'CONOR DON said, he was prepared to support the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Limerick. The Act of 1856 was a temporary Act, but the Act of 1870 was far more stringent, and had been passed for only two years, and many of its provisions were now to be abandoned. Of those that remained some would require amendment, and in order to have the opportunity of amending them the clauses should be set forth in full. He objected, for instance, to Section 39, of the Act of 1870, in its entirety; but if the Committee were against him, he should be anxious to propose Amendments to it. But now no convenient facility was given to hon. Members to propose Amendments and that arose from the form in which the Bill was proposed. At the present time he defied any hon. Member, no matter what his knowledge might be, to understand a single Amendment on the Paper without having all the Acts of Parliament before him. A person would require to have several statutes, and a whole lot of books spread out before him in order to understand the Amendments that were proposed. He could not understand what objection there was to accept the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, although he supported the second reading, he must confess that in the whole course of his professional experience, which had been greatly devoted to the study of Acts of Parliament, he had never come across a more complicated and embarrassed piece of legislation, and it would be almost impossible so to alter it in Committee as to render it intelligible to the particular class of people for whom it was intended. At the same time he could not support the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Limerick, which would make matters worse than they were at present.

MR. BUTT said, all the machinery was contained in the Act of 1856. The Act of 1870 was repealed, except as to three clauses which had nothing to do with the Amendment. He wished to point out that the 8th clause of the Act of 1870, already repealed by the Act of 1873, would be again repealed by the present Bill.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) said, the clause was repealed by the Act of 1873. [Mr. BUTT said, it was repealed again in the present Bill.] That was so; the 8th clause of the Act of 1870 was repealed by the temporary Act of 1873. But lest it might be argued that the Act of 1873 was not so continued by this Bill as to prevent the revival of this clause, he had thought it better to put it into the Schedule of repealed clauses in order to make the matter perfectly clear.

MR. M'LAREN said, he had heard of Irish Coercion Bills, and he knew a little about them; but still he could not say that he had ever read one of them until now. Having done so, he could only say that it was almost impossible to understand what the Bill meant. He was not sure if he made an honest endeavour to understand it, that he should be able to succeed. About a dozen Acts were re-enacted in the Bill in whole or in part, and he was expected to give an honest vote, saying "Aye" or "No" whether those Acts, which he knew nothing about, ought to be re-enacted. He thought that was very unjust; and he was of opinion that English and Scotch Members could not possibly understand the Bill now under discussion, unless they made a special study of all the previous Irish Coercion Acts. He further thought that if they voted for the provisions of the Bill it would be more from faith than knowledge of what they meant. A Parliamentary Paper was delivered to him last Saturday which showed that recently the Lord Chancellor had asked the officials of the two Houses of Parliament to communicate to him their opinion with reference to the consolidation of the statutes. Mr. Rickards having been asked by the other officials to express their views on that subject, made a statement to the effect that it was not convenient, nor was it creditable to our statute law that there should exist on a given subject several Acts of different dates which successively interpreted or partly repealed one or two of their predecessors. The opinion of these officials was that the remedy lay in a consolidation of statutes. That was exactly what they should be asked to do in the present instance. The Committee pointed out the remedy. They said that, in all such cases, the Acts should be consolidated. He (Mr. M'Laren) wished therefore to know why the Chief Secretary for Ireland could not take a pair of scissors and cut out all the clauses of Acts which he desired to be re-enacted, paste them together, make such alterations as he thought necessary for their harmonious working, and then produce a Bill containing this Code of Coercion. In that way every Member of the House could read intelligibly what the law was proposed to be made; but, in the present case, it seemed to him to be impossible, except for those who were intimately acquainted with the matter, for any Member to give an intelligent opinion on the subject. If some alterations were intended to be made by the Government in the clauses of former Acts proposed to be partially re-enacted, why should not such alterations be inserted in distinctive type, as was done in similar cases in the House of Lords, in Bills returned with alterations by this House? There would, in that way, be no difficulty whatever in framing a proper Bill which should include everything which it was intended to include in the present Bill, and which every Member of the House should have an opportunity of intelligently assenting to or dissenting from. For those reasons he should give his most cordial support to the Amendment.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER believed that they were drifting into a very bad style of legislation, for in all his experience of the House of Commons—and it was not a short one—the system of drafting Government Bills was never so bad as it was now. He had no hesitation in saying that a worse specimen than the Bill under notice could not be found. The more we legislated, the more our laws became entangled and more difficult to comprehend, through the system of references in Acts to other Acts of Parliament. What was the use of having a Commission for the consolidation of the statute law, when almost every Act the House passed was framed in a manner inconsistent with consolidation? If one Bill more than another ought to be perfectly plain it was this, because it affected the people of Ireland in their daily life. But he wanted to know how it could be possible for people of the humbler classes to understand a Bill framed in such a manner. The Bill ought to be withdrawn for the purpose of bringing in another Bill containing the whole of the law on this subject.

MR. VANCE said, he could not see why that Bill, of all others, should be selected for opposition on the special grounds alleged by the hon. Members for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) and Wexford (Sir George Bowyer), who had on hundreds of occasions voted in favour of measures similarly drawn. He could only account for the mode of criticism which had been adopted on the supposition that hon. Members opposite had made up their minds to oppose the Bill in any and every conceivable form that was open to them. He would admit that it had defects; but such defects were almost inseparable from a Consolidation Bill.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he could only regard the Bill in its present form as a kind of legislative pudding-stone, and, so regarding it, he should adopt every means open to him in order to pick it to pieces and ascertain the composition of the mass. He thought the right hon. Gentleman should introduce clauses showing distinctly what was repealed and what continued, so that the decisions of the Committee might be come to on intelligible propositions.

MR. COLLINS said, he also was unable to understand the Bill, owing to the form in which it was drawn. He therefore hoped that the right hon. Baronet who had charge of the measure would withdraw it, and substitute for it a Bill in which the Acts and portions of Acts which it was proposed to re-enact and repeal should be fully and clearly set forth. It was impossible for the great majority of hon. Members to give an honest vote upon it.

MR. FORSYTH agreed with the hon. Member who had just spoken in thinking that the provisions of a Bill like the present one ought to have been made more clear than was the case with the measure as it stood. Although he could not vote with the Home Rulers in the end, he thought that in a Bill of this kind such portions of previous Acts as were re-enacted by reference should be distinctly and fully incorporated in the Bill.

MR. WHITWELL thought that as the Attorney General had appointed a Select Committee to inquire into the mode in which Bills were drawn, with a view to amendment, the Government ought to have been more careful in framing the present measure. He thought that time would be saved if the Government reframed it, for it was the worst model of a Bill he had ever seen laid before Parliament. It was a Bill which curtailed the liberties of the Irish people, perhaps, in the interests of order and public safety, and they were entitled to know what they were to be subject to.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that, although at the instance of the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. Forsyth), he moved the appointment of a Select Committee on the question of drafting Bills, he expressly guarded himself against assenting to the objections which were urged against the present system by the hon. and learned Gentleman. It was always a question, when they were going to deal with an existing Act of Parliament with a view to continuing its enactments in a modified form, whether it was more expedient to repeal the whole of the existing Act and re-enact those portions of it they desired to retain, or simply to repeal and modify those portions which it was thought expedient to amend, and the solution of that question must depend on the circumstances of the case. In the present case the former course certainly appeared to him to be preferable. Suggestions had been made that certain paragraphs in the Bill were not readily intelligible; but it was to be assumed that the Acts referred to were well known to the Irish people, and if hon. Members who were unacquainted with those Acts only referred to them they would have no difficulty in understanding the present Bill. The 2nd clause of the Bill told them what sections were to be repealed, and the 3rd clause what sections it was proposed to modify.

MR. SULLIVAN urged that when they were legislating for the common people the simpler the Bill was made the better. In that view it would be more intelligible if the parts of previous Acts were shown, and not merely alluded to by figures. The question, he pointed out, had nothing to do with the policy pursued by the Government. Why should there be a long debate upon matters which any intelligent sub-editor with his scissors and paste-pot, could settle in half-an-hour. The Amendment did not alter in any way, but merely simplified the Bill.

MR. BULWER said, that if the object of the Government in drafting the Bill in its present form was to prevent discussion on such parts of the Peace Preservation Acts as it was not intended to alter, although he did not agree with that mode of drafting Bills as a rule, yet he thought the Government were right in the present case. As to the objection that hon. Members opposite could not understand the Bill, he would only say that if the House refused to pass a Bill until every hon. Member understood it, legislation would be very slow indeed. Everybody interested in the present Bill understood it thoroughly; and he made bold to say that it was perfectly well understood by the hon. Member who had just spoken (Mr. Sullivan), and, indeed, by every other Irish Representative in the House. The only object of hon. Members opposite was to make the Irish people believe that the Government were imposing upon them new coercive laws, instead of mitigating those which already existed.

MR. SULLIVAN could assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that he was in a state of blissful ignorance as to the bearing of the Acts amending other Acts, which again amended Acts in their turn. In trying to follow the relations of one to the other, he was "in wandering mazes lost."

MR. BULWER said, he was certain the Government would only be too glad to draft the Bill in accordance with the views of the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) and his Friends, if they, on their part, would pledge themselves to offer no opposition to those parts of it which the Government did not propose to alter. What hon. Members for Ireland really wanted was, that the Peace Preservation Act of 1870 should be re-opened to discussion, while the Government might possibly desire that Acts passed by a previous Parliament, and which they did not intend to disturb, should, as far as possible, remain undisturbed. If this was the view of the Government he entirely approved of it, and he would therefore vote against the Amendment.

MR. MOORE was astounded at what had fallen from the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken. There was one of Her Majesty's Counsel learned in the law who had told the House that the Bill was drawn in its present form with the object of stifling discussion. This was an important admission, and one which he earnestly hoped would be contradicted. As for the Bill itself, in its present shape it was quite unintelligible. It would be utterly impossible for magistrates and grand jurors to go through the whole statute book when called on for a summary decision; yet that was what the Attorney General seemed to expect.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU insisted that it would be most inconvenient for magistrates who had to construe the Act to refer to five different Acts. The right hon. Baronet said that if they were to bring forward this Bill, except in the usual way, it would be defeated night after night in Parliament and what did that mean, unless that this action was taken by the Government in order to hoodwink Parliament and to secure the passage of legislation which very few Members of the House could really understand.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY hoped what had been said by Scotch and English as well as Irish Members would induce the Government to re-consider the matter. They had fallen into a mistake. Let them place before the Committee the clauses of the Act referred to, let them undergo what modification they intended, and then let there be a fair fight with respect to them; but if the clause were continued in its present form it would be impossible to know what they were fighting about. What had taken place with regard to Section 8 of the Act of 1870 completely proved the clumsy and confused state of the Bill. Schedule A contained the sections of the Act of 1870 which were to be repealed by this Bill, and Section 8 was there set forth. Then it was said by the senior Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) that the 8th section of the Act of 1870 was repealed by the Act of 1873; but the Solicitor General for Ireland stated that the Bill of 1873 enacted only a temporary repeal of the 8th section, and it was therefore necessary that that section should be included in the Schedule. But the fact was, that the section was absolutely repealed by the Act of 1873, and if the Solicitor General for Ireland could make such a mistake on such a point, how could they expect the law to be understood by the common people, and even by the magistracy, in Ireland? He lamented the Bill, however, as one which would be certain to widen the gap which now divided the upper and lower classes in Ireland. By the almost unlimited power in which the Bill gave to the upper classes and to the majority, it was the very thing of all others that was calculated to check the growth of confidence and to make the general population believe that were siding with ascendancy and encouraging the very principles from which, in former times, the people so much suffered.

MR. GIBSON said, he would not now discuss the policy of the measure; but he denied that the section under consideration was in any way ambiguous. On the contrary he maintained it was perfectly intelligible, and there was no difficulty in grasping it. The section was plain and clear as crystal, and the references to previous Acts were quite usual and had not the ghost of a shadow of ambiguity. The logical contention of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick was that the Bill should recite the parts of the Acts repealed. [Several hon. MEMBERS: No; what is enacted.] The Bill did not purport to be a codification of the law, nor a permanent piece of legislation; on the contrary, it was a partial continuation of what he hoped would soon be wholly repealed. Its legal force would have a life of five years at the longest, while its worst parts would die out after two years, and that being so, he thought hon. Gentlemen opposite were somewhat unreasonable in contesting it so persistently. If the legislation were to be permanent, the Bill ought to be complete in itself; but, as an early alleviation of the law was expected, it was unreasonable to single out this Bill as a measure exceptionally confused. The very last Act of Parliament on this subject, that of 1870, was even more abstruse in its references than this Bill was, and yet it was perfectly understood by Irish Members, and was even supported by the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren). He admitted that the Bill was a specimen of the kind of drafting which he hoped would soon be reformed, and which was now being investigated by the Committee obtained by the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. Forsyth); but he denied that there was any reason for a special attack on the drafting of this Bill. It was justified in this case, at any rate, from the fact that Irish people had become familiar with these enactments.

MR. M'LAREN said, that as his name had been referred to, he would mention that he was so little in love with Bills of the kind that in 1866, when a Bill was introduced for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and 300 or 400 Members voted for it, the first vote he ever gave in Parliament was one against it, and his vote appeared in the minority of some eight or ten who opposed the Bill.

MR. FORSYTH objected to this particular Amendment because it and the one which followed would repeal the whole Act, of which it was intended by the Bill to repeal only a part. He was not prepared to support such a proposal as that.

MR. P. MARTIN again urged that what the Irish Members desired to know was what laws were intended to remain in force, and the necessary incorporation of the provisions to be re-enacted could easily be made in Committee. As the hon. Member for Louth had said, it might easily be done with a pair of scissors and a paste-pot in half-an-hour. The refusal of the Government to insert them in the Bill looked like an attempt to stifle discussion. Why did not they accede to the demand made upon them and save the time of the Committee?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) denied that he had, as had been represented, fallen into any mistake whatever in interpreting the clauses of the Bill. It was impossible for the Government to accede to the proposal to re-cast the framework of their measure, which was intended to renew certain Acts which would otherwise expire on the 1st of June of the present year. There was, perhaps, a probability that a Select Committee on legislation now sitting upstairs might report against the manner in which the Bill had been formed. But the able draftsman of the Irish Office had only followed the invariable practice since 1847, and although some slight inconvenience might be felt, no injustice could possibly be suffered by grouping the provisions intended to be repealed in the Schedule, or by the references to previous Acts. Why such great objection should now be raised for the first time he could not see, for there was no criticism that had been made on the Bill, that was not equally applicable to every Act of this code since 1847. There were Notices of 67 Amendments to this Bill of five clauses. Every possible point would thus be raised. The Government would not shrink from demanding the measures necessary for the preservation of the peace; but they would carefully consider every proposal whereby this object could be secured with the least possible inconvenience to the law-abiding people of the country.

MR. BUTT did not ask the Government to recast the Bill, but he would undertake that the changes desired could be made in three minutes at the Table of the House. If that was not done it would go forth that a Member of the legal profession sitting on the Ministerial side of the House had declared that the object of the Government in framing the Bill in this manner was to prevent discussion; but he must say that he had a far better opinion of the Solicitor General and Chief Secretary for Ireland than to believe that the statement was well-founded.

MR. BULWER said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman had misunderstood what he had said, or, at least, what he had intended to say. Not being a Member of the Government he had not stated and could not presume to state what their object had been. When the hon. Member for Louth asked why the Government did not use their scissors and paste-pot, and put in their Bill all the clauses of the Act of 1870, he merely asked the hon. Member whether if that were done he would pledge himself not to oppose those clauses.

MR. BIGGAR said, he had taken an unusual amount of trouble in informing his mind on the present Bill, but he had been obliged to give up the idea of reading the Acts dealt with in the measure. The Act which was here dealt with had reference to no less than four other Acts of the utmost importance and complexity.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 222; Noes 84: Majority 138.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 (Continuance of Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act of 1870, subject to amendments and modification).

The Solicitor General for Ireland

THE O'CONOR DON moved, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 4, to leave out the words "sections 12 and 13 of." His object was to omit all the clauses referred to by the Bill, which embodied the principle of charging the inhabitants of any locality with the payment of compensation to the relatives of persons murdered in connection with agrarian offences. He was obliged to raise the question in the form he had done, although he admitted it was an inconvenient form, and he wished to state clearly to the Committee his reasons for objecting to the principle. He thought it was unjust and unreasonable to tax the innocent inhabitants of a district for injuries to persons which they had no power to prevent. The hon. and learned Member for Dublin University (Mr. Gibson) had said that this tax, which it was proposed to put upon localities, was quite consistent with the British Constitution, and that when a riot occurred in England, the inhabitants of the district where the riot took place had to pay for the damage committed, and that there was such a law in existence in Ireland. But that was a statute, the object of which was to compensate a person for a malicious injury to property, and there was no analogy between exacting compensation for injury to property, as was done under the Riot Acts in England, and exacting it for injury done to the person. The fact that compensation would be given in the former case would probably deter malicious persons from destroying property, as there would be no object to be gained by it; but they would not be so deterred in the other case, and, indeed, such a thing as compensation for the destruction of human life was impossible. Moreover, it was not merely to certain districts in Ireland that the provisions he objected to applied, for they were put in force in every part of the country. If the principle was a good one, and so consistent with the principles of the British Constitution and British law, why was it confined to agrarianism, and why was it not extended to England? They had heard of such things as trade-union outrages in England, and the law, if a good one, should be extended to England. He thought, again, if the law was such a good one, it ought to be made a permanent instead of a temporary measure. There was, he contended, no more ground for adopting that sort of legislation as a means of repressing outrages arising from land disputes in an agricultural country, than there was for adopting it with regard to outrages in a manufacturing district arising from trade disputes, and it was unreasonable to expect that the one class of offences any more than the other would ever wholly disappear. He believed that if English Gentlemen could only be brought to look at the proposal fairly and with due consideration, they would be ashamed to support it. The Bill proposed that 23 gentlemen composing the Grand Jury should estimate in money the value of a human life, which was not to be measured by the loss sustained by the murdered man's family, but by having regard to the rank, the situation in life, and the circumstances of the person who was murdered or injured. By that means a man in high station would be awarded more, or his surviving relations receive more, than those of an honest, industrious hard-working man, who might have been the support of his family. That was a principle which they would not dare to apply to England; and Ireland was about the last country in the world to which such an invidious distinction ought to be applied, for there it was most desirable, as far as possible, to blot out distinctions of class and of race—those distinctions which had been one of the greatest misfortunes to Ireland, the line of demarcation between those of the upper classes and those of the lower being so unusually broad. It was a degrading task to impose on the Grand Jury—an unsuitable tribunal, moreover, for the discharge of such a duty, inasmuch as it consisted of the upper class, and of men who would not have to pay anything towards the compensation they awarded. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University had, on the second reading of the Bill, said that there was one advantage in the provision, because it would tax the locality in which the perpetrators of the crime resided. But that was not necessarily the case, for the compensation had to be voted if the crime committed was ever proved to be agrarian, and how did that work? There was a well-known instance of a lady who lived at Rathgar, in the county of Dublin, on the very best terms with her neighbours. She had some landed property in quite a different part of Ireland, and, having had some disputes with her tenants, was murdered, as it was supposed, by some of them or by some persons on their behalf. Her husband applied for compensation to be levied on the county of Dublin, where the crime was committed, and the inhabitants of that county had to pay a very heavy fine for a murder committed by persons living in a totally different county. Again, he knew a case where a man who was fired at applied for compensation, and, although he knew the person who fired at him, and refused to give information, yet the Grand Jury gave him £200 compensation, so that in a case where a man declined to bring an offender to justice he was absolutely rewarded by this Act. He had heard that in the county of Clare at the last assizes an application was made to the Grand Jury for an award of compensation by a man who stated he was fired at, who had received no injury beyond a scratch which might not have arisen at all from a shot, and yet the Grand Jury awarded compensation, which was levied on the peaceable inhabitants. That principle seemed to him to be opposed to all the principles of modern legislation. At one time, indeed, men's lives were valued by British law according to their rank and position, the scale graduating from the humblest serf up to that of the man of the highest rank, but he thought these days had passed, and certainly they had passed so far as England was concerned. Looking at the system as it at present stood, and its operation, he should oppose the clause in its entirety, but if it were carried in spite of his opposition, he hoped the right hon. Baronet would so amend it, that its operation would be confined to cases in which Ribbon or agrarian conspiracies were clearly proved to exist. In that way it might be rendered more acceptable.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, lines 2 and 3, to leave out the words "as amended by sections 12 and 13 of 'The Protection of the Life and Property in certain Parts of Ireland Act, 1871.'"—(The O'Connor Don.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, he could not accept the Amendment; but he would undertake to consider on a future occasion whether the law could be further modified. He wished to point out that the clause as it stood necessitated that the crime for which compensation was to be awarded should be of an agrarian character, or arise out of illegal combination or conspiracy, and he therefore thought the Committee could scarcely fail to accept the principle of the clause. The decision whether compensation was to be given or not, rested entirely with the Grand Jury, who were, with the going Judge of Assize, the body administering the law in cases coming within the meaning of the clause. The hon. Gentleman admitted that compensation was given under another Act in cases of malicious injury to property or to person, and for loss of life. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) did not think that money compensation for personal injury or loss of life was unknown to the spirit of British law, for they continually heard of large payments being made on this account by railway companies after an accident had occurred. It was true that the law compelling these payments was not on all-fours with the proposal now before the House, either in its nature, or in the reasons for its existence; and this proposal was made temporary instead of permanent, because they did not believe that agrarian conspiracy and combination in Ireland would be of permanent duration. The provision might not secure evidence, but it would produce a wholesome dread of allowing crime to occur if it could be prevented, and unwillingness to harbour an intending criminal. The compensation awarded by the Grand Jury under the clause—which would be examined by the Judge of Assize and fixed or altered by him—would, in fact, be a tax upon the cowardice or indolence of those resident in the district in which agrarian crime was committed. In order to meet the objection that too great a compensation might be awarded, the Bill contained a clause to modify the provisions of the existing law so as to enable a Judge to check the action of the Grand Jury more than he could do now. This Amendment, he believed, would prevent abuse, if it were now possible; but he questioned if, even as it stood, the law had been in any way abused, for the total sum levied throughout Ireland last year was very small. The principle of the provision had been discussed upon many occasions in the House, and had been approved by large majorities and included in successive measures. He believed it exercised a very useful repressive influence upon crime and criminals, and as such the Government asked the House again to include it in this measure, in the hope that when the term of five years had elapsed, this, with the other portions of the measure, might be suffered to expire.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, he considered the tax a very harsh and unnecessary one, and one which had utterly failed to produce the effects it had been intended for. He would refer to a case in which £800 had been awarded to a widow who probably never possessed a £5 note; and the fine was imposed, not upon the district in which the murder was committed, but upon a portion of the county 16 or 17 miles distant from the scene of the murder, whereas the cost of the police sent down in consequence of the murder was put on a small area, excluding properties near the scene of the murder, on representations, he supposed, of owners of those properties. The evidence given on the part of the Government before the Westmeath Committee showed that the law totally failed in its object, for according to the evidence of Captain Talbot, a resident magistrate, these fines did not to any extent touch the guilty, who were too poor to pay much, and the consequence was they were imposed almost wholly on the innocent. Mr. Reed, another resident magistrate, said these fines did a great deal of harm. They alienated the people and prevented the giving of information. Captain Barry, another resident magistrate, gave similar evidence. Why did not the Government propose that these fines should be paid like the poor rate, one-half by the landlord and one-half by the tenant? The right hon. Gentleman would find it very difficult to govern Ireland if no alteration were made on this subject of fines.

MR. BUTLER-JOHNSTONE would suggest that no fine should be imposed on a district in which a murderer was given up.

MR. HERBERT asked, whether the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) wished the House to understand that a great number of the members of a Grand Jury who had property in a district in which a murder occurred declined to impose a fine on that district in order to order to save their own pockets?

MR. SULLIVAN said, his belief was that the Grand Jury had been influenced, and he did not believe that there was a Grand Jury in Ireland that had not been similarly influenced.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA supported the Amendment.

MR. SULLIVAN said, there was nothing more oppressive or more maddening ever attempted against a people, not even by the Saracens in Spain, than was attempted by that Bill against the people of Ireland. If they passed the clause in its present shape, they would proclaim the Irish people aliens, and not subjects of the Crown. No precedent could be found for the clause, and the rejection of the Amendment moved to it by the hon. Member for Roscommon must have a disastrous effect in Ireland, for nothing in his opinion could be more tyrannical than that a fine should be imposed upon a district, even though the criminal were given up—that fine to amount, perhaps, to the whole rental of the district, and to be imposed by those who would pay no portion of it themselves.

MR. BIGGAR moved to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Biggar.)

MR. DISRAELI said, that before they reported Progress he thought it would be much better if the Committee could come to an understanding on the point. He was much disposed to accede to the proposition made on the other side—that where the criminal was given up, the fine should not be levied. That showed the advantage of discussion, and he must protest that at 12 o'clock, when the discussion was still proceeding, and with advantageous results on both sides, a Motion for reporting Progress should now be made.

MR. BUTT said, that he could not support the Motion; and he understood that the hon. Member for Cavan did not rise to make it with any intention that the discussion should then cease, but because he had been interrupted in addressing the Committee. The imposing of this old blood money was a most important provision in itself, and ought to form the subject of a separate Bill.

MR. BIGGAR said, he made the Motion because the question could hardly be said to be receiving discussion. No arguments had been adduced in favour of the clause, and there was not the slightest probability of arguing it out that night. It would be his duty when the Committee met again to speak at some length on the point. The House was in no mood to listen now, and he should therefore persevere with his Motion.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA observed that no doubt the proposition just made by the Prime Minister had been made in good faith; but it was a proposition which could have no useful effect. In most cases the people of a district would be unable to arrest and deliver up a criminal; and, if they could not, why should they be fined for not doing so?

MR. RONAYNE protested against the clause as being most injurious in its effects on the social position of many districts in Ireland. He thought it hard that poor people should be taxed for the payment of compensation when they might be perfectly innocent, and know nothing whatever of the offence. [Cries of "Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN hoped the hon. Member would confine himself to the Motion that the Committee report Progress.

MR. BIGGAR said, he would withdraw his Motion for reporting Progress, in order to give the hon. Member for Cork an opportunity of addressing the Committee.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. RONAYNE then continued: He opposed the clause as a piece of class legislation, which was not so apparent at first sight, because it was difficult for Englishmen to realize the relations of grand jurors to occupying tenants in Ireland. He knew many cases in which the proposed clause would inflict the greatest hardship, and should cordially support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Roscommon. That was the perpetuation of a system which had been the cause of keeping the two countries asunder, and which might eventually terminate in their severance.

CAPTAIN NOLAN argued that the amount paid for compensation ought to be levied upon the poor rates rather than upon the county cess.

MR. BUTT hoped the right hon. Gentleman would modify the clause, for as it now stood its provisions were most objectionable. Compensation could be claimed not only for agrarian murders but for every other class of illegal combination. That was opposed to the principles of the old law of England, and should not, under present circumstances, be applied to Ireland.

MR. BIGGAR also asked the right hon. Gentleman if he would modify the clause, so as to take the charge proposed by the Bill in cases of agrarian outrages off the county cess, which fell on the occupiers, and place it on the landowners.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, he was not prepared to adopt any such course. The charge had been placed on the county cess, and upon the occupiers who paid that cess, for good and sufficient reasons. The owner might not be resident and might not be acquainted with the facts, but the occupiers must have a guilty knowledge if anyone had. Beyond that, there was a precedent for the course proposed in certain sections of the Irish Land Act which had been unanimously agreed to.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, the theory of the House was that the compensation should be paid, half by the landlord and half by the occupier. In practice the whole fell upon the occupier.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 240; Noes 79: Majority 161.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, the next Amendment stood in his name; but at that late hour (10 minutes to 1) he hoped the Government would not proceed farther with the Bill. He would, therefore, move to report Progress.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH assented.

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

NATIONAL DEBT ACTS.

COMMITTEE.

Acts considered in Committee.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in moving—

"That it is expedient to amend the Acts relating to the National Debt, and to make further provision for the Reduction of the said Debt," said, the Bill he proposed to introduce was mainly for the purpose which he described in his Financial Statement—namely, to appropriate a fixed sum yearly towards the reduction of the Debt. There would, however, be another provision which he had not yet mentioned. It was in conformity with a recommendation of the Public Accounts Committee, which sat some years ago and had reference to the existing Sinking Fund. The payments in connection with this fund were at present made quarterly, and were of a very irregular character, and what he proposed was that the ascertained surplus upon any one year should be paid over in one sum in the course of the year following. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Acts relating to the National Debt, and to make further provision for the Reduction of the said Debt.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock.

CLERK OF THE PARLIAMENTS.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR informed the House, That Her Majesty had been pleased to appoint, by Her Letters Patent dated the 27th day of this instant April, Sir William Rose, K.C.B., Clerk Assistant of the Parliaments, to the office of Clerk of the Parliaments, vacant by the resignation of Sir John George Shaw Lefevre, K.C.B., the late Clerk of the Parliaments: Patent read, and the said Sir William Rose then made the prescribed Declaration (which Declaration is set down in the Roll amongst the oaths of the great officers), and took his seat at the Table.

CLERK ASSISTANT.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR acquainted the House, That by virtue of the power granted to him as Lord Chancellor, by the statute 5th Geo. IV. cap. 82. sect. 4., he had appointed Ralph Disraeli, esquire, to be their Lordships Clerk Assistant in the room of Sir William Rose, K.C.B., appointed Clerk of the Parliaments.

Then it was moved, That this House do approve of the appointment of Ralph Disraeli, esquire, as their Lordships Clerk Assistant in the room of Sir William Rose, K.C.B., appointed Clerk of the Parliaments.

On Question, resolved in the affirmative.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE QUALIFICATION BILL—(Nos. 5-72.)

(The Earl of Albemarle.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order.)

THE EARL OF FEVERSHAM said, that this Bill, if passed, would put into the hands of the Lord Lieutenants more power than they at present possessed, and that power they would be able to use for Party purposes. Their Lordships had previously rejected Bills dealing with this subject, and no new arguments had been adduced in favour of the present Bill. The present qualification was not more easily attainable than at any previous time, and, therefore, he hoped the Bill would be rejected.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR pointed out that their Lordships had already admitted the principle of the Bill by reading it a second time.

THE EARL OF ALBEMARLE moved, to leave out Clause 1. and insert the following clause:—

“Notwithstanding the said Act or anything therein contained, every person of full age and who has during the two years immediately preceding his appointment been the occupier of lands or tenements within any county, riding, or division in England or Wales of the rateable value of not less than two hundred pounds, and shall during that time have been rated to all rates (if any) made for the relief of the poor in respect of the said premises, and who is otherwise eligible, shall be deemed to be qualified to be appointed a justice of the peace for such county, riding, or division.”

THE LORD CHANCELLOR suggested that, instead of the clause proposed by the noble Earl, the following clause should be inserted:—

“Notwithstanding the said Act or anything therein contained, every person of full age and who has during the two years immediately preceding his appointment been the occupier of a dwelling-house assessed to the inhabited house duty at the value of not less than one hundred pounds within any county, riding, or division in England and Wales, and shall during that time have been rated to all rates and taxes in respect of the said premises, and who is otherwise eligible, shall be deemed to be qualified to be appointed a justice of the peace for such county, riding, or division.”

THE EARL OF ALBEMARLE agreed to the clause thus amended.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Other Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Thursday next; and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 72.)

CHIMNEY SWEEPERS BILL [H.L.]

A Bill for further amending the Law relating to Chimney Sweepers—Was presented by The Earl of SHAFTESBURY; read 1st. (No. 71.)

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 27th April, 1875.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILL—First Reading—Waste Lands (Ireland) * [141].

INLAND REVENUE—WINE LICENCES TO BEER-HOUSE KEEPERS.

QUESTION.

MR. CAWLEY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he has considered the representations which were made to him by a deputation from the Beer-house Keepers in reference to the extra charge to which they are subject for Licences to sell Wines as compared with the amount paid by the Keepers of Public Houses; and, whether he is prepared to make any and, if so, what alterations for their relief?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER: Sir, I have communicated with the Board of Inland Revenue on the subject, and have received a Report from them, from which I gather that, so far as Revenue is concerned, the question is one of so very little consequence that I shall be quite prepared to accede to the representations made by the hon. Gentleman; but the question is one which really bears more upon the arrangements made by the Home Office as to the licensing those houses than on the money question. I have handed the Correspondence to the Home Secretary, to whom I must refer my hon. Friend.

NAVY—SHIPPING AGENTS. QUESTION.

MR. BATES asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, What sum is paid annually to the shipping agents for engaging freight of Government stores; and, whether the work could not be as well done, and at less cost, by the Transport Department?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, the average annual amount paid to the shipping agents was a little over £1,800. With regard to the other question the matter was under consideration, but no final determination had been arrived at.

THE ARCTIC EXPEDITION—THE SCIENTIFIC OFFICERS.—QUESTION.

MR. W. PRICE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he will inform the House what scientific gentlemen have been selected to accompany the Arctic Expedition; what branches of science they respectively represent; whether any one accompanying the expedition is a competent geologist; and, whether the two persons in Holy Orders appointed to the expedition in the capacity of Chaplains are Chaplains holding Commissions in the Royal Navy, and whether they possess and have been selected as possessing any scientific attainments?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, the appointment of scientific officers to the Expedition devolved upon the Royal Society. They had selected two gentlemen; Captain Feilden, who was skilled in zoology, and Mr. Hart, who was skilled in botany. Several officers of the Expedition had a fair knowledge of geology, and two had a special acquaintance with it—namely, two medical officers of the Expedition. The Chaplains had not been selected in consequence of their possessing any scientific attainments. One of them had held a commission in the Royal Navy, and the other had been specially appointed to this Expedition.

LAW AND JUSTICE—STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATES—QUESTIONS.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, To state the total number of stipendiary magistrates in Ireland and the number of them who are not members of the legal profession; and also asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, to state the total number of stipendiary justices of the peace in England and Wales, and the number of them who are not members of the legal profession?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, the number in England and Wales was 18, of whom 12 were appointed under the Municipal Corporations Act, two under the Stipendiary Magistrates Act, and four under local Acts. In all cases a stipendiary magistrate was required to be, on his appointment, a barrister of five years' standing; and if the stipendiary appointed a deputy, he must be a barrister of seven years' standing.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, that similar information with respect to Ireland previous to the year 1872 was contained in a Return which had been presented to the House. The stipendiary magistrates appointed since that date were very few in number, and if the hon. Member would move for a continuation of that Return it should be given.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—FILTRATION OF AIR.—QUESTION.

MR. CAWLEY asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether there is any objection to the adoption of the plan for the filtration of the air introduced into this House by passing it through cotton wools, which has been proved by experiment to be effectual for the removal of dust and other matters floating in the atmosphere, and whether he can state what would be the cost of such filtration?

LORD HENRY LENNOX, in reply, said, he understood that the experiments made by Dr. Percy of filtering air through cotton wool had been attended with very great success, and there would be no objection to apply the system to both Houses of Parliament if it were thought necessary. Meanwhile, he would remind the hon. Gentleman that the air supplied to that House was filtered through the finest cambric, which had almost the effect of the cotton wool. The cost of adopting the cotton wool plan would be a first outlay of about £200, with an annual charge for labour and material of from £50 to £100.

METROPOLIS—THE REGENT'S PARK EXPLOSION—MACCLESFIELD BRIDGE.

QUESTION.

MR. M. BROOKS asked the first Commissioner of Works, Whether he is aware that Macclesfield Bridge and the fence along a large portion of the Regent's Canal which were destroyed by the explosion of gunpowder in October 1874 have not been rebuilt; that children may frequently be found playing on the bank at this portion of the Canal; that a child of ten years of age recently fell into the Canal and was drowned; and that great inconvenience is experienced by people entering the Park in carriages, as they must now enter at Gloucester Gate or at the entrance at Park Road; and, whether he proposes to order the reconstruction of this Bridge and the repair of the fence of the Canal?

LORD HENRY LENNOX, in reply, said, that he had very little to add to the Answer he gave in the early part of the Session to the hon. Member for Marylebone. He certainly was not aware that children were in the habit of playing on the banks of the canal, and he did not know of the calamity to which the hon. Gentleman referred until he called attention to it. With regard to the inconvenience which persons riding in carriages felt in entering the Park, in consequence of the state of the approach to it, he might remind the hon. Gentleman that, even after the new bridge would be built, nine or ten months must elapse before the necessary accommodation could be made available. With regard to the broken-down fences to which the hon. Gentleman called his attention, he would give directions to have new fences put up. As he then stated, the delay had arisen from certain legal proceedings which were about to take place.

ASSAM—MURDER OF LIEUTENANT HOLCOMBE.—QUESTION.

MR. PATESHALL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If the Government has received any definite information respecting the fate of Lieutenant Holcombe, who recently was murdered, with eighty other British subjects, by the Naga Hill Tribes, on the frontiers of Assam, while engaged on an exploring survey?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Yes, Sir, we have received definite information confirming the news of the murder of Lieutenant Holcombe and 80 British subjects, by a very treacherous attack made upon them by the Nagas on the 2nd of February, 1875. Captain Badgeley, who was with him, and was wounded, gives an account of the attack, from which the following is an extract:—

"About sunrise there were a number of Nagas in camp. Sitting in my tent, I heard one of the head-men say to Lieutenant Holcombe, 'The village head-man is there, but is afraid of the gun.' Lieutenant Holcombe took the rifle from the sentry and gave it to the Naga, who then began to dance and laugh with the rifle on his left shoulder. One of the young men near Lieutenant Holcombe felled him with a blow from behind on the side of the head, and there was a yell raised all through the camp."

Captain Badgeley then describes his escape, due to his falling over a stump; and he goes on to say—

"When I got to my feet again, the Nagas had disappeared and a wail was rising from the camp. Running to where Lieutenant Holcombe lay, I found him with two crossed cuts on the right side of the head. A minute of treachery has cost us the lives of 80 men, and of a fine and kind-hearted young officer."

Lieutenant Holcombe was a most promising young officer, and his murder has deprived the Government of the services of one in whom they had great confidence and reliance. An expedition was despatched at once against the Nagas, and we have received the following telegram from India:—"Naga expedition returned. Heavy punishment inflicted on Nagas. No casualties."

THE WRECK REGISTER—WRECKS ON THE SOUTH COAST.—QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is the fact that, within the six miles of coast line between Romney and Dungenness, there are now to be seen, at low-water, twenty three wrecks of ships, some of which are in positions dangerous to navigation; and, whether measures will be taken to remove such wrecks; if at least twenty vessels are not stranded on this part of the coast every year; and, if he will lay before Parliament a Return showing the losses of ships and lives in the area named since the sitting of the Committee on Wrecked Ships in 1844?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, the divisional officer of Coast Guard reports to me that 20 (and not 23) wrecks are to be seen at low water within the portion of coast named in the hon. Member's Question, three of which have been marked by the Trinity House by wreck-buoys. As the Trinity House have not marked the others, nor made any application to the Board of Trade for the removal of them, I conclude that they are not in such positions as to be dangerous to navigation. The average annual number of vessels reported to the Board of Trade as having been stranded on this part of the coast during the last 10 years is six, and not 20, as stated in the hon. Member's Question. As to the Return to which the hon. Member refers, I have to state that from 1844 to 1854 there was no wreck register kept at the Board of Trade, and that from 1855 to 1865 each year's register would have to be carefully searched, which would take some time; but, if the hon. Member chooses to move for the information subsequent to the last-mentioned date, the Return can be given.

NAVY—H.M.S. "DEVASTATION."

QUESTION.

MR. GOSCHEN wished to know, Whether the First Lord of the Admiralty has received any information as to the behaviour of the "Devastation" in her recent voyage?

MR. HUNT: I am not able, Sir, to say anything about the behaviour of the ship; but on the 23rd instant we received advices from Lisbon announcing that the Devastation and the Hercules arrived at Lisbon all well, and that they were to leave for Gibraltar on Sunday. We have since received a telegram from Gibraltar announcing the arrival of the ships, but with no particulars.

Sir Edward Watkin

PARLIAMENT — COMMENCEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS—QUESTION.

MR. HORSMAN said, he wished to make a suggestion to the Prime Minister on the subject of Public Business. All those who were in the habit of coming down to Prayers would confirm him when he said that from 4 o'clock until half-past there was no Private Business, and half an hour was therefore lost. He would therefore ask the Prime Minister, Whether he might not make an arrangement, with the universal assent of the House, whereby Public Business might commence a quarter of an hour earlier?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, so far as the Government are concerned, it would be for their convenience to meet at the earliest time for Business. I should therefore be happy to avail myself of the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman if it should meet with the general concurrence of the House. I should always wish to trench as little as possible upon the privileges of private Members; but if, as I may infer, the arrangement meets with, I will not say unanimous, but with general assent, I will, with your permission, Sir, propose that the House shall meet for Public Business in future at a quarter-past, instead of half-past 4.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—THE BUDGET RESOLUTIONS.

QUESTION.

MR. CHILDERS said, that as the Budget was introduced at the end of the evening, he wished to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he could not arrange for the debate on the Budget Resolutions to be taken as the first and not as the second Order of the Day? It now stood the second Order of the Day for next Thursday.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he did not anticipate that the Budget debate could possibly be taken on Thursday, and he would therefore propose to fix it as the First Order of the Day on Monday next.

PARLIAMENT — STRANGERS ORDERED TO WITHDRAW.

MR. BIGGAR called to the Notice of Mr. SPEAKER that there were Strangers present.

MR. SPEAKER: Do I understand the hon. Member to take notice of the presence of Strangers in the House?

MR. BIGGAR: I do, Sir.

MR. SPEAKER: That being so, I must order Strangers to withdraw.

The following is stated, upon sufficient authority, to be a correct Minute of what took place during the exclusion of the Reporters.

MR. DISRAELI, who spoke amid great excitement, said—Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that notice has been taken of the presence of Strangers in this House. There may be occasions on which it is proper to enforce the Rule excluding Strangers, but this should not be to gratify the caprice of a single Member. I think the course pursued by the hon. Gentleman tends to the discredit of this House, and that if such proceedings are resorted to the country will cease to believe that this House is what—notwithstanding there may be exceptions—I believe it to be, an Assembly of English gentlemen. It has always held, and whatever may be the political changes within it, I am sure it always will retain that character. Therefore, Sir, in order to foil the attempt of the hon. Gentleman—an attempt which I must describe as discreditable—I shall move that the Standing Order of the House excluding Strangers be suspended during the present Sitting. [Cheers.]

Moved, “That the Rule for the Exclusion of Strangers be suspended during the present Sitting of the House.”—(Mr. Disraeli.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I rise to second the Motion. Although I regret that some arrangement was not arrived at two years ago when the matter was brought before the House by my right hon. Friend the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Lowe), I concur so entirely with the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman, and all the reasons which justify the exclusion of Strangers are so manifestly absent from this occasion, that I hope the House will at once agree to the suspension of the Standing Order. [Cheers.]

MR. NEWDEGATE: Having served on the Committee which considered this question 10 years ago, and having, as an old Member of this House, never seen this Order enforced without some real or apparent justification, I call upon the hon. Member for Cavan to declare whether he can assign any sufficient cause for this extraordinary and discreditable proceeding. [“Hear, hear!”]

MR. BIGGAR said, that what he had done he had done in consequence of the unsatisfactory position in which the members of the Press stood in relation to the House. He complained that sufficient attention had not been paid to the question brought forward by his hon. Friend the Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), and though the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) had given Notice of Resolutions, the Prime Minister had made no sign. This being so, and until some sufficient remedy for this anomalous state of things was proposed, he would every day exercise the privilege he had exercised that evening.

MR. DODSON suggested that in consequence of the declared intention of the hon. Member for Cavan to repeat his present proceeding every Sitting the Standing Order with respect to the presence of Strangers should be suspended “until further notice.”

It was understood that several hon. Members from Ireland rose and repudiated all knowledge of, or concurrence in, the proceeding of the hon. Member for Cavan.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Rule for the Exclusion of Strangers be suspended during the present Sitting of the House.—(Mr. Disraeli.)

After the lapse of about 20 minutes Strangers were re-admitted.

EXPORT OF HORSES—DETERIORATION OF THE BREED.—RESOLUTION.

MR. CHAPLIN rose to call attention to the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Lords in 1873 on Horses, and to move—

“That this House views with apprehension the large and continued export of the best and soundest stud horses and brood mares for general purposes from this Country, and wishes to direct the attention of Her Majesty’s Government to the national importance of taking such steps as may be desirable to prevent the deterioration of the stock which remains.”

The hon. Member said that seldom, if ever, he apprehended, in the annals of that House had there been taken a course more uncalled for, more unwarrantable, or more offensive to the House than that which had been adopted by the hon. Member for Cavan, who appeared to forget that he was now admitted into an Assembly of Gentlemen. However that might be, he was proportionately grateful to the House for the decision at which they had arrived in rejecting the Motion of the hon. Member; and there was no man in the House, and, he believed, no man in the country, who would not re-echo the eloquent and indignant protest which the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government had uttered against that Motion. Having said this, he trusted the House would regard the importance of the subject he was about to submit to its notice as a sufficient apology for his intruding it upon their attention. It seemed to him that the question of the supply of horses in this country—and by that he meant the supply of horses bred and produced in the United Kingdom—was a question of very great interest, not only to himself and to many other Members of that House, as well as to an immense number of persons out of the House, but that it was, in addition to that, a subject which engaged the attention of the country at that moment, and one which deeply concerned the interests of the nation at large. Under those circumstances, he would endeavour to state, as briefly as he could, the reasons which had led him to place his Notice on the Paper; and if he were compelled to trespass somewhat severely on the patience of hon. Members, he should rely upon the indulgence and kindness on the part of the House which it had been his good fortune to experience upon more than one occasion. Whatever might be the cause—whether it was owing to the advantages of climate and of soil which we undoubtedly possessed in this country, or to the almost instinctive love and knowledge of the animal which appeared to be indigenous to the character of Englishmen, or whether it was owing to the enormous amount of care, pains, and attention bestowed upon its production in its most perfect form—one thing was perfectly certain, that this country had enjoyed for a very considerable period all the advantages which were to be derived from the possession of horses, and of a breed of those horses which had hitherto been unrivalled in any part of the world. Now, there might be a difference of opinion as to how this result had been first brought about; and he attributed to the practice of horse-racing and to the institution of the Turf as it had been conducted in this country, in the first instance, at all events—and he said in the first instance, because he believed that racing, as conducted in the past, conducted more to the general welfare of our horses than it did in the present—in no small or inconsiderable degree, the unquestioned superiority of our own horses over those of any other nation in the world. That was not the time, nor was he there to defend that institution. Racing was, on the whole, he was happy to say, in a tolerably flourishing condition, and was well able to take care of itself, although some persons constantly decried and attempted to run down the Turf. There were some things in connection with the Turf which he should gladly see altered. But, although he did not despair of seeing reforms carried out in connection with it, hon. Members should remember that it was beyond all question and doubt that it was the Turf which had mainly, if not entirely, promoted, stimulated, and encouraged the breeding of thoroughbred horses in Great Britain, and through them had benefited and improved every class of horse in the United Kingdom to such an extent that they had not only been sought for generally, but had become the admiration and the envy of the inhabitants of every quarter of the globe. That was a circumstance of which every Englishman ought justly to feel proud. He could not, however, look forward without a feeling of apprehension to a similar state of things in the future. Had there not been a well-grounded alarm in the minds of a number of persons who were competent to form an opinion on the subject that the country was losing the best of its breeding stock for general purposes, his Motion would never have been placed upon the Paper. They must not shut their eyes to the fact that an immense proportion of our best stallions and of our brood mares were being taken out of the country, and that, in the opinion of those people to whom he had referred, many of the horses which were bred in the country in these days were generally inferior in quality, and probably also deficient in quantity, too, as compared with what was the case some few years ago. If those views were correct—and he could show that they had at least a great deal of foundation—he said it was a question that was worthy of the serious attention of Parliament and of the country. The House would remember that public attention was first prominently called to this question a few Sessions since by a noble Lord in “another place” (Lord Rosebery), and the result was that a Committee was appointed to “Inquire into the condition of this country with regard to horses, and its capabilities of supplying any present or future demand for them.” That Committee enjoyed special advantages for discharging the task which was imposed upon it. Noble Lords sat on that Committee, who, by their judgment and special experience, were peculiarly capable of dealing with the question. The Heir Apparent to the Throne, who was one of its Members, displayed that sympathy with its objects which he invariably manifested in every subject that possessed considerable interest for any portion of the people of this country; and they had in addition as their President one who combined with a thorough knowledge of the subject distinguished ability and all the ardour and generous ambition of a youthful politician, which was not to be daunted by the difficulties incident to a question of this nature. The House could not have forgotten the very great interest that was manifested in the proceedings of that Committee at the time; and it was not too much to say that its appointment created a perfect flutter of excitement and anticipation in the minds of all the horse-loving portion of the community. It was hoped that its inquiries would result in the question being dealt with in a determined and vigorous manner. Those anticipations had been realized to this extent—that a vast amount of valuable and instructive evidence, which the House would do well to consider carefully, bearing upon the whole question, was laid before the Committee, and to some portions of which he would presently refer. At the same time, he was bound to confess that when the Report of that Committee appeared, it gave rise to widespread and general feelings of disappointment, from the conspicuous absence of any substantial recommendations, beyond two or three trifling suggestions as to how to deal with the acknowledged evils which it had been expected the Committee would have grappled and dealt with in an effectual manner. So far as their collection of evidence went, he thought that the labours of that Committee had been of the utmost value; but, so far as any proposals on their part as effectual remedies went, he must say he thought they had been singularly barren indeed. It was under these circumstances that he had ventured once more to bring this subject under the notice of Parliament. Now, there were three considerations in particular in connection with this question, which were all more or less dealt with in the evidence which had been taken before the Committee, to which he was anxious to direct the attention of hon. Members, because it was upon them that the decision at which they arrived on this subject must depend. He would ask the House then to consider, in the first place, the present condition of our horse supply in this country, both as regarded its quantity and its quality. In the second place, he would like to refer to the startling evidence given as to the great exportation of the best of our breeding stock which had taken place, and was still taking place, from these shores, and the consequent dearth of good and the great prevalence of inferior animals of that description, which remained in the country; and, thirdly, he would point out such remedies as had been suggested, and which might be applied with advantage to the scarcity and deterioration which was alleged by many, and to the great exportation which was denied by none. With respect to the first of these points, he admitted that when they came to consider the question of whether the number of horses now bred was greater or less than formerly, in the absence of any reliable statistics they had no absolute grounds upon which they could prove any assertion whatever. But, nevertheless, from all he had seen, heard, and read, he was of opinion that we had fallen off in that respect to a very considerable degree. He did not agree with all he had heard; but he still thought there were reasons for that falling off. He would, in the first place, say that he did not think any falling off was to be accounted for by reason of the superior attractions offered for the breeding of cattle rather than horses, owing to the high prices of beef and mutton. The breeding of horses in England had always formed a merely incidental occupation for the farmer, who had never devoted his exclusive attention to the breeding of horses. In former days there was scarcely a farmer throughout the country who did not possess, for some purpose or other in connection with the business of his farm, one or two mares of an excellent stamp, and adapted to breed a good foal; and, under more favourable circumstances than existed at present, with a good horse almost always close at his door, they invariably did so, with profit to the farmer, with advantage to the public, and with a loss and interruption to their work—so small as to be almost surprising. And what he was anxious to impress upon the House was this—that it had been through the general practice of breeding one or two foals every year, on the part of an immense number of individuals, which went to make up the aggregate of our horse supply, and that it was the easiest thing in the world to encourage this practice immensely or to extinguish it altogether. There was no great inducement to carry on that breeding with a view to profit; but, as a general rule, farmers liked the idea of breeding one or two horses, and it was an agreeable kind of speculation which could result in no very great loss, and might chance to bring a small fortune. Having had some considerable experience himself in the subject, he was convinced that it was in the power of the House of Commons at that moment, by means of the most trifling efforts, and by giving a very small amount of encouragement, to increase immensely that practice and that taste on the part of the farmers of Great Britain, upon which, after all was said and done, the horse supply of this country, for whatever purpose it might be required, and especially in the event of any foreign emergency, must in the long run more or less mainly depend. In order that the practice might be successful there were two essential conditions which must be maintained. The farmers must have a regular and ready market for their produce, and they must have facilities for obtaining the use of sound sires at comparatively little trouble and expense. They enjoyed the first at the present moment, it was true, owing to the great increase in the price of horses; but it was because the second condition was almost invariably wanting—because they no longer enjoyed the services of the excellent class of horses they were formerly able to get, because in nine cases out of ten those horses had been taken away to other countries—because the farmers were far too good judges to use the worthless brutes that were left—that, instead of continuing to breed, they had sold their mares to the foreigners who were always ready and anxious to buy them and to give a good price for them; that the practice of breeding horses in England had been growing of late years more and more into disfavour, and in some districts, he was sorry to say, had ceased altogether. The House would perceive that he was clearly convinced there had been a diminution in the supply, and that he was equally satisfied as to the causes of that diminution. But whether he was right or wrong in that respect—and he did not wish to assume the least infallibility—there was one thing, at all events, in which he thought they would all be agreed—namely, that we had at this moment to encounter a greatly increased demand and that our supply was in no way adequate to meet that demand. The real question, therefore, they had to consider was not so much whether the breeding of horses throughout the country to-day was more or less than it used to be, but by what practical means they might be able to encourage and to increase that supply so as to place it, in relation to the demand, on a permanently satisfactory footing. Recent Returns seemed to show that an improvement in this respect had commenced. In the Agricultural Returns which had lately been made, he found the following passage:—

“The number of horses returned by occupiers of land in Great Britain was larger in 1874 than in 1873 by 35,000, the increase being chiefly in the class of mares for breeding and unbroken horses. The number of horses of these descriptions, and which form the chief part of the addition annually made to the general stock of horses in this country, has advanced from 301,000 in 1870, to 367,000 in 1874, showing an increase in five years of 66,000, or at the rate of nearly 22 per cent. A large part of this increase occurred in the last two years, and to a greater extent in 1874 than in 1873, showing that high prices have had the natural effect of encouraging the breeding of a greater number of horses.”

Mr. Chaplin

This apparent increase in the number of horses was undoubtedly owing, in part, to an increase in the practice of making returns, which he found, on making inquiries, had been by no means universal. But, after making every allowance for that circumstance, he gladly admitted that this was intelligence of a cheering description, and he fully believed that so long as the present prices continued to prevail, there would continue to be an improvement, so far as numbers went, even if the whole matter was left, as an hon. Member (Mr. A. Brown) intended to propose it should be, to the ordinary operation of the laws of supply and demand. But the scarcity complained of was only one part, and to his mind by no means the most difficult or most important part of the question with which they had to deal. He ventured to say that it was of vital importance to this country to maintain the standard of excellence, as well as the standard of numbers, for which the horses of England had hitherto always been famous, and which, he thought, to a certain extent, the hon. Member appeared to lose sight of. Here again it was not in his power to offer any proof or make any positive assertion. The question whether our horses were worse or better at this moment than formerly was and always must be a matter of opinion. They could, each of them, only be guided by the experience which they possessed. There were, no doubt, many persons who would agree with him in the opinion that the proportion of good horses in this country to-day as compared with the bad ones was nothing like what it used to be, and that, as a general rule, they had deteriorated to a degree which was positively alarming. Then, again, he supposed there were others—among whom he must include his hon. Friend the Member for Dorset (Mr. Sturt)—who would declare that the horses had never been better; that they were to be had in abundance, and that it was merely a question of paying a proper price. He could only say that he hoped his hon. Friend when he next had occasion to go into the market would not find himself disappointed. There were always some men to be found of that happy and amiable frame of mind whose geese were invariably swans, and who, directly they got anything for themselves, invested it with every possible attribute of excellence under the sun. This description, however, would not, of course, apply to his hon. Friend, whose modesty, disposition, and character were so universally known; but, supposing for a moment that his hon. Friend was quite right and that he (Mr. Chaplin) was totally wrong—which was exactly reversing the real state of the case—it only proved to his satisfaction the terrible and irreparable loss the country had sustained in getting rid of the sires and dams which had bred the excellent animals of which his hon. Friend was so justly proud. This brought him to a part of his subject on which he hoped to be able to afford some information which might be new to many hon. Members of the House. He had carefully waded through the whole of the evidence given with regard to it before the Committee of the House of Lords, and he could come to no other conclusion than this—that if it was worth the paper on which it was printed two facts of the utmost importance were established by it and placed beyond doubt. It showed in the first place, that we had been losing for years, and were still losing, an enormous proportion of the best of our breeding stock for general purposes; and, secondly, it showed that those which remained in the country were of the most inferior quality only. Now, he wished it to be distinctly understood that in making these observations he was alluding in no way whatever to the highest description and class of those bred stock, or of stallions, which varied, in the price paid for the use of them, from 10 to 100 guineas. Owing to racing and to the market which racing created for their produce, private enterprize was still enabled in this country to compete even with foreign Governments for their possession. His remarks were wholly directed to animals of another description—animals which, although they might not possess all the qualifications which were requisite when the higher class of racing horses was wanted, were not a whit less valuable, but perhaps more valuable on that account for general purposes, and for the purposes for which foreign Governments desired to possess them, and which, according to his own experience, and according to the evidence contained in that Blue Book, had of late years been taken out of this country by wholesale. Persons might ask how it was that, with an increased and a still more increasing demand for horses in England, this description of animal did not remain in the country. The breeding of horses, however, and everything connected with that occupation, had hitherto always in England been left to unaided private enterprize; and so long as private enterprize had nothing to contend with abroad it answered remarkably well. But of late years the Governments of foreign countries had become keenly alive to the fact that it was of great advantage to a country to have good breeds of horses, and they were doing all they could to make up for deficiencies in this respect. From Hungary, Austria, Italy, France, and Germany, agents had been sent to England, and also to Ireland, whose business it was to be always on the look out for good horses, and who bought with excellent judgment—quite as good as our own—and with a most careful discrimination in rejecting anything in the slightest degree unsound. Their commissions were practically unlimited, and their instructions were never to miss anything of the right sort. They therefore scoured the country in every direction, and bought up the finest country sires they could get, at prices with which it was impossible for private enterprize to compete. Indeed, it was no uncommon thing for such horses to be bought for £4,000 or £5,000. In one case he remembered £6,000 was paid. He might refer in illustration of that point to a case in which he was himself concerned on the part of a noble Lord whose name was never mentioned in that House without a feeling of deep respect—he alluded to the late Speaker, Lord Ossington. It would be in the recollection of many Gentlemen present that some three or four years ago there was a sale of some of the most celebrated thoroughbred stock in the Kingdom, forming the stud of that most eminent breeder of horses, the late Mr. Blenkiron, a most patriotic Englishman. In that stud there were two horses descended from a breed the most famous that we possessed, and each of them conspicuous for the merits which distinguished it. One of them was Blair Athol, the best horse in the world, and priceless as a sire for the Turf, and the other was his own brother Breadalbane, of no less value as a stud horse, though greatly inferior to his brother as a racer. It might not be generally known that the late lamented Lord to whom he had alluded combined with those other admirable qualities which they had recognized so long in that House all the instincts of a sportsman and a knowledge and a love of horses second to none. Recognizing the unusual merits of those horses, the noble Lord commissioned him (Mr. Chaplin) to attend the sale, and offer for one of them a price which, considering that he wanted a horse for the service of his tenants and neighbours in the county of Nottingham, was liberal in the extreme. What was the result? Owing to the exertions of a patriotic body of English gentlemen, who, at the last moment, formed themselves into a company, of whom the hon. Member for Scarborough (Sir Charles Legard) was one, Blair Athol was bought, and kept in this country, for the sum of £12,000, the Prussian agent having actually offered £11,500 for him. Breadalbane fetched £6,000—three times the liberal sum he was commissioned by Lord Ossington to give for him—and was bought by a foreign agent. That was a simple explanation of the reason why such horses did not remain in this country. They were bought up at prices against which private enterprize could not compete and taken out of this country. He would lay before the House some particulars as to the manner in which those studs were managed in foreign countries, and more especially as to the system adopted in Germany, for his information about which he was greatly indebted to the Ambassador, and he took that opportunity of expressing his sense of the kindness and courtesy he had received from his Excellency. He found that in the Austrian, in the Italian, and in the French studs there were something like 5,000 stallions altogether, and they were distributed in this way. In Italy there were 350; in France there were 1,500 at this moment, which were to be raised at the rate of 200 a-year until they reached a total of 2,500; in Austria and Hungary combined there were 3,400; and all those horses were kept at establishments which were maintained in order to improve the breed by the respective Governments of those countries. Again, in Prussia there were three principal breeding studs, which were originally intended for supplying the Royal stud. In addition there were 11 different dépôts, containing about 1,450 stallions. From those depôts, at the proper season of the year, those horses were distributed in numbers varying from one to six, under the charge of Government servants; and they were located at 540 different stations throughout the country, where accommodation was usually provided for them by the landed proprietors, who took an interest in the matter. Now, the whole cost of maintaining these studs was £170,000 per annum, of which there was received back in fees for horses £70,000; and the annual results of those establishments was a produce of something like 50,000 foals, at a gross cost to the State of £100,000, or an average of £2 per head. Those were the results of that system, and they were surely worth our careful attention, especially when he pointed out that while the average charge for a German stallion was something like 10*s.*, if we had a similar establishment in this country it would be seldom less than two guineas, which would bring in £280,000. It therefore followed that if we had an establishment equally well managed on the same scale, we should not only greatly improve the breed of our horses, but put £110,000 a-year into our pockets. He hoped that was a matter which would commend itself to the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But the most serious part of that question as affecting us was that all those 1,700 horses in Germany were of English extraction—that was to say, were bred either from English horses or English mares, and one-third of the whole had been imported straight from this country. Again, in regard to France, during the last 10 years for which he had any figures—namely, down to 1873—541 stallions had been taken out of this country, of which 150 still remained in their studs, and he believed also that a large proportion of the stallions in Italy were English horses. Now, out of 29 witnesses examined before the Committee, he found that 22 were agreed as to that great exportation, while only one differed from them in opinion; while, again, out of that number there were 19 or 20 who contended that the stallions which travelled the country were, as a general rule, worthless and bad, as against five who took a different view. He would not weary the House with the evidence of the witnesses; but he would quote that of three of their number, which was a perfectly fair sample of the whole. He would take one witness from England, one from Ireland, and one who could speak for the whole Kingdom. Mr. Phillips, the great Army contractor, who had very large experience, was asked by the Chairman—

“As regards the class of stallions generally, are the travelling stallions a good class?”—The foreigners buy away all the best from us, and they would not leave a good stallion in the country.” “Is it true that an enormous percentage of the travelling stallions are unsound?” “No doubt of it.”

The Marquess of AILESBRURY: Do you mean unsound from accident in training?” No: hereditarily unsound, roarers and spavins and everything else.”

Mr. M'Grane, the great Irish dealer, stated that a good many of the stallions in Ireland were bad, and that there were a great many “roarers” in that country. Mr. Lumley Hodgson said there was a deterioration in the breeding stock in this country among mares as well as stallions. He attributed that deterioration to the best mares going abroad, and to the foreigners taking away the best and soundest stallions, adding that the farmers had only inferior stock to breed from them, and consequently they were tired of breeding. Well, if neither that evidence, nor the inferences to be deduced from it could be refuted, even those hon. Members who had put Amendments on the Paper would be compelled to admit that, whatever might be the state of our horse supply at that moment, we had a very deplorable prospect indeed to look forward to. That, then, was the case with which they had to deal. Perhaps he would be allowed to make one or two brief suggestions as to the mode of remedying that state of things. He thought they had two things to do—first, to encourage the practice of breeding as much as they could; and, secondly, to discourage the bad, and to devise some means of keeping the good, stallions in England, and dispersing them over the country. To prohibit exportation, or anything like it, according to his mind, would be out of the question. But there were two or three proposals which it appeared to him would be simple, feasible, and effectual. To discourage bad stallions, even without any undue interference with the liberty of individuals, was not very difficult. The Chancellor of the Exchequer only a short time ago took off the tax on horses, and it could not be denied that he had a right, if he saw fit, to re-impose it. He (Mr. Chaplin) would impose a considerable tax on every stallion that covered in England for hire, to be remitted on every occasion where it fulfilled certain conditions of soundness which they ought to require. It might be said they had no machinery for such a purpose; but he could not believe, especially in these days of Inspectors, that it could not be created without any very serious difficulty that could not be surmounted. In order to retain the good horses in England, his next suggestion was that they might have Government depôts in England under the same system as that which had been so successful abroad, and here they had a machinery ready to their hand, for there were State establishments maintained in this country for the breeding of horses; and if the object of those establishments was, as it ought to be, to improve the national breed of horses in England, they might do infinitely more than was now done towards attaining that object, instead of producing a number of worthless yearlings, of which of late years they had seen too many at the paddocks of Hampton Court. No great amount of capital would be needed. There were not enough horses to be found in England. They were not at this moment to be found in numbers sufficient to justify the outlay of more than £5,000 or £6,000, or, at the utmost, £10,000 a-year. If once they were purchased, they would not only pay their own keep, but they would pay a very good interest into the bargain. Then as to their use, they might, at the proper season, be sent over the country, as in Prussia, under the charge of Government servants; or, if that were deemed undesirable, they might be let annually by auction in the same way as the Glasgow stud was at the present moment. That stud, which he had just visited, not only did enormous service to the country, but paid a considerable interest to its proprietors. If this project were not approved—although it was one to which, for his part, he was disposed to attach the highest importance—he thought some good might be effected by giving large prizes at agricultural shows, on a system which he would describe. He would give prizes for foals, yearlings, and two-year-old horses. The younger the stock the quicker would be the return, and consequently the inducement to the owners would be greater, and in every case of a winner he would have the prizes supplemented by one for the mare and stallion from which he was bred. In that way the owners would have considerable inducements held out to them to retain their mares in the country, and the best stallions—the test of whose excellence was not so much what they were themselves as the quality of the stock which they begot—would be the means of securing such a number of prizes as to become very valuable property, so that their owners would be disposed to refuse the large sums for them which they were accustomed to receive when they were bought by foreigners. He had now almost done, and he had to thank the House exceedingly for the kindness with which they listened to a somewhat more than ordinary long statement. He was well aware that in making the present proposal he was doing that which was opposed to the practices and prejudices of the British House of Commons; but he knew also that the question was a most exceptional one. Hostile Amendments, indeed, had been placed on the Paper, and yet placed there, he was confident, in no unfriendly spirit. To his hon. Friend the Member for Dorset he would venture to say that, however he might regard it, the subject was one of real importance, and one with which, sooner or later, the House would find itself compelled to deal. He would ask him was he aware that three-fourths of the horses which were working in our streets at the present moment had not come from abroad? Was he aware that since the Report of the Committee was published, the price of the omnibus horses had risen 5 per cent? Was his hon. Friend aware that Mr. Phillips, the great Army contractor, stated before the Committee of the other House, that in the event of any sudden emergency the British Army could not be horsed in this country? Was he aware, to use his own words, that this was not a question of money, but one of not having the animals? Was he aware that it had been announced on the authority of the Committee that the supply of horses was greatly deficient? And he (Mr. Chaplin) wanted to know what was the meaning of a deficient supply? It might mean, in the event of any sudden foreign emergency, that they might some fine morning find themselves, especially if the example of Prussia were followed by other nations of Europe—and they all knew how contagious example was—placed in a position of difficulty and danger which, for aught they knew, might end in disaster to the nation. It was true that they were now at peace, and he hoped they might long continue to remain so; but when they looked to the Continent, and saw what was going on around them, they as men of common sense, could not shut their eyes to the fact that peace at the present day meant, unhappily, but a long preparation for war. What, then, would be their condition, if called upon to act in any such emergency? Would his hon. Friend be prepared to horse the British Army? [Mr. STURT assented.] His hon. Friend was, he knew, a man who was equal to any occasion. He should like to know, however, where the horses were to be obtained. Not in England, nor, he believed, in Germany, because there the doors were closed against us. Neither was it in France, for France herself had been obliged to seek elsewhere for 10,000 horses which she required. His hon. Friend, unable to meet the objections which he had raised, was compelled to resort to an evasive Amendment, to which he hoped the House would not give its assent. The question was, as he had said before, one of enormous importance, and one which he must confess he had most sincerely at heart. It was not given to any man to command success; but if he were on the present occasion successful it would be to him a source of honest exultation. He, at all events, had the consolation of knowing that no efforts of his had been spared to denounce what he believed to be a blind and suicidal policy, which, if persisted in, must sooner or later result in their losing for ever in this country that famous breed of horses which, tracing its descent from the purest blood of Asia, had been brought by the judgment, skill, and enterprise of those who went before them well-nigh to perfection, and which not once, but many thousands of times, had proved its superiority and upheld the national renown in every country and in every clime in which the name of England and her horses had been known. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

COLONEL KINGSCOTE, in seconding the Motion, pointed out that the price of the animals mentioned in it, from those used to draw the carriages of Her Majesty to the donkey which the huckster drove about town, had of late years become greatly enhanced in price. It was true the Motion did not include donkeys; but it was, he believed, the fact that they had risen in value 50 per cent during the last five years. That was a question which affected them all. As to the breeding of horses, he feared there was no increase in that respect, for when information on the subject was first required from the farmers the returns were not made properly, so that no reliable argument could be based on the statistics which had been furnished. The better prices which the farmers could obtain for mutton and beef had, he believed, a great deal to do with the farmers not breeding horses to a great extent, and one of the great objects he had in view in seconding the Motion was, if possible, to induce the House and the Government to adopt some step which would enable the farmer to get quicker returns from that source. The evidence taken before the Committee, he might add, clearly showed that the supply was by no means commensurate with the demand, and the Government found that not only had they to pay an increased price for their re-mounts, but that they had to buy horses at a younger age. For several years past many of our best mares, for breeding purposes, had gone to Germany, where breeding was carried on with great pains. He had been lately speaking to dealers who had returned from Lincoln horse fair, and they had told him they could not buy a sufficient number to pay their expenses, and that two-thirds of the horses in the stables of London dealers came from Germany. France could only give us horses of the lowest quality, and therefore we were flung upon our own resources, and that was the question they ought now to meet. We had incontestable evidence that for many years past we had been losing our half-bred mares, and the question was, how to build them up again. If help was given it might be accomplished, and one of the remedies he would suggest would be that farmers should be helped as regarded stallions. There was no use in private enterprize trying to compete with foreign Governments in the purchase of our best stallions. He did not speak now of stallions to breed racehorses, but of those which were to produce half-bred stock. If prizes were given in the several districts for stallions and brood mares great encouragement would be afforded to private enterprize, and he would like to see those prizes come from the Government. We were now paying £3,300 a-year for Queen's Plates. When first established they were very useful; but their utility had long gone by. When thousands were given not only for flat races but for steeplechases, assuredly £100 offered in a Queen's Plate was very meagre encouragement for improving the breed of horses. In his opinion, the money might much more usefully be given in prizes for sound stallions throughout the country. What the farmer wanted was a genuine article, and to have that article near his door; and the only way by which that could be obtained was either by letting out stallions in every district of the country, or by giving prizes not only at the large agricultural shows, but also at the shows in remote places—Wales, Cumberland, and elsewhere. If the farmer had the prospect of getting a genuine sound stallion he would take to breeding. There could not be a better instance in point than Cornwall. There at one time they hardly bred at all; but Lord Falmouth and others had for some years kept good stallions for the use of their neighbours, and now Cornwall was one of the favourite hunting grounds of the dealers in horses. If the sum given for Queen's Plates was augmented by £5,000 or £10,000, to be given in prizes all over the country for sound stallions, we might depend upon it that the farmers would breed very much more largely. But the encouragement must come from the Government; and veterinary surgeons, masters of foxhounds, and other fit men would always be found to go around and judge those animals. He would also like to see this encouragement carried further, by giving prizes for brood mares and foals. If the thing would not be done by Government, then let it be done by private enterprize; but he was afraid that private enterprize would not come up to the mark. It would be said by the hon. Member who was about to move the Amendment (Mr. Sturt) that the law of supply and demand would be sufficient. Well, the exception proved the rule, and we must meet the breeder half-way. He had ridden a great many miles over the estate and county of the hon. Member, and he would appeal to him if he did not wish to see the Government of the day engaging in this matter, to increase the great popularity which he now enjoyed by keeping a stallion himself for the benefit of his tenants and neighbours. He felt that this question was one of very great importance to the country. He could assure the House that he had had an opportunity of meeting many who dealt in horses; and they, one and all, said that instead of the price of horses going down it went on increasing every day; and he really thought that, for the sake of what was required by the Government and everybody else in the country, this question should receive due attention from Her Majesty's Ministers and from the House itself.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That this House views with apprehension the large and continued export of the best and soundest stud horses and brood mares for general purposes from this Country, and wishes to direct the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the national importance of taking such steps as may be desirable to prevent the deterioration of the stock which remains."—(Mr. Chaplin.)

MR. GERARD STURT, in rising to move the Previous Question, said, that in common with the whole House, he was quite ready and willing to admit that his hon. Friend had brought forward his Motion not only with his usual ability, but also that he had been actuated by no other motive or wish than a sincere and unselfish desire to improve the breed of horses we possessed. His hon. Friend would, he felt sure, give him the like credit, although he might feel bound to differ from him not only in his conclusion, but in many of the opinions which he had expressed. What was the Resolution now before the House; or rather, what were the Resolutions? Because when he first took up the Paper he said, "Hallo! here are two Resolutions combined in one;" and the speech of his hon. Friend had confirmed that idea. Well, let the House examine these Resolutions in a careful, impartial, and business-like manner. His hon. Friend asked the House to express its dread of the foreigner visiting our shores, to take away our best stallions and brood mares, and he proceeded to argue for some sort of Government interference to avert the deterioration of our remaining stock. He joined issue with his hon. Friend on both these points. He was all for competition, and he denied in toto any deterioration whatever of stock. And why was he all for competition? He spoke now as a breeder. Because competition raised and enhanced the value of the article that he produced. Who was the chief competitor? Why, the foreigner; and, instead of throwing obstacles in his way, he cared not whence he came—from France, Germany, Austria, Italy, Russia, Mesopotamia—he would say, “Welcome, illustrious stranger, to our shores; and the more you bid for my horses, my mares, and my foals, the better I shall like and the more I shall appreciate you.” Surely neither of the hon. Gentlemen who had spoken would advocate for a moment that the Government should employ a man to outbid the foreigner in endeavouring to obtain the best article he could. Who was to be the judge of the best article? Who was to be so supernaturally gifted as to be able to say which was the best stallion—which the best mare? His hon. Friend would, no doubt, say that was a matter of detail. Well, it was; but a matter of detail so difficult, so complex, so impossible to put in working order, that he (Mr. Sturt) strongly advised the Government of the day, from whatever side it might come, not to embark in such an undertaking. He would advance a step further than his hon. Friend. Suppose the man employed by the Government had out-monied the monied and illustrious stranger and obtained the article. Where was he to be placed? Was he to parade the Queen’s highway, to be turned out into the fairs, or to be placed in the barrack? No; his hon. Friend knew—and if he did not he would tell him—that if the Government interfered one iota—if they bought one single hair belonging to one single tail belonging to one single horse—they were “in for it;” they were in for Government haras and breeding establishments, which meant nothing more or less than Government grants of money from the Consolidated Fund to maintain and sustain them. He thought that by this Resolution his hon. Friend had framed an imaginary grievance, and then proceeded to demolish and destroy it. His hon. Friend told him that he was modest, but he was not half so modest as the Mover of the Resolution; because if there was one man in this country who had done more good than another towards improving the breed of horses it was his hon. Friend. His hon. Friend had improved materially, substantially, and numerically the breed of horses in his own county. How did he do it? By the aid of the Statute Book? No. By individual energy and enterprise; and he had done this not only without loss, but if he had followed it as a business, he might have added to his pecuniary emoluments. He asked his hon. Friend whether such propositions and schemes as he had carried out so successfully were not far better than annual Votes of money from that House—Votes which were sure to be challenged by some ultra-Radical economist on the Opposition benches, who would argue that such a Vote was unnecessary and unfair to the taxpayers of England. Give him (Mr. Sturt) public competition and private enterprise against Parliamentary interference and legislative enactments; and save him! oh save him! from going one inch further in the direction of paternal Government. He would now refer to the latter part of the Resolution, which dealt with the question of deterioration of stock. What did that mean? It must mean one of two things, or both—diminution in number or deficiency in quality. He was prepared with unmistakeable evidence to refute the former, and could bring unimpeachable testimony to rebut the latter. His hon. Friend had quoted the evidence of several witnesses from the Blue Book to substantiate his case, and he had dealt with those witnesses with a skill and dexterity well worthy of a member of the long robe. He knew exactly where to stop, and in no instance did he give the House the benefit of cross-examination, but in no single instance did any witness come forward in this particular without being taken in hand and bowled over and over again; and of all the witnesses that were taken in hand and bowled over and over again, slaughtered, flayed alive, spificated, hanged up to dry, none was more conspicuous and stood forth in bolder relief than the seconder of this Resolution—the hon. and gallant Member for Gloucestershire (Colonel Kingscote). Being of a generous disposition, he would make his hon. Friend a present of all these witnesses, and proceed to meet him, in regard to the diminution in the number of horses, with his own weapon—extracts from the Blue Book. Now, in 1862 the number of horses charged with the duty in this country was 579,181; whereas in 1872 the horses chargeable were 859,385. But that was child's play compared with the evidence he had got to annihilate the other half of the Resolution. But here he must complain that his hon. Friend, who was welcome to his ponderous blue volume, had been base enough to poach on his (Mr. Sturt's) preserves and run away with his "little boy blue." The hon. Gentleman had read a portion, but he had not read all. He had not read the following extract:—

"So far, there is no reason to suppose there is any falling off in the stock of horses in this country, but, on the contrary, it is increasing, although not as quickly as the demand for some description of horses."

His hon. Friend told them the difficulty he experienced in mounting himself. But then his hon. Friend must bear in mind that he happened to be a remarkably fine specimen of mankind. He defied anyone to look at the hon. Member without coming to the conclusion that Nature had bestowed upon him the very choicest of her embellishments. But if his hon. Friend wanted to be mounted he must pay for it, and he knew no one more capable of writing a fat cheque than the hon. Gentleman. Had it never struck him that there had been a great increase of wealth recently in this country? What did the increase of wealth mean? It meant increase of luxury, and what did increase of luxury mean? It meant more carriage horses, more driving horses, more racers, more hunters, and more hacks for wives, daughters, sons, and self. They were asked to agree to some Parliamentary interference because the supply was not quite equal to the demand; but he hoped he had proved to the House that it need not fret itself about the breed of horses dying out in these islands. Now, as to the latter part of the Resolution, deficiency in quality, he must again address a word of expostulation to his hon. Friend. He had entirely ignored the state of our thorough-bred stock. Nay, more, he had told them that he was perfectly satisfied with the condition of it; but would he get up and tell them that he was not perfectly well aware that the thorough-bred stock of this country was the fountain head from which they obtained not only the sinew, bone, fibre, and muscle, but the lasting qualities, the stamina, which were the chief characteristics of English horses? Would his hon. Friend have the audacity to tell them that there was a single horse or a young hack in his stable whose sire or grandsire was not to be found written in the chronicles of stud horses? In the year 1700, the average height of our thorough-bred stock was 14 hands; but in 1875, the average height of our thorough-bred stock was 15 hands $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches. It was a curious fact that the average height of our thorough-bred stock increased exactly 1 inch every 26 years. It was not everybody who knew that. In the year 1700, when the Emperor of Morocco made a present of the celebrated Curwen Bay Barb to Louis XIV., the height of the horse was 13 hands; in 1765 a great stallion was advertized—his stature being the chief feature in the advertizement—his height was 15 hands, and his name was Marske, by the sire of Eclipse. He asked the House if it was not a curious fact—and it was a fact—that the stature of the stallion should increase in 175 years from 13 hands to 17 hands—through the Curwen Barb of 1700—through the same Eastern blood to the Prince Charlie of 1875? This brought him to the time in which we now existed. Last year, when his hon. Friend placed a similar Motion on the Notice Paper, he (Mr. Sturt) took the trouble to look at his racing calendar, and he wrote to the owners of the first 25 stallions which were advertized in that publication; and he should read to the House the height and the girth and the size below the knee in each instance. The first four were stallions for the use of which 100 guineas were charged. King Tom—height, 16 hands $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches; girth, 6 feet $\frac{1}{2}$ inch; and size below the knee, 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ inches. What did the grumblers think of that? Lord Clifden—height, 16 hands 2 inches; girth, 7 feet; size below the knee, 9 inches. Blair Athol—height, 16 hands $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches; girth, 6 feet 6 inches; and size below the knee, 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ inches. Parmesan—height, 15 hands 1 inch; girth, 5 feet $10\frac{1}{2}$ inches; and size below the knee, 7 inches. The average stature of these stallions was over 16 hands, and below the knee the average was nearly 9½ inches. He wished to call particular attention to Parmesan and Favonius, who had got two consecutive winners of the Derby, each being over 16 hands high, and in circumference below the knee nearer 9 inches than 8. Some hon. Members might wonder what he was driving at. Well, he would tell them. There was no royal road to breeding perfection in horses. The veriest "weed" which might have brought any hon. Member to-day to that House would, if pluckily mated, produce a horse of enormous stature and incalculable value. He would give an illustration of this. In 1825 there was a little mare which belonged to a country apothecary at Newmarket, and her vocation was to go up one street and down another, leaving pills and what not. Well, this little mare, of nominal value, produced in three consecutive years three of the best animals of their respective years—namely, Rubens, Selim, and Castrel. Again, the dam of Venison, who was the finest stayer this country ever saw, stopped still after she had gone half-a-mile; and the moment she had gone that distance she could go no faster than the hon. Member for Lincolnshire could on his own hack. Now, his theory was that the more they bred the more likely they would be to attain perfection; but, above all things, he would ask the House not to place any shackles in any way upon the breeder of horses. It was not all gold that glittered in that direction, as he would show by an illustration. Three or four years ago he set up a small breeding establishment of his own through the kindness of his hon. Friend the Member for Weymouth (Sir Frederick Johnstone), and became possessed of three about as perfect brood mares as could be conceived. In order to obtain the best produce he could, he sent the mares to the most expensive horses, at 100 guineas. He went from home for two or three months, and when he returned he thought he would go and look at these mares, so he took his walking-stick and went into the paddock where the mares were. They all walked up to him and looked him full in the face, and he found that not one of those mares was a bit more in foal than he (Mr. Sturt) was at that moment. He asked the House whether it was astonishing or to be wondered at that breeders should view with fear, dread, and trepidation any Motion which might in any way detract from the value of their produce when it did appear? He had endeavoured to prove to the House, to the best of his ability, that the Motion now under consideration was unnecessary—and here he might say that no man had derived more benefit than his hon. Friend had done from freedom of action. He hoped, however, he had said nothing that would wound the feelings of his hon. Friend. Certainly it had not been his intention to do so, for no man was more ready and willing than he to bear witness to the great good his hon. Friend had done in furthering the object he had at heart. He must congratulate his hon. Friend and those who supported him on the circumstance that he had not ventured to propose to place an export or an import duty on horses. Indeed, he might tell those hon. Members who might desire to place an export duty on horses that this country was far too much alive to the blessings of free trade to assent to such a proposal. Any measure carrying upon it the stamp of a re-actionary policy and having even the flavour of a return to Protection would not only be regarded with suspicion, and received with hostile criticism, but it would be unmistakably negatived throughout the length and breadth of the land. His hon. Friend had to-night endeavoured to frighten the House and the country in regard to the difficulties we should have to encounter in case of invasion. This was a mere bugbear, because if danger were impending, or if it was only flitting on the horizon, he would guarantee to the Government 100,000 horses. Not out of his own stables, of course; but on such an occasion he would stand sponsor for the loyalty and patriotism of his own countrymen, from the highest to the lowest. He had listened attentively to the speech of his hon. Friend in the hope that he might have made some practical suggestion, offered some feasible solution, or found some definite method of grappling with this imaginary equine disaster. He was, however, much disappointed at not finding any practical remedy proposed. As for himself, he should like to feel that he had said something which might tend to increase and improve the breed of horses.

Before he sat down he had two favours to ask—one from Her Majesty's Government and the other from a large and influential class in this country. His entreaty to the Government was that they should do nothing. He saw many hon. Gentlemen opposite of the class to which he had the honour to belong, and there were many others on his own side of the House and also in "another place." He would ask them to follow the example of his hon. Friend the Member for Lincolnshire and himself, and set up in the South a few breeding establishments. They had every inducement to do so. They had paddocks, pastures new, and nature smiling, and if they would only do this he felt convinced that after generations would acknowledge the superiority of our equine production above that of all other nations of Europe, and that such a Motion as the present would never be necessary. Lastly, he believed that in after years those who considered the question would arrive at the conclusion that the Member for Dorsetshire was wise in his generation when he took upon himself to submit to the House, as he now humbly did, the Previous Question.

Previous Question proposed, "That that Question be now put." — (Mr. Sturt.)

MR. A. H. BROWN rose to second the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dorsetshire, and he did so because the Forms of the House would not allow him to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice—namely—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the scarcity in the supply of Horses will best be met by leaving the question to the ordinary laws of supply and demand."

He came down to the House expecting to hear some suggestion made as to how the purchase of horses for abroad could be regulated; but the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) had failed to suggest any remedy. It was quite impracticable to think of Government intervention in the way of keeping Government horses; and if good and sound animals alone were used for breeding purposes, we should have still more foreigners coming over to buy up our horses, and so the hon. Gentleman's alarm would be still further increased. The best friend to horses was the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who took off the duty last year. To remove all uncertainty about the number of horses, and to show that the increased price of horseflesh had had the natural tendency to increase the breeding, he would quote some figures from official statistics. In 1873 there were 2,750,000 horses in the United Kingdom, and, comparing the number that year with the number in the previous year, he found that there had been an increase of 65,000 or 82,000 in two years. Nothing could be more satisfactory. The number of horses employed in agriculture, including mares and unbroken colts, was in 1874, 1,007,000, which showed, comparing that year with the year previously, an increase of 45,000, and of 72,000 two years previously. There would be found a steady increase throughout the country, and the number of horses and their increase would be found to be unmistakably progressive. In 1872, there were 230,000 mares and colts in the country; in 1873, the number was 242,000; and in 1874, 268,000; showing an increase between the first two years of 12,000, and a much greater increase in the year following. If they turned to the number of licensed horses they would find that whereas in 1872 there were 917,000, in 1873 there were 972,000, showing that the wealth of this country in horses was on the increase. It was satisfactory to find that horse breeding was spreading in so many counties of England. Comparing the years 1871 and 1873, the number of brood mares and unbroken horses increased in 34 counties out of the 40, while in 1874 the Returns showed that the number had increased in every county. The horse power of the Kingdom was very satisfactory as compared with other countries, for while for every 100 acres of cultivated land France had 3 horses, the United States $\frac{1}{2}$, and Belgium and Holland, 5; Great Britain had 7. As to the horses we imported and exported, it would be found that whether as regarded their quantity or quality there was not the least occasion for the slightest anxiety. The number of horses imported into this country in 1871 was 3,000; in 1872 it was 12,000; in 1873, 17,000; and this year the number had been 20,000. Why should we not go abroad and buy a cheap horse, which could not be obtained in this country? There was no reason in the world, so far as he could see, why horses of this description, light draught horses, such as those employed in the omnibus traffic, should not be brought into this country. He now turned to the figures touching the export of horses. He was not in a position from his limited knowledge to say how many of those animals were of the first class, but he could give the total figures showing the gross number of horses exported; they would clearly show that there was nothing whatever to be alarmed about. In 1871, 9,000 went abroad; in 1872, the number had fallen to 3,000; and in 1873, it was only 2,000; and if the circumstances were considered, it would be seen that it was the disturbing influence of a great Continental war which produced a great exportation of horses in 1871. He would give another proof to show that the export was not of the serious character which some people thought it was. The Trade and Navigation Returns showed that the average value of horses sent abroad in 1861 was £80, whilst in 1873 it was only £63, and Colonel Jennings had stated to the Committee which had been referred to, that he had seen a large batch which were being exported, and the average price of them was only £17 a-piece. If that was the sort of horses which were sent abroad there was not much to alarm the country. Horse dealers were interested in showing that horses were leaving the country because it afforded an excuse for keeping the prices high. They had industriously fomented alarming rumours about foreigners buying up all our horses. In their eyes, the foreigner was ubiquitous—he was as rich as Croesus, and could outbid the poor Englishman. He knew where all the best horses were to be found, and bought them all up, regardless of expense. This mania about the foreigner reminded him of the character in Goldsmith's play of The Good Natured Man, who was made to ask "What makes the bread keep rising? The parle vous that devour us. What makes the mutton 5*d.* a pound? The parle vous that eat it up. What makes the beer 3½*d.* a pot?" He hoped and believed that this mania about the foreigner would soon vanish, and he had confidence in the energetic enterprize and horse-loving spirit of Englishmen. Turning to the question of the quality, he would point out that the Lords' Committee spoke in high commendation of our thoroughbreds and hunters, and stated that the mounted portions of our Army were never better horsed than at present. It was true that the breeding of certain classes of horses had declined, such as roadsters and the old-fashioned Cleveland horse; but that was simply owing to the change of fashion, which caused these horses to be less sought after in England, and consequently foreigners were able to come into the market and buy them at a cheap rate. But as to our better class of horses, such excellent judges as Mr. Tattersall and Admiral Rous considered that our horses were never so good before, and he would appeal to hon. Gentlemen whether a more splendid lot of animals could be imagined than were to be seen in last year's hunting-field, or in the Parks. The hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire had quoted from the evidence of Mr. M'Grane, the Dublin horse-dealer, but he had omitted to refer to the passage where that witness said that thoroughbreds in Ireland had improved in size. It really was nothing but a question of price, and so long as we were willing to give a price that would pay for breeding, we should have the best quality of horses. The wealth of the country had increased enormously, and the demand had for a moment outstripped the supply. Prices had increased, and increased price led to increased breeding. Our horses were steadily increasing in number, and our exports, instead of being a subject of alarm, were a subject of congratulation. If any one ought to be alarmed, it should be the foreigner. He hoped the views which he had expressed—and he was sorry the Forms of the House would not allow him to move his Amendment—would be maintained by the House; and, in conclusion, he must say that any Government interference on this subject would do more harm than good.

MR. DISRAELI: The hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), if he is correct in his views as to the diminution and deterioration of our British horses, may, perhaps, feel that some of the sources of interest in his life are being impaired. But I will offer him this consolation—that if his views are sound and accurate, he may find a substitute for that noble and inspiring pastime which has occupied many of his agreeable hours by giving more time even than he does at present to this House, and I can assure him, after the speech to which I have listened to-night, that I shall be most happy to find him sitting upon the same bench as myself. One of the most striking illustrations of the advantage of competition, however, which I think we have been furnished with to-night have been the respective addresses which we have heard from my Friends the hon. Members for Mid-Lincolnshire and Dorsetshire. That was a passage of arms which will not be easily forgotten, and far be it from me at present to decide who is the victor. In fact, one of my objects in rising is to suggest that, if possible, there should not be a division upon the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Lincolnshire, and that we should not be forced, as many of us may be, to support the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset. It is impossible to deny the interest and urgent importance of the subject which the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire has brought before our consideration to-night. It is one that engages public thought, and upon which the consideration of society, and even of the State, are employed. It is my business, in the position which I at present occupy, to consider it chiefly in a military point of view. I think the duty of a Minister is limited to considering whether Her Majesty's Army is sufficiently supplied with horses under the existing circumstances. I will not give too decided an opinion upon that subject; but I am bound to say that, so far as I can form an opinion from the facts that are in my possession, the state of our Cavalry is by no means unsatisfactory; and I cannot comprehend how the evidence of the experienced dealers examined before the Lords' Committee, and whose evidence has been so often referred to, is consistent with the prices that now obtain for horses for the Army. As far as I can see, there is no very material difference between the prices now paid and those which have prevailed since the Crimean War. In 1870 three or four year old horses for the Royal Artillery were purchased for £45; and in 1874 horses of a precisely identical quality and character fetched £50. It must be clear, therefore, that if there was a demand so great or a scarcity so remarkable as we are led to believe, the prices would have been very different from those which were stated to the Committee. Down to the year 1850 our Cavalry was horsed for £26 5s. per horse. Then came the Crimean War, and the price rose to £40 per horse. What do I find now? In 1870 the price had fallen to £36 per head; in 1871 it was the same; in 1872 it had risen to £40; in 1873, £47; and in 1874 the price had only advanced to £5 more than was demanded at a time when horses were required for the purposes of the Crimean War. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Lincolnshire has rested his case upon three points, one of which is the deterioration in the quantity and quality of our horses. With regard to the question of quality, it is difficult to fix upon any tests which would be generally adopted as conclusive, as so much depends upon opinion, and even upon fancy. The hon. Member for Dorset (Mr. Sturt), in his most interesting, and, I believe, accurate account of the development of our finest Arabian blood since the days of "Godolphin," has shown us that, taking the general views which are alone possible in considering questions of this kind, it is difficult to maintain that there has been a deterioration in the efficiency of our English horses. When we come to the question of the diminution of numbers, we are provided with tests which must be accepted as the materials for sound conclusions. So many figures have already been mentioned in this discussion that I should be sorry unnecessarily to refer to any, and especially to any which have been given before. We have had a Return referred to partially which I have here—from 1868 to 1870—as to the importation and exportation. In 1868 we imported 1,575 horses, and exported 4,091; in 1869 the numbers were not materially changed; in 1870 we imported 2,387 horses, and exported 7,202; in 1871 our imports were 3,448, and exports 7,072; in 1872 our imports, owing doubtless to the termination of the last war, were 12,618, and our exports only 3,300; again, in 1873 our imports had risen to 18,000; in 1874 they were about 12,000; and in both years the numbers exported remained about the same as in 1872. The hon.

Member for Dorset has quoted from an important Return, which I presume, though I have not recently referred to it, is in the Report of the Lords' Committee; but I think I have even a later Return as to the licensing of horses. I think we give the numbers up to the year 1870 as 841,000 in round numbers. I have a Return up to 1873. My hon. Friend called our attention to the fact of an increase of, I think, from about 500,000, in round numbers, to 841,000. But from the last Return, in 1873, I find that the 841,000 who were licensed in Great Britain in 1870 had increased in 1873 to 865,000. This I take to be a remarkable piece of evidence contrary to the conclusions of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Lincolnshire. Well, I will hardly touch upon the second cause of the present unsatisfactory condition of our horses according to the views of my hon. Friend—namely, as to the disadvantages which we have suffered by the exportation of breeding stock, because I do not understand that my hon. Friend insisted upon these facts as a foundation for any interference of the Government or the Legislature. We notice the circumstance with regret; but I am not persuaded that there really is any Party or any individual in the House of Commons who is prepared to put any check upon the exportation of horses; and therefore I will not dwell upon it. I would rather touch—which I will do shortly—upon the third head of the interesting speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Lincolnshire—namely, the remedies which he suggests. Now the remedies which he suggests I confess appeared to me to be the portion of his address which was the least appreciated. I do not find in the remedies which he suggests any that are at all equal to the assumed evils which he looked upon as his duty to encounter; and, at the same time, they appear to me to be, though slight, probably productive of public inconvenience and injury. I do not think it is possible for us to bid against those prices which foreign Governments give by offering prizes which would be considered moderate in different districts of the country. If the power of foreign Governments, with their unlimited resources, is of the character my hon. Friend describes, is it possible to imagine that by confiscating Queen's Plates, or by any other means which the Government might have at hand or which the House of Commons would authorize, we could compete with those mighty Empires which are buying up all our stock at fabulous prices, and that with no regard to any immediate return for their capital, but solely with a view to the ultimate and beneficial consequences which they may produce in their respective countries? Again, I cannot understand that the system suggested by my hon. Friend for bodies of travelling sires wandering about under inspection in different parts of the country would be a system from which anyone would guarantee efficient results. It appears to me that it might be open to a great deal of mismanagement and carelessness, and that the Government in adopting it might only be doing very badly what individuals most probably would do much more efficiently. We have a remarkable instance in the haras of India of what can be effected by individual action. For a considerable period after its establishment in India the haras, which was looked upon by Government as of great importance, was not at all successful. I believe it was established for a limited period, and it was contemplated that it must be ultimately given up. After 10 or 12 years' experiment it gave such unfavourable results that Sir George Barlow, the Governor General, proposed to abolish the system; but, on further consideration of the subject, the Court of Directors determined to send over from England to superintend the stud a man who was thoroughly conversant with horses and breeding. Mr. Morecraft, a man of extraordinary energy, judgment, and knowledge was sent out, and his management was most successful and fully realized all the hopes of the Government. But it was entirely the individual character of the superintendent that made the haras of India successful, for at his death the establishment gradually declined was obliged to be given up. We have this example to guide us in considering what would be the effect of these travelling sires distributed over the country under the care of Government agents. As a general rule, you could not expect to see Government agents exercise that vigilance and care which depend so much on individual character and individual interests; and I think we may assume it would be altogether a losing speculation. This remedy, therefore, is not one which it would be advisable to adopt. "But," says the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Gloucestershire (Colonel Kingscote), who seconded the Motion of the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire, "Something must be done by Government." I say, "Why by Government?" Why should the Government keep stallions any more than they should keep bulls or rams? I have never heard that question satisfactorily answered. Who produced our Shorthorns, our South Downs? Not the Government, but private breeders; and it is to the same individuals and the same class that we must trust for a settlement of the present question. It is to this class, which has achieved such great and beneficial results to the country, and of which the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire is such a distinguished ornament—it is to the intelligence, energy, judgment, knowledge, wealth, and experience of men like the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire and the hon. Member for Dorsetshire—although, I am sorry to say, the latter seems to have been deficient in one of his duties in that respect—that we ought to look for those improvements in the breed and number of our horses which the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire so much desires. I do not know that it becomes me to enter further into this discussion. I would just remind the House and the country that we have had upon the subject a Committee in the other House of Parliament, which has been referred to in this debate, a Committee distinguished by the ability of its Members, by their being perfectly equal to the subject with which they had to deal, who brought to it a knowledge which perhaps no other Assembly in the world could equal, experience of an unrivalled kind, and of which the result has been that they only came to one decided recommendation. Upon all other points they appear to have been doubtful, hesitating, perplexed, careful and cautious no doubt about committing themselves, and with a general impression in the Committee that it was best to do nothing—with the exception of one great object. And what was that? To take the tax off horses. Now, since that time the country has been blessed with a Government which has taken the tax off horses, and I think that ought to be accepted as evidence that we are in perfect sympathy with the important and interesting subject which has been brought under our consideration to-night. I am not prepared to do more at present than to remind the House and the country that we have taken the tax off horses, which was considered by that Committee a matter of the highest importance. My main object in rising was to suggest that we should not come to any division on the Motion. I do not see that the temper of the House is favourable to the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Lincolnshire, though I am sure in everything connected with it both sides of the House are equally interested. But I should be sorry if, after a matter of this kind has been brought forward, in a manner so justly commanding the attention of the House and the country, by a Member whom we all so much respect, there should be a division which would convey to the country the impression that there was a want of sympathy in the House with him and with this subject, which might be if a division took place. I think that the Amendment—if we go to a division—the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset (Mr. Sturt), which he enforced not only with so much efficiency of logic, but with such sparkling illustrations, is the Amendment that I should support, if an Amendment is necessary. But we have had an interesting debate that has engaged the attention of both sides of the House, and which will do great good; which will bring the attention of the country to this important matter; which will, I hope, animate the gentlemen of England to the fulfilment of more active duties in this respect than they have hitherto accomplished; which will make them remember that they really now have approached a time when the country expects from them—grateful as the country is for their past exertions—something more than the mere production of thoroughbred stock. Thoroughbred blood is necessary in all things; but the country wishes, and the landed proprietors of this country generally must remember, that there are other animals to produce of equal use and efficiency than mere racehorses. If they bring their minds to this—and I believe they are bringing their minds to it—they will establish a fresh claim to the gratitude of their countrymen; and it is by their means—it is by the exertions of men like my hon. Friends who have addressed us with such remarkable ability to-night—that I, on this important subject, trust the future of England.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE said, he thought the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) had done good service in bringing this important subject under the attention of the House. From the earliest times the importance of a good breed of horses had been recognized in this country. Oliver Cromwell held that opinion. Since his day Royal personages had taken a very active interest in the breed of horses. In 1712 Queen Anne started two horses—Pepper and Mustard—to run at Newmarket, and one of them afterwards gained the York Gold Cup. We were now obliged to dispense with Royal patronage, because practically that House dispensed the Royal bounty; and the farmers and gentlemen of this country had given themselves more to the breeding of shorthorns and sheep than of horses. To this day he found that the agents of foreign Governments were taking away our best stock. The increased prices offered would in time stimulate production, but English farmers and breeders had a remarkably uphill race to run. They had to contend with foreigners who were subsidized by their own Governments for warlike purposes, and the immense sums given away every year at hundreds of races rather increased the difficulty. No sooner was racing over than steeplechases began, and the money lost and won in gambling at those races made the production of horses so remunerative that nobody would part with a good running horse in these days. In the country generally it did not pay to breed horses, and the country was therefore much indebted to those gentlemen who from patriotic motives had done so much good in improving the breed of horses. He did not think his hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Lincolnshire had asked too much when he proposed that the money spent in Queen's Plates should be given up for prizes to the best horses at the various shows throughout the country. The money would be perfectly safe in the hands of the Lord Lieutenant of each county. A Queen's medal or cup for the best horse would be highly appreciated by farmers. This matter really depended upon country gentlemen, and especially upon what he might call the new country gentlemen, who, having of late years accumulated enormous wealth, thought nothing of paying £5,000 for a picture or a Sèvres vase—if these gentlemen would keep good horses for the benefit of their tenants and their neighbourhood, they would perform a great national service. He entirely endorsed all that the Prime Minister had so properly said. The number of horses in the country was larger than it had been, but not the class for Her Majesty's Cavalry. The Government themselves had recently knocked off six months from the age of horses purchased for that purpose. They used to give £28, £30, and £35 for a horse four years old; but they now allowed the same money, and even £55, for an animal three years and one month old.

MR. CONOLLY entirely sympathized with all that had been so well and effectively said by the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire. When danger was distant they might pooh-pooh the warning voice; but the time would come when attention must be paid to it. The urgency of this question was felt much more in the country to which he belonged; but even the urgency which was felt in this country amply justified what had been stated by his hon. Friend. In Ireland there had not only been a decline in the number but a deterioration in the quality of the horses sold. At Mullingar fair the average price of a horse was now only £19; whereas he recollected when it ranged from 50 to 70 guineas. The Irish horses were at one time held in high estimation, and he could mention a long list of them which had been brought over here and beaten the English horses on their own ground. They had no such horses as Russborough, on which J. Robinson rode a dead heat for the St. Leger. Faugh-a-Ballagh was allowed to pass into the hands of the foreigner, and this horse, which had only half of Faugh-a-Ballagh's blood, turned out the best horse in England. These were the acts of children, and if they did not know how to conserve their advantages they would at length let the thing pass out of their grasp, and 10 years hence they would have to come down to the House and acknowledge that they had allowed their best horses to go to Russia, to Prussia, and to Italy, and would be ready to offer countless treasures for what they had thrown away that night. It was said in Ireland that all the best young horses were taken over from that country to Lincoln fair. He had gone to Lincoln to verify the statement, and at that fair had found it to be perfectly true. He found young Irish horses there ready to be sold to the foreigner. He was sorry the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire had been sent back empty-handed to his county, with all his warnings complimented away. The House, he feared, would find out too soon what a precious benefit it had lost. The debate, in his opinion, had come to a lame and impotent conclusion; but he could not sufficiently admire the patriotic motives of the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire.

MR. GREENE said, he thought that there was little left to be said after the speech of the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), which really remained unanswered. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government said it would be difficult to decide which was the better speech, that of the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire, or that of the hon. Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Sturt). No doubt the speech of the latter Gentleman was very amusing; but it by no means met the arguments contained in the speech which had gone before it. The evidence taken by the Committee of the other House sufficiently showed the serious character of the subject with which the House was dealing. He would only refer to one question. The Lord Privy Seal asked a witness whether, supposing he wanted a stud of hunters, and did not mind the money he should have to give for them, he could not get as many of a high quality as he could have done some years ago; and the witness replied that, apart from the question of price, he could not. As to the speech of the Prime Minister, if there was a weak point in the right hon. Gentleman's character, it was that he was not a sportsman, and therefore he could not sympathize with them fully upon a question of this sort. He did not believe that the right hon. Gentleman had ever taken a flight with the Pytchley or the Quorn. It was all very well to compare horses with bulls, but we did not mount out Cavalry on bulls; and, if we were starving for want of beef, the Government would look about them. Returns had been quoted in reference to the horses in this country; but he very much doubted the accuracy of those Returns; and he could hardly understand how anybody could say that horses in this country had not deteriorated, and were not dearer than they used to be. If you wanted a pair of good carriage horses now you could scarcely get them, and only yesterday he gave £27 for a little pony, though years ago he could have bought a similar one for £8 or £10. Cart horses, which formerly cost £40, now fetched £80, and this was a serious thing, because a very large amount of capital was invested in cart horses. He would suggest that Government, instead of buying horses at four years old, should buy them at three years old; because many persons would be induced to breed horses if they could sell them without the trouble of breaking them. The Government found money to support staghounds and Queen's Plates, and surely they might give some encouragement for retaining our horses in the country. He did not ask for the imposition of an export duty; but he was not alarmed at the word re-action. The House had lately gone from Free Trade to monopoly by passing a Bill to create a monopoly in public-houses. What was asked was that we should prevent the exportation of every good animal, and the leaving of nothing but refuse in this country. Although racing had done much for us, it did not produce useful horses of a particular class. At one time at Tattersall's it was easy to find a good short-legged carrying hunter; but now he often left without seeing a single horse he could covet. The simple remedy was that proposed by the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire. It was absurd to talk of rigid economy in a matter which affected the prestige of the country. Some of our soldiers were mounted on horses he would hardly mount if he were paid for it. If it were asked what the Government were to do with horses, he would say, let them keep them at Hampton Court. There was a great amount of patriotism in the country, and it only wanted encouraging by a few prizes for the best horses and the other measures recommended by his hon. Friend (Mr. Chaplin). What the noblemen and gentlemen in every part of the country had to look to was that there were a few good sires for the use of the neighbourhood. His county (Suffolk) was noted for good horses; but the best were being day by day bought up by foreigners and sent abroad. The farmers now bred a number of ordinary animals; but if they had good sires within reach they would breed animals of greater value. His hon. Friend (Mr. Chaplin) had been taunted with riding the best horses; but he was of some weight, and his hon. Friend very properly did not care to have a weedy, lanky, cross-kneed, ewe-necked brute to support him. If his hon. Friend went to a division he should vote with him, for no arguments had been urged against his Motion. His hon. Friend (Mr. Sturt) had, no doubt, shown a great deal of fine action. He (Mr. Greene) seldom went to a theatre; but he thought for a moment he had entered one when he saw his hon. Friend raising his hands to the clouds like the pictures of the theatres on the walls outside. It was very amusing, but it was not argument. Now they had got a Conservative Government there would be no nonsense, he hoped, about economy, which was generally another word for parsimony. England would not be the nation she was without her field-sports, and without horses there could be no field-sports. The importance to a nation of a sufficient supply of horses could not, indeed, be overrated. He could only say he thought the House ought to feel much indebted to the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire for having brought forward the Motion, and he regretted it had not had greater success.

MR. MAITLAND said, he thought he had some right to ask the indulgence of the House for a few minutes, because he represented a very large county (Kirkcudbrightshire) which, in former days, produced a very fine breed of horses, and which did so no longer. He particularly alluded to Galloways, which were exceedingly useful and very much thought of; in fact, there was no class of horses out of which they could get any better work than the Galloway. As to the speech of the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), he could not altogether agree with the remedies which he had proposed; but there could be no doubt whatever that there was at present a very great want of horses, and, he was sorry to say, a want of good horses. He spoke with knowledge when he said that really good horses could only be had at almost famine prices. In the face of this fact, therefore, how could any Gentleman who was a political economist say that the supply of horses was plentiful? It was said that people were richer and more luxurious now, and that every one connected with the upper classes wanted more horses than they did formerly. This, however, did not meet the point, and he thought he could dispose of that argument in one sentence. Let him ask, how about cart horses? If there was any class of horses in the Kingdom in regard to which the price had increased, it was the cart horse. He could remember when a good cart horse could be purchased for £30, and now a similar kind of horse would cost £100. Statistics had naturally been much relied on during the debate, and he had reliable statistics to show that, whether from bad management or bad breeding, a large proportion of our working horses were lame. His opinion was that the lameness which prevailed proceeded from the putting of wretched weeds of horses to do heavy work. He would like just to refer to some statistics in regard to the point of quality. The authority he would quote was Professor Gamgee, who had taken observations in the streets of Paris and of London, and the results were so astonishing that he should not have ventured to have quoted them to the House unless they had confirmed observations of a similar kind which he had made himself. On the 24th of August, 1869, Mr. Gamgee saw passing along New Oxford Street on one side of the road, and in the same direction, in 15 minutes, 102 horses, of which 40 were lame. On the 25th of August he saw 83 horses of all descriptions, of which 47 were lame. In Piccadilly he took, altogether, observations of 143, and of these 75 were lame. Now, in Paris, on the 21st of April, 1870, standing on the south side of the Boulevard des Capucines, he saw 86 horses trotting past in the course of 10 minutes. Of these 5 were lame on one fore leg only, 3 on both fore legs, and 1 on the off hind leg. In the Boulevard Montmartre the proportion was even less; about 100 horses passed in 12 minutes, and of these 11 were lame. How could it be asserted, in the face of these statistics, that the London horse was, as to quality, in a satisfactory condition? The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had made an observation by which the House was very much struck. The Government, he said, did not keep bulls in this country—why should it keep stallions? But in this country horses were bred very differently from other animals—such, for instance, as short-horns and sheep. In the latter case the breed was not crossed; but if a man had what he regarded as an ideal horse he would cross all other breeds of horses with it. This he considered a wrong principle upon which to proceed. In his own county, many years ago, they had a very fine breed of animals; but he could not now get a pure bred pair for love or money. It seemed to him that what was desirable was to keep the breed of horses as pure and distinct as possible, suiting them to the particular districts of the country.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICIARY (SCOTLAND) BILL.—[BILL 13.]

(Dr. Charles Cameron, Mr. Macdonald, Mr. Mackintosh, Mr. William Holms.)

DR. C. CAMERON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said: The objects of the High Court of Justiciary Bill are two-fold. It proposes, in the first place, to extend the term during which appeals from the decisions of inferior Courts under the provisions of the 20th of Geo. II., cap., 43, may be competent; and in the second, to extend the grounds of those appeals. According to the 34th clause of that Act, it is lawful for any party conceiving himself aggrieved by the judgment of any sheriff or burgh Court, when such sentence shall be concerning matters criminal of whatever nature or extent, except all cases which infer the loss of life or demembration, or in matters civil where the subject-matter of the suit does not exceed in value the sum of £12, to appeal to the next Court of the circuit wherein such county or burgh shall lie. No such appeal is competent before a final judgment is pronounced; and in order that it may be competent, it must be taken in open Court—

“At the time of pronouncing such decree, judgment, or sentence, or at any time thereafter within 10 days, by lodging the same in the hands of the clerk of the Court, and serving the adverse party with a duplicate . . . and serving in like manner the inferior Judge himself in case the appeal shall contain any conclusion against him by way of censure or reparation of damages for alleged injustice.”

The provisions of this Act for appeal have been incorporated in a number of other Scottish Acts of Parliament, both public and private—amongst others, for example, in the General Police Act and in the Glasgow Police Act; and in both these Acts, and in most of the others, the grounds on which appeal is allowed have been so narrowed that it is absolutely necessary in the interests of justice, that no unintentional obstacles should be thrown in the way of exercising that right. In the Acts which I have quoted, for instance, appeals according to the provisions of 20 Geo. II., cap. 43, are only allowed on the grounds of corruption, malice, or oppression on the part of the Judge, wilful deviations in point of form from statutory enactments, and incompetency, including defect in jurisdiction. Now, Sir, when it is borne in mind that appeals under the provisions of this Act are restricted to such narrow and urgent grounds, it is imperative to see that no unnecessary obstruction is placed in the way of any person desiring to avail himself of the right of appeal which does exist. In considering this matter it must be borne in mind that in petty criminal cases in Scotland the law is administered in the most summary fashion. In the great majority of cases the accused is apprehended without a warrant, kept locked up in a police cell, taken to Court, and the trial at once proceeded with. If he asks for delay, he is entitled to have the case postponed for a few hours. But there is no provision made for informing him of that right, and if he does demand the delay, he is still kept under lock and key; so that unless he happens to have funds to employ an agent, or friends to interest themselves in his behalf, he is absolutely powerless to do anything in the way of preparing for his defence. In consequence of this there is reason to fear that much injustice is often done; and, as imprisonment follows immediately upon conviction, even the limited right of appeal given under the Act which I propose to amend becomes unavailing. As I have said, according to that Act, appeal must be lodged within 10 days of the sentence being passed; and although in the various Acts with which its provisions have been incorporated, that term has been more or less modified, it may be safely stated that such appeal is nowhere competent more than 14 days after the passing of the sentence. If, therefore, a justice or a magistrate corruptly, oppressively, or maliciously sends an ignorant and undefended person to jail for 15 days, he may do so with the comfortable assurance that by dealing out a sufficiently lengthy sentence, he has practically rendered it all but impossible for his victim to appeal against his decision, or to seek redress at his hands. For according to the 35th of the rules for the conduct and treatment of prisoners in Scotland, convicted prisoners are allowed to receive no visit, nor to send out or to receive more than a single letter during the first three months of imprisonment, except in case of sickness and other special circumstances, when the Governor may make an exception in their favour. Once, then, safely in prison for 15 days, the victim it may be of oppression, malice, or corruption on the part of the Judge, is practically cut off from the outside world, and effectually prevented from exercising his right of appeal. In using the words corruption, malice, and oppression in connection with the Judges of our inferior Scottish Courts, I should be very sorry to be supposed to wish to cast any reflection upon them. I make use of the words simply because they occur in the Acts of Parliament with which has been incorporated the provisions as to the appeal of the Act which it is the object of the Bill now before the House to amend. Cases in which there is any ground for alleging corruption, malice, or oppression against even our unpaid magistracy are extremely rare; but they are not so rare, but that the Legislature has thought proper to provide for a right of appeal, wherever such allegations can be sustained. What I affirm is, that under the existing restrictions as to the time during which appeals are competent, taken in connection with the conditions under which the accused is placed, the salutary intentions of the law with regard to the right of appeal may be altogether frustrated, and that in the very cases where it is most desirable, in the interests of justice, that effect should be given to them. This is illustrated very forcibly in a case which occurred about six months since in the city of which I have the honour to be one of the Representatives, and which excited a great deal of attention, not only there, but throughout all Scotland—the case of William Mackenzie, a Glasgow joiner. The case as set forth in the statement of facts appended to the bill of suspension which was unsuccessfully raised to obtain the quashing of Mackenzie's sentence were as follows:—On September 11, Mackenzie, who was at work on a building, the joiner work of which was being executed by his employers—Messrs. Miller and Bannerman—was taking his breakfast on the premises, when his attention was called by his wife to a woman who was gathering pieces of stick within the barricade which surrounded the building, and handing them to another woman who stood outside it. Mackenzie thereupon ordered away the woman who was within the barricade, and took from the woman who was outside the sticks which were in her possession, with the exception of "three small and useless pieces of old wood, partly rotten, and filled with nails," which the woman refused to give up, and which Mackenzie did not think it worth while attempting to force from her. He had never seen either of the women before, had not seen the three pieces of stick handed through the barricade, and did not actually know whether they had been taken from the building upon which he was employed or not. It happened, however, that two policemen had observed the old woman with the sticks, and they brought her back and made her throw them down. Now, if anyone committed a theft, it was obviously the old woman, and not Mackenzie, and if anyone should have been arrested and punished for it, it was obviously she. And yet for this wretched theft, which the policemen considered too paltry to justify the arrest of the old woman, Mackenzie, who had committed no offence at all, was sentenced to 30 days' imprisonment by Bailie Bannerman, a magistrate, who was for many years sole partner of the firm of Miller and Bannerman, who, according to the statement of facts from which I am quoting, at the very time that he pronounced this extraordinary judgment, retained a large pecuniary interest in the firm, and whose son was a partner of that firm. Now, Sir, the fact of such a sentence being pronounced in such a case, had even the alleged theft been committed, was bad enough. It was especially bad that a magistrate should pronounce it in a case brought up at the instance of a firm in which he retained a large pecuniary interest, and of which his son was still a partner, and it was doubly bad that he should pronounce such a sentence directly in the teeth of a wise and salutary arrangement which has for long been acted upon by the magistrates of Glasgow, that in first convictions for trifling offences the prisoner should be dismissed with an admonition. But, Sir, bad as all these considerations would have rendered this case, its injustice was aggravated by the circumstances which attended Mackenzie's arrest and trial. As I have said, the policemen who brought back the old woman with the three pieces of stick did not think it worth while to arrest her, and of course they had no excuse to arrest Mackenzie; but on the afternoon of the day on which the occurrence took place, Mackenzie was given in charge of the police by Messrs. Miller and Bannerman's foreman, and brought to the police office, where the lieutenant on duty, having inquired into the case, considered that there was no ground for detaining him, and dismissed him. On the following day, Saturday, when Mackenzie went to his employers' office for his week's pay, he was again given in charge by a member of the firm to a policeman whom they had arranged with to be in attendance for that purpose, and this time the charge was entertained, and Mackenzie was locked up in a police cell, where he lay till Monday morning. During this time he had no opportunity of communicating with anyone except his wife, to whom he got one of the officials to convey a message on Sunday, and who arranged to be in Court to speak for him on the following morning, as Mackenzie had such an impediment in his speech as practically prevented him, when excited, from making himself intelligible to any but her. On the Sunday, too, he was visited by the detective who had charge of the case, and who strongly urged him to plead guilty, assuring him that the case was of such a paltry nature that, if he did so, he was certain to get off with an admonition. On the Monday morning Mackenzie was brought up before Bailie Bannerman, the charge against him, which he now heard for the first time, read hurriedly over to him—in accordance with the advice he had received he pleaded guilty, intending, he maintains, to explain that it was only to having allowed the old woman to go away with the three sticks. His wife, who was to have been there to make the explanation for him, was not in Court, having been prevented by the police from entering. His plea of guilty was recorded, and he was sentenced to 30 days' imprisonment. Now, Sir, I say that this is as aggravated a case of injustice as one could well conceive, and that it is precisely one for which the law intended to provide by the allowing of appeals. But in this very case, from the restriction at present placed upon the time during which an appeal is competent, an attempt at appeal proved futile, and that although Mackenzie was, in accordance with a provision contained in the Glasgow Police Act, liberated after eight days only of his sentence had expired. For, as I have said, Mackenzie was virtually cut off from the outer world from the date of his arrest. He was a poor man, and had not the benefit of legal advice. He was totally unacquainted with the provisions of the law as regarded appeal, and it was not till after his release that, his case having been brought before the public, the necessary funds were provided to enable him to seek for redress. By this time the statutory number of days allowed under the Act had elapsed, and although it was attempted, by way of suspension, to have the sentence quashed on the ground that there had been corruption, malice, and oppression on the part of the Judge, and that, in fact, no such crime as that libelled had ever been committed, the Court of Justiciary held that it was too late to open up the question. Nay, the judgment of the Court aggravated the anomaly to which I have drawn attention. It was argued by the appellant's counsel, as a reason for bringing the appeal to the High Court of Justiciary, instead of the next Circuit Court, that the complainer having 14 days allowed him by statute within which to deliberate whether to seek review or not, and being—under the statute which I seek to amend—required to give 15 days' notice of his appeal to the opposite party, after he had determined on it, there was not that length of time—29 days in all—intervening between the date of the sentence and the meeting of the next Glasgow Circuit Court. Now, Lord Neaves, who delivered the leading judgment in the case, disregarded this plea.

"The appellant," he said, "takes 14 days to make up his mind to complain of the flagrant injustice under which he is smarting; he lies in jail until it becomes impossible for him to carry out the other requisite—the 15 days' notice; he could have done it perfectly well under the statute—he could have made up his mind. It appears to me it was his duty to have made up his mind; he was not bound to delay 14 days. He has that time if he requires; but there is another requisite with which I think he should have taken steps to comply when it was in his power."

I would ask the House to mark the effect of these last words, for it has a most important bearing on this Bill. It is this—that, according to Lord Neaves, when less than 29 days elapse between the pronouncing of a sentence and the sitting of the next Circuit Court of Justiciary, the respondent is entitled to 15 days' notice, and the appellant only to so many days as may remain between the date of the sentence and the 15th day before the sitting of the next Circuit Court. So that actually if the sentence should happen to have been pronounced 16 days before the sitting of the next Circuit Court, the appellant, according to this learned Judge must be restricted to a single day instead of the 10 or 14 granted him by statute, and if judgment happens to have been pronounced within 16 days of the sitting of the next Circuit Court, the man must, according to the same reasoning, be deprived of the right of appeal altogether. Now, Sir, any one who takes the trouble to read the words of the statute regarding this 15 days' notice, will see that, according to the plain wording of the Act which I seek to amend, the appellant is entitled to so many days wherein to give notice, and the respondent to 15 days' notice, and that he must attend not at the next Circuit Court after the trial, but "at the next Circuit Court which shall happen to be held 15 days after such service." It will thus be seen that Lord Neaves' decision on this point was directly in the teeth of the obvious meaning of the statute. But when Judge-made law and statute law come into collision the latter too often goes to the wall; and I have shown what Lord Neaves' interpretation of the right of appeal under 20 Geo. II., cap. 43 is, because it strengthens my case, and renders more urgent than ever the necessity for such an extension of the time during which appeals may be competent, as is proposed in this Bill. Before leaving this point, it may be as well to correct an impression which a sentence of Lord Neaves, which I have quoted, might leave upon the mind of the House. The learned Lord speaks of a man lying in prison, being perfectly well able to appeal under the statute of 20 Geo. II. As I have shown, the rules which regulate the management of prisons in Scotland render this practically impossible; for, according to them, a convicted prisoner cannot receive any visit, nor write or receive more than one letter during, the first three months of his imprisonment. But a hon. and learned Friend of mine, a Member of this House, said to me—"What is the use of granting the right of appeal against a sentence of imprisonment after it has been undergone?" My reply is, that the Act of 20 George II., as it at present stands, grants that right of appeal, and very plainly suggests the reason for so doing. For under it, any man who has been unjustly imprisoned for any period less than 25 days must bring his appeal after his term of punishment has expired. Moreover, according to it, provision is made not merely for serving the adverse party with the appeal, but "for serving in like manner the inferior Judge himself, in case the appeal shall contain any conclusion against him by way of censure or reparation of damages for alleged wilful injustice." The reason, therefore, for allowing these appeals under the Act of 20 George II. is clearly not only, in cases where that is possible, to prevent unnecessary hardship being suffered through the operation of an unjust sentence, but when that sentence has been completed to allow the injured party to clear his character by the annulment of the conviction recorded against him, and to obtain reparation of damages at the hands of those from whom he has suffered wilful injustice. The importance of the last object, not only to the injured party, but to every one concerned in the purity of the administration of justice in our inferior Courts, is obvious, and the importance of providing for the revision, and, if it appears proper, the reversal of sentences in such cases as are dealt with under this Act, is equally obvious if it be remembered that as long as the conviction stands it is practically impossible to obtain reparation for injury suffered under it, by a civil suit. This constitutes my case for the extension of the time during which appeals under 20 Geo. II., cap. 43, shall be competent. What I propose is that they shall be timeously made if lodged at any time during the currency of the sentence, or within 14 days after its expiration—and I make this proposition with the view of converting what is at present, in those cases where the most wrong has been suffered, but the shadow of a right into a reality—with a view of abolishing that legal fiction which at present gives a convicted prisoner the right of appeal, while the prison rules effectually prevent his availing himself of it. The 2nd clause of the Bill now before the House is intended to enlarge the ground on which appeals from the Inferior Courts to the High Court of Justiciary are competent. Originally the powers of review of the Supreme Court were unrestricted; but it has comparatively of late years become the fashion in various statutes with which the provisions for appeals of the Act to which I have so often referred have been incorporated, to limit the grounds on which they can be exercised. In a number of cases these are now so limited as to apply only to cases where the injustice of a sentence has not only been manifest, but where it has arisen through the wilful act of the Judge. Thus, in the General Police (Scotland) Act of 1862, and in the Glasgow Police Act, the only ground on which an appeal from the magistrate's decision is competent are (1) corruption, malice, or oppression on the part of the Judge; (2) such deviation in point of form from the statutory enactments as the Court of Review shall think took place wilfully; and (3) incompetency, including defect of jurisdiction. What I propose is to add that an appeal against a sentence shall be competent whenever the Court of Review shall consider that the proceedings under which that sentence was pronounced were so conducted as not to afford the appellant a fair trial. It may be objected that the words in this Bill are such as would allow the Court of Review a very wide discretion. Such, I do not conceal, is their object; but I do not think they would allow it a wider general discretion than that which is already allowed it in different directions even by the various restrictive enactments. Thus, it does not allow a wider discretion than is allowed the Court in the interpretation of what constitutes oppression, a term which, elastic as it is, is sometimes stretched to its very limits of expansion in order to allow the Court to get into a case when an obvious injustice has been done, but which technical difficulties hedge round against the exercise of appeal. Again, in the Small Debt Act, Section 31, appeals are allowed in the case of such deviation of form from statutory enactments as the Court shall think took place wilfully, and prevented substantial justice from being done. Now, this is precisely analogous in point of the discretion allowed, and almost of the language used with what is proposed in this Bill. In both cases the Court of Review is left to determine, in the one case, whether the wilful deviation from forms has prevented substantial justice from being done; and, in the other, whether the proceedings were so conducted as not to afford the appellant a fair trial; and in each case it has it in its power to remit to the local sheriff, or some other commissioner, the task of inquiring into, and reporting on, the one preliminary point or the other. Having disposed of this objection, let us now consider a few cases which illustrate the necessity of the extension proposed in this Bill. In the first place we have the Mackenzie case, to which I referred at some length in connection with the proposed extension of time for lodging appeals. There, as we have seen, the prisoner was afflicted with such an impediment in his speech as rendered him when at all excited unintelligible to everyone except his wife, and those whom habit had enabled almost to read his thoughts. His wife, who had seen the whole transaction, and who came to Court to speak for him, and who in his case was really as essential to the elucidation of any explanation which he had to make as an interpreter would have been in the case of a mute or a foreigner, was prevented by the officer in charge from entering the public Court. The prisoner was not even supplied with a copy of the charge against him, and knew nothing of its particulars beyond what he could gather from having hurriedly read over to him a long document, couched in unintelligibly technical language, and encumbered with a mass of technical details. He pleaded guilty, intending to add to allowing the old woman to go away with the pieces of stick. His stammer prevented him from gasping out more than the word which was interpreted as guilty, and he was forthwith sentenced to 30 days' imprisonment. Now, Sir, as the law at present stands, under the words of the Glasgow and of the General Police Act, the oppression which has occurred, not being oppression on the part of the Judge, would not justify an appeal. At the same time, it will hardly be denied that in the interests of justice it is desirable that a sentence pronounced under such circumstances should be capable of being appealed against. This is precisely one of those cases where the Court of Review, if this Bill passes, would have a wise and desirable discretion allowed it, and an appeal would be competent if the proceedings under which the sentence had been pronounced were such as in its opinion not to afford the appellant a fair trial. Another Glasgow case which forcibly illustrates the necessity for the extension of the grounds of appeal which I propose is that of Gray v. M'Gill which is reported in Irvine's Justiciary Report, vol. 3, p. 29. In this case the appellant, a boy of eight years of age, was taken out of bed in his father's house, after his father had left home for his work, hurried to the police office, tried, convicted, and ordered to be flogged; and in accordance with his sentence received 20 stripes all within a few hours, and before his father could even be communicated with. In this case the sentence was quashed because of certain irregularities appearing ex facie of the written record of the proceedings; but on the main facts of the case, Lord Ivory said—and the two learned Lords who were sitting with Lord Ivory concurred with him as to the grounds on which the judgment should rest. It would thus appear that under the existing law there could have been no appeal, unless for the accident of these formal irregularities. I maintain that it is most undesirable that this right of appeal, in such a case, should depend upon an accident, and what I propose is, that if in a case like this the Court of Review considered that the proceedings at the trial were so conducted as not to afford the appellant a fair trial, irrespective altogether of points of form, it should have the power to hear the appeal. Another case which also occurred among my own constituency, and I am done. In November last a woman of loose character was assaulted. A fortnight later she gave a lad named Gilmour, aged 16, the only son of a respectable widow, in charge of the police for having committed the assault. This occurred on a Saturday night. On the following day the mother learned through some one who had seen the arrest what had taken place. She at once went to the Police Office where her son was locked up, but the officer on duty positively refused to allow her to see him. On the following morning she went to the Court; but, although, according to the words of an appeal which was afterwards raised, she remained at the entrance of the Court from half-past 8 in the morning till 1 in the afternoon, she was positively refused admission till the Court was over. Meanwhile the lad, who, from his age and inexperience, was naturally unable to conduct his own defence, and who, in consequence of his mother being kept out of Court, was unable to communicate with witnesses, who he maintains could have proved his innocence, was sentenced to 60 days' imprisonment. An appeal was taken in the case, and the matter came before the Glasgow Circuit Court only last week, when it was held by the Court that as there had been no oppression on the part of the Judge, the sentence could not be reviewed. Now, assuming these statements to be correct, I think that there can be little question but that in this case the proceedings were so conducted as not to afford the prisoner a fair trial; and what I contend for is that in such cases the mitigation or reversal of an unjust sentence, pronounced under circumstances for which the Judge himself is not to blame, shall not be left to the chance of a legal quibble, or pronounced altogether incompetent, as at this moment it is; but that in such cases as those which I have described the Court of Justiciary should have power, should it think fit, to review the decision of the inferior Court. And now, Sir, having fully described the scope and objects of the Bill before the House, I have only to move its second reading.

“The complainer is a child, his father was known—a householder in Glasgow. The child was, in the absence of the father, tried and punished with reckless haste. I would abstain from placing my judgment on this ground:”

MR. FRASER MACKINTOSH, in seconding the Motion, said, he had much pleasure in supporting the Bill of his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow. That was a subject which excited much interest among a large and intelligent class of the Scottish community, for it related to the proper administration of the criminal laws, than which nothing could be more important. In ancient times the central Regal power being weak in Scotland, it was found necessary in charters and grants of regality, barony, and others, to include criminal jurisdiction powers. These were often the instruments of intolerable wrongs, and in the reign of Charles II., in 1672—a reign which, he might observe, had generally been regarded as one in which the exercise of arbitrary powers was a matter of constant occurrence—was established the High Court of Justiciary, the supreme tribunal in criminal procedure. When he spoke of that Court, he meant whether it sat at Edinburgh, or on circuit. Notwithstanding occasional instances of abuse, it could be truly said of the High Court that its records were of an honourable character, and it had often proved the safeguard of those falsely accused, and the terror of inferior evil-doers. The right of reviewing inferior Court sentences was, as had been clearly pointed out by his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, put on a distinct footing by the Act of 20 Geo. II., cap. 43, passed in the year 1747, and from that period until well on in this century, the rights of review thereby constituted were fully taken advantage of, and the High Court ex nobili officio, by a train of decisions, came to establish for itself the very widest power of review. The rules laid down by the Act of Geo. II., when population was more scanty, and crime perhaps not so common, were sufficient for the time; but as towns and cities grew in population, and local Acts of Parliament came to be applied for, for police and other purposes, Provisoes that the sentences pronounced under these special Acts should be subject to no Court of review whatever, except on very limited grounds, almost impossible of proof, became common, and thus the rights of appeal were so narrowed and hampered as to become almost useless for any good purpose. It had for some time been obvious to those who had studied the subject, that the provisions of the Act of George II., with regard to appeals, had become inapplicable, in consequence of the restrictions he had referred to in special Acts, the altered state of population in large cities, and the rules laid down for the management of prisons and prisoners. The illustrations, striking and apposite, which had been given by his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, of the hardships under the present law, sufficiently demonstrated that position, and showed that the present law was insufficient in many cases to afford justice. It was one of the boasts of civilization that, as it advanced, so did the freedom of the individual, and they were proud to think that in no country in the world was there less danger than in their own—that if there were a wrong committed, it could not be righted. The Bill was a studiously moderate one; it did not in the least facilitate unnecessary appeals, nor strike at the stability of sound decisions; but it certainly gave to the ignorant and unfortunate, and to those innocently charged, opportunities of redressing wrong which they did not then possess. They contended for the correctness of the principles involved, and if the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate was of opinion that the wording of some of the clauses of the Bill might be amended with advantage, that could be done in Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Dr. Charles Cameron.)

MR. MONTGOMERIE said, he did not intend to move the rejection of the Bill; but it was very undesirable to multiply Bills on subjects of the kind; and as the Lord Advocate had a Bill on a cognate, or rather the very same subject, he would suggest to the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) that his object might be attained by the introduction of Amendments on that measure. He was not prepared to admit as facts all the statements made by the hon. Member for Glasgow—they must be regarded as simply ex parte statements, although, for the purpose of argument, he was willing to assume that they were true. In regard to the Mackenzie-Bannerman case, he regretted that the Court had not seen its way to go into the facts, and the 1st clause of the Bill before the House would probably meet such a case. Some of the cases which had been referred to seemed to turn upon the police, or the officers of the Court having exceeded their duty by preventing the friends of persons accused from entering the Court. Such cases could scarcely be provided by any alteration of the law. All Courts were open, and those who could have assisted the accused had a right to be present in Court. These were matters for regulation by the magistrates not for legislation. He, himself, had no wish whatever to stand in the way of appeals from the Inferior to the Supreme Court; but they must take care not to encourage frivolous appeals on trifling points, which were apt to be raised by ingenious lawyers, but would not bear argument in Court, and were only calculated to add great expenses to the punishment their clients had already suffered. He thought the most objectionable part of the Bill was the 2nd clause, which, in his opinion, opened the door to appeals of the kind to which he had referred. Cases had been stated where the police were accused of having influenced parties to plead guilty. In cases of this kind, it was the duty of the Judge to take the matter up. He would move that the Bill be not read now.

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Member propose an Amendment?

MR. MONTGOMERIE thought the matter had better be left in the hands of the Government, and would therefore move its rejection.

SIR WILLIAM EDMONSTONE seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Montgomerie.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he had had a long experience of judicial business—not much in his own country—but, to some extent, in England; and a great deal in another country, where appeals were carried to excess. That being his position, he had listened attentively to the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), and his impression was that he had not made out a sufficient case. Though appeals were in many cases necessary and expedient, they might be carried too far, and, as had been said by the hon. Member who moved the rejection of the Bill, there was a danger of giving too much encouragement to appeals of a frivolous nature, which might be got up by members of the legal profession. Not one case of practical injustice for want of an appeal had been made out by the hon. Member for Glasgow, and a good deal of what he said went to prove other things than those with which the Bill dealt. He had referred to cases in which injustice had been done by unpaid magistrates and the police, but he had given no single case in which justice had been thwarted by the existing limitations of the right of appeal. Even in the Mackenzie case, the injustice which had been done was eventually set aside. Therefore, he could not see that a case had been made out for the Bill; and considering the undesirableness of encouraging appeals, and the proneness of his countrymen to litigation, he did not think we should too much facilitate litigation. At the same time, he thought much might be said in favour of the 2nd clause, which would enable a prisoner to appeal on any serious irregularity in the trial. Inasmuch, however, as the Lord Advocate had a Bill on the same subject, he thought the hon. Member for Glasgow might withdraw his, and let the whole matter be considered when the Government measure came on.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he thoroughly agreed with the remark that it was desirable there should not be too many Bills in regard to small matters. Though the Bill he himself had prepared and brought in did not propose to deal with the points brought out in the present discussion, still those points could all be raised when they were dealing with that measure. He thought when hon. Members had time to peruse it—and he regretted it had not been ready earlier—they would find that ample provisions were made for the review of the decisions of the Inferior Courts, at least in regard to matters which involved questions of law and not of fact; but he confessed he had not addressed himself to the peculiar forms of appeal which arose in cases like those which had been referred to. It would, however, as he had said before, be perfectly competent to discuss all matters connected with the subject when they got to Committee on his Bill. Certainly his desire was that there should be fair play given to all the people of this country in regard to the administration of criminal justice, and his wish was to have as satisfactory a review as possible on matters of this kind, in regard to which, he was aware, considerable interest was felt by the working classes throughout the country. He understood the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) had introduced this Bill in consequence of the discussions which arose as to the Mackenzie-Bannerman case. It appeared that it was alleged that Bailie Bannerman, who tried that case, was interested in the contract at which the prisoner was working, but inquiries he had made satisfied him that he was not. At the same time, his son was interested in it, and he admitted that it would have been advisable for Bailie Bannerman to have abstained from sitting on the case. Still he was quite entitled to do so, and it appeared that the case came before him while he was presiding magistrate for the week. The offence which the man committed was not a very serious one, and probably an admonition might have satisfied justice, but a different sentence was pronounced, and he was sent to prison. An appeal was got up on his behalf, but as there was not sufficient time to enable it to be brought on at the Circuit Court, it was sent to the High Court of Justiciary. Now, it happened that there was no provision for such appeals in the High Court of Justiciary; but the course that he (the Lord Advocate) thought should have been followed was to wait for the next sitting of the Circuit Court. At the same time, he thought it desirable to make it competent to go to the High Court of Justiciary as well as to the Circuit Court, which would remove the possibility of any miscarriage of justice, and he would introduce Amendments into his Bill with this view. He would suggest that the hon. Member should rest satisfied with having raised that discussion, and instead of pursuing the Bill further, to wait to see the Amendments he (the Lord Advocate) proposed to make in the Government measure.

MR. FARLEY LEITH said, that this discussion had opened up a question of great importance, and he was glad to hear the Lord Advocate proposed to deal with it. The point, however, was whether the appeals should be confined to questions of law, or whether they should be extended to irregularity of procedure which might work injustice to the prisoner. He would suggest that the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) should withdraw his Bill, on the understanding that the Lord Advocate would do something to meet his views.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he would admit that it was undesirable to have many Bills on matters of this kind; but still, as the hon. Member for Glasgow had made out a fair case for an alteration of the law, he hoped the House would not refuse to read a second time the Bill before them. Considering that its principle had been generally approved of, he thought the best way would be to read it a second time, and leave it to be determined afterwards how the principle should be carried out, on the understanding that it should not be placed in rivalry with the measure of the Lord Advocate. The right hon. and learned Lord said he had several Amendments to propose in his Bill, and as it was desirable to have that Bill before them in as complete a manner as possible, the provisions of this Bill might in Committee be introduced into the Lord Advocate's Bill.

DR. C. CAMERON said, he had simply introduced the measure to remedy what appeared to him to be an injustice in the present system, and if the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate would take the matter up that would meet the end he had in view. Though he was willing to withdraw the Bill, he thought, with all deference to the right hon. and learned Lord, that the proper course would be to read it a second time pro forma, and postpone its further consideration until the Government could state what they proposed to do in their own measure.

MR. RAMSAY thought there was a general concurrence of opinion in favour of the principle of the Bill, and therefore he would appeal to the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate to agree to the second reading, and then the Committee could be postponed to a time that would allow the Lord Advocate's Bill to be brought forward, and let them see how far it met the case in point. He thought the House would stultify itself if it rejected the Bill, when it was really in favour of its principle.

MR. M'LAREN approved of the suggestion. In late years there had been many Bills read a second time with the consent of the Government on former occasions, although they partly objected to them. In the present case the Lord Advocate was substantially in favour of the principle of the Bill, and therefore he hoped he would not oppose the second reading.

MR. MONTGOMERIE said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he would not oppose the second reading, on the understanding that he did not pledge himself to accept the details of the Bill, because it was difficult to carry out matters of the kind in legislation; the matter, however, should receive his best consideration. The course he thought would be the best to follow was to postpone the Committee on the present Bill till June. He mentioned that time because the 4th of May was fixed for his Bill; and some 10 days or so would be required to make Amendments in the direction of the main objects proposed in the measure they were discussing.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Tuesday 1st June.

SHERIFF COURTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

(Mr. Anderson, Colonel Mure, Mr. M'Lagan.)

[BILL 21.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. ANDERSON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that at present the state of the law was this—that a sheriff might try any case, of whatever magnitude, so long as it affected only pecuniary or personal property; but if in any case there was involved what in Scotland was called heritable right, which was the same as real estate in England, it became necessary, however small the amount, to take it out of the hands of the sheriff, and hand it over to the Supreme Courts at Edinburgh. This amounted practically to a denial of justice to many persons who were too poor to go to Edinburgh to get their cases tried. He believed the feeling in the country generally was in favour of the Bill, the only exceptions being the lawyers of Edinburgh, who naturally did not want their work taken away from them. He, however, thought they had forgotten the large number of cases which were never tried, because of the expense of going to Edinburgh. He had the testimony of the sheriff of Lanark, who had a large experience in these matters, to say that the present state of the law amounted to a denial of justice in such cases, and therefore he thought he would have no difficulty in getting the House to agree to the second reading. However, within the last few days the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had given them a Bill dealing with this very question, and so far as he (Mr. Anderson) had read it, he would be perfectly satisfied with it; but time would require to be given to the country to see whether it approved of it, as it dealt with many other points besides that which he had raised. Under those circumstances, he would suggest that the same course should be followed as in the last case. If Scotland had perfect confidence that the right hon. and learned Lord really meant to pass his Bill, he (Mr. Anderson) might withdraw the one before the House. The Scotch newspapers did not hesitate to say the Government measure was not intended to pass at all this Session; but he firmly believed that it was the intention of the right hon. and learned Lord to pass it, but he might not have sufficient time, and judging by the way Scotch business had been systematically shelved by the present, and still more by the preceding Government, it was not impossible that obstacles might be allowed to get in the way. He would therefore suggest that the House should agree to the second reading, and he would postpone the Committee until June. In fact, the only difference between the right hon. and learned Lord and himself was, that while he (Mr. Anderson) proposed to remit all cases of heritable right to the sheriffs, without limit as to amount, the right hon. and learned Lord proposed to introduce a limit of £1,000. He would not be at all disposed to fall out with him about that. His only reason for abandoning any limit was that it occurred to him that there might be a preliminary litigation to ascertain the value of a subject, which would be of itself a very inconvenient thing to have; and he thought that as there was no limit in regard to actions in which personal property was involved, there equally seemed to be no great occasion for a limit in the case of real estate. But he would be perfectly content to adopt the limit of £1,000 proposed by the right hon. and learned Lord. The hon. Member concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Anderson.)

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, contrary to what the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) had stated, he did not think the House should take the same course with reference to this Bill as it had taken with regard to the last measure. The hon. Member himself, if he understood him rightly, had said that if he thought the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had a chance of passing his Bill, he (Mr. Anderson) would not think of pressing his; but he should like to know what chance the hon. Member had in that case of passing his Bill, and after such an admission by him, he (Sir Graham Montgomery) saw no good reason for reading it a second time. Now, the whole subject had been reported on by a Royal Commission, and the Bill of the Lord Advocate dealt with the whole question; whereas that of the hon. Member for Glasgow really only dealt with a fragmentary portion of it; and, under these circumstances, he thought the House would do well to reject it.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he hoped that the House would, in regard to the Bill, follow the same course as that which it took upon the last measure, and for very much the same reason—namely, that the Bill of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) affirmed a principle as to which they were all generally agreed. Indeed, his only objection to the measure was that it was not wide enough in its scope. He thought that a Bill of the kind ought to deal with the appointment of sheriffs, and when he spoke of the sheriffs, he referred more especially to the sheriff's substitute. Hon. Members from Scotland were aware that by far the larger part of business of Scotland was performed by the sheriff's substitute, who were already with regard to jurisdiction, both criminal and civil, in a considerably higher position and exercising larger functions than that occupied by the County Court Judges in England. Now, if that greatly extended jurisdiction were to be given to them, their position, if allowed to remain unaltered, would be a most anomalous one. They were nominated, not by the Crown as the Representative of the people, but by individuals—namely, the sheriffs of counties, while they received far less salaries than those paid to County Court Judges in England. It seemed to him that a Bill which proposed to extend the jurisdiction of the sheriffs substitute should also deal with the mode of appointing them and with their salaries.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, that the Bill stood undoubtedly in a position somewhat analogous to that of the last measure, and he hardly thought that the House could consistently reject it on the second reading. To do so would be to deny a principle which the House generally assented to. He might say further that the Bill came before them supported, not merely by the authority of the sheriff of Lanark, but by that of a Commission which, after inquiring into the subject, recommended that the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Courts should be extended to cases of heritable right. But while saying that much in favour of the Bill, he must, at the same time, say that while that Commission sanctioned the principle of extending the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Courts to those cases, they did so subject to a very important qualification, in addition to that as to value which the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had introduced into his Bill. The Commission considered that the defender should be enabled to carry his case up to a higher Court at once, and that no case should be decided in the Sheriff Court without the consent of both parties. If both these principles were embodied in the Bill of the Government, he (Sir Edward Colebrooke) did not see why there need be any great limit to the sheriffs' jurisdiction. If, on the other hand, it was considered desirable to introduce a principle of limitation, he thought that the same principle which applied to cases of small value in regard to personal property might be made in certain cases to apply to heritable right. He trusted that the right hon. and learned Lord would consider the matter, and say whether it would be necessary to introduce the principle of limitation. Although many of the questions involved in the consideration of the subject were of a legal and technical character, which it was not in the power of laymen like himself to decide, yet he thought that Scotch Members might with advantage resort to their little Parliament to consider these matters, and fortified with the advantage of the opinions of the profession, and armed with such criticisms as they received from the different learned bodies in Scotland, he did not despair of seeing these wholesome attempts at legislation finally and speedily accomplished.

MR. DALRYMPLE said, that although the hon. Baronet who had just sat down spoke with an authority on the subject to which he (Mr. Dalrymple) could not lay claim, yet he thought that that was a question which would be much better discussed in that House than in a Scotch Parliament. He had risen to suggest that instead of the House being asked to read the Bill a second time, the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) should withdraw it. He could not admit that the case for the Bill was on all-fours with that for the last measure. It seemed to him that the two Bills stood upon a totally different footing; because in the case of the first Bill, a point was raised which was not contained in the measure of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate, consequently some advantage was gained by reading it a second time; whereas, in this instance, the hon. Member for Glasgow himself admitted that the point dealt with in his measure was embraced in the Bill brought forward by the Government. His hon. Friend had, in his capacity of private Member, been singularly fortunate in passing Bills through that House, and therefore if he consented to withdraw the Bill there need be no risk of his amour propre being injured. On the contrary, he might take credit to himself for having embodied in this measure a principle which was contained in what might be called a Government Bill, and under all the circumstances he would suggest to his hon. Friend that he should not press the measure to a second reading.

MR. ORR-EWING said, that as the principle of the Bill was not contested, he did not see why the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) should be placed in a worse position than his hon. Colleague (Dr. Cameron), whose Bill had been read a second time. He agreed with the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy Burghs (Sir George Campbell) that both sheriffs-depute and substitute were at present placed in a false and anomalous position. Duty after duty had been heaped upon these gentlemen, and yet nothing had been done in the way of augmentation of their salaries. He was therefore afraid that the interests of these gentlemen, who occupied a high position in Scotland, did not receive that justice from Her Majesty's Government to which they were entitled, simply because hon.

Members in their good nature did not persevere in pressing their just and reasonable demands upon the attention of the Government.

MR. M'LAREN said, he was in the peculiar position with regard to the Bill, that while he entirely approved of the sheriffs having jurisdiction over the heritable subjects of small value, he was altogether opposed to giving them unlimited power to deal with the larger properties in Scotland. He thought it would be an exceedingly rash thing to give them such a power. In fact, it would be putting them in an equal position to that of the Judges of the Supreme Courts of Scotland. He knew a little about most of the sheriffs-substitute that had been appointed during the last 30 or 40 years—not personally, but by report. He knew that many of them were able men, and that some of them, according to general report, were more able lawyers than their superiors—the sheriffs-principal; but he knew also that many young men were appointed sheriffs-substitute, who had not succeeded in earning a living in their own professions, and who were not supposed to be possessed of a great deal of law, though no doubt they had a great deal of honesty of purpose. He would object altogether to giving these gentlemen this very extensive power, though he admitted that it was desirable to give them jurisdiction in small cases. He thought the limit of £1,000 which the Lord Advocate's Bill fixed was a reasonable one, and if this Bill were pressed to a division, he should feel bound to vote against it.

MR. M'LAGAN said, he must presume that hon. Members would vote for the second reading of the Government Bill when it came before them, and, if so, they would be stultifying themselves that day if they refused to read a second time this measure, which embodied a similar principle. He therefore joined in the appeal which had been addressed to the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate to allow the Bill to be read a second time, and then to postpone the Committee until after the Government Bill had received the assent of the House. He agreed with what had been said by the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. Orr-Ewing) concerning the sheriffs-depute and sheriffs-substitute. It was high time that their case was taken into consideration. Year after year fresh duties were being imposed upon these learned gentlemen, but no increase was made to their salaries, and he was not at all surprised at the dissatisfaction which had been expressed. Repeatedly, deputations had waited upon the Scotch Members urging upon them the justice of increasing the salaries of the sheriffs-substitute in accordance with the recommendation of the Commission, and he trusted that these representations would be favourably considered by the right hon. and learned Lord. He would only say that, whether the House agreed to the second reading of the Bill or not, he approved most cordially of its principle. He did not think that one Petition had been presented against it, while hundreds had been presented in its favour.

MR. VANS AGNEW said, he was unable to concur in the observations of the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire. The Bill which the House was asked to read a second time was to give unlimited jurisdiction to the Sheriff Courts of Scotland over heritable property, and he agreed most fully with the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) that it would be very dangerous to give such a power to an inferior court, such as the Sheriff Courts in Scotland. If they affirmed the principle of the Bill, they affirmed the principle that unlimited power ought to be given to these Courts over the largest estates in Scotland. He hoped the House would not do that, but wait for the measure which the Government had laid on the Table. The House had been informed that provision was being made to extend the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Courts in a manner which he believed the whole House would consider to be safe and reasonable, and the hon. Member who had charge of this Bill, and who asked them to affirm this unlimited jurisdiction, did not complain of that jurisdiction being limited to £1,000. It seemed, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman was not very much in love with the principle of his own Bill, when he was willing to cut it down from an untold limit to £1,000 of heritable value. With respect to the salaries of the sheriffs-substitute, his experience did not concur with what had fallen from several hon. Members on that subject. Within his own recollection, the salary of the sheriff-substitute in his district had been very nearly doubled, and he believed that the same might be said in regard to those officials in other counties in Scotland. Moreover, in many cases, by a change in the limits of jurisdiction, the salaries had been made more commensurate with the duties performed.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, that an important question contained in the Bill was its extension to heritable property. All agreed with the recommendations of the Royal Commission in extending the jurisdiction of the Sheriffs' Courts, and only differed as to its amount, but that was only a matter of detail, on which the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) was willing to leave to be settled in Committee. He congratulated the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate on the honour which he would acquire in having taken up this great and useful reform, and with having dealt with it so comprehensively in the Bill which he had presented to the House; but, at the same time, he would appeal to him to allow the present Bill to be read a second time on condition that, whenever his own Bill passed through a second reading, the hon. Member for Glasgow would at once drop his. The question which the right hon. and learned Lord had taken up was a very large question, and it was one which he (Sir George Balfour) had in vain endeavoured to induce the late Lord Advocate to take up. The present right hon. and learned Lord would give great satisfaction to the people of Scotland if he should succeed in inducing the Government to improve the position, whilst extending in this useful manner the jurisdiction of the sheriffs-substitute.

MR. MARK STEWART, while expressing his satisfaction at the announcement that the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate intended to deal with the subject, hoped he would not give his assent to the second reading of the Bill; because he (Mr. Stewart) felt convinced that if he did so, it would go forth that the Government were going to give great power and authority to these gentlemen, and although their decisions might be approved of in certain cases, yet there were many instances in which these decisions had been revoked and rescinded, and in which they had not given that satisfaction which he should have liked them to have given. He fully concurred in the remarks which had been made on both sides of the House with regard to increasing the remuneration at present given to sheriffs-substitute, and he trusted that that point would not be overlooked when the Bill of the right hon. and learned Lord came on for discussion. Hon. Members were very much divided in opinion upon the principle of the Bill, and he therefore hoped the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) would withdraw it.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN trusted that the learned Lord would consent to the second reading of the Bill, on the understanding that had pervaded almost every speech that had been made on the subject. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down was afraid that there might be a misunderstanding in the country if the Bill were to be read a second time. Fortunately, however, the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) had not exercised his right of noticing the presence of Strangers; and as far as his (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman's) experience went, the reports of debates in the newspapers were much more widely read than the Bills which came before the House. Not only were Bills not read in the country, but they were often discussed in that House at considerable length, without the preliminary process of reading them having been gone through. He thought, therefore, that if the House consented to the second reading, no misunderstanding was likely to arise. The debate would show to the country that there was a substantial agreement that heritable jurisdiction should be conferred upon the sheriffs, and that was the principle of the Bill. The only question was as to its amount.

MR. RAMSAY said, that however important the question of an increase of the salaries of sheriffs-substitute might be—and he thought it was eminently deserving of attention—it could only be properly dealt with when the right hon. and learned Lord had time to take up the whole subject of the constitution of these Courts. If hon. Members would take the trouble to look over the judicial statistics of the business that came before these Courts, they would see that the State was paying for the services of learned gentlemen in various places where very few cases indeed of importance came before them. He conceived, therefore, that this was not the proper occasion on which they should press upon the Government the consideration of an increase in the salaries of these officers.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that appeals having been made to him to allow the Bill to be read a second time, he might be permitted to appeal to the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) to withdraw it, inasmuch as it was admitted that his (the Lord Advocate's) Bill comprehended the principle which was enunciated in the present measure. It had, moreover, been conceded that he had drawn a fair limit in the matter of the heritable jurisdiction to be conferred on the sheriffs. The hon. Member for Glasgow knew that he (the Lord Advocate) had never stood in the way of his passing measures which he had thought fit to promote, but, on the contrary, that he had given to the hon. Member every assistance possible; and, under these circumstances, he would suggest that this Bill should be withdrawn. It had been brought forward, he supposed, as a sort of spur or stimulus to him. If so, he could only say that the question had engaged his attention during the autumn; but, unfortunately, illness, which prevented him from attending to business during the early part of this year, had prevented him from bringing forward the Bill sooner. He would remark, as a further reason for his hon. Friend withdrawing his Bill, that it was his intention to press forward the Bill which he had introduced, and he saw no reason why it should not pass. He did not understand that it would meet with much opposition. Although he unfortunately did not number among his supporters a majority of the Members for Scotland, yet his experience was that he had not much difficulty in getting through Scotch business. An additional reason for withdrawing this Bill was that it was a mere skeleton Bill. It confirmed the proposition in the Preamble, but it had no provisions for carrying that out, and remitted the formation of rules to the Court of Session. He did not think that was the proper course to adopt. He thought the proper course was that the Bill should contain the opinions of the House as to the way in which the principle should be carried out. He would further suggest that it was not unbecoming in him to ask that this Bill should be withdrawn, seeing that in the last case he did give way, and an hon. Gentleman had said it was a bad practice, for which the Home Secretary was to blame. He was afraid that if he were in this instance to follow the same course, he might get credit for giving way too easily, and he would suggest, therefore, that there should be a withdrawal of the Bill. When he brought his measure forward, he should be ready to give every consideration to any Amendments which might be suggested.

MR. ANDERSON said, the right hon. and learned Lord thought that, having given way in the last case, he ought not to be asked to do so in this.

MR. SPEAKER said, he would remind the hon. Member that he was not entitled to make a second speech. He might, however, explain to the House the course which he proposed to take.

MR. ANDERSON said, he was aware that, as the rejection of the Bill had not been moved, he was not entitled to a reply; but he was only going to say that, as suggested by the hon. Member for Bute, he had no reason to feel that his amour propre would be hurt by withdrawing the Bill. On the contrary, he was only too pleased to find that its principle had been taken up by the Government; because, in that case, he knew it would meet with attention, and as the right hon. and learned Lord had said it was his full intention to press on his measure, he would therefore withdraw the one before the House.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill withdrawn.

LICENSING COURTS APPEAL (SCOTLAND) BILL—[BILL 68.]

(Mr. Anderson, Mr. M'Lagan, Mr. Cowan.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. ANDERSON, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, its object was to amend the licensing appeal system, which in Scotland was very bad indeed, and he would state at short length what the present system was, and what were the evils of it. The present system was, that the appeal should be from the licensing magistrates to the justices of the peace in quarter sessions, and as the battle lay between the publicans on the one hand and the teetotallers on the other, in a very large proportion of the cases the decisions of the magistrates were appealed against. It appeared to be considered by both parties that the original decision was a very secondary matter, and that the real battle had to be fought, not before the licensing magistrates, but in the appeal Court. It had consequently become the practice in a number of counties for the parties interested to canvass the justices and induce them to go down to the appeal Courts and vote in a given direction. So notorious was it that that was done that both parties went even beyond canvassing, and he had been told, on authority he could not question, that justices of the peace had been known to take presents in the shape of railway tickets or the payment of their hotel bills for going down to vote on a certain side. He submitted that when things got to that extent, when appeals were not decided on their merits, but on corrupt principles and according to which side had made the most vigorous canvass, the appeal became in reality a scandal and a farce, and ought to be got rid of. He believed there were no two opinions on that subject. No hon. Member of the House would contend that the present system was one that could be supported, or that it ought to be tolerated any longer. The only point on which there could be discussion was as to the nature of the remedy. He had taken great pains to find out what would be the most likely remedy to meet the admitted evils. It had been suggested to him that the justices should appoint licensing committees; but he had felt obliged to give that idea up, because he could not see any way in which a committee of justices could be appointed without the same evils springing up as existed now. The committee would, of course, be constituted of men holding the views of the majority of the justices, and that would not be an arrangement to give satisfaction and confidence. After great consideration, he had come to the conclusion that what was wanted was a Court of Appeal that would have a local knowledge sufficient to judge of every case on its merits, and at the same time to be above local prejudices and beyond the slightest suspicion of being open to corruption. They must be superior to canvassing, and must accept no railway tickets or hotel bills, nor, as had been done in some cases, presents of whisky.

[Laughter.] The hon. Baronet near him (Sir Edward Colebrooke) smiled as if that were a doubtful statement; but he assured him the thing was perfectly notorious even in the county of which he (Sir Edward Colebrooke) was Lord Lieutenant. The remedy which he (Mr. Anderson) proposed was to make the sheriff and the sheriffs-substitute the Court of Appeal. Those officials were looked up to by everybody in Scotland, and there would not be the slightest suspicion of corruption or of anything but fair-play between the parties in the decisions they might give. Strange as it might seem, the parties he had expected to support him in the Bill—the parties who wished to restrict the issue of licences, had held aloof altogether, and some of them, he understood, intended even to oppose him; but, to his surprise, the party he had expected to oppose him most strongly—namely, the party representing the publican interest—had very cordially accepted it as a fair compromise. The other party opposed him, because they thought there should be no appeal at all from the magistrates. The publicans, however, very reasonably said—“We must have an appeal—if we don’t, there will undoubtedly be injustice done.” Another strong ground why there should be an appeal was, that if there were no such appeal, every municipal election would become, far more than it was at present, a contest between the two rival parties on the liquor question. That matter already entered into municipal contests so far as to be an evil. More important matters were lost sight of, and a man’s election or rejection depended on whether or not he was a teetotaller, and if that system were encouraged by the abolition of appeals, they would have in some towns what would please the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle—namely, town councils composed entirely of teetotallers; but, in other towns, they would be composed exclusively of publicans, which would not please the hon. Baronet so well. It was perfectly impossible to do away with appeals; it would not be fair to either party, nor good for the interests of the public to do so. He understood the Lord Provost of Glasgow objected to the Bill because he thought it would be derogatory to the dignity of burgh magistrates to have their decisions in any way subjected to the review of sheriffs or sheriffs-substitute. He had great respect for the burgh magistrates generally, and for the Lord Provost in particular, believing they performed responsible and thankless duties in an admirable manner; but he could not see that it took away from their dignity to have their decisions reviewed by such a Court of Appeal as he had suggested. He should dismiss that objection, therefore, as untenable. If they had no Court of Appeal, such a thing might happen as took place the other day at Dundee, where the magistrates assembled and decided beforehand not to hear cases on their merits at all, but to refuse every application for a new licence, and the renewal of licences to men who held more than one. That was a clear case of going beyond the statute, and was a specimen of the unfair and illegal things which might be done if there were no appeal. The only reasonable objection he had heard to the sheriffs as a Court of Appeal was that the matters they would have to deal with were not confined to legal points, but involved questions of administration and discretion. He had mentioned that objection to the sheriff of Lanarkshire, who said he considered it no objection at all—that his office was to a great extent an administrative one, and that while he thought there were grounds for objecting to the Bill, he could not regard that as one of them. The sheriffs had not been slow to assert the importance of their office from an administrative point of view when they wanted larger salaries, and it was rightly considered that their duties were largely administrative. No doubt, many of the sheriffs were opposed to the Bill, because they expected it would throw on them a large amount of work, but he anticipated nothing of the kind. The sheriffs, having the same desire as the magistrates to preserve peace and order, would generally affirm their decisions; but, at the same time, would be able to prevent any injustice like that perpetrated the other day at Dundee. He believed the extra work thrown on the sheriffs would after a time be very limited indeed, and they would be looked up to with universal confidence; and as there was some talk of giving them larger salaries, there ought not to be any objection to a little more work. He would not further detain the House. He thought he had shown, in the first place, that the present system was intolerable; in the next place, that they wanted a Court of Appeal, which should have sufficient local knowledge, and yet be above possible corruption, or above any small local prejudices. He thought he had also shown that they could get that in the Sheriffs Courts, and that it would not be for the good of the community, or fair to the community, to abolish appeals altogether, because it would turn municipal elections into a battle-ground between the teetotallers and the publicans, and that certainly would not be for the good of the community. Although he had chosen what he believed to be the best Court of Appeal that could be got, he freely admitted that there were some objections to it; and he was not so wedded to it as not to be prepared to accept some modification if hon. Members could point out any better arrangement in Committee; but the main principle of his Bill was, that the present Court of Appeal was entirely unsatisfactory, and should be changed. He would conclude by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Anderson.)

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he could not believe the charges of corruption which had been made, for had it existed to anything like the extent represented, he must have heard of it, as it would have been represented to him by the authorities. He certainly did hear some statement about a few magistrates dining at the expense of some of the parties applying for a licence and that was a serious charge, no doubt; but it was made in such vague terms, that he could take no notice of it. The hon. Member having made these charges, should inquire more fully into them, and if they were found to be true, he would like to see the matter brought before the Home Secretary; for if the statements were true, nothing could be more discreditable or more likely to shake public confidence in the administration of justice. If, however, they were not true, he hoped the hon. Member would have the grace to tell the House that they were false. He would admit the unsatisfactory nature of the present Court of Appeal, but could not agree that the sheriffs were the proper parties to throw the duty upon. It would be inconsistent with their other work, and it was very undesirable they should be mixed up in local squabbles, which could only tend to interfere with the dignified performance of their higher duties as the administrators of justice. In that way, imputations would be heaped upon them tending to bring discredit upon their tribunal. As Judges of the land it was very much to their interest to stand aloof from local questions, and it was far better that duties of this kind should be discharged by bodies who could bring to bear local knowledge. In the boroughs there was a tendency to take extreme views; but, on the whole, it would be better to continue the present system rather than adopt the sheriffs as a Court of Appeal. Besides, there was the less need to call on them to perform this work, because they had a remedy already lying at their feet. The numerous body constituting the Court of quarter sessions should delegate their functions to a committee, and that would meet the necessities of the case and remove the existing evils. It was a course which had already been recommended by several Parliamentary Committees which had considered the matter, and it had already been adopted in English counties under the last Licensing Act. He cordially concurred with the hon. Member as to the necessity of having some appeal, because there was far more danger in Scotland than in England of justice running wild. The people took stronger views, and were more likely to run into extremes. In conclusion, he must again regret that his hon. Friend should have made such general and serious charges against the magistrates, for the appointment of some of whom he (Sir Edward Colebrooke) was personally responsible. He should vote against the second reading of the Bill.

MR. ORR-EWING said, there was no doubt that there was a grievance in Scotland on the question. They had no appeal Court at all, for it was merely an appeal to the same justices who had originally decided the question. The hon. Baronet the Member for Lanarkshire had repudiated the accusations which, for his own part, he (Mr. Orr-Ewing) had seen more than once in the papers, but he had never seen any official contradiction of it. By the Bill it was proposed to have an appeal Court for the counties, but there was no alteration proposed for the burghs. Now, it was in the burghs where the greatest evils existed, and he thought the hon. Member for Glasgow would do well to confine the Bill to the burghs, and leave the Government to deal with the counties. They could fancy that there would be no better constituted body than the magistrates, who were responsible for the peace and good government of the city, to grant these licences. Take Glasgow. The decisions of the magistrates of Glasgow were subjected on appeal to the justices of the county of Lanark, who were not interested in Glasgow, and who came under circumstances as described by the hon. Member; and these justices decided what licences should be granted to music-halls and dancing saloons. This was a most unsatisfactory state of things. He did not think that it would be right to delegate a certain portion of the magistrates to hear appeals. He believed the sheriffs would be the best Court of Appeal so far as the burghs were concerned, and therefore he should support the second reading of the Bill.

MR. M'LAREN said, he had for the last 30 or 40 years paid great attention to licensing, and he certainly did not agree with those who had so many faults to find with the present system. He would, however, admit that it was very unsatisfactory, the magistrates who decided the appeals being often not cognizant of the merits of the case. The most dangerous state of things in public or private affairs was when parties came forward and said "something must be done," without knowing what. If the something was done, they often got deeper into the mire. Until something could be done which was certain to be an improvement, he held that nothing should be done. So far from this Bill effecting any improvement, he believed it would be a great evil if it were passed into law. The sheriffs objected to being made the Court of Appeal, because it was imposing a duty upon them foreign to their office, and they said that, for the due exercise of that power, they would require local knowledge as to the requirements of the towns and villages within their jurisdiction which they did not at present possess; and, on the other hand, they affirmed that such knowledge was possessed by the justices of the peace who were drawn from all districts of the country in which the jurisdiction was exercised; and, lastly, they said that if this duty was thrown upon them it would tend to impair the administration of justice. He coincided with the suggestion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Lanarkshire that the Courts of quarter sessions should appoint a small licensing committee, say of four, and he would make the further suggestion that no decision of the local magistrates should be reversed except with the concurrence of three out of the four members of the committee, as was the rule with the Judges of the Supreme Courts. He thought that would afford a fair presumption that there had been no miscarriage of justice. It was not so much a question of law to decide as of fact. All the old Licensing Acts said that licences were to be given, not to everyone qualified according to law, but "to such number of persons as the magistrates shall think meet and convenient in each locality." It was a question of discretion; and who was so well qualified to decide as the magistrates of a borough or the justices of a county? To prevent the four magistrates or justices being selected on grounds of partizanship, he would have the names of all the magistrates present at the Court of quarter sessions put into an urn, and the first four drawn out should constitute the committee. They would thus obtain a fair and impartial court of appeal. He had many other objections to urge, but he had said quite sufficient to show that he opposed the Bill.

MR. MARK STEWART said, if the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) would move the rejection of the Bill he would second it. It appeared to him that the question was one of very great importance to the country, and that it ought to be taken up by the Government, as there could be no doubt that some alteration of the Licensing Acts was imperatively called for. He had had some experience of quarter sessions both in England and Scotland, and he felt that the practical effect of the measure would be to throw upon the sheriff an odium that no Judge ought to incur. As he had said, the question ought to be taken up by the Government, and although he could not suppose, in the crowded state of Public Business, it could be taken up this Session, still he hoped the debate would not be futile in eliciting some expression on the part of the Government, or in drawing their attention to the fact how great and important the question was in the eyes of the people of Scotland. The suggestion thrown out as regarded the selection of a certain number of magistrates to form a committee in order to adjudicate in licensing appeals would not hold good in burghs, where the number of magistrates was not large enough to inspire confidence in the selection. It had been said that there were too many public-houses in burghs, but the excessive number of public-houses had not sprung up within the last few years. On the contrary, there had been recently a decided disposition to reduce the number of public-houses, and the number of licences granted had been very few. He should, for his own part, be glad to co-operate in any measure which would still further diminish the number of public-houses; but he did not believe that the Bill, if passed, would produce the effect which the hon. Member for Glasgow desired.

MR. M'LAGAN thought any system would be better than the present one, and he noticed that every one who had spoken had approved of the principle of the Bill. Everyone, too, considered the present circumstances unsatisfactory, and that there ought to be a change. The Preamble of the Bill did not ask for the appointment of sheriffs, but it simply stated that the present state of things was very unsatisfactory, and that it was necessary to have a change. He believed that a better amendment of the law could be made than was proposed in the Bill; and he had no doubt that in Committee the hon. Member for Glasgow would be ready to assent to any Amendment which would render its provisions more entirely satisfactory. For his own part, he must say that he preferred the constitution of the Court of Licensing Appeal as proposed by the Commission of 1860 to that proposed by the Bill. That Commission suggested that a committee of justices should be formed to hear appeals. In many places, public-houses were now forced upon the inhabitants of towns by packed benches of magistrates—he would not say by corrupt, but by facile magistrates. That would not be the case if the Bill passed, and he should therefore vote for the second reading, reserving to himself the right to support Amendments on its provisions in Committee.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY thought the Bill had been introduced in consequence of some local grievance which the hon. Member for Glasgow had in reference to the administration of the laws in licensing appeals by the justices in the lower ward of Lanarkshire. He objected to go into Committee on the Bill with a view to substitute an entirely different Court of Appeal from that which it proposed to establish. He thought it would be very unwise to transfer the appeal from the justices to the sheriff. At the same time, he thought it would be expedient that appeals should be heard by a committee selected but not by ballot, from the justices, instead of by the bench at large, as was the case at present. Although he did not object that the sheriff or sheriffs-substitute should preside over such a committee, he could not consent to transfer to them alone the whole power now exercised by the magistrates.

MR. RAMSAY said, that on the ground that the present system was very unsatisfactory, and that some remedy was required, he should vote for the second reading, if the hon. Member should go to a division. The principle of the Bill was not that the licensing appeals should necessarily be transferred to the sheriff, but that a new licensing Court of Appeal should be constituted. The true course would be to pass the second reading, and then amend the constitution of the proposed Court of Appeal in Committee. A change in the present system was certainly required, for, as it was, the decisions of the local justices were often overruled by magistrates from other parts of the country who knew little of the merits of the question. He had known a case in which the decision to refuse a licence by four local magistrates had been reversed by two justices at quarter sessions, one being the sheriff. The licence was granted, though the local magistrates considered that it should be refused, and though the proprietor of the house himself had requested by letter that it should be withheld. Nothing more anomalous than that could be pointed out in order to induce the House to provide some remedy.

SIR WILLIAM EDMONSTONE said, he strongly objected to an appeal being allowed from the decision of magistrates to the sheriffs of the county. His duties, as a justice, with regard to licences had been of a disagreeable nature; he would be very glad to be relieved of those duties, but it would be intolerable that the decision of county magistrates should be reversed, or liable to be reversed, by a Sheriff Court. He strongly objected to the Bill, and if the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) would make a Motion, he would support the rejection of it.

DR. C. CAMERON said, that as his hon. Colleague (Mr. Anderson) had expressed his determination to carry the matter to a division, he felt it incumbent upon him to explain why he would vote against the second reading of the Bill. The measure contained no such provision as that which had been recognized and adopted by Parliament in respect to licensing appeals in England, and which did away entirely with appeals from the decisions of the local magistrates in all applications for new licences. Now, the Bill before the House proposed to place all appeals in the hands of the sheriffs. It was not a novel proposal, as it had come under the consideration of the Royal Commissioners in 1859, and they had not only reported against it, but also against what might be described as a much milder suggestion in the same direction—namely, that the sheriffs should be ex officio members of the Licensing Appeal Court, which the Commissioners recommended should be appointed. Since these Commissioners reported, the law relating to appeals had been altered in England, and the suggestion of the Commissioners that a Licensing Appeal Court should be formed had been accepted; it was accepted also with this further important addition, as he had just explained, that no appeal should be allowed from the local justices in the case of refusal on application for a new licence. That was really a matter of much greater importance than the question of the constitution of the Appeal Court. A Return, which had been laid before the House last Session, showed that in Glasgow, within three years, 150 licences had been granted by the county justices over the heads of the city magistrates. The reason why the measure of his hon. Friend, therefore, met with the opposition of the Good Templars and of the Executive Committee of the Permissive

Bill Association in Scotland was, that they feared that it would be a means of saddling permanently upon that country a mode of dealing with licensing appeals which was far behind the system adopted in England, and for that reason he (Dr. Cameron) was prepared to vote against the second reading.

MR. VANS AGNEW said, that he should consider it his duty to vote against the second reading of the Bill. He believed that its principle was not merely that there should be a better licensing Court, but that the appeals should be taken from the justices of the county, who had local knowledge, and given to the sheriff and his substitutes. He objected to that. He granted that the present system afforded room for improvement. He had sat for more than 30 years as a licensing magistrate, and a magistrate hearing appeals. He had sat at quarter sessions with a bare quorum of three magistrates, when an appeal had often come from a decision of a unanimous bench of magistrates, and he was always sorry when these questions of licensing came before them. Under those circumstances — knowing that he was ignorant of many local details bearing upon the cases—he had always felt it his duty not to interfere with the decision of the magistrates; but he thought it was hard on the magistrates of burghs, who knew their own town and its circumstances, for them to feel that their decisions were liable to be reversed by another set of justices who happened to meet in the county town on the day of quarter sessions. He thought it very desirable that such a contingency should be obviated. In reference to the Bill itself, the proposal to refer appeals to the sheriffs would not improve the condition of affairs. They could not have the local knowledge required in each particular case. Besides, he found that it would be possible for the decision of the sheriff, who might be in the right, to be overruled by his two subordinates, whom he had himself appointed. The sheriffs themselves objected strongly to have this duty thrown upon them, and urged that it was quite foreign to the discharge of their official duties. They were appointed to decide upon questions of law, not matters of expediency such as the granting of licences; and they thought that it would be better that the system of throwing the decision of such questions upon a licensing committee should be adopted in Scotland as it was in England. In Scotland it happened very often that an appeal would be heard by a smaller number of magistrates than the Court which had granted or refused the licence. There might in some cases be strong pressure put upon the magistrates to refuse or to grant licences; but he believed that the mode in which it was proposed by this Bill to meet that possible danger would neither be satisfactory to the magistrates nor to the people of Scotland. He thought the suggestion thrown out that there should be a licensing committee sitting as a Court of Appeal was one worthy of attention, and he should be very glad to see it carried out. If possible, the sheriff of the county might be placed upon the committee, and if that were done, he thought they would have arrived at a very fair arrangement, by which the matter would be put on a much better footing than it was at present.

MR. MONTGOMERIE said, that it seemed to be admitted on all hands that licensing appeals should not be abandoned, but he did not think the Bill had pointed out the right course that should be adopted. If, as was stated, the sheriffs objected to the Bill, he thought all the more would the sheriffs-substitute object, for they lived on the spot, and they would dislike to be mixed up in private squabbles about licences. Several speakers had suggested the appointment of a committee of justices to quarter sessions, and he could not see why there should be any difficulty in adopting this suggestion. The county of which he had the honour of representing, a division was divided into districts for licensing and other purposes. From these district courts there was an appeal to quarter sessions. Let the justices meeting in quarter sessions appoint a committee composed of those best qualified for the duty, to be assisted by a magistrate chosen from each of the district courts, who would give the committee the benefit of their local knowledge, and, at the same time, guarantee thorough impartiality in hearing appeals. He believed that in that way disputed questions arising in any particular district would be satisfactorily settled, and, if such a provision were introduced in any Bill on the subject, he would support it. There was not the least occasion for that committee to dispose of any case at the moment. They might sit from time to time, according to circumstances. One objection to the sheriffs would be that they would be inclined to grant licences simply because the applicant bore an unimpeached character. The sheriff would say—"He is a respectable man, and I am prepared to grant him a licence." He did not think that would be satisfactory, although, at the same time, he thought it would be very desirable to get rid of the present system of canvassing the magistrates. A great deal had been said about the opinion of the sheriff of Lanarkshire, and it seemed to him that on the present occasion they were asked to upset the whole system of licensing for the simple purpose of providing a new licensing Court for the city of Glasgow. Notwithstanding the high authority of the sheriff of Lanarkshire—whom he knew to be a most excellent man and able lawyer—although he did not know that he had any other special qualifications as a licensing magistrate—as to the necessity for the change proposed, he did not think they were bound to pass the Bill.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, there were many inconveniences connected with the matter of licensing appeals, especially as far as regarded a large community like that of Glasgow, and he thought it desirable that there should be some change in the present system. But he was quite opposed to the substitute suggested by the Bill, for it would be quite inconsistent with the recognized principles of local administration in such affairs that the opinions of the magistrates of such a place as Glasgow should be overruled by the opinion of a sheriff and a sheriff-substitute, which was really what was proposed by that measure. The sheriffs were unwilling to have imposed on them such a duty, not because of the additional work, which would not be very much, but because it would introduce them into disputes with reference to social and temperance questions from which it was very desirable they should be kept free, in order that they should maintain their judicial position. In Scotland the question of temperance probably occupied a larger share of public discussion than it did in England, and they were told that the selection of members of municipalities depended upon the opinion on that subject held by candidates. If that were the case, how very unfortunate it would be if the sheriffs and sheriffs-substitute should be subjected to the opposition of a certain party, because of their judgments in the licensing Court. The question had been under the consideration of the House before. It was also considered in 1870 by a Commission who were in favour of the appointment of a committee of justices as a committee of appeal to be nominated by a general meeting of the justices; and in the Licensing Act passed for England in 1872 there was a provision for the appointment of a licensing committee composed of justices, annually nominated, and he thought that in the case of Scotland it might be well to have some such committee, dealing, however, with the large towns in a somewhat different manner from the small towns. In small towns and remote districts such questions could best be determined by those who had local knowledge, and even in such large cities as Glasgow and Edinburgh, they would be better dealt with by a licensing committee of magistrates than by the sheriffs. He could not assent to the Bill; but, without pledging the Government to the introduction of a measure that Session, he would promise that the question of the licensing Courts in Scotland should be dealt with at the earliest opportunity.

MR. ANDERSON was about to reply, when—

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member would be out of Order in making a second speech.

MR. ANDERSON said, that no formal Motion for the rejection of the Bill having been made, he was deprived of the opportunity of reply, but he must trouble the House to divide.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, the debate had hitherto been confined entirely to Scotch Members, and it might go on for a considerable time longer, as those hon. Gentlemen kept dropping into the House. In the meantime, he desired to say a few words. He was very glad to see the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) had taken up the part of a temperance reformer, and was endeavouring to improve the licensing system, from which they all suffered so much. The debate had been particularly pleasing to him, because almost every hon. Member who had got up had made a speech in favour of the Permissive Bill. He must, however, look at this Bill from his own point of view, and that point of view was, that all the facilities which were afforded for drinking were very dangerous to the people, and were the cause of a great amount of the misery which existed among them, and in that frame of mind he should support any measure which went in the direction of removing such dangers. The only question he had to consider, therefore, was whether this Bill, if carried, was likely to diminish those dangers. There had been great diversity of opinion expressed on the subject. The Scotch Members were generally supposed to agree better among themselves than the Irish Members did; but, on the present occasion, the variety of opinion they had expressed was rather perplexing. For his own part, he could not see why the Scotch law on the subject should be different from the law of England, and what he would suggest was that the law of Scotland should be made the same as that of England, and that there should be no appeal from a refusal to grant a new licence. If an Amendment to that effect was introduced in the Bill when in Committee he would vote for the second reading now. Apart from that question, the Bill was of trifling importance, and the general opinion seemed to be that it would make things worse rather than better. Before sitting down, he wished to refer to a matter to which he almost felt that it was his duty to call the attention of the Speaker, and to ask him whether it was not a breach of Privilege—only they had breach of Privilege questions almost every day now. He referred to a note addressed to the Members of the House signed by the Secretary to the United Licensed Victuallers, Protection Society for England, Ireland, and Scotland, which was couched in the most insolent terms—

“Sir,—Please to be in your place in the House of Commons on Wednesday, the 28th of April, to vote for the Licensing Appeal Bill for Scotland, to be brought forward on that day by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Mr. Anderson.”

Why, that was language which they could not have dared to address to their own potboys, and he protested against the audacity of dictating to hon. Gentlemen what course they should adopt in dealing with the question. He felt that it almost amounted to a breach of Privilege, but he would not be too hard upon them, and would not call upon the Speaker to decide that it was so. He simply called attention to the fact that that note was signed by the Secretary to the proprietors of all the drinking establishments of the United Kingdom. He scarcely liked to vote in such company; but on the condition he had stated as to an Amendment, and on the old principle that half a loaf was better than no bread, he would, as he said, vote for the second reading.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson

CHURCH RATES ABOLITION (SCOTLAND) BILL.—[BILL 26.]

SECOND READING.

MR. M'LAREN, in rising to move that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that, looking at the time of day—4.15, P.M.—and the importance of the question, he should be unjust to hon. Members holding opinions different from his own if he made a long speech. He should, therefore, be brief, in order to give those who were opposed to his views an equal time with himself. Lest any hon. Member of the House might suppose he had been anxious to bring this question forward, he begged to say he had done everything in his power to induce the Government to bring a Bill themselves. When the question was brought before the House last Session, nearly all the Members who spoke on his side of the House urged the Government to bring in a measure of their own. With that sentiment he cordially concurred, expressing, at the same time, his opinion that it was not a question which a private Member could carry, but was a question which could only be carried by the Government. It had been said that he and his hon. Friends who supported him were anxious to bring this question before the House with a desire to make political capital. If any hon. Member thought that of him, he was much mistaken. The people of Scotland intensely felt the grievance under which they now laboured. The hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander) proposed last Session, in an able speech, views which he (Mr. M'Laren) now ventured to bring forward in his Bill. The hon. and gallant Member said, the Resolution he then proposed pledged the House to find a remedy for the existing state of things, and asked the Lord Advocate to undertake the duty. The hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. Orr-Ewing), who seconded, expressed similar views. Again, the hon. Baronet the Member for Peeblesshire (Sir Graham Montgomery) said, that a disagreeable feeling undoubtedly did prevail in Scotland with regard to this question; and he thought no Member of the House more competent to deal with it than the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate. Hon. Members on both sides of the House urged the Government to bring in a Bill on this subject; and before he (Mr. M'Laren) replied, the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. M'Lagan) told him that if he would not insist on a division, the Lord Advocate would publicly pledge himself to bring in a Bill next Session. He then said he should be willing to withdraw his Bill on that assurance. What, then, did the Lord Advocate do, as the Representative of the Government? The right hon. and learned Gentleman said—

“It shall be my endeavour to bring in next Session such a Bill as will meet, if possible, the difficulties which have been stated in the course of this discussion If it does not give complete satisfaction, I hope it will at least approach that result. Under the circumstances, I trust my hon. and gallant Friend, to whose industry and information we are so much indebted, will not press his Resolution, and that the hon. Member for Edinburgh will withdraw a Bill which, in any case, could not usefully be proceeded with during the short period that remains of the present Session.”—[3 Hansard, ccxx. 1322.]

In place of making a long speech in reply, he (Mr. M'Laren) said only a few words—that after the statement of the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate, that he intended to bring a Bill, he should be quite content to leave the matter in the hands of Her Majesty's Government, because he admitted it was a question which ought to be dealt with by them rather than by a private Member. That was how the question stood at the end of last Session of Parliament. At the commencement of the present Session he was, unfortunately, through illness, unable to be in his place, but the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) was good enough to introduce the Bill, and he then told the hon. Member that whatever might be the chance of his ballot for an early day, he was not to fix one within two months of the commencement of the Session, in order to give the Lord Advocate time to bring in his Bill. At a later day, he put a Notice on the Paper to ask what day that Bill would be brought in, and before it came on, his right hon. and learned Friend asked him to postpone the Question some little time, as he had not yet got instructions from the Cabinet. He did postpone the Question, and he postponed the second reading until that day, when nearly one-half of the Session was passed. He said this, not to upbraid his right hon. and learned Friend in the matter, but to show that he had not been pressing the measure unduly on the House. On the contrary, he had been most anxious that the Government should take it up, and he would give them every possible facility in his power. Having made that preliminary explanation, he must revert to some of the objections which were made last Session regarding the Bill. He had obtained facts since that time to show that these objections were ill-founded. He might state some of the alleged cases of hardship. Excessive rates had been levied on poor people, as he would show by the result of careful inquiries made by competent authority. In the case of the Orkney and Shetland Islands, which he particularly dwelt upon, it was denied that there were hardships he had stated. He had mentioned one case where the rate levied was 12s. 5d. in the pound. Doubts were thrown on that fact; now, he had most undoubted authority for stating that the rate of 12s. 5d. in the pound was levied in one of those Shetland parishes, and the Free Church minister whose manse and garden were rated at £15 9s., was assessed at £9 16s. In Orkney he heard also, from a gentleman of undoubted authority, that the heritors of St. Andrews—six miles from Kirkwall—had just built a manse for the minister of that parish at a cost of £655, and office-houses £210—in all, £865. A handsome sum to pay for the accommodation of a minister having, according to his own showing, not more than 45 communicants. Most of the people in the parish preferred walking a distance of six miles to Kirkwall, and had done so for 40 or 50 years, rather than worship in the parish church. In the parish of Lady in the Island of Sanday, a manse, &c., had been put up at a cost of over £700. The Rev. John Dangerfield, the minister of this parish, said he had 25 communicants; the average attendance at his church was about 12, and never exceeded 24; while in the immediate neighbourhood the Dissenting Churches were attended—the Free Church by 300 persons, and the United Presbyterian Church by 500, the membership of the former being returned to the General Assembly as 358, and of the latter to the United Presbyterian Synod as 507. Rather than build a new manse the heritors of the parish of Evie had, during the past few months, put repairs costing £469 upon the manse. The average attendance at the parish church of Evie was not more than 90, while that of the Free Church congregation, almost next door, considerably exceeded 200. Indeed, the membership of the Free Church was given at 265, while that of the Established Church for the combined parishes of Evie and Rendal was given in the Return presented to the House of Commons at 213. Was it not hard that poor people who supported their own ministers should be fleeced for ministers of the Established Church? It was called the Church of Scotland, but it was not the Church of Scotland in any sense whatever, more particularly in those parishes; for as he had shown the congregations there were in most instances smaller than those in the Free Church. With one other case, and one only, he would trouble the House, because it was one that was particularly used last Session. In the course of the debate last Session, a statement was made to the effect that the Clerk of the Cairston Presbytery had informed the hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire that the manse of Harray, which had cost the heritors £1,800, had cost so much in consequence of the heritors having disputed among themselves, and further, that Lord Zetland had paid almost half the amount. He (Mr. M'Laren) had made inquiry into this matter, and found that the buildings did actually cost the heritors £1,800; that there was no dispute among them, except in so far as the parish minister, who was also a landowner in the parish, desired, along with the Presbytery, to compel the heritors to build a manse which would have cost nearly £3,000. This the heritors refused to do. The Presbytery were afraid to go into Court, and the compromise of £1,800 was agreed to. Lord Zetland acted along with the other heritors all through in this matter, and simply paid his legal proportion of the cost; the other proprietors, chiefly very small and poor, had many of them to sell their pigs and cows to meet this most iniquitous demand. A case such as that showed how much existed of hardship and injustice which ought to be remedied. The hon. Member for the Falkirk Burghs (Mr. Ramsay) last year went fully into the origin and incidence of this question. He showed that church rates in Scotland were optional under the Act of 1649 just as much as church rates in England were optional; but that in course of time it became otherwise. He showed also that the Parliament of Scotland imposed a maximum amount, that no more than £83 6s. 8d. should be imposed for erecting a manse; but by a decision of the Courts in Edinburgh—Judge-made law—the sum was raised to £1,000, or more, as might be thought fit from time to time. Even if a man's house was rated at only £4 a-year, he was legally liable for his share, under the present law as interpreted by the Courts, for erecting a manse for the minister of the parish. When it was said that the cases of the two countries were not exactly the same, let him remind hon. Members that in England the incumbent was not entitled to a manse at all at the cost of the people. He was bound to pay for keeping up his dwelling himself, and if he left it in a dilapidated state, his successor could proceed against his heirs, and compel them to put it in a proper condition. All the Scotch ministers had to do was to declare the manse was not in a proper state, and they could get an assessment to put it right. One great evil had been the extension of this Act to small proprietors—feuars, as they were called—in Scotland. It was not intended, but was so construed owing to the ambiguity of an Act passed for regulating the mode of defining assessments in 1856. It enacted that no burden should be imposed on any man, or on any property which was not formerly legally imposed in respect of the property; but one clause provided that all assessments thereafter should be levied in conformity with this new valuation, and, in practice, the latter clause had been held to overcome the former. If a declaratory Act were passed, stating what was the real effect of the Act of 1856, all the smaller people would be exempted. His right hon. and learned Friend had said the passing of this Bill would have disendowed the parish ministers, by depriving them of a portion of their income. He (Mr. M'Laren) begged altogether to deny that impression. All the Bill did was to transcribe the clauses of the English Act passed in 1868. That Act was passed after many years' battles, and although church rates might still be levied, no legal proceedings could be taken to enforce them. What had been the result? Plenty of money had been raised. There was no difficulty at all about the matter; neither would there be in Scotland. One religious body alone, the Free Church, since 1843 had erected 900 churches. There were only about the same number of original parish churches in Scotland altogether. Suppose all these were overthrown in one year by an earthquake, the Church of Scotland would be able to re-erect them for themselves, as were the Free Church congregations. Surely, then, the voluntary efforts of the friends of the Church would be amply sufficient to keep the fabrics in repair. The Free Church had erected nearly as many manses, and besides that they had erected colleges and schools. The United Presbyterian Church also had 500 churches erected at the expense of those worshipping in them. There had never been any difficulty in getting money for those churches, and he presumed there would be no more difficulty with regard to the Establishment. The Church of Scotland was, however, in a decided minority of the people of Scotland. There were disputes whether that Church had one-third or two-fifths. Most people thought two-fifths was nearer the case than one-third, and he doubted whether it came to two-fifths. Taking the attendance on the Census Sunday, the numbers attending the non-Established Churches were about 60 per cent more than those attending the Established Churches. Presuming he had not misstated these facts, he would ask, was it fair to impose a compulsory rate on poor people who entirely supported their own churches, manses, pastors, and schools, to compel them to contribute towards another Church? His right hon. and learned Friend and various other hon. Members had admitted that was a grievance, and having done all he could himself, he now called upon the Lord Advocate to fulfil his promise and bring in a Bill. He had implicit faith in the good intentions of his right hon. and learned Friend, and he did not believe if it was in his power to do what they desired to be done, it would be left undone. It was the Government which was to blame. He should not further allude to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Glasgow; but he did say that the Government had entered into an undertaking and had failed to fulfil that undertaking, and the people of Scotland would resent this failure. He begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time.—(Mr. M'Laren.)

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, the difference between himself and the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren) was that, while the latter doubted the promise made by the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate, he (Sir Graham Montgomery) believed the right hon. and learned Gentleman would bring in a Bill. There were difficulties in the way; but if he did not do it this Session, he would do it next. ["Oh, oh!"] He was not without hope they would have it this Session. However this might be, the hon. Member for Edinburgh had elected to proceed with the second reading of his Bill, and he (Sir Graham Montgomery) must state the reasons which induced him to move its rejection. The hon. Gentleman had always proceeded on the assumption that assessments in Scotland were the same as church rates in England. That proposition he entirely denied. He would endeavour to show what church rates were in the early history of England. It was stated that their origin was lost in antiquity, and so great was the uncertainty in reference to church rates in the early history of England, that it was felt necessary to have some definition of the law. The consequence was that 13 learned doctors of civil law met in conclave at Doctors' Commons, and endeavoured to put forth to the country definitions as to church rates, and how they were to be levied. These learned doctors issued several directions, but these, he was sorry to say, in course of time were all pronounced to be wrong by the Courts of Law. He then tried to find a definition of church rates, and he found a book in the Library of the House of Commons which defined that church rates were not a Common Law charge, neither were they a charge on land, neither were they a definite permanent charge, but depended on the pleasure of the vestry. The question came up in 1837, in the Braintree Case, when the vestry would not raise a rate, and the churchwardens proceeded to raise one themselves. This was decided by the Court to be illegal. After that a minority of the vestry proceeded to put on a Church rate, and that also was declared to be illegal. Another authority stated, that the Braintree Case completely altered the law, and that church rates, instead of being a burthen on land, became a voluntary payment dependent on the majority of the ratepayers. For many years after 1837 the question of church rates was debated in that House; and, at length, Parliament decided that, though the vestry might continue to impose the rate, payment should not be compelled. With regard to Scotland, he was quite willing to admit that before the Reformation the laws of the two countries were pretty much the same. The parishioners supported the fabric of the church, and the parson the chancel; but after the Reformation, the two countries proceeded in totally different directions. The church rates in England were voluntary assessments; in Scotland they were a charge upon the land. The highest authority on the subject in Scotland stated that the heritors were bound to provide and maintain the church and manse, and burial-ground, for parishioners. This was done by Acts of the Scotch Parliament in 1572 and 1663. The heritors had no option in this matter. It was a burthen on their land. If they failed to do it, there was power to compel them. It was a power inherited by the Presbyteries of the Church from the Bishops, and if the heritors failed to perform their duties, the Presbyteries could appeal to the Sheriff, and then to the Court of Session; so that the payment was in no sense voluntary. He thought in what he had said he had succeeded in showing that this burthen fell entirely upon property, and it was not, he thought, a burthen from which the heritors of Scotland should be relieved. They were not seeking to be relieved from that burthen. He had seen the list of Petitions presented in favour of the hon. Member's Bill, and none of them came from the heritors of Scotland, and he was quite sure that they did not seek to be relieved in the manner proposed by the Bill. The question of commutation had been referred to; but, individually, the more he looked at it the more difficulties he saw in that question. If commutation would have the effect of separating the owners of the land from the Church, as he believed it would, he should oppose it on that ground, although he had formerly expressed an opinion in favour of commutation. Of course there were persons in Scotland who objected to compulsory payments for the support of religion; but it appeared to him that those persons were in possession of property bearing legal burthens which they ought in justice to pay, and there surely could be no objection on their part to pay what was really their legal dues. They took their property upon the understanding that they would have to pay them, and why should they be relieved from them? He objected to such a relief being given, and should consequently move the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Sir Graham Montgomery.)

MR. ERNEST NOEL said, he would at once acknowledge that church rates in Scotland were, as a legal matter, on a very different footing from that on which church rates in England had been. In the case of Scotland they were a charge laid upon property, while in England they had been levied upon the individual. But although there was a difference legally, he thought it could be shown that the incidence of the tax became practically the same as it had been in England prior to 1868. So far as church rates were concerned, he would say that since they had been abolished in England, not the slightest difficulty had been found in accomplishing without them all that had formerly been done with them. Indeed greater facilities were found in raising money for Church purposes, and in his opinion, the same result would happen in Scotland. Not only had it been possible in England to do more than could be done when church rates were compulsory, but the sense of irritation and soreness that had existed was at the same time removed, and he believed that the Church of England was really stronger than it had been before those rates were repealed. He would acknowledge at once that church rates in Scotland were assessed upon the land for the building of manse and the building and repairing of churches, and he would also acknowledge that the heritors generally did not wish to be relieved from these charges; but they had heard from the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Sir Graham Montgomery) that the more he inquired into the question the more difficult did he find it to bring about any commutation that would be satisfactory. He (Mr. Noel) ventured, however, to point out to hon. Members who were unacquainted with the subject that, as a tax on the feuars, this assessment fell very heavily, and nearly in the same manner as the old church rates had done in England. A most admirable speech on this subject was delivered by the hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander) last Session. It was a speech that should be read by every hon. Member who wished to become acquainted with this subject. That hon. and gallant Member pointed out to the House distinctly that there were three classes of parishes, and he read a list of parishes where there had been no assessment since the memory of man—or, at all events, for a very long time. He then gave the number of parishes where there was no assessment, or where, at all events, it was not paid by the feuars; he also gave cases in which the feuars were assessed, and he quoted instances of parishes in which there had been no assessment—in some for 60 years, some 20 years, and in some none at all. If these discrepancies existed, it did not appear that this was a charge that could be commuted, but one that ought to be removed altogether. When a man took a piece of land, how could he tell how much it was likely that he would have to pay, when in some parishes there had been no assessment for 60 years, and in some there was none at all? Yet, directly he built upon the land, an assessment might take place, and in the following year he might be called upon to pay 4s. 6d. or 5s. in the pound. When they considered that some of these feus had been used for building manses, he asked, was it a reasonable and a fair thing that a heavy tax, quite an irregular tax, a tax that was so irregular that no reliance could be felt as to whether it would be raised or not—was it fair that such a heavy tax should be placed on the feu, when the sum thus raised might be applied to the building of a manse belonging to a sect different from that which he who paid it belonged to? They had been told of the parish of Inveresk, which enjoyed an unenviable notoriety for putting on an assessment, and other instances showed that an absolute want of uniformity existed, and surely it was necessary that they should remove the want of uniformity by taking off the tax forthwith. He thought that in these days they were all agreed upon the general principle that it was not only very unjust, but very unwise to tax persons of one creed for the maintenance of another creed, in which they did not believe, and that such taxes should be at once repealed. This was not like a fixed charge upon property in the way of tithes. A tithe could be estimated, and was estimated, in the purchase of land; its amount was perfectly well known, and could be said to belong to the property. But in this case it was perfectly clear that the charge was, in many instances, falling upon the feuars, so that it could by no means be termed a fixed charge upon property. That it caused a great amount of soreness in Scotland no one could deny, and he asked whether it was wise, in the interest of the Church of Scotland, that it should any longer be maintained? Some might think it was wise, but he ventured to say that no wise statesman would resolve to continue it. Although he would admit that the hon. Member for Edinburgh was not looked upon as a friend to the Established Church, yet he (Mr. Noel) thought that by the passing of this measure that Church would receive a real accession of strength. Both as a religious body and a Christian Church it would find itself much stronger should the feuars be relieved from the burdens imposed upon them.

MR. MARK STEWART said, he could not endorse the principle of the Bill, which he believed was framed in the interests of a comparatively small number of people; but he was ready to admit that there were cases of grievances which ought to be remedied, in some parts of Scotland, and more especially in the Orkney Islands. His own experience, moreover, convinced him that in the majority of cases the Church authorities showed no disposition to impose the rate on people who objected to it. But to say that they were to entirely remove an impost which had been for many years on the land of Scotland, merely to alleviate the evils complained of by a few persons, was a matter which he did not think the House of Commons would sanction. The hon. Member for Edinburgh had said that the Church of Scotland embraced only two-fifths of the people; but he (Mr. Stewart) differed from that statement, and thought there were more people connected with the Established Church than the hon. Member seemed to think. He should like to quote a few statistics. According to the Return of the Registrar General, 82·02 per cent of the people of Scotland were married by the clergy of the three leading Presbyterian Churches. In 1870—the last year, he believed, for which Returns were published—the numbers were 44·76 per cent in the Church Scotland, 22·91 in the Free Church, and 14·35 in the United Presbyterian Church. Then, as regarded education, the Commissioners in their Report for 1867 showed a Church connection of about 2,000,000 out of the 3,000,000 of the population of Scotland, or 81·3 per cent, connected with these three Churches, of which 44·4 per cent were Church of Scotland, 26·1 the Free Church, 10·7 the United Presbyterian, and 10 per cent were unclassified. In the Return given to the General Assembly, in May, 1874, of the adherents of the various Churches, out of a population of 1,704,837 embraced in the Return, 813,149, or 47·7 per cent, belonged to the Established Church. As to the number of communicants, he was speaking from memory, but he believed that in 1871 there were something like 436,000 belonging to the Established Church, 285,300 to the Free Church, and 165,000 to the United Presbyterian. These figures showed that the Established Church was much stronger than the hon. Member wished to make out. As regarded the Bill, he would repeat that he was perfectly ready to relieve the grievances which were justly complained of, but he was not prepared to give into the hands of the heritors that money, the payment of which they did not at present grudge. They should recollect that the Established Church possessed 1,160 churches throughout the country, and they should also recollect that the present incumbents of parishes had taken their livings believing that their manse, churchyards, and churches would be properly kept up but, if the Bill passed, they would leave those incumbents in a difficult position. That was not a proper thing to do, especially at a time when they were promised a Bill by the Government. As grievances did exist, however, he would willingly give what assistance he could to the settlement of the question on an equitable footing, and he had no hesitation in believing that the Lord Advocate was sincere in his intention to deal with this subject, and therefore he should vote against the Bill.

MR. VANS AGNEW said, he was unwilling that the House should go to a division on the Bill, because they were aware that the Lord Advocate had promised to deal with the subject. He was quite ready to remedy any legitimate grievance which might be complained of, but he could not agree with the remedy proposed in the Bill, and he would therefore rather wait for the measure of his right hon. and learned Friend. He believed his right hon. and learned Friend intended to settle the question not perhaps, entirely in accordance with the wishes of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, but in a manner satisfactory to Scotland generally. He admitted that there existed some hardships with reference to the feuars, and they were all anxious that they should be removed, though not in the manner proposed by the hon. Member for Edinburgh—namely by the total abolition of what he termed church rates. He would not enter at length into the question, but he would point out that church assessments in Scotland were not the same thing as church rates in England; they were, in fact, more like the tithes than church rates. He thought it would be very much better if they tried to lay their heads together and come to some understanding which would be a practical settlement of the question. He hoped his right hon. and learned Friend would be able to give some pledge that he would be able to bring in a Bill which would settle the matter, and he hoped the House would not be called upon to express an opinion upon the subject then. To abolish the charge according to the terms of the Bill would be to rob the Church of the value of these assessments and put the money into the pockets of the heritors who did not ask for it. It was not the original intention of the law that these feuars should be assessed, and what he would suggest was, that they should revert to the original intention of the law, and let the tax fall upon the land, and if the land had been feued, let the feuar pay upon the ground rent and not upon the houses. If the hon. Member for Edinburgh would accept this settlement, he would get a great deal of what he asked for, and he believed it would remove the grievance which he admitted was at present complained of.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he was of opinion that the Bill was one which it would be best to leave in the hands of the Government. Indeed, it ought not to be dealt with by a private Member at all.

MR. M'LAREN gave Notice that on an early day he would again bring the Bill forward.

And it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

NATIONAL DEBT (SINKING FUND) BILL.

learned doctors of civil law met in conclave at Doctors' Commons, and endeavoured to put forth to the country definitions as to church rates, and how they were to be levied. These learned doctors issued several directions, but these, he was sorry to say, in course of time were all pronounced to be wrong by the Courts of Law. He then tried to find a definition of church rates, and he found a book in the Library of the House of Commons which defined that church rates were not a Common Law charge, neither were they a charge on land, neither were they a definite permanent charge, but depended on the pleasure of the vestry. The question came up in 1837, in the Braintree Case, when the vestry would not raise a rate, and the churchwardens proceeded to raise one themselves. This was decided by the Court to be illegal. After that a minority of the vestry proceeded to put on a Church rate, and that also was declared to be illegal. Another authority stated, that the Braintree Case completely altered the law, and that church rates, instead of being a burthen on land, became a voluntary payment dependent on the majority of the ratepayers. For many years after 1837 the question of church rates was debated in that House; and, at length, Parliament decided that, though the vestry might continue to impose the rate, payment should not be compelled. With regard to Scotland, he was quite willing to admit that before the Reformation the laws of the two countries were pretty much the same. The parishioners supported the fabric of the church, and the parson the chancel; but after the Reformation, the two countries proceeded in totally different directions. The church rates in England were voluntary assessments; in Scotland they were a charge upon the land. The highest authority on the subject in Scotland stated that the heritors were bound to provide and maintain the church and manse, and burial-ground, for parishioners. This was done by Acts of the Scotch Parliament in 1572 and 1663. The heritors had no option in this matter. It was a burthen on their land. If they failed to do it, there was power to compel them. It was a power inherited by the Presbyteries of the Church from the Bishops, and if the heritors failed to perform their duties, the Presbyteries could appeal to the Sheriff, and then to the Court of Session; so that the payment was in no sense voluntary. He thought in what he had said he had succeeded in showing that this burthen fell entirely upon property, and it was not, he thought, a burthen from which the heritors of Scotland should be relieved. They were not seeking to be relieved from that burthen. He had seen the list of Petitions presented in favour of the hon. Member's Bill, and none of them came from the heritors of Scotland, and he was quite sure that they did not seek to be relieved in the manner proposed by the Bill. The question of commutation had been referred to; but, individually, the more he looked at it the more difficulties he saw in that question. If commutation would have the effect of separating the owners of the land from the Church, as he believed it would, he should oppose it on that ground, although he had formerly expressed an opinion in favour of commutation. Of course there were persons in Scotland who objected to compulsory payments for the support of religion; but it appeared to him that those persons were in possession of property bearing legal burthens which they ought in justice to pay, and there surely could be no objection on their part to pay what was really their legal dues. They took their property upon the understanding that they would have to pay them, and why should they be relieved from them? He objected to such a relief being given, and should consequently move the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Sir Graham Montgomery.)

MR. ERNEST NOEL said, he would at once acknowledge that church rates in Scotland were, as a legal matter, on a very different footing from that on which church rates in England had been. In the case of Scotland they were a charge laid upon property, while in England they had been levied upon the individual. But although there was a difference legally, he thought it could be shown that the incidence of the tax became practically the same as it had been in England prior to 1868. So far as church rates were concerned, he would say that since they had been abolished in England, not the slightest difficulty had been found in accomplishing without them all that had formerly been done with them. Indeed greater facilities were found in raising money for Church purposes, and in his opinion, the same result would happen in Scotland. Not only had it been possible in England to do more than could be done when church rates were compulsory, but the sense of irritation and soreness that had existed was at the same time removed, and he believed that the Church of England was really stronger than it had been before those rates were repealed. He would acknowledge at once that church rates in Scotland were assessed upon the land for the building of manses and the building and repairing of churches, and he would also acknowledge that the heritors generally did not wish to be relieved from these charges; but they had heard from the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Sir Graham Montgomery) that the more he inquired into the question the more difficult did he find it to bring about any commutation that would be satisfactory. He (Mr. Noel) ventured, however, to point out to hon. Members who were unacquainted with the subject that, as a tax on the feuars, this assessment fell very heavily, and nearly in the same manner as the old church rates had done in England. A most admirable speech on this subject was delivered by the hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander) last Session. It was a speech that should be read by every hon. Member who wished to become acquainted with this subject. That hon. and gallant Member pointed out to the House distinctly that there were three classes of parishes, and he read a list of parishes where there had been no assessment since the memory of man—or, at all events, for a very long time. He then gave the number of parishes where there was no assessment, or where, at all events, it was not paid by the feuars; he also gave cases in which the feuars were assessed, and he quoted instances of parishes in which there had been no assessment—in some for 60 years, some 20 years, and in some none at all. If these discrepancies existed, it did not appear that this was a charge that could be commuted, but one that ought to be removed altogether. When a man took a piece of land, how could he tell how much it was likely that he would have to pay, when in some parishes there had been no assessment for 60 years, and in some there was none at all? Yet, directly he built upon the land, an assessment might take place, and in the following year he might be called upon to pay 4s. 6d. or 5s. in the pound. When they considered that some of these feus had been used for building manses, he asked, was it a reasonable and a fair thing that a heavy tax, quite an irregular tax, a tax that was so irregular that no reliance could be felt as to whether it would be raised or not—was it fair that such a heavy tax should be placed on the feu, when the sum thus raised might be applied to the building of a manse belonging to a sect different from that which he who paid it belonged? They had been told of the parish of Inveresk, which enjoyed an unenviable notoriety for putting on an assessment, and other instances showed that an absolute want of uniformity existed, and surely it was necessary that they should remove the want of uniformity by taking off the tax forthwith. He thought that in these days they were all agreed upon the general principle that it was not only very unjust, but very unwise to tax persons of one creed for the maintenance of another creed, in which they did not believe, and that such taxes should be at once repealed. This was not like a fixed charge upon property in the way of tithes. A tithe could be estimated, and was estimated, in the purchase of land; its amount was perfectly well known, and could be said to belong to the property. But in this case it was perfectly clear that the charge was, in many instances, falling upon the feuars, so that it could by no means be termed a fixed charge upon property. That it caused a great amount of soreness in Scotland no one could deny, and he asked whether it was wise, in the interest of the Church of Scotland, that it should any longer be maintained? Some might think it was wise, but he ventured to say that no wise statesman would resolve to continue it. Although he would admit that the hon. Member for Edinburgh was not looked upon as a friend to the Established Church, yet he (Mr. Noel) thought that by the passing of this measure that Church would receive a real accession of strength. Both as a religious body and a Christian Church it would find itself much stronger should the feuars be relieved from the burdens imposed upon them.

MR. MARK STEWART said, he could not endorse the principle of the Bill, which he believed was framed in the interests of a comparatively small number of people; but he was ready to admit that there were cases of grievances which ought to be remedied, in some parts of Scotland, and more especially in the Orkney Islands. His own experience, moreover, convinced him that in the majority of cases the Church authorities showed no disposition to impose the rate on people who objected to it. But to say that they were to entirely remove an impost which had been for many years on the land of Scotland, merely to alleviate the evils complained of by a few persons, was a matter which he did not think the House of Commons would sanction. The hon. Member for Edinburgh had said that the Church of Scotland embraced only two-fifths of the people; but he (Mr. Stewart) differed from that statement, and thought there were more people connected with the Established Church than the hon. Member seemed to think. He should like to quote a few statistics. According to the Return of the Registrar General, 82·02 per cent of the people of Scotland were married by the clergy of the three leading Presbyterian Churches. In 1870—the last year, he believed, for which Returns were published—the numbers were 44·76 per cent in the Church Scotland, 22·91 in the Free Church, and 14·35 in the United Presbyterian Church. Then, as regarded education, the Commissioners in their Report for 1867 showed a Church connection of about 2,000,000 out of the 3,000,000 of the population of Scotland, or 81·3 per cent, connected with these three Churches, of which 44·4 per cent were Church of Scotland, 26·1 the Free Church, 10·7 the United Presbyterian, and 10 per cent were unclassified. In the Return given to the General Assembly, in May, 1874, of the adherents of the various Churches, out of a population of 1,704,837 embraced in the Return, 813,149, or 47·7 per cent, belonged to the Established Church. As to the number of communicants, he was speaking from memory, but he believed that in 1871 there were something like 436,000 belonging to the Established Church, 285,300 to the Free Church, and 165,000 to the United Presbyterian. These figures showed that the Established Church was much stronger than the hon. Member wished to make out. As regarded the Bill, he would repeat that he was perfectly ready to relieve the grievances which were justly complained of, but he was not prepared to give into the hands of the heritors that money, the payment of which they did not at present grudge. They should recollect that the Established Church possessed 1,160 churches throughout the country, and they should also recollect that the present incumbents of parishes had taken their livings believing that their manse, churchyard, and churches would be properly kept up but, if the Bill passed, they would leave those incumbents in a difficult position. That was not a proper thing to do, especially at a time when they were promised a Bill by the Government. As grievances did exist, however, he would willingly give what assistance he could to the settlement of the question on an equitable footing, and he had no hesitation in believing that the Lord Advocate was sincere in his intention to deal with this subject, and therefore he should vote against the Bill.

MR. VANS AGNEW said, he was unwilling that the House should go to a division on the Bill, because they were aware that the Lord Advocate had promised to deal with the subject. He was quite ready to remedy any legitimate grievance which might be complained of, but he could not agree with the remedy proposed in the Bill, and he would therefore rather wait for the measure of his right hon. and learned Friend. He believed his right hon. and learned Friend intended to settle the question not perhaps, entirely in accordance with the wishes of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, but in a manner satisfactory to Scotland generally. He admitted that there existed some hardships with reference to the feuars, and they were all anxious that they should be removed, though not in the manner proposed by the hon. Member for Edinburgh—namely by the total abolition of what he termed church rates. He would not enter at length into the question, but he would point out that church assessments in Scotland were not the same thing as church rates in England; they were, in fact, more like the tithes than church rates. He thought it would be very much better if they tried to lay their heads together and come to some understanding which would be a practical settlement of the question. He hoped his right hon. and learned Friend would be able to give some pledge that he would be able to bring in a Bill which would settle the matter, and he hoped the House would not be called upon to express an opinion upon the subject then. To abolish the charge according to the terms of the Bill would be to rob the Church of the value of these assessments and put the money into the pockets of the heritors who did not ask for it. It was not the original intention of the law that these feuars should be assessed, and what he would suggest was, that they should revert to the original intention of the law, and let the tax fall upon the land, and if the land had been feued, let the feuar pay upon the ground rent and not upon the houses. If the hon. Member for Edinburgh would accept this settlement, he would get a great deal of what he asked for, and he believed it would remove the grievance which he admitted was at present complained of.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he was of opinion that the Bill was one which it would be best to leave in the hands of the Government. Indeed, it ought not to be dealt with by a private Member at all.

MR. M'LAREN gave Notice that on an early day he would again bring the Bill forward.

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL (MINOR CANONRIES) BILL.—(No. 60.)

(The Lord Bishop of London.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

3 M

THE BISHOP OF LONDON, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that the direct purpose of the Bill was to extend the provisions 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, so as to authorize certain arrangements with reference to the minor canonries in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul; and next to secure the efficient performance of the cathedral services by the appointment to the office of minor canon of men thoroughly competent to perform the duties. The 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, provided that after the passing of that Act there should not be more than six, nor fewer than two minor canons in each cathedral and collegiate church. At that time the minor canons of St. Paul's were 12 in number, and were a body incorporate by a Royal Charter. For this reason, and because no power was given by the Act to deal with the estates of minor corporations, no regulations had been made pursuant to the Act for limiting the number and fixing the emoluments of the minor canons; but excepting as to the last two the vacancies of their canonries had been from time to time filled up. But doubts having arisen as to the legality of these appointments, the Bill had been introduced to remedy the inconveniences that had arisen. It provided that all past appointments to minor canonries were confirmed, and the right of existing minor canonries preserved: it limited the appointment of future minor canons until the number was reduced to six, which was hereafter to be the establishment: they were to continue a body corporate under the old style, and the corporate property was to vest in the corporation. The separate estates of the minor canons were, as they became vacant, to vest in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for the purpose of their "common fund." The Ecclesiastical Commissioners, on the other hand, were to provide residences for the six minor canons, and were authorized to prepare schemes for regulating the office and duties of minor canons, for their residence, and for their enforced retirement on pension when no longer able to perform their duties. It was to this last provision he referred when he spoke of the Bill as intended to provide for a more efficient performance of the services of the cathedral church. Under the existing arrangements, the minor canons were not compelled and had no inducement to retire when disabled by age or other circumstances from the efficient performance of their duties. The consequence was that they sometimes continued to hold their appointments long after their retirement had become desirable. In fact, the senior minor canon—a venerable gentleman in every sense of the word—was now 94 years of age. He wished to speak with every respect of the minor canons, and the only fault he could find in them was their tendency to grow old, which was not an uncommon or unpardonable weakness: but when minor canons became old they were no longer able to sing. Three of them at St. Paul's were laid up from various causes; it was more than half-a-century since the senior minor canon had performed service in the cathedral church; another of the minor canons was 70 years of age, and two others were almost entirely incapable of discharging their duties. This condition of affairs would not be desirable at a cathedral in a small city, but it was still less tolerable at St. Paul's, which could no longer be accused of being useless, and was devoted to a most important part of the spiritual work of the present day. On Sunday, besides the early service, which was not choral, there were three full services, attended by congregations varying from 1,000 to 6,000 or 7,000 persons. The week-day services were well attended; while classes and lectures had been established for young men, who formed a large proportion of the residents in the City, as well as lectures for the younger clergy. It was not surprising, therefore, that the Dean and Chapter should ask Parliament, as they did by this Bill, to give them the means for providing for a succession of competent, able minor canons, in order that the services might be made as efficient as possible, and that there might be a body of clergy ready to assist in all the other work of the diocese. He might add that the minor canons were themselves anxious for the proposed change—and in fact they might well be, for they would be secured in all their present rights and privileges, while all future minor canons would on appointment be entitled to an income of not less than £300 a-year with a residence; and when the number was reduced to six, each would receive an annual stipend of £400. The Bill provided that no benefice could hereafter be held with the minor canonry; but probably no grievance would be felt by any clergyman from the loss of his canonry on being appointed to a better benefice. The right rev. Prelate concluded by moving that the Bill be now read the second time.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

ACT (1873) AMENDMENT (No. 2)

BILL.—(No. 66.)

(The Lord Chancellor.)

REPORT OF THE AMENDMENTS.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

LORD SELBORNE said, that the peculiar circumstances under which the Bill had been brought in, and also the peculiar character of the Bill itself, had naturally prevented discussion on its previous stages, either of the questions involved in the clauses, or of the still larger questions which were opened by the Bill as a whole. He, and those who thought with him, believed that they sufficiently discharged their duty to the House and the country by merely saying Not-Content to the leading provisions of the Bill, without asking their Lordships to divide against them; but they never would have reconciled themselves to that course, if they had not anticipated that there would be a fitting opportunity for stating their view of the principles involved in this measure;—because the questions which it opened, whether as a merely provisional measure, or as one which might influence permanent legislation on the subject, were, in his opinion, such that—especially after the experience of the last two years—there were very cogent reasons why their Lordships should not part with the Bill before there had been a full discussion upon it. Their Lordships knew that the opportunities which had been expected for a discussion of the subject with which the Bill dealt had been suddenly and unexpectedly lost to the House; and that circumstance made it important that the present occasion should be made use of, for contributing suggestions which might be taken into further consideration when this question might again be occupying the attention of Her Majesty's Government, or of that House, or of the country. For himself, he did most heartily desire that, in the interval which would elapse before the subject was again brought under the notice of their Lordships, the country at large should have its attention directed to it and to the great interest which all classes of Her Majesty's subjects had in its being settled on sound principles. With this object in view, he would pass in review, first of all, the arrangements of the Act of 1873, which the present Bill suspended; next, the modifications of those arrangements which were proposed to their Lordships last year and in the early part of the present Session, and, so far as their Lordships knew, not relinquished without regret by Her Majesty's Government; and, lastly, the manner in which the present plan would operate as a provisional measure during the year while the question of the Final Court of Appeal was in suspense, and what its operation would be if it were made the basis of a permanent scheme. He held now, as he held in 1873, that the good and sound working of our altered system of judicature must depend, if not entirely, at all events mainly, upon the constitution and the working of the Court of Appeal. He was, therefore, bound to admit that if the appellate arrangements of the measure of 1873 were not what they ought to have been, it was important that there should be a re-arrangement; but, at the same time, he must say that the more consideration he had been able to give to the matter the more had he become convinced that the arrangement made for appeals in the Act of 1873 was not only good in itself, but better than anything which had been since proposed, or that was likely to be proposed, as a substitute for that plan. When framing the Act of 1873, he did so with the conviction that to have a large number of highly-qualified Judges available for the business of the Court of Appeal was one of the most important requisites of a sound judicial system. Accordingly, the Act provided that the ordinary Judges should, in the first instance, at all events, be nine in number. In addition to those, there were five ex officio Members of the Court of Appeal, who were also to be the heads of the different Divisions of the High Court—namely, the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice of England, the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, the Lord Chief Baron, and the Master of the Rolls. The Lord Chancellor was to be the head of the whole system. Of the ordinary Judges, four were to be taken from the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council by virtue of the powers given in the Act appointing four paid Members of that Committee; two others were to be the present Lords Justices, and three were to be nominated by the Crown. He thought it must be admitted that those materials must go far to constitute a strong Court of Appeal. But in addition to these elements, which were fixed in number, there was another which he had always regarded as one of great importance. It was the element composed of such retired Lord Chancellors and Judges of Her Majesty's Courts as, being selected by Her Majesty, might express their willingness to serve in the Court of Appeal. That provision, if acted on, would practically contribute to the Court of Appeal the same Judges who now administered justice in their Lordships' House, and also the effective unpaid members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. In that element he should have hoped to see included such men as his noble and learned Friend, with whom he had the misfortune to differ on this Appellate question (Lord Penzance), and Sir Henry Keating, who was at present giving his assistance to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. With such materials, he thought they would have a Court as strong as imagination could conceive in respect of knowledge and experience both of Equity and of Common Law; and the whole strength of that Court would have been available for all the Appellate business of England, if the Act of 1873 had been allowed to come into operation in its integrity. If authority were wanted in support of that view, it might be found in the published opinion of the Lord Chief Justice, whose opinion on all subjects was of great weight and value, but on this question of especial value, not only because of his experience and eminent qualities, but also because of the close attention which he had given to the question in 1870 and 1871, during which years the Lord

Chief Justice was one of the most jealous critics of the proposals which were then made to their Lordships' House. The Lord Chief Justice favoured the country in those two consecutive years with the expression of his opinion on the subject; and the conclusion at which he arrived, after the best consideration he could give the matter, was that there should be only one Court of Appeal, and that it should consist of the materials which had just been described to their Lordships, and which in the Act of 1873 constituted the Appellate portion of the Supreme Court; with this exception—that the Lord Chief Justice then suggested that there should be four, and not nine ordinary Judges. He did not know whether, when suggesting that number, his Lordship contemplated that the Privy Council Appeals would not be heard by the new Court, or whether his Lordship might have counted more than he himself had thought it safe to do upon the constant attendance of some of the ex-officio Members. For the present he postponed the question of the appeals from Scotland and Ireland, and also the question of the Privy Council appeals—what he wished now to bring under their Lordships' special consideration was, the enormous importance of giving the strongest possible constitution to the Court which was to hear the first appeals. He used the term "first appeals" on the supposition that there might be a second appeal. At present, first appeals constituted the great mass of the Appellate business of the country. It would be an error to suppose that the further appeals which came to their Lordships' House generally represented business of special legal importance. It was quite true that important cases, in respect of which great difference of opinion existed, or in which large interests were at stake, would from time to time be brought to the Court of Final Appeal, whatever that Court might be; but from his long experience at the Bar of the House, and his more limited experience as one of the Law Lords, he believed that by far the greater number of appeals to their Lordships' House did not involve very important questions, either as regarded points of law or as to the value of the property involved in the decision. But what was the number of appeals brought to the First Court of Appeal, and what was the number brought to that Final Court, their Lordships' House? Taking the year 1873—a year in which there were a greater number of appeals in their Lordships' House than there were this last year—he found by the judicial statistics for 1873 that in that year the number of errors and appeals disposed of by the Court of Exchequer Chamber was 51; the number disposed of in Chancery, including Bankruptcy appeals, was 189; and the Admiralty appeals which went to the Privy Council were 13. Those figures gave a total of 202 cases from the English Courts to the First Courts of Appeal. On the other hand, in the same year, the whole number of errors and appeals disposed of in the House of Lords was 32. That was the proportion—32 to 202; and that proportion was, he believed, quite as true in respect of the importance and value, and as to the legal questions involved in the litigation, as it was with respect to the mere number of cases. There could be no doubt, therefore, that the law was mainly built up by the decisions of the Court of First Appeal, and consequently the constitution of that Court and the operations of that Court were of the greatest importance. If that were so under the existing system of judicature, he asked their Lordships how much more must it be so under the system introduced by the Judicature Act, in the carrying out of which system all the branches of the Supreme Court and all the Judges were to administer Equity as well as Law? He quite agreed with his noble and learned Friend Lord Coleridge, and he had himself always said, that it was an error to talk of the fusion of Law and Equity—the true expression was a “fusion of the administration” of Law and Equity. When framing the Act of 1873, he gave full credit to the Judges of this country for capacity to administer the new system; but, at the same time, he was perfectly conscious that in the first working of it a great number of questions in Law and in Equity must arise, which would necessarily lead to frequent recourse to the Court of Appeal. An efficient Court of First Appeal was, therefore, essential—one capable of grappling with all questions of Law or of Equity, and with all questions relating to the working of the Supreme Court. For the discharge of such a duty, the Appeal

Court constituted by the Act of 1873 was well qualified. Well, having regard to the amount of business which that Court would have had to discharge, he had thought it necessary that it should be capable of being sub-divided, and sit in two, or perhaps three Divisions. He was still convinced that with the amount of business likely to arise under the Judicature Act, it would be impossible to prevent arrears, unless the Court were able to sit in Divisions, and did so. Some persons thought that to have a Court of Appeal sitting in Divisions might result in conflicting decisions and a confusion as to the state of the law. That objection was not consistent with his experience, and in these matters one grain of fact was worth an ounce of theory. There was no difference, in this respect, between having a Court of three Judges sitting in one room and a Court of three sitting in another room and exercising Appellate Jurisdiction at the same time, and having a Court of one set of three Judges sitting to-day and a Court of another set of three other Judges sitting to-morrow and hearing appeals. The system would not be at all like that of the present Court of Exchequer Chamber: you would not have the same Judges continually sitting together elsewhere as members of a particular Court, by the traditions or prevailing views of which they might be, or supposed to be, in some cases, biassed. You would have had, in principle, the same state of things which was now found in their Lordships' House and in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. It might, for instance, and it did sometimes happen, that on one day three Law Lords—say, his noble and learned Friends Lord Chelmsford, Lord Penzance, and Lord O'Hagan—might sit to hear appeals, and on the next day three others—say, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Hatherley, and himself. And this happened without any inconvenience, because the Law Lords in that House and the Members of the Judicial Committee were not persons who continually sat together or who were sorted in classes. As he understood the proposal of his noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor) it was intended that the ordinary Members of his Court of Appeal should sit three at a time. His noble and learned Friend seemed to contemplate that only three would sit at a time; so that some of them might always be free, this relaxation being taken by the Judges in turn. Experience, he thought, showed that there would be no inconvenience, but might often be a great practical convenience in adding to the numerical power of a Court of Appeal, and therefore he must express his opinion against the Rule of Three in this matter, which his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack told them on a former occasion had been favoured by the late Lord Kingsdown. That noble and learned Lord appeared to have held that three Judges were the best number for a Court of Appeal. For the ordinary business of appeal three might do, and in the Act of 1873 he (Lord Selborne) himself proceeded on that principle; but in cases of great importance, on which judicial minds had differed, he thought that five Judges at least were desirable as an Appellate tribunal. He now proposed to show that, in the Act of 1873, the principle of a rehearing, or what some noble Lords liked to call a second appeal, was not overlooked. He retained to the full all the opinions which he formerly expressed on that subject, and he took the liberty of now vindicating the arrangement for rehearings made in the Act of 1873. Section 53 of that Act was in these terms—

“Every appeal to the Court of Appeal shall be heard and determined, either by the whole Court or by a divisional Court consisting of any number, not less than three, of the Judges thereof. Any number of such divisional Courts may sit at the same time. Any appeal, which for any reason may be deemed fit to be re-argued before decision, or to be re-heard before final judgment, may be so re-argued or re-heard before a greater number of Judges, if the Court of Appeal think fit to direct.”

The meaning of that was, that, in cases in which there was a difference among the Appeal Judges, or in which their decision would reverse on important points the opinions of other Judges, or in which there were serious questions of law or great interests at stake, the Court would have power to order a rehearing before a greater number of Judges. His noble and learned Friend (Lord Penzance) the other day had represented that as a provision for a second hearing “when the Court wished for it.” The correct way of putting it was, that it was a provision for a second hearing where the Court gave leave for it. The parties, who desired it, would in all cases make the application; and he had not the slightest doubt that under such a provision the second hearing would have been granted in all cases in which it ought to be granted; and his only doubt in respect of it was, whether it might not have thrown an invidious duty on the Judges in some cases. He had no doubt, that the interest of the public and the suitors would be much better promoted by such a system, than by establishing the right to a second appeal, as a general rule—a principle which seemed to be so strongly favoured by some of their Lordships? That was not now and never had been the law. The fact was, that there were great inconsistencies and discrepancies in the present state of the law as regarded appeals. There was no such thing now as an obligation on any one appealing from the Court of Chancery in England to bring his case to any Court of Intermediate Appeal. From one of the Chancery Courts a suitor might go, and not unfrequently did go, direct to their Lordships' House, and thus deprive the other party—who might have succeeded in the Court of Chancery, but might fail in this House—of a second appeal. The late Lord St. Leonards remarked that not a few decisions had been pronounced by their Lordships' House which were open to much criticism; and it was said to be the opinion of the Profession that if there had been a further appeal from their Lordships' House to some other tribunal, some at least of those decisions of their Lordships would probably have been reversed. Again, from the Court of Admiralty there was but one appeal, which was to the Privy Council. He did not refer to these things as if it were an advantage to have discrepancies in the law as regarded appeals—he referred to them because, in practice, no one had been dissatisfied with the finality of one appeal, when the law made it final. Suitors never cried out and complained that they were unjustly dealt with, because they had not another appeal in those cases. The real truth was, that in the great majority of cases finality was the greatest boon you could give to suitors. The system established by the Act of 1873 had these great merits, above every other which had yet been proposed:—it was the best for maintaining the authority of the Court;

it interfered least with its available strength; it would have worked rapidly, easily, and cheaply; it gave the least opportunity for excessive litigation and oppressive costs. He ventured to say that all these objects were accomplished by the Bill of 1873 in a degree and in a way in which they could not be accomplished by any other system. He was speaking now of the Appellate Court and of the regulation which provided that the rehearing should be by a greater number of the same Court of Appeal. Their Lordships would permit him to remind them of the reasons which, so far as they were stated by him, satisfied them in 1873. On the 13th of February of that year, in introducing the Bill, he said—

“If you have a good Court with sufficient judicial power to command the confidence of the country, it is better that there should be no double appeal. I would not exclude the power, where you have an appeal heard by a small number of Judges, of having it reconsidered by a larger number of Judges. But my opinion is that, if you establish an adequate Court, it is desirable for the parties, and for the general interest of the country that the decision of that Court should be final, and that you should not multiply appeals. You never can escape, by going through any number of Courts of Appeal, from the risk of differences of opinion in each and every one of them, and from doubts arising as to whether the last Court decided better than those before it. What you want is to make as good a Court as possible, and to give it all the power and authority you can, and that in my humble judgment, is best accomplished by making it final.”—[3 Hansard, ccxiv. 350.]

He begged their Lordships to notice how the two first objects—the maintenance of the authority of the Court and the utilization of its whole available strength for all purposes for which that strength might be useful, were accomplished by the Act of 1873. They had not half of the Judges to do a small part only of the business—to dispose of 32 appeals instead of 202; but every one of them was available for every part of the business; and by enabling a re-hearing to be taken before a greater number, they at the same time secured the necessary amount of authority for the careful consideration of all such cases as required rehearing. It was, in his view, no objection to that system that the final decision or rehearing would be by Judges some of whom at other times sat in other Divisions of the Court and had themselves pronounced other judgments which might also be the subject of re-hearing by a greater number; because that happened now, and it did not interfere in any way with the authority of the Final Court. He himself and his noble and learned Friends (Lord Hatherley and the Lord Chancellor) had pronounced judgments which had been appealed from to their Lordships' House; and though they might not, in these cases, have followed the example which some of their Predecessors—probably of necessity—had set, of deciding on appeals from themselves, they sat on the very next day to decide on other appeals with others to assist them. So far from thinking there was a disadvantage in such a circulation of Judges, he thought there would be a very great advantage, because in that way a greater amount of business would be transacted by each of them, their experience would be derived from a larger area, and there would not be the same danger of falling into a narrow groove, or getting into possible habits of negligence, which might arise from dealing with business of a more limited quantity or kind. He would now ask their Lordships to consider how the Court proposed by the present Bill would be constituted, in these respects, as compared with the Court established by the Bill of 1873. His noble and learned Friend took out of the Court which would transact the greatest amount of business, which would deal with the far larger amount of property and the vast majority of suitors, some of its most important Members, and by so doing greatly weakened it: he at the same time ran the risk of weakening the Courts of First Instance, and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—which was still to continue—so far as he relied on the regular services of Judges who had also duties to discharge in those other Courts. Then there were those two other considerations which in point of importance could not be exaggerated—namely, that the Court of Appeal should be easily accessible and expeditious, and that there should be as little burden of costs thrown upon the suitor as possible. Of all the evils of the present system, none was greater than the enormous power which it gave to the largest purse. Was there no substantial difference in these respects between a rehearing such as was proposed by the Act of 1873 and a second appeal? In the first place, under the Judicature Act of 1873, in the 48th and the following Rules of the Schedule, and the 58th order of the Schedule to the present Bill, regulations were laid down for the conduct of appeals, of such a nature that greater facilities and expedition would be afforded than had ever hitherto been done, and thereby the costs would be proportionately diminished. But those advantages would be lost if the rehearing were taken to their Lordships' House or to another place. Some light would be thrown on those points by a Return of certain costs which he moved for not long since, and which had been laid on the Table. His object in moving for that Return was to enable their Lordships to compare the cost of appeals in the Court of Chancery with the costs of appeals to their Lordships' House. The Return contained only three cases, in which such a direct comparison could be made: but the other cases—to which he would refer by the numbers affixed to them in the Return—were also examples of the great expense of appeals to this House. Cases 4, 7, 10, 11, and 12, were, he could say, from his own recollection, of quite an ordinary character, in each of which there was only a single respondent. The average cost of these five appeals was £491 8s. 9d. There was another case (No. 5) which was also of an ordinary description, except that there happened to be three respondents—the costs which their Lordships' House adjudged to those three respondents against the appellant were £1,121 8s. 2d. With regard to the three cases which afforded materials for a direct comparison, No. 12 was an ordinary case, quite as simple as the common run of Chancery cases, and the costs, taxed even as between solicitor and client, in the Court of Appeal in Chancery, were £191 11s. 8d. The costs given in their Lordships' House to the successful party were £587 10s. 9d., taxed as between party and party—a difference of about £400 more in the House of Lords. Nos. 6 and 15 were heavy cases, with one respondent in each. The costs of the appeal of No. 6 in Chancery were £780 3s. 4d., and of the appeal to that House £1,248 15s. 9d. In No. 15, the costs of the appeal in Chancery were £509 14s. 2d.; but in the House of Lords they were £1,248 5s. 7d., being a difference of

£738. This was not a trifling matter, and he thought their Lordships must be satisfied that the suitors had a great interest indeed in the substitution of a system which would avoid these ruinous expenses. The promptitude with which a second hearing by a greater number of the same Court could take place was also a great advantage in those cases where there ought to be a second appeal, and a still greater incidental advantage in preventing frivolous appeals. Having said so much in favour of the scheme of 1873, he would observe that there were some variations of that scheme proposed by the Bill of 1874, in which he had acquiesced, and he acquiesced for several reasons. He did so principally because he did not wish to throw difficulties in the way of the noble and learned Lord now on the Woolsack, when following up and completing the work of 1873, and for other reasons also, which he would now state. Under the Act of 1873 there would have been the advantage of discouraging unnecessary and frivolous rehearings: but, on the other hand, he was not insensible to the existence of some real force in the objection to throwing upon the Court the responsibility of saying whether there should or should not be any rehearing, in each particular case. When, therefore, his noble and learned Friend thought it better to establish the right to have an appeal reheard, if it were desired, before final judgment—for that was his proposal—in certain defined cases—being in substance the same which he himself had in view as likely to be proper cases for rehearing—he had no difficulty in accepting that change. The other change was that which proposed to fix the manner in which the rehearing of English appeals, and also the hearing of Scotch and Irish cases, should take place before what his noble and learned Friend then called the First Divisional Court of the Court of Appeal. About this he felt much greater difficulty, though a difficulty, rather of sentiment than of a practical kind. He believed that change might, in practice, have worked as well as, though not better than, the plan of 1873. The objection to it was that it might appear to constitute, from time to time, some inequality of position as between the different members of the Court of Appeal. He still felt it was a weak point in that scheme that it did constitute some difference in the position of the members of the Court, and he confessed in that respect he preferred the Act of 1873. But there were certain other provisions which the noble and learned Lord introduced into that Bill which more than anything else tended to reconcile him to that proposal:—a proposal for which there was, at least, one very substantial reason—namely, that it was made in connection with, and mainly for the purposes of, the transfer of Scotch and Irish appeals in the new Court. If their Lordships would refer either to the Bill of 1874, or to the corresponding provisions in the now abandoned Bill of the present Session, they would see that, so far as the available strength of the Court was concerned, it was as completely preserved by those two Bills as by the Act of 1873, and the essential unity of the Court was preserved also. If they referred to the Bill of 1874 they would find, that subsections 5 and 7 of section 15 enabled Judges of the Court of Appeal, not belonging to the First Division, to sit in that Division under the authority of the Crown or the Lord Chancellor, in case of need; and it was expressly provided that—

so that the whole strength of the First Divisional Court was available for all the business of the whole Court of Appeal. Then the 16th section was exactly like the provision of the Act of 1873—

“An arrangement for re-hearing any appeal before the First Divisional Court of Appeal shall provide that such re-hearing shall take place before any judgment, decree, or order made on such appeal is registered, passed, or entered.”

He thought he was warranted in saying that, under these circumstances, the changes in which he had acquiesced last year were mere modifications in detail of the Act of 1873. It now became necessary for him to make some observations upon the Court of Intermediate Appeal, which would be established—he hoped only provisionally—by the present measure. He confessed he had the greatest possible misgiving as to the sufficiency of the strength of the Court as it was proposed to be constituted, and he deplored the exclusion from that

Court of such elements as the Lord Chancellor, when sitting in that House, and the other Members of their Lordships' House who had filled high judicial positions. When the Bill was in Committee, he stated his concurrence with his noble and learned Friend upon one point, as to the mere construction of the Act under which the four Judges of the Judicial Committee were appointed. He did not see his way to the conclusion, that the Supreme Court of Appellate Jurisdiction, contemplated by that Act, must necessarily be one, from which there could be no further appeal. But a more serious difficulty—though one which might, of course, be removed by the consent of the Judges concerned—was, that the Act in question certainly did not appear to contemplate, that new duties should be imposed on some of these four Judges, which would not be shared by them all. And as long as the functions of the Judicial Committee continued, the first and primary duty of all the four, under that Act, must necessarily be to the suitors before that Tribunal. In 1873, when it was proposed that power should be given to the Queen to transfer the appeals before the Privy Council to the new Court, he said this—

“If Her Majesty should exercise the power which I shall ask the House to confer upon her, all the other judicial business of the Privy Council would be transferred to the new Court of Appeal. It is convenient it should be so; because if we are to have the services of these four Judges appointed for the business of the Court of Appeal, it is manifest we must provide, in the first instance, for the discharge by them of those duties for which they were especially appointed to the Judicial Committee, and the two systems will be most conveniently combined if we have the whole business brought together.”—[3 Hansard, ccciv. 358.]

With regard to the ex-officio Members, his noble and learned Friend had expressed his belief that each of them would be able to devote six weeks in the year to the Court of Appeal. Though glad, he was surprised to hear that statement; because a rumour had reached him that some of the heads of the Common Law Courts were of opinion that the pressure of business upon them was so great that any diminution of the strength of those Courts would interfere materially with the conduct of their ordinary business. The energetic Master of the Rolls might possibly get through his own work, and have six weeks to spare for the Court of Appeal; but he should not have ventured to expect that this could be the case with all the other Judges. Besides, it might fairly be expected that the Appellate business would very largely increase during the early years of the working of the Act—especially as in all the Courts interlocutory orders would now be subject to appeal. As a permanent scheme he could not expect it to work well, and in the first year the difficulties would be particularly numerous. He would say no more as to the present Bill, which was admitted to be provisional for one year only:—in another Session, he understood his noble and learned Friend to say, they would have before them the alternative, either to adhere to the Act of 1873, with such modifications as were consistent with its principle, or to constitute some other final Court of Appeal. For his own part, he could certainly see no reason whatever why the Act of 1873 should not have at least a full trial. As far as Ireland and Scotland were concerned, he adhered to the opinions he expressed when that Act was under consideration. The fact that the Irish Act of Union contained a clause which made it proper that changes as to Irish appeals should not be made without the consent of the Irish people, or those who could speak on their behalf, was no reason why Parliament should be precluded from making any arrangement which might be for the advantage of England, as to English appeals. The Irish Courts—if the Irish people were indeed so much attached to the right of appeal to the House of Lords—must do their work remarkably well, judging by the number of appeals which had come during the present year from the different parts of the United Kingdom. There were 21 English appeals, 15 Scotch appeals, and only three from Ireland. As for Scotland, there was no clause in the Act of Union with that country about the jurisdiction of the House of Lords. There was only a clause providing that the Courts at Westminster Hall should not have cognizance of Scotch appeals. He should be well content to carry on the Irish and Scotch appeals as at present: still believing, that when the new Court of Appeal was established and in operation for England, it would not be long before the people of Scotland and Ireland would again express their desire to be brought into the same system. If the arrangement of 1873 were not in the end to be maintained, he should very much like to foresee what was to be done with the Ecclesiastical, the Indian, and the Colonial appeals. Political considerations might be imported into the question. The Colonies, for example, might entertain some objection to the transfer of their appeals to the House of Lords without their consent. As to Ecclesiastical appeals, he was not sanguine of perfect contentment resulting from any arrangement which had been or which could be made; and this being so, he thought the safest course would be to abide by our present arrangements, which had been supposed to be likely to be treated with more respect by some of the clergy, than had been shown to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Any Court, which consisted of, or included, paid Judges who were not Peers, and which sat in the Parliamentary Recess, when the House of Lords did not sit, could not possibly be the House of Lords; it would be just as much a new Parliamentary Court as that which was created by the Act of 1873. To call such a new Court the House of Lords would be nothing less than ridiculous. Their Lordships would add nothing to their own dignity, or to the dignity of the Court, by endeavouring to transfer to it by Act of Parliament the historical prestige of the existing tribunal. That tribunal, whatever might be its merits or defects, stood on historical foundations; whereas this new tribunal would be as much the creature of an Act of Parliament and would be as totally different from their Lordships' House as was the Court constituted by the Act of 1873. He had made these remarks because he looked upon the subject as one of momentous importance. No necessity had been shown for hastily deciding to overturn what was done two years ago. There was yet time for the country, through all its organs of opinion, to address itself seriously to the consideration of what would most conduce to the public interest in this matter; and when he spoke of the country he, of course, intended to include Scotland and Ireland. There was yet time to re-consider this question; and, so far as Scotland was concerned, he would mention one fact, that The Scotsman newspaper—which he ventured to say expressed the opinions entertained by a large part of the people of Scotland—and, in his judgment, hardly any newspaper in the kingdom was more ably conducted—was in favour of the Act of 1873, and of its extension to Scotland. He did not believe there was either in Scotland or in Ireland such a unanimity of opinion as ought to stand in the way of any settlement which might after grave consideration be deemed the best. All he desired was, that, whatever conclusion was arrived at it should be good in itself and conducive to the administration of justice. It could not be for the public interest that the decisions of Parliament upon questions of that great magnitude, whatever they might be, should be constantly disturbed. If his noble and learned Friend made any proposition which might commend itself to their Lordships and to the other House of Parliament, even though it might not be one that would commend itself to his (Lord Selborne's) own judgment, yet if in practice it should be found conducive to the due administration of justice he would not be the man afterwards to attempt again to disturb it.

LORD PENZANCE said, he did not think that it was a convenient thing to discuss the question of the Appellate jurisdiction of this country without any definite plan being before the House. His noble and learned Friend had indicated a Court of his own construction, and then told them that it was not the House of Lords. He admitted it; but the question which was to be discussed was whether the House, preserving its immemorial jurisdiction, might not be so improved in its judicial character as to become an efficient Appellate Tribunal for the Empire. The question of the Court of Ultimate Appeal was an open question, and as the consideration of that question had been relegated to next Session he would not now deal with it. He quite agreed with his noble and learned Friend that the costs of appeals to that House of Lords were considerable, and that the matter required to be looked to; but meanwhile he thought that they might be reduced if by a Standing Order the printed matter used in connection with the appeal cases in the Court below might also be used before that House and only reasonable fees allowed on taxation. Their Lordships were aware that the larger portion of the law of this country was what was called judge-made law. No Court reversed its own decision; therefore, as soon as the Court of Ultimate Appeal pronounced its decision upon a question the law on that subject was fixed, subject, of course, to an Act of Parliament. With regard to points of a novel character, the course frequently taken was this:—The Court of the First Instance decided one way on a question of that kind; the losing party did not ask for a re-hearing; but in the course of time the same question was raised in another case, and it was then submitted to the Intermediate Court of Appeal, which enunciated a general principle in deciding the case. As time went on the Judges began to see that the principle laid down by the Intermediate Court of Appeal could not be maintained, and they therefore threw doubts on the decision of that Court. Finally, after the matter had been considered by the Judges, and they were ripe for a decision, the question came by appeal to the House of Lords, where the matter was settled once for all. The only escape from a decision of that House was an Act of Parliament.

LORD HATHERLEY did not agree that this was not the proper occasion for discussing the question what should be the Ultimate Court of Appeal, because that question had been settled by an Act of Parliament, to suspend the action of which this Bill had been brought in. A case that ought to be re-heard he was of opinion should be re-heard before a larger number of Judges than when it was heard in the first instance. In the Court of Chancery it was not uncommon, when a cause had been heard by the Master of the Rolls or by one of the Vice Chancellors, for the appeal to be taken at once to the House of Lords without first going either to the Lords Justices or the Lord Chancellor. The reason for this was that the suitor wished to appeal to a more numerous tribunal, and to bring fresh minds to bear upon the law of the case. The result, however, frequently had been that the House of Lords, sitting as a Final Court, consisted of one noble and learned Lord and two lay Peers, which last, if the hearing continued for any length of time, were not always the same on successive days. Even in cases where there had been an intermediate appeal in Chancery, the final appeal had been, in many cases, from a noble and learned Lord sitting in Lincoln's Inn to the same noble and learned Lord sitting in the House of Lords at Westminster. The question was one in reference to which the public mind ought in the first place to be informed, and in the second to make its wishes clearly known. This could, in his view of the matter, be better done by a full discussion in their Lordships' House than by taking the opinions either of the solicitors or counsel who were professionally interested. As an instance of the inconvenience resulting from the present state of things he might mention that some years ago a Master in Chancery gave a decision of great importance, affecting many thousands of people, as to whether a provisional director of a joint-stock company committed himself to the position of a shareholder. This decision was reversed by one of the Vice Chancellors, and afterwards reversed again by one noble and learned Lord, an ex-Lord Chancellor, sitting with two lay Lords as the Final Court of Appeal in the House of Lords. The question was one which it was important finally to settle; but, as a matter of fact, the House of Lords subsequently pronounced a totally opposite decision upon a precisely similar set of facts. He thought it must be clear, therefore, that the House of Lords, as at present constituted, could not be regarded as a satisfactory Court of Final Appeal; and, in his opinion, a satisfactory Court of Final Appeal could only be settled in some such manner as was indicated in the measure introduced by his noble and learned Friend (Lord Selborne). Under such circumstances as were proposed by his noble and learned Friend (Lord Penzance) the final jurisdiction would not rest with the House of Lords, but with a new tribunal sitting in their Lordships' Chamber; and he could not think that with the real transference of a jurisdiction which would make the tribunal as a House of Lords only nominal, it would in the slightest degree add to the dignity of their Lordships' House.

LORD REDESDALE protested against the assumption that no improvement could be made in the constitution of the House of Lords for the hearing of appeals. He believed they could effect a very great improvement in it, and at the same time retain the constitution of that House in respect to the exercise of its judicial functions as it had existed from the earliest period. On this subject there had lately been a great change in public opinion, and he was convinced that the feeling which was now entertained against the transference of the jurisdiction of their Lordships to another Court would be more fully developed when the Government proposals were laid before the country next Session. That their Lordships should sit during the Recess for the purpose of hearing appeals was not a new principle at all. With regard to the expense of appeals, he had no doubt they could be greatly reduced, and if noble and learned Lords would consult with the officers of the House as to an alteration of the Standing Orders, a great improvement might, he thought, be effected. He must confess he never could understand how the Act of 1873, which did not provide a common Court of Appeal for the Three Kingdoms, could be regarded as satisfactory, while he believed the Privy Council would always continue to be the best Court of Appeal for the trial of Colonial and Indian causes.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR rose for the purpose of addressing only a few sentences to the House, and he might in the first place observe that he had already stated that the Government desired to preserve entirely unprejudiced until next Session the question of the final constitution of an Ultimate Court of Appeal. Their Lordships would not, therefore, expect him now, he was sure, nor would his noble and learned Friend who had introduced the subject expect him to enter into any argument in support of, or in opposition to, any particular view with respect to it which he might entertain. So far as the Government were concerned, they held themselves perfectly at liberty to consider next Session the best proposal on the question which could be made for its settlement. He quite concurred, he might add, with his noble and learned Friend (Lord Hatherley) that it was extremely desirable the public mind should address itself on all occasions to the consideration of the question, and should be as carefully informed upon it as possible. He would, however, put it to his noble and learned Friend whether he had taken the best way to accomplish that end, and whether he was really informing the public mind in any useful manner by raking up a number of old stories which had been repeated 20 times over as to what had happened a quarter or half a century ago, but which everybody knew perfectly well could not occur at the present day. Such stories appeared to him to be about as useful to the elucidation of the subject as if, when a measure for amending the constitution of Parliament was under discussion, some one were to give a narrative of the abuses and scandals which existed previous to the passing of the Reform Bill. He should like to say a few words, in the next place, with respect to what had fallen from his noble and learned Friend as to some remarks of his own which might perhaps lead to misapprehension "elsewhere." He was quite aware of that to which his noble and learned Friend referred—namely, that under certain circumstances an appeal might be made, as it was termed, per saltum from the decision of a Vice Chancellor to that House. Now, in that instance he quite concurred in the statement that there was a perfect right of double appeal, and he should be sorry that there should be any misapprehension on the point. If a decree was made in the Court of Chancery by the Vice Chancellor against the defendant in a cause, that defendant had a perfect right to have a double appeal. He might have it first before the Court of Appeal in Chancery, and then before their Lordships' House. He had, therefore, a perfect right of double appeal, although he might, of course, abandon part of it, and proceed at once to that House—a course of proceeding, however, which was so seldom adopted that it might be practically disregarded. He had on a former occasion stated fully what was to be the constitution of the particular Court which would be established under the present Bill. That constitution must be looked upon as provisional, and he should be sorry to detain their Lordships by repeating the reasons which he had before given for the adoption of the course which the Government deemed it to be their duty to take in the matter, or for thinking, as he did, that the Court would be found quite sufficient for the discharge of the important duties which it would have to perform. Notice had been given of an Amendment on the Report with regard to a District Registrar in Lancashire; but he hoped his noble Friend in whose name the Notice stood (Lord Winmarleigh) would defer the question until the third reading of the Bill, which he would fix for next Friday, inasmuch as the subject was under consideration, and it was his intention to propose certain Amendments altering in a general way the Rules relative to Registration Courts.

EARL GRANVILLE thought the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack had exercised a wise discretion in not entering, on the present occasion, into the question of what should be the Final Court of Appeal. He knew the noble and learned Lord was animated by a sincere wish to establish the best tribunal possible; but he must at the same time observe that his noble and learned Friend near him (Lord Selborne) had availed himself of a most legitimate opportunity for laying their views with respect to many important points connected with the Act of 1873 before the House. As to the attack which the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack had made on what had fallen from his noble and learned Friend behind him (Lord Hatherley), he thought it was somewhat unjustifiable, for his noble and learned Friend had a perfect right to illustrate his views of the jurisdiction of that House as a Final Court of Appeal by referring to circumstances which had happened, not half a century ago, but within his own experience, and even within the last five or six years.

LORD WINMARLEIGH, at the request of the Lord Chancellor, postponed the Amendment of which he had given Notice to the third reading.

Bill to be read 3^a on Friday, the 7th of May next.

House adjourned at Eight o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

PUBLICATION OF DEBATES AND PROCEEDINGS—EXCLUSION OF STRANGERS.

NOTICE OF RESOLUTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I beg to give Notice that on Tuesday next I will move the following Resolutions:—

1. "That this House will not entertain any complaint, in respect of the publication of the Debates or Proceedings of the House, or of any Committee thereof, except when any such Debates or Proceedings shall have been conducted with closed doors, or when such publication shall have been expressly prohibited by the House, or by any Committee, or in case of wilful misrepresentation, or other offence in relation to such publication.

2. "That strangers shall not be directed to withdraw upon notice being taken of their presence; but if occasion shall arise for repressing or preventing disorder, Mr. Speaker may direct their exclusion from any part of the House (save as provided for in the previous Order).

3. "That strangers shall not be directed to withdraw, during any debate, otherwise than by an Order of the House; and unless notice shall have been given of moving such Order, before the commencement of a debate, the question shall be put and determined without amendment or debate."

ARMY—THE MILITIA—FINES FOR DRUNKENNESS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL EGERTON LEIGH asked the Secretary of State for War, If he would state to the House in what way has the fund arising from fines for drunkenness in the Militia been spent?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, he had already stated that it was proposed to apply the fund to purposes of recreation. The War Office had been unable, however, to deal with the amount collected during the last training without the permission of the Treasury.

ARMY—ADJUTANTS OF MILITIA.

QUESTION.

COLONEL EGERTON LEIGH asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, if a Militia Adjutant appointed before 22nd February 1871, willing to perform all the duties of the Brigade Depôt, or any other Military duty he may be called on to perform, and who does not wish to accept the retiring pay, as per Royal Warrant 29th March 1875, will be subsequently debarred from the benefits of the new scale?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY replied in the affirmative.

IRELAND—BLACKWATER BRIDGE.

QUESTION.

MR. VANCE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the Government has taken any steps to compel the local authorities to open the Blackwater River for the navigation of masted ships which are now prevented from ascending higher than Youghal, owing to the condition of the drawbridge, which can no longer be worked in consequence of the structure of the bridge having decayed?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that the story of the bridge was a very old one. It was in a ruinous condition, and the question of its repair was under the consideration of the grand juries of Cork and Waterford, and the Town Commissioners of Youghal had drawn the attention of the Government to the matter. He believed there was some technical defect in the law which prevented the grand jurors making use of the powers conferred upon them by Act of Parliament. If that should prove to be the case, he was prepared to introduce a measure to provide a remedy.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTORS—THE ANNUAL RETURN.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Annual Return of the number of Electors in Parliamentary Constituencies, moved for at the beginning of the Session, will be presented; and whether it will be printed in time for the Debate of Friday week on the Redistribution of Political Power?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, the Return alluded to had been presented and ordered to be printed, and he hoped it would be in the hands of hon. Members before the debate of Friday week.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ORANGE FREE STATE—RETURNS.—QUESTION.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, When he will furnish to the House, Copies of the Correspondence which he has already promised to produce referring to the diamond fields and the lands in South Africa which have been occupied by Her Majesty's High Commissioner, but which are still claimed to be the territory of the Orange Free State Republic?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, the Papers alluded to by the hon. Gentleman are in course of preparation, though I am afraid they cannot be confidently promised before the expiration of some weeks.

ARMY—SUPERSEDED CAPTAINS OF THE SCIENTIFIC CORPS.

QUESTION.

COLONEL BARTELOT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, on Her Majesty's birthday, any brevet is to be conferred on the remaining old Captains of the Line and Royal Marines who have been superseded by the Majors of Scientific Corps?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, the question had engaged a great deal of attention in the Department; but he hoped he should be forgiven if he said it was no part of his duty to forestall or disclose Her Majesty's gracious intentions with reference to her birthday.

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES.

QUESTION.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether, pending the negotiations for the settlement of the French claims to a monopoly of fishing rights on the coasts of Newfoundland, Her Majesty's Government has arranged with the French Government that its cruisers shall not seize the nets of British fishermen, or otherwise interfere with them in the exercise of their lawful occupation?

MR. J. LOWTHER: The French Government has instructed its officers commanding vessels on the coasts of Newfoundland to abstain from all forcible action, with a view to any difficulties which may arise being referred to and settled by the Mixed Commission appointed by the French and English Governments for this purpose.

REPORTS OF THE CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.—QUESTION.

MR. J. HOLMS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If it is the intention of the Government to publish the Second Report of the Civil Service Commission relating to the out-door departments of the Customs and Inland Revenue; and, if so, when such Report will be issued?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that the Government had not received a Second Report from the Commission, and, as far as he knew, there was no such Report in existence.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT—FIRE-ARMS.—QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is true, as stated in some Irish newspapers, that on Monday week an old woman who earned a livelihood by attending on racecourses, and charging a penny a shot out of a toy gun (fired by a percussion cap, without use of powder) at a wooden figure dressed as an ancient mariner, was arrested or stopped by the police at the Mullingar races, and cautioned against such a practice in a proclaimed district, she having "no licence to have and carry arms;" and, if this be so, whether the Government will extend to this old woman such arms licence as will enable her to earn a livelihood as heretofore?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH, in reply, said, remarkable stories of this kind were not very rare in the Irish Press. The Government had instituted an inquiry into the facts of the case referred to, and he was almost sorry to spoil the story, but he had to inform the hon. Member that it was without foundation. What happened was simply this. The Irish constabulary had recently received general instructions to check itinerant gamblers at racecourses, and those orders had been carried out with very excellent effect at many race meetings during the present season. This old lady, hearing that the police were warning gamblers against continuing their pursuits, seemed somehow to think it possible she might be included in the designation. She asked a resident magistrate on the course whether she would be allowed to continue the pursuit of her business, and she was at once informed she would not be interfered with. She was not further spoken to nor molested by the police. The question of arms licence was not mentioned, and he was afraid this portion of the story was due to the lively imagination of the reporter.

IRELAND—CORK GRAND JURY.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

MR. HERBERT asked the hon. Member for Cork, in consequence of a statement made by him, What was the date of the meeting of the Cork Grand Jury he referred to, the names of the gentlemen who served on it, and the names of the different baronies they represented?

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING: Sir, after the statement I made on Monday evening I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman should have put the same Question to me again. I have told him, as I tell him now, that I cannot tell whether it was the March Assizes of 1872 or of 1873; and my recollection of the gentlemen who served with me is a perfect blank, save one or two of them. The baronies there represented I do not know. I think the hon. Gentleman ought to have been satisfied with the statement which I made to him in private on Friday night. I do not know why the hon. Gentleman has put the Question again; and I hope I am not violating any Rule of the House when I say that he might be better and more profitably employed in settling affairs with his constituents instead of—["Order, order!"]

MR. HERBERT rose, but

MR. SPEAKER said: The hon. Member has put his Question and has received an answer.

MR. HERBERT: I claim the indulgence of the House while I make a personal explanation. The reason why I put this Question was because an accusation was brought by the hon. Member for Cork against a number of gentlemen members of a Grand Jury. The hon. Member stated in this House that those gentlemen actually put a large sum of money on a district because one of those gentlemen had property in the district. I wished to know from the hon. Gentleman who those gentlemen were; because if the statement of the facts be right every one of those gentlemen violated a most solemn oath which he had taken, and I think that bringing an accusation of that kind against a body of gentlemen requires some explanation, particularly when the hon. Gentleman tells me after bringing this accusation against these gentlemen, that he does not remember—although he was the foreman—the date of the Grand Jury nor the names of the gentlemen who served with him.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING asked whether he might be allowed to explain.

MR. SPEAKER said, that both hon. Members, it appeared, had been referring to a past debate in that House, which was irregular.

BRUTAL ASSAULTS—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

MR. COLE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is his intention to bring in a Bill in the present Session to amend the Law with respect to the punishment to be awarded to persons convicted of brutal assaults; and, if so, when; and, whether it is his intention to propose any alteration in the Prisons Act, 1865, so as to enable governors of gaols to employ prisoners sentenced to hard labour in industrial labour instead of the so-called first class hard labour?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill during the present Session to amend the Laws relating to punishment awarded for brutal assaults, and I propose on Monday to ask leave to bring in such Bill. With regard to the second point, I believe that industrial labour may be used as the Act now stands. The Prisons Act, however, has now been in operation 10 years, and the Government have asked for information as to whether some amendment of that Act may not be necessary. That information is not yet before us; but next Session it may be necessary to introduce a Bill on the subject.

PARLIAMENT — PUBLIC BUSINESS — MONASTIC AND CONVENTUAL INSTI-TUTIONS BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to preface the Question of which he had given Notice by two observations—first, that the subject excited a great deal of interest throughout the country; and, next, that he had been delayed in proceeding with his Bill by the non-production of Papers containing information from Foreign Countries. He would now ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, considering the state of the Order Book, he will consent to the appointment of a Morning Sitting for the consideration of the Monastic and Conventual Institutions Bill?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, it is always very agreeable to me to assist my hon. Friend in bringing forward any business he may have on the Paper; but at the present moment it is not possible for me to offer him a day for a Morning Sitting. I am, on the contrary, meditating asking the House myself for a Morning Sitting to-morrow, and even with that sacrifice of the convenience of hon. Members, I am afraid they must consent to a further sacrifice in the curtailment of their holidays in consequence of the progress—or, rather, want of progress—of public Business. Therefore, at present it is not in my power to make the arrangement that my hon. Friend asks for.

MR. NEWDEGATE: At a later period of the Session I will renew my Question.

MASTER AND SERVANT ACT—LEGIS-LATION.—QUESTION.

MR. GORST asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the promised measure for amending the Master and Servants Act and other Acts affecting the relations between employers and employed will be introduced by Government?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I hope, Sir, that the measure to which my hon. Friend refers will be introduced immediately after the Whitsuntide Recess.

VOL. CCXXIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

INDIA—CASE OF MR. TORCKLER.

QUESTION.

MR. AGG - GARDNER asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he has considered the grievances complained of Mr. Torckler, Ex-Lieutenant of the Bengal Native Infantry, in a Petition that has been presented to the House of Commons; and if he is prepared to grant the redress for which the Petitioner prays?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, the circumstances of Mr. Torckler's case have been frequently under consideration, and are, therefore, well-known. He has received such redress and compassionate consideration as appeared to be suitable, and it is not proposed to institute any further inquiry into the case.

STAMP DUTY ON APPOINTMENTS.

QUESTION.

MR. CHILDERS wished to know, Whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer could lay a memorandum on the Table of the House explaining the working of the present Stamp Duty on Appointments?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he would endeavour to do so.

RATING ACT, 1874—ASSESSMENT OF THE RIGHT OF SPORTING.

QUESTIONS.

MR. MILBANK asked the President of the Local Government Board, How the sporting right is to be assessed under the new Act when a landlord lets his land but retains the shooting and preserves it? Is it to be valued on the principle of what the tenant would give for the shooting, assuming it to be in an unpreserved state, or is it to be valued upon what it would be let for in a preserved state; in which latter case is the cost of such preservation to be deducted from the assessment?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: It is, of course, Sir, impossible for me to say what the decision of the Courts may be, but it certainly was intended that the Assessment Committee should value the right of sporting in connection with the occupation of the soil, on the principle of "what the tenant would give for the right without reference to preservation."

If an additional value is proposed to be put upon a right of sporting by reason of the preservation of game, it would seem to follow, on the analogy of the general law of rating, that the cost of such preservation might be deducted. It is obvious that important questions as regards preservation arise incidentally where, by reason of such preservation, the full letting value of the land is depreciated.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON asked the President of the Local Government Board, If he will state the principle upon which assessment committees are supposed or intended to rate the right of sporting over grass dairy land, on which there is not any game, and which land is let to tenants at its full agricultural value; and, whether it is in conformity with the intentions of the Act that the same class of grass land in different parishes, but within the same union, should be rated capriciously at little or nothing in one parish, and at a considerable sum per acre in another adjoining parish?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: In reply, Sir, to my hon. Friend I can only say that the sixth section of the Rating Act, 1874, which states that a deduction from rent may be allowed "if rateable value is increased, but not otherwise," clearly contemplates the case of land on which there is not any game, and over which the right of sporting is of no appreciable value. It certainly was not intended that land should be rated capriciously in the manner pointed out by the Question. If any such inequality should exist, the valuation lists may be objected to before the Assessment Committee, or appealed against at the Sessions.

THE REVENUE—RETURNS.

QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether there will be any objection to give a Return of the growth or diminution from year to year of the various heads of receipt since 1841, so as to show the normal increase or decrease of the revenue for each year?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, there would be some difficulty in giving the Return. He would, however, consult with the hon. and learned Gentleman as to the adoption of some form on which the Return might be made out.

INDIA—THE GUIKWAR OF BARODA.

QUESTION.

SIR SEYMOUR FITZGERALD asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is the intention of the Government to lay any Papers upon the Table of the House with reference to the deposition of the Guikwar of Baroda; and, if so, when the House may expect to be in possession of them?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, the Report of the first Commission is in the hands of hon. Gentlemen. The Papers connected with Colonel Phayre's removal and the temporary deposition of the Guikwar, and containing information up to the actual assembling of the second Commission, are in the printer's hands, and will be before long upon the Table of the House. The proceedings of the second Commission, the Report, and Papers connected with the final deposition of the Guikwar have not yet been received from India; but when received shall be printed and laid upon the Table of the House as soon as possible.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS— DAY SITTINGS.—QUESTION.

In reply to MR. PEASE,

MR. DISRAELI said, that it would depend upon the progress made in Committee that night on the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill whether it would be necessary to ask the House to consent to a Day Sitting to-morrow. If sufficient progress was made he would not ask the House to meet to-morrow; but, if not, it would be his duty to make such a proposal.

BILL—[BILL 77.]

(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE.

[Progress 26th April.]

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 3 (Continuance of Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1870, subject to amendments and modification.)

CAPTAIN NOLAN moved, in page 2, line 8, after "modifications," to insert—

"And to this modification that 'The Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1870,' shall be read as if in section four there were inserted after the word 'gun' the words 'except a fowling-piece or the ammunition for the same.'"

He said, if the Government would only assent to the Amendment which he intended to propose in reference to the possession of arms it would greatly facilitate the progress of the Bill. He had given Notice of two or three Amendments under this head, giving certain rights to certain people; but although the Amendments were of a very simple character he had experienced some difficulty, owing to the way in which the Bill was drawn, in finding a place at which they might be conveniently inserted. One of the objects of the Bill was to restrict the possession of arms, and his proposition was to take fowling-pieces out of the definition of arms. He thought he was justified in moving the Amendment, because they could hardly call fowling-pieces arms in the present day. They were perfectly useless for warlike purposes, being merely bad smooth-bore muskets. As well might the Bill prohibit the possession by Irish farmers of scythes or axes. But if fowling-pieces were useless as weapons of offence or defence they were extremely useful to the farmer to enable him to protect his crops. A farmer said to him in conversation on this subject—"The crows are as stiff on the land as we are ourselves," meaning that it was extremely hard to drive them away; and he added that the British Government had given the crows a right to eat up the seed that was sown on the farms. He hoped the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland would adopt this slight alteration, and that he would give the Committee some information as to the general policy he intended to pursue in reference to these Amendments.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 8, after the word "modifications," to insert the words "and to this modification that 'The Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1870,' shall be read as if in section four there were inserted after the word 'gun' the words 'except a fowling-piece or the ammunition for the same.'"—(Captain Nolan.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, he feared he should be unable to accede to the Amendment, and he did not see how he could make the concession which would satisfy the hon. and gallant Member upon this point. He felt some diffidence in differing from the hon. and gallant Member in respect to a subject on which he was so great an authority—namely, that of the gun—but he could not see how fowling-pieces could be regarded as not coming under the denomination of "firearms." They were firearms, and would be very dangerous weapons in the hands of those who might desire to use them for unlawful or improper purposes. The adoption of the Amendment would be tantamount to the rejection of the principle of the Bill, as far as it related to the carrying of arms. He desired to extend the possession of arms amongst the farm classes in Ireland. Hitherto, there had been a technical difficulty in the law which had rendered it doubtful in the mind of the Licensing Authorities whether they had the power to grant a licence to carry arms over specified lands—such, for instance, as over the land occupied by a farmer. The Bill removed that doubt, and would allow the grant of such a licence. He hoped these licences would be freely granted in the quieter parts of Ireland, and that the present system of restriction might be relaxed until, in the natural course of events, it would disappear altogether. With all deference to the hon. and gallant Member, he could not help saying he considered the difficulty now experienced in procuring arms licences had been much exaggerated. So far as the present Amendment was concerned, it could not be accepted by the Government.

MR. MELDON supported the Amendment. It would be absurd to say at the present time that arms should be kept out of the hands of the Irish people for fear of a rebellion. He pointed out several instances in which the present law had proved a great hardship to the people, and urged the acceptance of the Amendment, which would bring about a much more satisfactory state of things.

MR. HERBERT stated that, whereas formerly no game was sold in Killarney, there was now one licensed shop there doing a flourishing business, although the gentlemen in the neighbourhood did not sell their game—a proof that the police did not carry out the provisions of the Act very stringently. He considered it was at present a great hardship that the Irish farmers were not allowed to kill the rooks. He trusted the Government would provide a means of enabling farmers to get rid of this tiresome foe.

MR. RONAYNE said, what was wanted was to place the possession and carrying of arms in Ireland on some plain and definite foundation, instead of leaving the matter to the decision of the magistrates, who acted on caprice or pique, as he knew many of them now did. He did not ask for petty favours here and there, dependent on the whim of an individual, but for justice all round. His own house was entirely unprotected. He had got rid of gun and dogs, and had not even a cap under his roof, because if he had it would be sufficient to render him liable to a sentence of two years' imprisonment. He could not see any reason why the Government should refuse what was asked by the Amendment unless they thought the farmers of Ireland, as a body, were not to be trusted with such arms. If that was their idea his own experience enabled him to say distinctly that it was a great mistake, and utterly without foundation.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN urged that there would be an advantage rather than a danger in intrusting arms to well-disposed citizens, in particular to farmers who required them for the protection of their crops. Last week a man holding 77 acres of land wrote to him requesting that he would use his influence to obtain for him a licence to carry a gun. Surely it was unreasonable to place obstacles in the way of such a man obtaining a licence. He had himself on one occasion been unable to get a licence for the man whom he employed as a game-keeper. There ought, at all events, to be a provision inserted in the Bill to the effect that holders of land should be entitled to the possession of a gun if they had not been convicted of any offence.

MR. CALLAN said, he had done as much as any man in protecting game, and also vermin in the shape of foxes, but he objected, as a tenant-farmer, that his brother tenant-farmers were precluded from carrying arms over their own farms. He had himself applied to be allowed to have a gun in his house, and had been asked who had recommended him. He replied that he was a large landowner, and had never had a stain on his character. The end was that he obtained the licence because the magistrates of his county had recommended him. To show that the restrictions were put in force for the purpose simply of preserving game, he would read from a Parliamentary Return the case of a young man at Dundalk who, after shooting over his (Mr. Callan's) farms for a week, with his permission, was told by the police that if he went out again he would be arrested. The sub-inspector, on being asked to assist in getting him a licence, replied—"I will do no such thing on account of your poaching over the country;" and on the ground that he had been poaching—for so his offence was called, although he had been shooting with permission—an application which he subsequently made for a licence, supported by the recommendation of two magistrates, was refused. If the Chief Secretary would assent to the use of the words "bonâ fide" in the clause he would advise his hon. and gallant Friend to withdraw the Amendment. Otherwise, he would follow him into the Lobby if he divided the Committee.

MR. SULLIVAN wished to point out the position in which Irish Members were placed at that moment in reference to the Bill. It appeared that they were to discuss their Amendments under a sort of coercion. A notice might have been placed over the entrance to the House, stating that all who were desirous of considering the Budget should discourage the Irish Members, and all who wished to discuss any other measures in the hands of the Government must squeeze the Irish Members. While he and those who acted with him meant to discourage any merely dilatory tactics, they would not be pressed, nor squeezed, nor intimidated into shortening, by one word or sentence, the debates they were to have on their Amendments to the Bill. And if the Budget or any other very important measures which were dexterously put after that Bill were postponed, the responsibility must rest on the exceedingly skilful strategists of the Treasury Bench. With regard to the present proposal, here was a great and powerful Monarchy declaring it to be a matter of peril to allow an Irish farmer to have a gun to shoot crows with. The Chief Secretary of Ireland had said, from information he had received through the police—the real rulers of Ireland—that there were several murders all ready to come off, and which would be committed if the House of Commons did not pass this Bill. He put it to the right hon. Gentleman whether he could name a single attempt at shooting in Ireland which had not been carried out for want of a gun. There had not been one. The Government, by their proposal in this Bill, were inconveniencing honest and peaceable occupants of farms for the hypothetical advantage of stopping one murder out of 50,000. Why did not the Government register the wearer of clogs in Lancashire, and say that John Brown should wear clogs, on the recommendation of a magistrate, because he was a quiet man, and would not kick his wife to death with them? The time would arrive when military conscription would be the order of the day in Great Britain; and when one of those great cataclysms occurred which the Premier had often warned them was nearer at hand than most supposed—then it would be found that Ireland would be unable to help England in her difficulty, not from disaffection, but because she would be incapacitated through the operation of these Coercion Acts, which denied her inhabitants the right to carry arms.

MR. GOLDNEY said, he thought that was one of the most impracticable Amendments which could be conceived, as its adoption would necessitate the re-casting of the whole of the Act of 1870. A much more convenient course of proceeding would be to withdraw the present Amendment, and take the discussion of the question it raised on the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt).

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, if farmers were allowed to use fowling-pieces, then he would consent to re-frame his Amendment. He asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, if he would consent to give compensation to farmers for damage done to their crops in consequence of the occupiers of lands being prohibited to carry fire-arms for the destruction of vermin, &c.?

MR. MOORE said, he thought the fowling-pieces would prove as disastrous as any other kind of weapon in the hands of persons bent on committing agrarian or other outrage, and he did not wish to see an Amendment carried in that form. What he wished for was that any two justices of the peace should be allowed to grant licences for carrying arms to persons fit to be entrusted with them. He thought it absurd that men who were thought fit to serve as magistrates should not also be thought proper persons to be entrusted with the power to grant licences for the carrying of fire-arms; and he thought it an indignity cast on them to require them to run after a stipendiary magistrate. Personally, he had no complaint to make; he had applied for gun licences for some 20 or 30 of his tenants and others, and none of his requests had ever been refused by the stipendiary magistrates; but he thought that putting justices of the peace beneath the resident magistracy indicated a certain suspicion of the good faith of the magistrates which could not fail to be keenly felt by the people of the country. The Government could not expect the people of Ireland to respect the law, when they felt that they were being watched and suspected on all sides; and he thought that if the Government adopted his view a judicious relaxation would be made.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, there was great force in what had fallen from the hon. Member who had just spoken; but, at present, he would not enter into the subject, although the Government were anxious to give it full consideration. The discussion would be better raised by the Amendment which stood in the name of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick. He could not support the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway; and as to the question of compensation to farmers, that was a matter on which the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have something to say if any hopes were held out on that head.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 80; Noes 291: Majority 211.

CAPTAIN NOLAN moved, in page 2, line 11, to leave out "eighty," and insert "seventy-seven," with the view of limiting the operation of the Act to two instead of five years. He said, he considered there were many reasons why the Act should not be continued in force longer than two years. In the first place, he objected to a suspension of constitutional liberties for a longer period, and when the noble Lord at the head of the Opposition supported the principle of the Bill, he did not understand that he intended to vote for its continuance for five years. Under any circumstances, hon. Members on that side would not be bound to support a proposal which would keep the Act in force for a longer period than had been proposed when they sat on the Ministerial side of the House. What did they do with the Mutiny Act? They knew that there was a suspension of liberty in connection with these Acts, and they were never adopted for a longer period than one year. No one had contended that these Coercion Acts were Constitutional Acts, even if circumstances had made them necessary; and he wanted to know, therefore, why they should be asked to pass them for so long a time? They destroyed the liberty of Ireland by these Acts for five years, and there was no encouragement to the people to advance. All hope was crushed out of them, and all their Representatives could do was to bring forward Motions and Bills in favour of repealing the Acts, which would be rendered unnecessary if they were prolonged for only two years. The present Parliament was not likely to last longer than five years, and that seemed to be the only reason for adopting that period.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 11, to leave out the word "eighty," in order to insert the word "seventy-seven."—(Captain Nolan.)

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING hoped the proposals would be adopted, and said he believed many of those who had supported the Government hitherto would vote for this Amendment. The House ought to bear in mind the fact that in the state Ireland was in 1870, it was considered sufficient to pass an Act which was to continue in operation for two years. What justification could there be now, when crime was almost unknown in the country, for asking that the Acts should be continued for five years? He believed that the present Government would remain in power during that period of years, and that it was their intention if they were succeeded by a Liberal Admininistration to leave these Acts as a legacy for them to deal with. At the end of two years, the Bill, or a portion of it, could be renewed, if it were necessary. No case had been made out for re-enacting these laws at all, and he hoped the feelings of the Irish people would not be strained by having these Acts forced upon them for five years.

THE O'CONOR DON said, he had on former occasions voted for these Acts being continued for two years rather than one, believing that if re-enacted annually they could be brought forward and accepted as matters of course, like the Mutiny Act, and great difficulty would be experienced in getting rid of them. He, however, entirely concurred with the Amendment, and he would make one remark which appeared to him to come with peculiar force at this time. This Bill was introduced as a relaxation of the code of coercion which had previously existed, and the Chief Secretary had held out the hope that this coercion would be still further relaxed. Why, then, should the House be asked to bind itself to the provisions as they stood for five years? They ought to pass the Bill for two years, and at the end of that time the House ought to have the opportunity of making such further relaxations as the condition of the country would admit of. If they bound themselves for five years, no matter what the state of the country might be, the provisions must remain in force, unless a Bill was brought in to repeal the Act, which, as hon. Members knew, was a very clumsy proceeding. He hoped the Committee would not sanction this very long extension of time.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he hoped that the Committee would have clearly before its mind the precise nature of the provisions which it was proposed to continue for five years. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway had spoken of taking away all the liberty of the country, and other hon. Members had used similarly extravagant language. Now, the provisions of the existing law, which the Bill proposed to continue, were these—Restriction upon the possession of arms; the issuing on sworn informations of search warrants for threatening letters; the arresting of absconding witnesses; the clauses allowing compensation for agrarian murder or injury; and the special police tax, which had already been discussed at some length. Hon. Members must recollect that the clauses of the present measure were very different from the Act of 1870, which gave power to arrest strangers who were unable to give an account of themselves, which rendered liable to arrest persons who were out after sunset, and which imposed the most arbitrary restrictions upon the freedom of the Press. The main provision which was retained in the present Bill was the restriction upon the possession of arms. He would remind hon. Members of the past history of Ireland on this subject. Since the year 1796 there had only been a period of 18 months during which these restrictions did not exist. That period was in 1846-7, when it was found necessary to re-impose the restrictions which had been temporarily removed, with additional provisions infinitely more stringent than anything now proposed. Was, then, the Committee prepared to say—looking at the fact that these provisions had continued in operation for so long—that there was any chance that in the short period of five years they would become entirely unnecessary, not in certain parts of Ireland, but all over that country? If the noble Marquess who filled the office he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) now occupied were in his place he would, doubtless, agree that no other course could be adopted than that proposed by the Government. They hoped to be able to revoke these restrictions gradually, and they trusted that when the time they had fixed upon had expired—namely, five years—it would be no longer necessary for them, or for any Government, to re-enact them. Still, they did not think that the free possession of arms could be allowed in Ireland generally until the five years had expired. The provisions had, since 1847, been re-enacted at the end of every one or two years. Was it of any real use to continue this mode of proceeding? If the Government were of opinion that these restrictions would be unnecessary in one or two years, they would not make their present proposal; but they had no such hopes, and what they intended to do was this—when the agitation with regard to this measure had subsided—and it was subsiding already—they would gradually withdraw the proclamations in certain parts of Ireland, and in this way relax these laws, until they prevailed over only a small part of the country. Perhaps, as matters progressed, even before the five years had expired the restrictions might be withdrawn all over Ireland. But they felt it their duty to ask Parliament to give them these powers for this lengthened period. They thought that they would have more chance in this way of carrying out their policy of gradual relaxation than if they came to Parliament at the end of 12 months or two years to renew these powers, and thus led to a constant renewal of excitement and agitation upon the question.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN observed, that if the Government thought it necessary to introduce this measure for the sake of the peace of the country, they ought to declare that they did so on their own responsibility, and relieve other persons from the odium of being supposed to sanction its operations for so long a period.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that the fact relied upon by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that restrictions had existed upon the free possession of arms for nearly a century told the other way. The period during which there was no coercion law was during the Irish Famine, in 1847-8, when not a shot was fired in Ireland; while in London, at the time of the Chartist gathering on Kennington Common, the streets were lined with policemen kept carefully out of sight, and the corners were occupied by troops, the officers commanding which did not know who were their next neighbours, so carefully and secretly had the arrangements been made. Would any one on the Treasury Bench venture to propose these restrictions for England? He appealed to the front Opposition Bench to support the Irish Members in obtaining the small modicum of liberty for which they were now contending.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had not heard from the Chief Secretary for Ireland any sufficient reason for suspending rights of the character dealt with by the Bill for so long a period as five years. Former Governments in asking for such powers had acted upon a plain constitutional principle which the present Government—and for the first time—asked the House to depart from. That principle was, that the responsible Government of the day should, from time to time, state to the House of Commons that there was an absolute necessity for the granting of the powers for which they asked. The right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland had reviewed the history of Ireland for nearly a century; but he had failed to show that any Administration—Liberal or Conservative—had ever made a proposal similar to the present. The argument of the right hon. Baronet in its favour would apply with equal cogency to the English Mutiny Act. That was an annual Act. Well, it was not likely that Her Majesty's Government had it in contemplation to dissolve the Army within the next five years; but what would the House of Commons say to a proposal to continue the Mutiny Act for five years? Such a proposition would not be entertained for a moment. Upon principle, and in accordance with precedent, it would be most objectionable that any Bill suspending important rights of Her Majesty's subjects should be allowed to continue for so long a period as that suggested by Her Majesty's Government. If two years was sufficient in 1847 and 1848, and in the most disturbed times in Ireland, surely a like period would be sufficient now. It was no argument to tell the House of Commons that the Government did not mean to execute the powers which they sought to obtain. The liberties of the subject had never been made dependent upon the discretion of any Government. The House had shown no disposition to support Her Majesty's Government during the progress of the Bill; but he must vote against the present proposal unless a much stronger reason was given for departing from established precedent than had yet been advanced.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) said, that he readily admitted that hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite had during the progress of the Bill acted towards Her Majesty's Government with great fairness. He assured the House that it would have been a far pleasanter thing for the Government, if they felt at liberty to do so, to bring in the Bill in a shape which would have rendered the Amendment unnecessary. The present was a measure of relaxation. ["No, no!"] Surely hon. Gentlemen opposite who cried "No" must admit that, as compared with the Acts the Bill was meant to displace, it was a measure of enormous relaxation. Within the last few years the larger Act was continued in the Annual Continuance Bill, but last Session Her Majesty's Government gave a pledge that in future, so far as they were concerned, the subject should be treated in a different way if it required to be treated at all. It did require to be dealt with, and the Government had, after full consideration, come to the conclusion that they should ask the House to grant them the powers referred to in the clause for a period of five years. There was no parallel between the present Bill and the Mutiny Act. He had always understood that the Mutiny Act was continued only, from year to year, not so much on account of the provisions it contained for the punishment of offenders, but to reserve to the House of Commons power over that which would otherwise become a standing Army. The Westmeath Act, which was one of a very exceptional character, they only sought to continue for two years; but the power which this clause would confer upon the Government they felt in the interests of the peace of Ireland that they should ask for for a period of five years; and the Committee would remember that they could only be put in operation in districts which had been proclaimed by the Lord Lieutenant. There were only two clauses thus continued that applied to the whole of Ireland. One of them was the power to arrest absconding witnesses, and the other the power of making presentment in cases of agrarian outrage. Where there were no agrarian outrages this last provision of the Act would not come into force, and he regarded the clause giving the power of arrest as a most useful one. What the Government desired was, that they should have this reserve power for five years, but they hoped that it might not be necessary to keep all these clauses in force for anything like five years. The Government had already shown the Irish people their earnest desire to relax the severity of these laws, not only by repealing the most stringent of the provisions which their Predecessors had found it necessary to ask Parliament to assent to, but also by the manner in which they had administered them. He need scarcely say how gladly Her Majesty's Government would have come down and told the House—"For the first time for the last 90 years we fling away these coercion Acts, and we now ask the House to repeal them." But Her Majesty's Government were compelled, unfortunately, to adopt a different course at this moment, and could not indulge in eloquent and heroic speeches of that character. Looking over that unhappy period of 90 years during which this kind of legislation had existed, they always found that there was a rising of excitement among the people whenever measures of stringency were suddenly relaxed. There followed some violent outbreak, and then it was found necessary to resume with increased severity the powers which had been abandoned. Such had been the case in 1846 and in the succeeding years, when famine was accompanied by outrage, and when the money that was subscribed by the people of this country to purchase food for the famine-stricken population of Ireland was spent by the latter in the purchase of arms. [An hon. MEMBER: Name!] If the hon. Member wished, he would read an extract from his authority—

"In the midst of the most horrible starvation a mania arose for the possession of arms, and the gun trade of Birmingham had experienced a great revival."

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the hon. and learned Gentleman to name the authority from which he was reading.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PLUNKET): From The Annual Register of the year 1846, which was an authentic contemporary record of what had occurred, and which was not drawn up subsequently for controversial partizan purposes. In that work it was stated that, in Clonmel, so many as 1,138 stand of arms were disposed of in a few days, and in many cases were paid for in the silver just received by the Public Relief Committee. He was happy to think that there was not at present a chance of the recurrence of such a terrible state of things, for now we lived in a period of prosperity. Again, what was the state of things in 1870? These things occurred when they had tried the experiment of renewing the code for short periods. To avoid doing this, and to avoid the necessity of having to make the code more and more severe when they had to renew it, the Government had determined upon this occasion to adopt a different course—that was, that whilst they relaxed measures of extreme stringency, they retained those parts of the code that were of a precautionary nature for a longer period. They believed that it would be more satisfactory if they took a renewal of the legislation for five years, so that they might be able to enforce it if necessary, instead of again within a short period raising this sad and vexed question in the House. The Government holding this power in reserve, would, it was hoped, be able to relax from time to time such sternness as even the revised Acts might possess by withdrawing their proclamation of the districts, whenever they found that they might do so consistently with the preservation of the public peace. Such was the programme Her Majesty's Government hoped to be able to carry out, and the manner in which these laws had been administered by them was a guarantee to the people of Ireland and the Irish Representatives in that House that these Acts would be enforced in the most conciliatory, cautious, and fair-dealing manner. An hon. Member (Mr. Downing) had suggested that the term of five years was fixed by the Government, in order to bequeath to their Successors the disagreeable, but inevitable task of passing another Peace Preservation Bill. But if the view taken by the majority of the Irish Representatives who had spoken on the subject were correct, then a Peace Preservation Bill would certainly not be wanted for Ireland at the end of five years. It seemed to him that each of these arguments cut the throat of the other. He need scarcely say that it was greatly to the regret of himself and of every Member of the Government that they felt themselves obliged to ask for a renewal of these Acts; but after having given the subject the most careful consideration, they felt that by doing so they would be taking the safest and surest way of securing peace and tranquillity in Ireland.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he would state in the briefest manner the reasons that induced him to support the Amendment. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had stated that he had received every support and every courtesy from that side of the House during the progress of this Bill, and he therefore trusted that hon. Members opposite would permit him to say a few words on the subject under discussion. In reference to what had just fallen from the Solicitor General for Ireland, he wished to remark that the point involved was not a mere question of passing on the consideration of this subject from one Government to another, but was that of the propriety of transferring the important responsibility of ultimately repealing these Acts to another Parliament. Surely it would be wiser for the present Parliament, which imposed these Acts, to retain in their hands the power of either renewing them, or of letting them drop? But if this Parliament were to have the ultimate determination of this question, it was of the greatest importance that it should deal with it before the last days of its existence, inasmuch as it would not be desirable that it should have to discuss a Peace Preservation Bill for Ireland on the eve of a General Election. Under these circumstances, if no middle term between the five years and the two years that would be acceptable to all parties, could be found, he thought that it would be better that the power should be renewed for two rather than for five years. It was most desirable that the people of Ireland should know that the present Parliament would again consider within a limited time whether they might not further relax these restrictions. It was fortunate that the Act passed by the late Government was restricted to two years, as it had given the right hon. Gentleman opposite an opportunity of proposing to the House a Bill better suited to the present circumstances of the case. The present Parliament and the Government would not be sorry if, after two years, they might be able to make those relaxations in the Bill which both sides of the House generally desired. The Solicitor General for Ireland had spoken most fairly on the subject, and, on the other hand, he trusted that the Government would not misinterpret the vote he was about to give.

MR. VANCE remarked that the late Government had received every assistance from hon. Members sitting round him in their attempt to carry these measures; but hon. Members opposite had not shown any reciprocity in that respect towards the present Government. On the contrary, they had joined with certain Members from Ireland in opposing this Bill and to prevent its being carried into law. One reason why it was desirable that the measure should be passed for five years was, that by that means they would prevent a recurrence for a considerable time of the sort of debates and scenes they had lately witnessed, which greatly impeded the general business of the country.

MR. RONAYNE supported the Amendment. He thought passing a Bill for five years but poor reward to the Irish people for being peaceful and contented for so long a time.

Question put, "That the word 'eighty' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 230; Noes 144: Majority 86.

MR. FAY moved, in page 2, line 11, after "eighty," to add—

"Where any person shall be licensed or entitled to carry arms under the above-mentioned Acts, or any of them, he shall be at liberty to unite with with others so licensed in forming volunteer regiments, and such volunteers shall have in all respects the same rights, and be subject to the same laws and regulations, as the volunteer forces of England are now subject to."

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must point out to the Committee that, as the Amendment stood, it was outside the purposes of the Bill, and would require a separate Instruction of the House before the Committee could entertain it, because it would, if carried, have the effect of repealing certain clauses of the Acts relating to Volunteer corps in England.

MR. FAY said, he would mention the subject on the Report.

MR. BUTT moved, in page 2, line 11, at end, to add—

"Provided always, That nothing herein contained shall have the effect of continuing the eleventh section of the Act as passed in the eleventh year of the reign of Her Majesty, entitled 'An Act for the better Prevention of Crime and Outrage in certain parts of Ireland,' until the first day of December one thousand eight hundred and forty-nine, and to the end of the then next Session of Parliament; and from and after the passing of this Act the said section shall be and the same is hereby repealed."

The hon. and learned Member said, his object was to take away from the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland the power of preventing persons from having arms in their houses, but to leave to him the power of preventing persons from carrying arms outside of their houses. The powers of the Lord Lieutenant were now only optional, but he had the power of issuing notices, the effect of which was to disarm the whole people. Not only were they not allowed to carry arms out of doors, but they were bound to deposit any arms they had in their houses at the police barracks. This being so, of course it was necessary that there should be the power of search for arms, and his Amendment, if carried, would enable them to escape the odious power of domiciliary search, which was so liable to abuse, and which in many cases had been actually abused. That power of search as it now existed amounted practically to a general right for any policeman to enter every man's house in a proclaimed district whenever he thought fit, by day or by night, and to ransack every room in it under the pretence of searching for arms. In doing that he might break open every door in the house. He asserted positively that the power of searching for arms as now exercised was nothing less than a power given to every policeman to break into any house he pleased in Ireland. He proposed to limit that power of search. Any concession which the right hon. Baronet thought it within his duty to make would be received in the spirit in which it was offered. He had not been able to give him the credit which he claimed for the relaxations of the present Bill. It was more severe in its provisions than the Act of 1856, although it was not so severe as the Act of 1870. The Committee had now decided that the operation of the measure should be extended to five years; it was therefore necessary carefully to scrutinize every provision in detail. He did not think there were any Amendments which had been placed on the Paper for the purpose of obstruction or raising a discussion, and they might fairly challenge the decision of the Committee on every one of them. It was a delusion to speak of these Acts as temporary measures—they were, in fact, perpetual. The first Act, that was introduced for two years, had been in existence for 33 years. He wished it to be clearly understood—he said it deliberately from information received since the Bill was introduced—that every one of the clauses to which objection was taken, was part and parcel of a most grinding and despotic system of police tyranny, which would be exercised under this Bill in many districts of Ireland.

He wished by this Amendment to prevent the importation and carrying of arms, but not to meddle with the sacredness of home. He hoped, although the Committee had decided against the last Amendment, they would not be deprived of the opportunity of taking the sense of the House on the duration of the Bill on bringing up the Report.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 11, after the word "eighty," to insert the words "Provided always, That nothing herein contained shall have the effect of continuing the eleventh section of the Act as passed in the eleventh year of the reign of Her Majesty, entitled 'An Act for the better Prevention of Crime and Outrage in certain Parts of Ireland, until the first day of December one thousand eight hundred and forty-nine, and to the end of the then next Session of Parliament,' and from and after the passing of this Act said section shall be and the same is hereby repealed."—(Mr. Butt.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, he would not discuss the statements which the hon. and learned Member for Limerick had made with regard to an alleged system of police tyranny, or the special case of improper exercise of the power of searching for arms to which he had referred. All he would say on that subject was this—that if these cases were officially brought under his notice, they would be thoroughly sifted and justice done; but he was bound to observe that he could hardly remember a single instance of a complaint being made to him on the subject. Those portions of the hon. and learned Member's statement which related to future Amendments would be fairly considered when the time arrived. The present Amendment was proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman as a mitigation of the present restrictions on the possession of arms; and he seemed to think if the Committee adopted it, the law would be still sufficient for the purpose required. But if it were adopted, the very foundation on which restriction was based would be destroyed, because the people would be able to keep their arms concealed, and take them out and use them for all practical purposes, without the police being able to detect them, precisely as if no proclamation had been issued. There could be no better way of getting rid of restrictions to carry arms than by supporting the Amendment. If the Amendment were adopted, those arms that had been delivered up in the proclaimed districts would have to be returned, whilst the proclamation would remain in force. No result could be more absurd.

MR. BIGGAR said, the present law was altogether inoperative, since it affected only the well-disposed. Those who wished to make an improper use of arms could still obtain them in spite of any proclamations.

MR. BUTT, quoting the original Act, contended that it contemplated the carrying of arms as something entirely distinct from the possession of them in a dwelling, and therefore there was no difficulty in separating them now.

MR. SULLIVAN said, it was obvious that the object of the Government was to entirely disarm the Irish people. The present law had not been efficacious, he contended, not the slightest proof being forthcoming that the power of search had prevented a single outrage from taking place. What was the use of maintaining these powers when they (the Government) were admitting by their silence that they were not efficacious. The evil, on the other hand, of imposing such laws as these on the people was very great, and the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt), in his Amendment, was no doubt, striking at the most objectionable part of the Bill—namely, these horrible domiciliary visits. This power given to the police amounted to dire oppression and insult, and its exercise tended continually to impress the people with the feeling that they were governed by an authority which considered itself hostile to their sentiments. His Predecessor was put out of the representation of Louth because the people there, especially the farmers and their wives, objected to the great power which was placed in the hands of the police. There had been no lack of instances showing the evils of the law. He remembered a case in which some love letters belonging to a young lady were taken by the police in the course of one of these visits. The friends of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, however, were caught tripping, and the young lady was advised to bring an action against the police-officer. She did so, and the result was that she recovered £250. damages. But what did the officer plead? Why, he pleaded the Coercion Bill. In conclusion, he declared that the Government were not powerful to render their law efficacious—they were, indeed, powerful to madden the people.

MR. COLLINS said, there was no country in Europe where the Government possessed the power of depriving individuals of the power of protecting their own households and families. Even in Russia the idea of conferring such a power would be scouted. He appealed to the Chief Secretary for Ireland not to put such an indignity upon the people of that country, or do them so gross an injustice.

MR. CONOLLY considered that these provisions were absolutely necessary, and he should have thought that his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Butt), from his great experience in the defence of criminals, would have had some idea that this was so. The millenium had not yet arrived in Ireland. The late Mr. John Martin, who had represented the county of Meath, said he never would be happy until he saw every Irishman armed. The possession of arms was the most dangerous possession, in his opinion, that the Irish people could have. First, because there was the danger which always existed to a peasant of a brother peasant endeavouring to rob him of them; secondly, because the Ribbon societies might insist upon his using them in a manner he would not like; and thirdly, because they were allowed to get rusty, were kept in bogs and ditches, and were therefore quite as likely to go off backwards as forwards. A peasant who sat with arms in his house sat in reality upon a barrel of gunpowder.

MR. FAY characterized the arguments used by the last speaker as weak and illogical. He had said that the first reason why a peasant should not have a gun was that his brother peasant would take it away from him. But one would be as strong as the other; in fact, the man with the gun would be much safer from intrusion than he would be without it. Then with regard to Ribbonism, it was now admitted on all hands that the organization was a myth. The peasantry were Conservative, for since the passing of the Land Act they had a stake in the country. As to the third point—the rusting of the guns—if the arms were kept in the bogs and dykes, surely there was no need of domiciliary visits.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he did not believe in the existence of Ribbonism at present, but supposing it to exist in such perfect organization as the Government would have them to suppose, then the effect of disarming all well-disposed persons in a district would encourage evil-disposed persons to attack them, knowing as they did that their intended victims had no weapons with which to defend themselves. The evidence given before the Westmeath Committee showed that a Ribbon murder was never committed by any person residing within the barony—it was always perpetrated by some person who came from a distance. The effect of the 3rd clause was to encourage ill-disposed persons to commit outrages, and to leave well-disposed persons at their mercy.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 63; Noes 116; Majority 53.

MR. O'SULLIVAN moved, in page 2, line 14, to leave out from after "lawful for," to and including "authorise," in line 16. He stated that the object of the Amendment was to enable persons who had a licence to possess arms, to carry and use them on their own land.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he thought the hon. Member did not quite appreciate the probable effect of his Amendment, which would be to limit rather than to increase the number of licences granted to persons to have arms in their houses for self-protection. He thought that the hon. Member's object would be attained by the proposal which he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had already inserted in the Bill.

MR. MOORE said, that those who administered the law in Ireland did not appear quite to understand what they were administering. In the counties of Meath and Louth, and in other parts of Ireland, resident magistrates gave permission to persons licensed to have arms in their houses to carry those arms over their own grounds, and also permitted employés to carry their masters' guns so long as in their employ, and no longer; whereas other magistrates of experience refused to give any such permission.

MR. BUTT said, there could be no doubt about the law as it stood, and under it only two classes of licences could be granted—the first class that of persons licensed to keep arms in their houses, and the second class a general licence to carry arms abroad. Although it would be regarded as a boon by occupiers of land having licences to keep arms in their dwellings if they were allowed to carry them over the lands in their occupation, yet the effect of the hon. Member's Amendment would probably be to limit still more than at present the number of persons to whom licences of the first class would be granted.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PLUNKET) said, he hoped the hon. Member would not press his Amendment to a division, because it would limit the number of those to whom licences were granted.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, a licence to a man merely to have arms in his house would prevent him from defending himself with a gun outside of his house if he were attacked. He believed that the whole object of the restriction in question was to protect game, and he should feel bound to press his Amendment to a division.

MR. CALLAN said, he wished to make an appeal to the Government, but, as it was unrepresented on the Treasury Bench, and hon. Gentlemen generally seemed to feel little or no interest in the matter before the House, he begged to call attention to the fact that there were not 40 Members present, and to move that the Chairman do report Progress.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PLUNKET) apologized for his temporary absence, as he did not, at the moment, know that the Chairman had returned to the Chair, and expressed his readiness to deal with any observations which the hon. Member desired to make.

MR. CALLAN said, he had merely moved to report Progress in order to give the hon. and learned Gentleman time to return to the House. He now appealed to the Government to accede to the proposal of the hon. Member for Limerick (MR. O'SULLIVAN), which he thought only a fair and reasonable concession to be made to the Irish farmers. He begged to withdraw his Motion to report Progress.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he hoped that the Government would see their way to accept this Amendment, as he thought it a very reasonable one.

MR. BUTT said, this matter was a very important one. He thought perhaps the question might be fully weighed by the Government before the Report on the Bill, as he was sure the right hon. Baronet would do well to take the subject into consideration.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he was prepared to consider the subject before the Report; at the same time, he could give no promise as to what course he would take with reference to the matter.

CAPTAIN NOLAN observed, that licences could not keep a man from shooting his landlord, if he were so inclined, or prevent an insurrection, and the object of the Bill, he contended, must therefore be the preservation of game.

MR. CALLAN said, during the time the debate had lasted that evening the Government had not yielded one iota to Irish Members. The clause was really in the interest of the game-preserving population and not in the peace-preserving interest.

MR. CONOLLY asked whether the clause would allow farmers to carry arms over their own farms? It was a matter of great importance that farmers should be allowed to carry arms. He hoped the Chief Secretary for Ireland would find it possible to assent to the clause.

MR. MELDON said, there was no reason why the Committee should come to a decision on this point to-night. The simple issue was if a person was licensed to have arms in his house, why should he not be allowed to carry arms over his grounds? He hoped the Amendment would be carried.

MR. VANCE hoped, considering the promise made by the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), that the matter would not be pushed to a division. If it were, he should vote with the Government.

MR. CALLAN was not surprised that the hon. Member who had just spoken did not appreciate the hardship of the Bill, seeing that his constituents were allowed to carry arms to the public detriment. The only time he (Mr. Callan) had been shot at was in the city which the hon. Member represented (Armagh) on the 12th of July last. He happened to be standing in the garden of the college attached to the Roman Catholic cathedral by the side of the clergyman, when a shot was fired, and the sexton was struck down, and the shot was fired by one of the hon. Gentleman's constituents. He did not object to the inhabitants of Armagh being prevented carrying firearms, but he did object to the peaceable farmers of Ireland being placed on the same footing with them.

MR. VANCE said, there had been a previous discussion in the House on this question, and there was a grave difference of opinion as to the person from whom the shot came; but he did not think there was any proof that it came from one of his constituents.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT joined in the appeal to the hon. Member for Limerick county (Mr. O'Sullivan) for the withdrawal of the Amendment.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, he would withdraw it if the Chief Secretary for Ireland gave him a positive promise that he would re-consider the matter.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he could give no assurance that the hon. Member's views would be adopted. All he could say was that he would look into the matter again in deference to the wish which had been expressed that the licences should be extended as widely as possible.

MR. GREGORY said, the object of the clause was to enable persons to have arms in their hands for the purposes of defence, but not of aggression.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY urged the hon. Member to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING pointed out to the hon. Member the necessity of deferring to the expressed wish of the hon. and learned Member for the city of Limerick (Mr. Butt), in the interests of the Home Rule Party.

MR. SMYTH also deprecated the pushing of the Amendment to a division, as it would alienate from the hon. Gentleman (Mr. O'Sullivan) a section of the Irish Members.

MR. O'SULLIVAN assented to the request made to him.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BUTT moved, in page 2, line 20, at end, to insert—

"The person appointed to grant licences to have or carry arms in any district shall be bound to grant a licence to have arms or to have and carry arms upon any specified lands, or a licence to have and carry arms generally, to any person resident within the district who shall produce to him a certificate signed by two justices of the peace for the county that he is a fit and proper person to have such licence respectively."

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH welcomed the Amendment as a proof of returning confidence in the magistrates of Ireland on the part of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick and those with whom he acted. He would accept the proposition on the understanding that the certificate should be signed by magistrates residing in the same petty sessional division as the person applying, because he thought that personal knowledge ought to be secured. He moved an Amendment with the object of carrying out this view.

MR. BUTT said, he thought this would give rise to considerable difficulty in some parts, where but few magistrates resided, and he suggested that the certificate should be signed by magistrates residing in the same quarter sessional division as the applicant.

MR. CONOLLY said, he was sorry the Government had accepted this Amendment. There were such people as popularity-hunters, and Benches of Magistrates in Ireland were not always free from this taint. In a large body like the magistrates of Ireland they could not all be angels, and some of them, he was sorry to say, had nothing angelic about them at all. Two magistrates would have the power of frustrating the design of the Act, and a person might obtain a licence upon the certificate of two of the greatest Numskulls in the county. The House had, in fact, got itself into a nice "mess," and he would try and extricate it by dividing the House against the Amendment.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING remarked that a magistrate in his county certified in favour of a man holding a considerable portion of land on the seaboard, whose crops were being destroyed by sea-fowl and rooks, and the certificate was signed by a gentleman of rank in the county; but when it was presented to the resident magistrate he refused to act upon it, although he had not a word to say against the man's character. The Amendment which had been accepted, with a modification, by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was really the only concession which had been made since the House went into Committee on this Bill. He hoped, therefore, that the hon. Member for Donegal (Mr. Conolly) would not go to a division on the subject.

MR. CALLAN observed, that there were many petty sessional divisions in which it would be impossible to get the signatures of two resident magistrates. He would suggest that the signatures of two magistrates in the quarter sessions division or in the barony should be sufficient. It ill-beseemed a Member sitting upon the Conservative benches to call the Irish magistrates "numskulls."

MR. W. JOHNSTON said, he was quite satisfied at the acceptance of the Amendment by the Government, and he had no sympathy with the views of the hon. Member for Donegal (Mr. Conolly).

MR. COLLINS appealed to the right hon. Gentleman not to restrict his good intention unnecessarily, and that he would consent to introduce the words "baronial division."

Amendment amended and agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 9, after the word "endorsement," to insert the words "any order made after the passing of this Act for the revocation of any licence or licences granted to any person or persons to have or carry arms shall state in such order the reason for the revocation of same."—(Mr. Richard Power.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he could not accede to the Amendment of the hon. Member. Revocation of licence was only made after careful inquiry, on the authority of the Lord Lieutenant, and he could easily imagine circumstances under which it would be highly inexpedient to publish the information so obtained.

MR. BUTT suggested that the Amendment should not be pressed by his hon. Friend. He (Mr. Butt) must, however, protest against the power which the magistrates would have under the Bill of branding a man's character in private without affording him an opportunity of knowing and probably of repelling the charge made against him.

MR. STACPOOLE said, he thought that the magistrates of Ireland might safely be intrusted with the duty which the clause would impose upon them.

MR. CALLAN protested against the assertion that Irish magistrates might safely be allowed in secret to decide upon the character of a man and the course which the Government ought to adopt towards him.

MR. STACPOOLE stated, without fear of contradiction, that the magistrates of Ireland were as independent and straightforward a body of men as could be found in the Three Kingdoms. The Government would, he believed, do a service to the country by acting upon any suggestion they might make.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 82; Noes 199: Majority 117.

MR. R. POWER moved, in page 2, line 20, at end, insert—

"Every person appointed to grant licences under this Act shall keep a true and perfect list of the names and residences of all persons applying for such licences, and shall on the first day of every month deposit with the clerk of the peace of the county a true and perfect copy of such list, adding thereto to the name of each applicant a statement showing whether the licence has been granted or refused, specifying also the nature of the licence applied for, and the nature of the licence, if any, granted, which list shall be kept by the clerk of the peace among the records of the county."

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he had no objection to the Amendment provided the words "true and perfect", were omitted, and that for "month" the word "year" was substituted.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING moved, in page 2, line 20, at end, insert—

"Every person duly licensed to kill game shall be entitled as of right to obtain a licence to have and carry arms under this Act."

This would restore the law to what it had been prior to the Act of 1870.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 20, after the word "endorsement," to insert the words "every person duly licensed to kill game shall be entitled as of right to obtain a licence to have and carry arms under this Act."—(Mr. Downing.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH pointed out that the Amendment would simply have the effect of taking away the discretionary power of the licensing authority in the case of persons who chose to pay £3 3s. for a game licence.

CAPTAIN NOLAN supported the Amendment. He thought that persons who would pay £3 3s. for a game licence would not belong to the "dangerous" classes.

MR. GOLDNEY maintained that if the clause were passed as it was it would entirely remove all discretionary powers from the county magistrates.

MR. CALLAN said, he hoped the Chief Secretary would agree that persons having a licence to carry arms in their own county should, if they had also a game licence, be permitted to carry arms in any part of the country. At present they could not join a shooting party in a neighbouring county.

MR. RONAYNE stated that he had suffered inconvenience personally as a sportsman under that clause. After paying £3 3s. for a game licence he had gone out shooting without having also a licence to carry arms, being ignorant of the alteration of the law which rendered the latter licence necessary. In that way he understood he had made himself liable to two years' imprisonment with hard labour every time he had gone out shooting, and it was in the power of any policeman to have arrested him. When he became aware of the real state of the law he got rid of his dogs and his gun because he could not bring himself to go and ask a magistrate for permission to carry arms. That grievance might be a sentimental one; but it was keenly felt by the highly intelligent constituency which he represented.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he thought the Representative of an intelligent constituency ought to look into the Acts of Parliament relating to his country, and if he found that he had infringed the law and that the Government had not come down upon him for it, he ought to be grateful to them for their clemency, and not complain of it as a sentimental grievance.

MR. SULLIVAN replied that in such a case it was the first duty of a Viceroy to know the laws he had to administer, and not to break them. Was it becoming for the son of a Viceroy who, ignorant of the laws he had sworn to maintain, had rendered himself liable to prosecution as a felon, to tell an hon. Member that, as a simple Representative, he ought to study the uncodified laws of the British Empire? He (Mr. Sullivan) believed that if the noble Lord was examined, he would prove to be well able to preach, but not to practise.

MR. RONAYNE, in explanation, could only refer to the complicated state of English legislation, and of the penal enactments.

THE MARQUESS OF HAMILTON: Will the hon. Member for Louth state the laws of which the Viceroy was ignorant and which he had broken?

MR. SULLIVAN: With the greatest pleasure. I was referring to those portions of the Act of 2 & 3 Vict. which the Government is now about to amend, as it provides that every unregistered Freemason in Ireland is liable to be prosecuted as a felon. I hope that no one will deny—no brother Mason certainly will deny—that the Viceroy of Ireland is a Freemason. I am not aware that his name is on the return of registered Freemasons. If it is, I make the most profound apology to him, not only as Viceroy, but also in his other character, in which I highly respect him, as an Irish gentleman and a nobleman who is extremely popular in our country. If it be true that these Acts have been so absurd and complicated that a Viceroy was ignorant of their provisions, I put it to the House whether it is to be wondered at that the hon. Member for Cork should be ignorant of the law for three months? I should be glad to hear now that the Viceroy was registered, and not a felon. We are now about to amend the law, so that there shall no longer be felons in high quarters in Ireland through ignorance of the law.

THE CHAIRMAN wished to remind the Committee of the Question before it. It was proposed to insert words to the effect that every person duly licensed to kill game should be licensed to carry arms.

DR. O'LEARY spoke in favour of the Amendment, and said that he himself had similar experience of the difficulty of understanding the Act to that which had been stated by the hon. Member for Cork. He hoped the Chief Secretary would consent to modify the clause.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER appealed to the hon. Member for the county of Cork to press his Amendment to a division, and he should have his support.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA moved a verbal Amendment in the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork.

MR. MELDON opposed the verbal Amendment, and stated that the law, as it now stood, in relation to game licences, authorized any man having a game licence to go through any proclaimed district in Ireland with his gun.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, he understood the hon. Member who had just spoken to state that a person having a licence to carry arms and also a game certificate, was thereby authorized to carry arms in any proclaimed district; and he believed this to be correct.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA: Then, Sir, after what the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland has stated I withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BUTT said, there was no instance wherein it could be shown that men possessing game licences had turned their arms to improper uses. The present Bill was going beyond the Act of 1847.

MR. BIGGAR moved that the Chairman do report Progress.

Motion negatived.

MR. BIGGAR again rose, and said he had intended to ask leave to withdraw his Motion, which he made simply because the House would not hear him. He must be heard or would repeat the Motion.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that it was not competent for the hon. Member to renew a Motion which had been negatived.

MR. CALLAN protested against the unseemly conduct of hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House. They were sent to Parliament to express their opinions freely and fully, and they ought not to be interrupted by unseemly noises. He would move that the Chairman do leave the Chair.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF appealed to the Chairman to know whether it was in Order for one hon. Member to say that other hon. Members had been guilty of "unseemly conduct."

THE CHAIRMAN said, he did not understand the hon. Member to apply the term "unseemly conduct" to hon. Gentlemen, but to use the words "unseemly noises," and he must point out that even that term was not desirable.

MR. CALLAN said, that he did not think it was fair that hon. Members should be interrupted in their observations by noises which were not seemly, and if the noises were not seemly they were unseemly noises; and therefore, in spite of the hon. Gentleman who had just risen to Order, he begged to repeat his remark.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must again point out that the words "un-seemly noises" were not a desirable term to use; and he must also say that it was not the practice of hon. Gentlemen to repeat expressions after they had been ruled to be undesirable.

MR. SULLIVAN quite understood that the Committee should evince a little impatience at listening to the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar); but he desired to say that up to the present both sides of the House had evinced the fairest disposition to carry on the discussion. He hoped, therefore, the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan) would withdraw his Motion, and that the hon. Member for Cavan would be heard.

MR. BIGGAR said, he intended to be heard. If hon. Members did not like it they had their remedy—and he had his. All he wanted to say was that the Excise in Ireland had power to grant licences for the sale of spirits, and he did not see why the gun licences should not be in their hands also.

MR. CALLAN said, the Chairman had misunderstood him if he thought he had repeated anything which it had been ruled was undesirable to be used in debate.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING inquired whether it was intended, as he believed it was, by the clause to prevent a man who held an arms licence in his own county carrying arms into an adjoining county which was proclaimed?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) replied that in the case referred to, a licence to carry arms in the proclaimed district, or in some other proclaimed district, would be required.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 84; Noes 250: Majority 166.

MR. BUTT moved, in page 2, line 26, at end to insert "between sunrise and sunset." There was no reason why search warrants should be used at any hour of the night. For any legitimate purpose the power of search in the day-time was sufficient. What he wished was to restore the law to what it was before 1870. At the present moment every man's house was liable to be broken into without warrant at any time. There was such a thing as lawless law, and this was one. In England they had given household suffrage; in Ireland they gave household search. That was the law in 31 counties of Ireland. Every house was at the mercy of a common policeman.

MR. MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, that after listening to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick he could well understand how it was that there was so strong an opposition on the part of some hon. Members who sat below the Gangway on the opposite side of the House to this measure, the cause of their opposition being a want of knowledge of the provisions of the law as it now existed. Neither in law nor in fact was it true that in 31 counties in Ireland any man's house could be searched at the will of a common policeman. No policeman could search the house of anyman without a warrant issued by the proper authorities; and, in the second place, no search warrant had been in force in Ireland except for searching houses specially named since June last, with very few exceptions, as in the case of certain ports where there was reason to fear that arms were being imported. Under those circumstances, the eloquent denunciation of the existing law by the hon. and learned Member appeared to be a little exaggerated. Having looked at the matter very carefully, however, he felt that the existing law respecting the search for arms might be fairly amended in several material respects. He therefore proposed to accede to certain of the Amendments which had been proposed by the hon. and learned Member and his Friends. Thus, he would assent to the proposal that the search for arms should only be between sunrise and sunset—a concession which he believed would be of very material importance. A great deal had been said about the dreadful way in which the houses of the Irish peasantry were invaded at night. He was willing to secure them against any such danger. He was also prepared to agree to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman that search warrants should not be executed except in the presence and under the direction of some responsible officer. The third Amendment provided that such warrant should not be executed except by the authority of a justice of the peace acting for the county within which it was to be executed, specifying the house or place to be entered. To that Amendment he must object, because it would place the authority of a justice of the peace over that of the Lord Lieutenant, and therefore he hoped the hon. and learned Member would not press it. Under these circumstances, he asked the hon. and learned Member for Limerick and his Friends to meet the Government in the same conciliatory spirit, and to accept the compromise he had suggested.

MR. BUTT said, that the right hon. Baronet in assenting to these Amendments had done much to mitigate the evils of this coercive legislation, inasmuch as it might now be said with truth that the general right of domiciliary search no longer existed. He need scarcely say that the Irish people would fully appreciate the action of the right hon. Baronet and of the Government in the matter; and, for his own part, he could with a clear conscience return his sincere thanks to the right hon. Gentleman for the concessions he had made.

The two first Amendments were then put and agreed to.

MR. BUTT said, that after the generous spirit shown by the Chief Secretary, he was unwilling to interrupt the general harmony, and he would therefore withdraw his Amendment on the understanding that he should have the power to move it on the Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. FAY moved, in page 2, line 36, to leave out "one year" and insert "forty-eight hours." He thought 48 hours' imprisonment was sufficient punishment for a person found in the possession of arms, especially after what had been stated by the hon. Member for Donegal (Mr. Conolly) as to the character of some Members of the Irish magistracy.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH opposed the Amendment, which seemed to savour somewhat of a ridiculous character.

MR. CONOLLY: I wish to deny emphatically having depreciated the local magistrates of Ireland as a body. I did say some of them were not angels. ["Numskull."] I did say there were Numskulls among them, and I will say further, that there are Numskulls in this House.

MR. RONAYNE said, that the hon. Member had shown that there were Numskulls in the House, and the Government had evidently thought that there were Numskulls amongst the local magistracy, because stipendiary magistrates, who in many cases knew nothing of the law, were placed over them.

MR. SULLIVAN suggested that three months should be inserted instead of 48 hours.

MR. FAY asked permission to withdraw his Amendment. ["No."]

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT complained of the language of the Irish Secretary, and expressed the hope that the original Amendment would be allowed to be withdrawn.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, the hon. and learned Member, not having been successful in his operations against the Bill in the earlier part of the evening, had now, after he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had spent a long and fatiguing evening in the Committee, come down, without hearing a word of what he had said, and accused him of using improper language. He would appeal to the Committee, whether he had used any language justifying the implied censure of the hon. and learned Member? He had only said that the Amendment would tend to make the Bill ridiculous. If the original Amendment were withdrawn, there would at any rate not be this objection to the substituted Amendment. The penalty had already been reduced from two years to one year, and he had hoped that this concession would have received more acknowledgment.

MR. DODSON said, he had heard no improper language attributed to the right hon. Baronet; and, indeed, his hon. and learned Friend (Sir William Harcourt) had spoken in a conciliatory manner. He hoped that the original Amendment would be allowed to be withdrawn.

MR. DISRAELI said, as a general rule, he should like to meet the wishes of the Committee, and as far as he had any influence in that House, he should use it to try and induce the Committee to consent to the withdrawal of the hon. Member's (Mr. Fay's) Amendment. With regard to the progress of the Committee with the Bill, there appeared to be a misconception, not only in that House, but out-of-doors; but so far as it appeared to him, he must say that he thought the progress made with the Bill was satisfactory, and the spirit in which the discussion had been carried on by the Committee so business-like and encouraging, that by meeting to-day at 2 o'clock they would, no doubt, make considerable further progress with the measure. It was a proposition which he had no doubt would be generally popular, and he hoped the remaining parts of the Bill would be discussed in the same well-intended feeling as the preceding parts had been. He hoped the hon. Member would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. MELDON proposed to omit "one year" in order to insert "three months for a first offence, and not exceeding one year for any subsequent offence."

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 36, to leave out the words "one year," and insert the words "three months for the first offence, and not exceeding one year for any subsequent offence."—(Mr. Meldon.)

Question put, "That the words 'one year' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 179; Noes 120: Majority 59.

MR. SULLIVAN moved that Progress be reported, and suggested that the discussion should be resumed on Monday.

MR. DISRAELI acceded to the Motion for reporting Progress, but remarked that the Committee so thoroughly understood the subject of the Bill now that they could dispose of it more easily at a Morning Sitting to-morrow than at an Evening Sitting on Monday.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

NAVAL ORDNANCE — BREECH-LOADERS AND MUZZLE-LOADERS.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET, in moving for a Return relative to the different classes of guns and projectiles in use in the Navy, said, that the question of our naval artillery was one of the most important that could be considered—it involved the efficiency of our ships for the purposes of naval war; for whatever use might be made in the future of rams or torpedoes the main strength of a ship of war must rest in her guns. We had now in use in the Navy guns of various sizes—some of enormous weight and great size. We had no longer ships of 80, 100, and 120 guns with armament of comparatively small calibre: our ships now carried but few guns; and this being the case, those ought to be the best possible weapons that mechanical science could produce. To carry such weapons our ships had to be of a very large tonnage. Thus the Hercules was a ship of 8,000 tons, though she carried only 16 guns, but eight of them were of 18 tons weight and were 15 feet in length. It was not very long since guns of 8 and 12 tons were regarded as very heavy naval artillery; but we had now 18-ton guns, 25-ton guns, 35-ton guns, and he believed that a gun of 80 tons was now in course of construction. In proportion to the weight of those guns was their length, so that we should have guns 28 feet in length. This was an element which could not be lost sight of in the consideration of this question, because the size of the gun governed the size of the ship; and when any ship was about to be constructed, the Constructor must know the description of gun she was intended to carry. Whether she was to be a turret or a broadside ship she must be adapted to the size of her guns. The advantage of a long gun appeared to be that it burnt a greater quantity of powder. Now, when a gun was a muzzle-loader it had to be carefully sponged out to prevent accident, and in the case of a gun of even 18 or 20 feet that must be a very difficult operation. It was one of the great difficulties to be contended with in the use of muzzle-loaders. Again, the enormous length of the gun involved great weight on the upper part of the ship, and to compensate for this a great weight of ballast must be placed in the bottom part. Those were difficulties which had arisen with the improvements in naval artillery. But to come to a point on which he wished to direct the earnest attention of their Lordships—the advantages of breech-loading guns. The House would remember that in 1860 the Admiralty of that day made a trial of breech-loading guns on the Armstrong principle. Owing to the failure of that experiment, the breech-loading system in our heavy guns was abandoned, and the guns with which our ships were furnished were muzzle-loaders. Sir William Armstrong was a very clever man, and he produced a very clever gun; but it was found on experiment that the vents of his breech-loaders were apt to fly out, and the consequence was that breech-loaders had been entirely discarded in the Navy. There could be no doubt that the Armstrong breech-loader had the defect which he had just mentioned; but because we had discarded this gun it ought not to be supposed that the breech-loading system had been discredited. On the contrary, if we could get a good breech-loading gun, which would not be more liable to accident than the muzzle-loader, undoubtedly it would be the gun for our Navy. It possessed various advantages over the muzzle-loader. As the breech-loader had a powder chamber larger than the rest of the bore, you could put in more powder. In the muzzle-loading gun you had to limit the size of your cartridge to that of the bore. In the breech-loader you could put in a cartridge larger than the bore. You put in your shot first, and your powder after. In the next place, the men working breech-loaders were much less exposed than those working muzzle-loaders. Next, the breech-loader need not be drawn in for loading; but the muzzle-loader must be drawn in: and when they were drawn in, the ports must be shut: otherwise, men and ship might be exposed to a very dangerous fire from the enemy, because there could not be a better bull's-eye than an open port. Then, while the men were loading they were in comparative darkness owing to the port being closed. It was difficult for the gunners to make a good shot immediately the port was opened and the gun was turned out after they had been in such bad light just before. When men were exposed to a close fire there was the danger of their getting into confusion and not serving the guns properly. Such an occurrence was experienced in the engagement on the Adriatic between the Italians and the Austrians. The musketry fire so disorganized the sailors that the officers had to come forward and load the guns. There was a further danger in muzzle-loaders of the premature explosion of the cartridge, as was pointed out by the Manual of Artillery, which could only be obviated by the embarrassing process in action of careful sponging after firing: while this inconvenience was altogether obviated by the use of the breech-loader. The "Manual" further stated that the breech-loader had the further advantage of saving the men from the noxious effects of the gas felt in the case of muzzle-loaders. Another and decided advantage in the breech-loader was that you could see any small crevice or other defect in the inside of the gun. Their Lordships knew that to be so in the case of breech-loading fowling-pieces, and it was the same with breech-loading large guns. He need scarcely point out the advantages possessed by the breech-loaders over the muzzle-loaders for gunboats and steam launches, such as were sent up the rivers in Africa, keeping the men under shelter, whereas they would be fully exposed to fire with the muzzle-loader. What, then, was the objection to breech-loaders? As he had already stated, they had been objected to on the score of strength; but he believed that they could be made as strong as they were required to be; and this seemed to be the opinion of Continental nations. It was now shown that we were no longer confined to the old description of steel. Steel could now be made of any strength and of various degrees of hardness and ductility. What he said, therefore, was that the Government should make experiments with breech-loaders. It was better to try any necessary experiments in time of peace than to be found behind other nations in a time of war. His advice to the Government was to have a certain number of guns made of Whitworth's steel—let them try some of these guns to destruction, in order to test whether they burst explosively. Then as to the projectiles, the projectiles now in use, they were of composite materials, and the studs were found to tear away in the rifling, and to be scattered at the muzzle of the gun to the great danger of the troops. After a sufficient number of trials in firing, the best metal for guns would easily be ascertained. Another important point in favour of the breech-loader was, that you need not place any limit on the length of the gun, whereas with the muzzle-loader the contrary was the case. It was asserted in favour of the muzzle-loader that the projectiles had the greater velocity; but in naval guns and projectiles great power of penetration was required as well as velocity. Accuracy of fire was another requirement, and so also was facility of loading. Then you wanted a low trajectory. Shot and shell which flew with a low trajectory were much superior for chasing purposes at sea, where distances were not known; and, as had been stated by engineers of authority, if you made a projectile of iron and then bored holes in it, obviously it would be a much weaker projectile than one made of steel. Perhaps he might be asked why it was that, holding as he did such views, he had not himself ordered the construction of some breech-loader guns when he was in office. His answer to that was that he did order some Whitworth guns; but the Administration which followed him had not carried out his idea. He was not satisfied with the metal of which guns were now made. Why were they not wholly, instead of partially, made of the best steel? What they ought to aim at was a gun which would carry a larger charge of powder, which would give greater accuracy of fire, which would allow of greater speed in loading, and which would finally afford a low trajectory. These being his views, he was extremely anxious that some experiments should be made with breech-loaders. He remembered when military men said that we could not have a small-bore rifle for the service; but Sir Joseph Whitworth had proved that a very efficient weapon of that description could be made, and it had been adopted by France, Russia, Prussia, and, indeed, generally throughout Europe. He was not to be understood as pledging himself to any particular make of large gun; but he did venture to predict that breech-loaders would become essential to the Navy, and therefore he felt no doubt that we ought to try them without delay. As he had said in the beginning, the reputation and the efficiency of our Navy depended on the guns with which our ships were furnished, and therefore he thought the Government should not rest content with an old system which some of the greatest and most warlike nations had abandoned in favour of what he believed to be a much better one.

Moved, That there be laid before the House—

The Duke of Somerset

"Return of the different classes of guns now in use in the Navy; stating the various sizes of bore and the pitch of rifling whether of uniform or of increasing spiral; stating also in each class of gun the number of rifled grooves.

"Return of the various projectiles, stating their weights and lengths, with the number of studs and the bursting charge of each hollow projectile."—(The Duke of Somerset.)

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: My Lords, I shall begin by saying that there is no objection to the production of the Papers for which the noble Duke has just moved; but I would ask your Lordships to bear with me for a few minutes while I make some observations on what the noble Duke has said in reference to the important points on which he has addressed your Lordships. In doing so, I shall confine myself entirely to naval guns, and shall not touch upon the subject as it affects the Army, for I see present several officers of the Army—including the illustrious Duke—who are more competent to speak on the military aspect of the question. Before, however, I come to the main subject, I will explain one matter to which the noble Duke has alluded. As I understood the noble Duke, he rather complains that the Government of Lord Derby in 1866 did not follow up his example in respect of experiments with breech-loading guns for the Navy. Now, as to that I believe I am correct in saying that the Armstrong breech-loaders had turned out such a complete failure and had proved to be so dangerous to those who served them, in consequence of the weakness of the breech and the flying out of the vent-pieces, that the breech-loading system was given up. No doubt that arose, in some degree, from a feeling of certainty that in point of strength the muzzle-loaders were good while the breech-loaders had shown themselves to be bad. We had not at that time the experience of which we have now the advantage. The whole question might now be re-considered again with the light of the experience we have had since 1866. I need not attempt to give your Lordships a lecture on gunnery. You know that small-bore rifles have been adopted for fowling-pieces and that they are now used in the Army. You know also that a muzzle-loader is strongest in the breech, and that a breech-loader is weakest in that part. In 1866 the difficulty appeared to be that Sir William Armstrong had not discovered a metal strong enough to make his breech-piece. He proposed to strengthen the breech by an additional quantity of metal; but that plan added so much to the weight that it was rejected. If I were asked what is the general opinion as to the comparative merits of the breech-loader and the muzzle-loader, I must confess that the majority of opinions are in favour of the breech-loader if you can make the breech strong enough. If this can be effected, the superiority of the breech-loader over the muzzle-loader can hardly, I think, be disputed. The noble Duke has told us of the advantages of the breech-loader—they will commend themselves to every sportsman. Many of your Lordships who know something of deer stalking will be able to appreciate the advantage of being able to load without standing up and making yourself a very visible object. That advantage holds good aboard ship. Guns have now grown to such immense size and weight that if they are to be moved about a ship of war will have to be made as large as Noah's Ark. Hence there is a great objection to muzzle-loaders, for it is a difficult problem how they can best be loaded. Your Lordships are aware that there is an invention for loading guns on board ship by means of hydraulic machinery; but great doubt is entertained as to whether it will answer. It is accompanied by considerable danger, for when it is used the gun has to be depressed 30 or 40 degrees after it is turned in from the front. If any accident occurred to cause a gun to go off while at such an angle of depression, the charge would go through the bottom of the ship. Many trials with the hydraulic machinery must be made, and made very carefully, before the Admiralty can think of adopting it. As to the strength which can now be imparted to breech-loading guns, Sir Joseph Whitworth has discovered a description of compressed steel by which it is said he can so fortify the breeches of guns as that all fear of accidents will be effectually removed. If that is so, we shall no doubt do what other nations have done already, and adopt the breech-loader. At the same time, my Lords, it must be remembered that experiments with large guns are very costly. Already this country has laid out £4,000,000, and therefore we must not rush too hastily to give up one system and adopt another. I quite agree with the noble Duke that the proper time to make experiments is during peace and not to wait until war has been declared. My noble Friend admits that all that can be expected of us in such a case is to proceed by experiment. Of course, it is a strong fact that other leading nations—and among them those nations which are absorbed in warlike preparations—have adopted the breech-loader. It is not likely that they should be mistaken in such an important matter. I know it has been said that Krupp's guns failed very often during the Franco-German War: but I was told by two French officers that such was not the case. They said that those guns did not fail till they got into French hands. The French took certain Krupp guns from the Bavarians, and did not know how to manage them, and accordingly those guns failed in French hands. That was the account given me by those French officers, though what they said told rather against their own artillerymen. In Prussia and France breech-loaders have been adopted, they have found their way even to Brazil. All that is very strong in favour of breech-loaders, and, therefore, with respect to this controversy, I hope that neither the noble Duke nor any other noble Lord will suppose that the Government regard the matter as settled. The Government will continue to watch the trials that are being made with the view of adopting, without prejudice, whatever might prove to be the best artillery for the country.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE said, that when Sir William Armstrong's breech-loader was tried we thought that the strongest powder we could procure was the best: but that was quite wrong in the case of breech-loaders—the strong powder blew the breech-piece out and burst the gun, against which, accordingly, there was a condemnatory report. Foreign nations, knowing the reason why we had given up the breech-loading gun, did not hesitate to adopt it. Since then there had been actual experience of its working in time of war, and those nations found that with them the breech-piece never blew out or burst the gun. Great strength of powder was not required for the breech-loader. What you wanted was that the breech should be strong enough for the little powder required to move the shot. After that the charge of powder should gradually burn itself out. The fact was we had not taken time to properly consider the subject. He believed it would be found that Krupp's guns and other guns made of steel had burst, but that the breech-pieces were perfectly secure. Such a thing as the breech-piece being blown out of one of them was unknown. The breech-loader was now almost a perfect weapon. He was very glad to hear from his noble Friend (the Earl of Malmesbury) that the Government did not regard the matter as settled and that they intended to make further experiments. If we were going to have guns of 26 and 30 feet long aboard our ships, it would be impossible to handle them as broadside guns if they were muzzle-loaders.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: My Lords, I agree with my noble Friends who have spoken on the subject that it is one of great importance. It is a delicate subject also, and, undoubtedly, it is one that very much concerns our Navy. Now, in the first place, I may remind your Lordships that it was the naval authorities who especially objected to the Armstrong breech-loader. I must say that when the matter was first brought under my notice the leaning of my mind was in favour of the breech-loader—because there must be greater difficulties in loading a muzzle-loading gun at sea than exist on shore—and I thought that if ever it was brought into use it certainly would be the gun for the Navy. I was therefore surprised to find such a strong feeling against it in the minds of naval men. At the same time, I am quite aware of the cause which gave rise to that feeling—namely, that in the Armstrong gun which was tried, the vent-piece became detached from the gun, and, if great care were not used, would blow out—which might be a very serious occurrence on board ship. Indeed, we know there was an instance in which the flying away of the vent caused such results that a ship's deck was almost blown away. That was the ground on which the breech-loading gun was rejected. But the misfortune was that we ran from one extreme to the other. Because the Armstrong breech-loader was not found to be the best gun, the muzzle-loader was adopted. I have not a word to say against the present muzzle-loading guns as muzzle-loaders. I believe that as muzzle-loading guns they are as good as can be had. The experiments made show that we have no reason to be dissatisfied with them; but that is no reason why we should not try whether a breech-loading gun of a better construction than the one condemned cannot be produced. There is no reason why we should not make experiments in that direction. I do not, therefore, wonder to find that though at one time there was in the Navy a great dislike to the breech-loader, there is now a considerable body of officers who think that its adoption would be a great advantage. There is, however, one consideration which must not be omitted, and that is the question of expense. I am the last person to say that expense should not be incurred for such an important object as the one here in view. If it is essential that experiments should be made for the purpose of testing the breech-loading gun, there is no good reason why those experiments should be left untried because of the expense they would entail; but, at the same time, there is no reason why we should rush headlong to the adoption of the breech-loading guns, or to the adoption of every description of weapon or projectile which may for the time seem to meet with general favour. This would entail expense which would not meet with public approval, and therefore I say we ought to proceed with the greatest possible caution. What I understand my noble Friend (the Earl of Malmesbury), on the part of the Government, to say is, that there is no objection to experiments being made. And here I may remark that we are very generous with our experiments. We make them known to all the world—though our action in that respect does not always meet with reciprocity. We make trials at great expense, and we make known to the world at large what we have done, with all its results. Our friends and neighbours take advantage of all that we do; but sometimes, certainly, without the reciprocity which might be expected. Under these circumstances, we ought to be careful how we spend our money in large and costly experiments. That somewhat alarms me; but, with that reservation, I think it would be a great misfortune if the present Government, or any Government, were to say that it would not try a system, of the advantages of which so much is said as we have heard in favour of the breech-loading gun. I repeat, that I was not one of those who had so strong an aversion against the Armstrong gun as to set myself against breech-loaders—I was surprised at those who took so strong a view in opposition to the breech-loading guns—but I am not an artilleryman, and I may have been wrong and they right. I think, my Lords, that when we find that Continental nations are adhering to the breech-loading guns, after having made a trial of them in the field, we must feel that to a certain extent we have retrograded in going back to muzzle-loaders. At all events, we should not be startled with the idea of having to adopt breech-loaders. My noble and gallant Friend (the Earl of Lauderdale), as I understood him, said there had been no accidents to breech-loading guns in actual service. That may be correct as regards naval guns; but it is not so as regards guns brought into the field. It is difficult to get correct statistics on such points; but I believe that a large number of breech-loading guns—not fewer than some 200—became disabled during the Franco-German War. I have thought it right, my Lords, to make these few remarks, the more especially because it is well known that in my individual capacity I never was an advocate for giving up breech-loaders, but have shown myself to be in favour of breech-loading rather than of muzzle-loading guns.

THE EARL OF LAUDERDALE wished to explain that he had not said there were no instances in which breech-loading guns had burst while in use in the field. What he had said was that there was no instance in which the breech-piece had been blown out.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: I think there is one point, my Lords, upon which noble Lords on whatever side they may sit will concur, and that is, that it is the duty of every Government, no matter of whom it may be composed, to see that this country is furnished with the best arms and equipments that can possibly be discovered. And I can assure the noble Duke who brought forward this Motion (the Duke of Somerset) that it is the intention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War not to lose sight of the necessity of this country being armed in the most perfect manner. I beg to state, on behalf of my right hon. Friend, that he is by no means wedded to any one system over another, and that whatever system may be shown to be most perfect, he holds that that should be adopted by this country. And here I should like to offer a few remarks in consequence of what fell from the noble Duke opposite and my noble and gallant Friend on the cross-benches (the Earl of Lauderdale). In the first place, as to what my noble Friend stated about the breech-piece being now so strengthened that it does not blow off, I do not know where he has got his information. But the information received from foreign countries by the Secretary of State for War is to the effect that accidents, and very severe accidents, are constantly occurring. Of course, as they have occurred in foreign countries, it is impossible, as the illustrious Duke stated, to give the details in a Parliamentary Return. But the authorities of the War Office are by no means asleep. Indeed, they are now quite alive to everything in connection with this subject that occurs in foreign countries. And when I say "now," I do not mean the present authorities as distinguished from those of former years; for I believe it has for many years been the practice to obtain by means of distinguished officers every information possible from abroad with a view to the production of a better arm than we have at this moment. With regard to the Woolwich system, that was introduced in consequence of the great objection entertained by the officers of the Navy to the guns before in use. And when the noble Duke talks of those guns being now safe, I believe that on one occasion the breech-piece blew off and was found on the mizen-top of the ship—a place where one would not be likely to look for it. And then it is to be remembered that in 25-ton guns the breech-piece alone weighs a ton, and the projectile cannot be put into the gun except by machinery; whereas you can load a big muzzle-loader in a shorter time than a breech-loader of the same calibre. Therefore, if speed of firing is necessary, that, at all events, is a great advantage in the muzzle-loading as compared with the breech-loading gun. And here I wish to state on behalf of a very distinguished officer, the Director General of Artillery,

Sir John Adye, that the system which now prevails is not his system. He found it in operation when he came from India, and he thought it his duty to carry out the system in operation at Woolwich, and to bring it to the greatest state of perfection in his power. The question of cost, too, is not to be lost sight of, the muzzle-loading gun being much cheaper. Of course, where the defence of the country is concerned we ought to disregard cost; but until persons of authority are agreed that the breech-loading is better than the muzzle-loading gun, the question of expense ought not to be put out of sight. Then as to the opinion of the Navy on this subject—that opinion has been thoroughly considered by the War Department, because of those Committees which sit from time to time to consider the question of guns distinguished naval officers invariably form a part, and the result of the deliberations has been come to with their entire sanction and approval. The noble Duke said that with a breech-loader you had nothing to do but to look down into it; but that with our present guns you could not see whether they were likely to burst or not. But I can tell the noble Duke there never has been an explosion with any of our guns, and if there were a tendency in the gun to burst, from the way in which it is constructed you would be able to detect it. It would not be right, my Lord, for me to detain you any longer; but I beg to repeat on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War that he is perfectly alive to all that is doing in foreign countries. I do not take any credit to my right hon. Friend, for the system adopted at Woolwich is the same as that which was adopted by the noble Lord opposite (Viscount Cardwell), who is as patriotic in his desire to keep up the Artillery of this country at the highest point possible to attain as anyone can be. We have now spent about £4,000,000 on guns for the Navy, and a very small number only is required to furnish the service completely. That is a large sum; but still my right hon. Friend has not lost sight of the fact that with the increased knowledge we have of the manufacture of guns it may be advisable to make breech-loading guns. But whatever he does he will do with a view to the benefit and the safety of the country.

The Duke of Richmond

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, that these discussions had this great advantage—that they gave an opportunity for contact between two classes of opinions—the opinions of persons who were content to criticize our artillery from outside, and the opinions of those who had been connected in one capacity or another with the Administration, and who necessarily approached the subject with somewhat different feelings as regarded responsibility. He did not intend to include the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) among the critics to whom he had referred, because no one had a greater knowledge of the subject from an administrative point of view. But he would venture to remind their Lordships that if there was one conclusion more than another which had forced itself upon those who had had official connection with these matters, it was the extreme danger of perpetually introducing change in the armaments of this country. Change meant transition from one state of things to another, and a period of transition was a period of weakness. The conclusion which led the late Government to adopt what was known as the Woolwich system had been arrived at after great deliberation and with good reason. From 1864 to 1870 scarcely a year passed in which some Committee did not sit to inquire into the relative merits of breech-loading and muzzle-loading guns; and he was not overstating the case when he told their Lordships that, without almost a single exception, those inquiries resulted in an unanimous opinion in favour of the muzzle-loading system. He wished to ask whether anything had occurred since the muzzle-loading system had been adopted for field guns and heavy guns which ought to shake our confidence in them, and whether there was anything in the armaments of foreign countries which should lead us to distrust our own? There were two or three propositions which he thought might be advanced even by anyone unacquainted with the technical details of this subject. The first was that no change should be made from the existing state of things to one which did not exist merely for the sake of a very trifling advantage. The loss of power which would take place while the change was being effected in nine cases out of ten outweighed the ultimate advantage to be gained. Another general proposition which might be laid down was that a few years' experience in service was of great deal more value than the experience which resulted from any series of experiments at Shoeburyness or elsewhere. In the case of the guns in the Army and Navy, they had the experience of a considerable number of years—an experience which he ventured to think was, on the whole, favourable. A third proposition which he should venture to offer was that of two guns equal in all other respects, in power of penetration and in accuracy and rapidity of fire—one of them a muzzle-loading gun and the other a breech-loading gun—the presumption was in favour of the muzzle-loading one. What did the noble Duke behind him (the Duke of Somerset) tell them when dealing with projectiles? He said that composite projectiles were inferior to solid ones; and this was not less true of the gun from which the projectile was fired. A muzzle-loading gun was solid, the breech-loader was composite; and the difference was between solidity and mechanical union. This was especially true with regard to the colossal pieces now constructed for the defence of the country. In the case of these, the complication of the mechanism of a breech-loader seemed to him to offer an almost conclusive argument in favour of the opposed system. They had got guns with which the War Department was not dissatisfied. The field gun, in point of simplicity, gave the greatest possible satisfaction. They had heard rumours of a new field gun tried by Prussia, but Prussia had been endeavouring to obtain as good a gun as this country had already got. As to heavy guns, they had arrived at an 81-ton gun, and he had yet to learn that any other country had, or was likely to have, anything approaching to this. Now that the Navy was completely armed and the field batteries were also complete, he hoped the Government would not attempt any unsettling change without great consideration. The Lord Privy Seal had reminded the House that a number of accidents befell the French gunners who worked the Krupp guns taken from the Bavarians, and that these accidents might fairly be attributed to the inexperience of the French gunners. What would happen in the event of this country going to war? The Artillery Reserve would be called upon, he presumed, to fill up the gaps, and as they would have to handle guns of a complicated nature, accidents might be expected, as in the case of the French gunners called upon suddenly to handle the Krupp guns. He hoped the Government would proceed with great care in this matter, and that while fully informed with regard to the proceedings of foreign artillerists, they would hesitate to derange the national armaments by any new changes merely because those changes were being adopted by others.

LORD ELPHINSTONE observed, that it must be borne in mind that it was only after a long series of careful and costly experiments that they had arrived at the conclusion that for heavy ordnance muzzle-loading was superior to breech-loading. There were, it was true, objections to muzzle-loading that did not exist in breech-loading guns; the shot could not fit so tight, and not being fairly centred it wobbled as it left the bore, and the accuracy was impaired. Again, the rush of gas above the shot was so great that after only 150 rounds had been fired the gun had to be turned over and revented. That objection, however, had been overcome by the use of a gas check, which was a disc of copper screwed to the base of the shot, which effectually prevented the rush of gas, and the consequent scoring of the gun; while at the same time the shot was fairly centred, the accuracy, range, and the initial velocity was increased, and the stress upon the chamber was not increased at all; while, at the same time, the rear or bearing stud, which before the use of the gas check was very much worn by friction during the passage of the shot through the bore of the gun, was found now to be scarcely rubbed. An objection urged against muzzle-loading guns, as compared with those loading at the breech, was that while the latter might be increased to any length, the former could not, on account of the difficulty of loading; and, also, that the crew of a gun loaded at the muzzle must always be much exposed, especially when loading. That objection had been met by a very clever and simple contrivance, invented by Sir William Armstrong, by which the gun was loaded by hydraulic power. The turret was turned round until opposite an hydraulic rammer, the gun was depressed to an angle of three degrees, and the sponge forced home; when it reached the bottom of the bore it ejected a certain quantity of water, sluicing the chamber, and effectually extinguishing any fire that might be left. The shot was then raised by mechanical means outside the turret, rammed home, and the turret revolved into its fighting position; and it was obvious that in the handling of projectiles of the enormous weight now in use it was much safer to do so—especially in a sea way—outside the turret than inside, and among the gun's crew; while, at the same time, the crew were not exposed, owing to the protection afforded by the armour-plated shield of the hydraulic rammer covering the port while loading. It was said that the muzzle-loader had not the rapidity that was desirable. They had no means of comparing the rapidity of fire of heavy ordnance with that of the guns of foreign Powers; but he thought it would be interesting to their Lordships if he told them what he knew of the rapidity of firing of muzzle-loading guns. The 18-ton guns of the Sultan fired eight rounds in 9½ minutes, and the 12-ton guns of the Iron Duke fired eight rounds in 5 minutes. He thought that result was most satisfactory. Moreover, every one of these shots would have hit a ship at 1,200 yards. He believed that some of the guns on the German ships had burst, and, he believed that not long ago one gun had burst, killing two officers and the whole gun's crew. Some of the French guns also burst; but in this country they had not had a single accident by which a gun or a man was in the slightest degree hurt. The Americans, Denmark, and Italy, all preferred the muzzle-loading guns; indeed, the latter-named country was building two frigates in Italy, to be protected with 22 inches of iron, and to be armed with guns of 100 tons each, and these guns were to load at the muzzle, and would be the heaviest guns in the world. He thought that the Whitworth, or other breech-loading guns, might in many cases be of greater use than the guns loaded at the muzzle, and that especially so in boats. He was glad that further experiments were to be made with that description of gun, as he did not wish it to be inferred that he was a blind advocate of muzzle-loading. But what he did contend was, that so far as experience had taught them, they were fully justified in adhering to the muzzle-loading system for heavy ordnance, in preference to the breech-loading system.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL: My Lords, the discussion has been very interesting, and so full, that I do not feel called upon to say more than a few words. I think the decision at which Her Majesty's Government has arrived is extremely wise. I understand it to be this: they admit the principle that in invention there is no finality, and that however well satisfied they may be for the time with the system which has been adopted, they will not shut their eyes or ears to anything that offers a prospect of making an advance. There is another principle which may be laid down, and that is expressed in the familiar French proverb that "Better is always the enemy of good." If you always wait until you get something better, you will never have anything settled at all. Now, we were exactly in that position in 1869. It so happened, then, that the course of invention had unsettled everything in the way of armaments. Rifles, howitzers, field guns, siege guns, great guns—almost everything was in a state of confusion in the scientific world—the consequence was, that a large part of the Store Vote remained unexpended, and was repaid to the Exchequer; and, early in 1870, Sir John Adye, the Director of Artillery, came to me and said that any rumour of war would find us in a very awkward position. This was at the time when the Minister of France said, in the Chamber, that the horizon was without a cloud. My noble Friend (the Marquess of Lansdowne) has told you of the repeated Committees which have inquired into the subject. I believe they have uniformly reported in favour of a muzzle-loader, and with hardly an exception they have reported unanimously. First of all, there was the Ordnance Select Committee, the question before which arose in this way. The Navy had demanded a breech-loading gun, and by the year 1864, more than £2,000,000 had been expended on breech-loading guns, chiefly for the Navy. However, after further experience the Navy returned them into store, and there are acres of them at Woolwich. Then there was a Committee of superior Officers appointed in 1866, which reported unanimously in favour of a muzzle-loader. Next, in 1869, there was the Dartmoor Committee, which was also in favour of a muzzle-loader; and the Committee appointed to consider the question of new guns for India also unanimously recommended a muzzle-loader, which the Indian Government adopted. When my gallant Friend (Sir John Adye) brought the subject before me another Committee was expressly appointed to consider the question of muzzle-loaders and breech-loaders for field guns. It consisted of 11 officers, 10 of whom reported in favour of a muzzle-loading gun, and only one in favour of a breech-loader. Then we obtained a pattern of the Prussian breech-loading gun; and when we tried it against our muzzle-loading gun of the same size, our gun was unanimously reported to be superior. Under these circumstances, we determined upon making the field guns which we have now. I am informed and believe that we have the most powerful gun, and I am sure we have the simplest, the safest, and the most economical gun, that now exists. It is true that Prussia has re-armed her artillery with another breech-loading gun, and no one will doubt the very great weight of the authority of Prussia; but I am not aware of any proof that the new Prussian breech-loader is equal or superior to our muzzle-loader. The noble Duke behind me spoke very much in favour of the breech-loading system. I think we can all admit without dispute every word which the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) said in its favour, and certainly a civilian coming into office would naturally have a sympathy in favour of going forward with the breech-loading system. I certainly had such a sympathy; but I must say that when you come to arm your soldiers and sailors it will not do merely to have a sympathy with a system and to have general ideas, but you must know exactly what gun you mean to have and whether it is preferable to the gun which you possess already. The authority of foreign nations has been quoted. Now, I believe France and Austria are in favour of a breech-loading system in the abstract; but, unless I am greatly misinformed, neither France nor Austria has yet adopted any particular system of breech-loaders, and their authority cannot fairly be cited until they have done so. I think the Government have done right in not shutting the door against further investigation and experiment for this additional reason—that a remarkable invention has been made by Sir Joseph Whitworth of a kind of steel prepared by hydraulic pressure, which it is supposed will exclude all particles of air, and the steel will therefore become perfectly safe against explosion. Before we make guns, especially those which are to be used in ships, we had better know for certain whether this process is successful—and successful to such a degree that we can safely trust it in the making of guns; for although the noble Duke has said that we can have steel of any kind, it should be borne in mind that no steel has been yet used in gunnery which is not liable to explode. But if we have 99 guns which do not explode, and one which does explode, such a feeling of consternation will be produced among our soldiers and sailors that the one gun would do more harm than the 99 others did good. What we want to know is not whether 100 guns can be made 99 of which will not explode, but whether this invention will prevent the risk of explosion altogether. It must not be supposed that there is some official prejudice which retards improvement. The men who under the control of the illustrious Duke manage the Artillery of this country are not behind anybody in their zeal for new inventions, and among the inventions of the last few years none are more marvellous than those which have been introduced into the system of destroying human life. There have been two very distinguished men during the last few years at the head of the Naval Ordnance—Sir Cooper Key and Captain Hood—who have been of the same opinion on this subject as the authorities at the War Office. Therefore, you have the Navy and the Army, and the Government of India, acting according to their present lights, in entire concurrence. I was very glad, indeed, to hear the statements which were made by the noble Earl and the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Richmond) that we ought to retain our present system until we are sure of a better one, and that as there is no finality of invention we ought not to shut the door against further investigation and experiment.

Viscount Cardwell

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET, in reply, said, that the projectiles at present used for breech-loading guns were more expensive than those which were made for muzzle-loaders. That was a point worthy of consideration from an economical point of view, as the men must practise, even though the projectiles were very expensive. With regard to the suggestion of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) that we ought to ascertain the opinion of the officers of the Army, he would remind him that some years ago the officers were in favour of retaining "Brown Bess."

Motion agreed to.

POLLUTION OF RIVERS BILL.

(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in rising to call attention to the state of the law on the Pollution of Rivers, said, the subject was one in which a large portion of the country took a deep interest, and which had occupied the attention of the country for a considerable time. It had been considered by more than one Royal Commission. One Commission was appointed in 1865, and another, of which the late Sir William Denison was the Chairman, and Professor Frankland was a member, was appointed in 1868. These Commissions went all over the country and examined very carefully into the subject which was intrusted to them, and the result of their labours had been embodied in four elaborate Reports before Parliament. It seemed to the Government that the time had now arrived when some legislation ought to follow so much inquiry. In 1848 an Act of Parliament was passed in the interest of the public health, enacting that all localities should carry out an efficient system of drainage. Drainage must be put somewhere. You could not put it in the air; you could not always put it on the land; and when you could not put it on the land, you necessarily put it into a river. Concurrently with this process there had been an enormous growth of manufactories of all kinds—of dye works, of paper works, and, above all, of distilleries—and the consequence of turning the refuse of these works into the rivers had been to produce in many of our most useful streams a fearful condition of pollution. The grievance was a very real one, as was well known to noble Lords who lived on the banks of polluted streams; but for the sake of others, he might read one or two passages from the Report of the Commission on the Pollution of Rivers to show what was the evil and the necessity of applying a remedy. Dr. James Brunton, Sept. 6, 1869.—Report to Commissioners—

“Dr. Macadam remarks with reference to water taken from the junction of the Gala and the Tweed, ‘fish immersed in this liquid were deleteriously affected thereby, became sick and prostrate, and died within the day.’ Of the deposit taken from the junction of the Gala and the Tweed, he remarks that, ‘it was highly offensive, as it consisted in great part of organic matter in a state of putrefaction.’”

Certificate of James Weir, M.R.C.V.S., dated September, 1870—

“This is to certify that I have been called in very often by Mr. Thomas Shanks, farmer, Drumshanzie, Airdrie, to see his cattle. A great many of them have died through drinking the water of a stream which runs through his farm. This stream, in my opinion, is poisoned by liquid refuse from a paraffin oil refinery situated near to the farm. Mr. Shanks wishes very much the early attention of the Commissioners to be directed thereto.”

Statement by Bailie James Bain, Deputy Chairman of the Clyde Trustees, 25 July, 1870—

“The polluted state of the river Clyde is so generally known that I deem it unnecessary to attempt to prove it; but I take leave to enclose copy of a petition from owners and masters of steamboats, (see page 69 on the subject,) in which they refer to the loss they are sustaining thereby and pray for a speedy remedy. Also to the report of Dr. Anderson (see pp. 69-76) on the waste products from public works entering the Clyde, by the action of which, in combination with the ordinary sewage, it will be observed he considers the copper sheathing of ships is damaged and the public health impaired. I am aware it has been stated that the death rate on the river bank is not in excess of that in other parts of the city, but I believe there is much ill health. I have seen people so overcome with sickness from the stench of the river, as to require to be led ashore from the steamers. Surely it is not necessary to kill a man right off before it will be allowed that he has suffered injury. I consider the Police Board, the ‘local authority’ here, have been remiss, and that the Clyde Trust are aggrieved by their inaction.”

The Rev. F. G. Hopwood, Sankey Brook, Winwick, near Warrington—

“Not only does it beset us out of doors, but it penetrates into every room of the house, and the clothes in the laundry, with ‘the window closed,’ and also in the drying ground are discoloured and have frequently to be re-washed. On one occasion this winter (1869), in a few moments all the copper vessels in the kitchens were turned almost blue. It makes this place perfectly odious. The nuisance is constant, as the prevailing winds are from the west and north-west.”

James Nicholson, Esq., Warrington—

“I am lord of the manor of Thelwell, which lies upon the Cheshire side of the Mersey, about three miles from Warrington. Formerly, the river at that point abounded with fish, and was a clear stream; now, unfortunately, it is a fearful nuisance—black as ink at most times, and most offensive in smell.”

Mr. T. B. Laycock, a wool comber, on the Worth, said—

“Opposite my works the bed of the river has silted up very considerably. 40 years ago the bed was five or six feet deeper than it is at present, and the silting up to this great depth has been caused by ashes and rubbish thrown in by manufacturers and others. Formerly, trout were very plentiful in the stream, but now no living thing can exist except rats, which feed on the dead carcases of animals thrown in. The river for more than half-a-mile above my works is very seriously polluted by town sewage and refuse from manufactories and works, and in summer the stench is so bad that the smell is perceptible for more than half-a-mile off.”

Letter from Mr. Jepson, F.R.C.S., Durham, Sept. 1870—

“The River Wear at Durham is simply a gigantic cesspool receiving the sewage of the whole town, and in summer emitting a stench vile enough to generate a pestilence, especially when it is disturbed by boats.”

Letter from Mr. H. Reynard Cookson, Nov. 1, 1870—

“I am desirous of calling the attention of the Rivers Pollution Commissioners to the filthy state of the Bourne flowing from the Edmondsley Collieries through the town of Chester-le-Street, where it empties itself into the Wear. At times it is as yellow as ochre and as thick as glue, and a grave matter for the Commissioners report. It passes all through my grounds, and is an abominable nuisance.”

Extract from letter from R. Duncombe Shafto, Esq., Whitworth Park, Ferry Hill—

“The sewage matter from houses containing on the Spennymoor side nearly 5,000 inhabitants, is all poured into it by the present system of drainage, and in a very short time double the number of houses will be relieved of their filth by the same outlet, as all the Mount Pleasant and the houses near the Iron Works will be drained into it. The water now is as black as ink and so offensive, that a mile and a-quarter below Spennymoor, where it enters the Wear, it is an annoyance to have to cross the brook. No one in Spennymoor will say a word. They prefer being poisoned to the chance of having a rate to pay for the improvement of the drainage of the district; and I fear the medical men, who are painfully aware of the fatal character of the effluvia arising from this Stygian stream would probably be afraid of giving offence in certain quarters by giving evidence."

He believed that nothing had so fearful an influence in the pollution of rivers as the product of distilleries. If their Lordships could imagine the stench of the River Thames in the outbreak in which it indulged of 1858 and multiplied that stench by 36, they would have a fair idea of what the stench was which was produced by refuse from the distilleries of the favourite beverage of the people. As to the river at Manchester, he could testify from his visit to that city last winter that it was in a bad condition, and he was told by a high municipal authority that an unfortunate man tumbled into that river, and, before he could be rescued, swallowed a dose of the water, of which he died as soon as he had been drawn on to the bank. This was a state of things which called for some action on the part of Parliament. There was no doubt that those who interfered with their neighbours' rights below stream violated the law. It might therefore be asked why not be satisfied with the existing law for the abatement of the nuisance? His answer was that there was great difficulty in putting the law in force. It only recognized damage actually done. But it was usually difficult to ascertain by whom the damage was done; and, as was frequently the case, where the pollution was caused by the combined operation of two or more factories there was no power of ascertaining who was the responsible party. Another difficulty which was experienced with reference to the prevention of the pollution of rivers was the objection which some people had to being rated to pay for the expense of an improved drainage of a district—people sometimes preferred being almost poisoned to the chance of being called upon to pay for the remedy. The drainage of a district was not a matter which could be intrusted to local authorities; in many cases their decision could not be relied on, and it was always open to suspicion. It was therefore essential that in any legislation Parliament might undertake on this subject there should be some other machinery provided for carrying out its provisions than that of the local authorities. That was a point on which the Bill that he intended to lay on their Lordships' Table differed from others which had been brought forward hitherto. He proposed not to carry a case before any local tribunal—that was to say, any tribunal dependent on the local authorities. He was afraid that, in attaining that object, they must appeal to that officer who from small beginnings had acquired an important position—he meant the County Court Judge. It was obvious that cases of this kind which required immediate decision could not be tried at the Assizes, which in many cases only occurred twice in each year. For this reason it was proposed that offences under the Bill should be taken to the County Courts. The next question was as to the offences so to be dealt with, and in this respect the present Bill would differ in a vital point from the measure introduced by Lord Shaftesbury in 1872, and afterwards taken up by the noble Duke on the cross benches (the Duke of Northumberland). In the Bill of 1872, in accordance with the recommendations of the Commissioners, 10 standards were laid down in reference to the character of the ingredients of matter which might be thrown into streams, and it was made an offence to transgress any of these standards. The difficulty that was felt with regard to these tests was that they struck too far, and that on the one hand they would include water flowing from perfectly innocent sources, while on the other they were not sufficiently stringent to affect the very nuisances against which the legislation was directed. His view was that in dealing with nuisances it was better to trust to the common sense of the tribunal to which the cases were referred than to lay down a number of unwieldy chemical tests. The Bill, therefore, proposed to forbid the pouring of filthy, noxious, and polluting liquids into streams, and to leave it to the County Court Judges to decide upon evidence what liquids possessed the forbidden qualities. That was the most important change which this Bill proposed to make from the Bill recommended by the Government in 1872. He would next define the offences which were to be guarded against by the Bill. In the first place, it was absolutely forbidden to put solid matter into streams. With respect to sewage, it must either be freed from its polluting qualities or be kept out of the streams. With respect to liquids issuing from manufactories or mines, a distinction had been made between the various classes of offenders. Manufacturers or mine-owners who, at the passing of the Act, poured or permitted liquids to flow into streams, and who had not done so for more than 12 years—or had 12 years' prescription—would be bound to make it harmless within a space of two years, or be absolutely forbidden to pour or allow it to flow into streams. With regard to those who might be said to have a longer prescription, the Government had felt that they could not well do more than prescribe absolutely that the offending persons should use the best practicable and available means for making the liquids harmless. In the majority of cases he believed that this could be effectively done. The carrying of the Act into force would be intrusted to the rural sanitary authorities, with a power reserved to the Local Government Board to institute proceedings and enforce the law in case the rural authorities failed in their duty. In addition to this the Bill proposed that the sanitary authorities in drainage districts should be grouped into Conservancy Boards, as a better means of carrying out the provisions of the law. These were the principal provisions of the Bill, and he hoped they would be sufficiently stringent to arrest the greater part of the existing mischief without at the same time being so stringent as to arouse an amount of resistance in the country which could not be overcome. At the same time, the Act would be administered by authorities not liable to be swayed by the passions or interests of their constituents, but anxious only to carry out the law, and to preserve to all persons the right—which was as sacred as usage and habit could make any right—of using the waters of our rivers for all ordinary purposes, domestic and otherwise, to which they could be legitimately applied.

Then a Bill for amending the Law relating to the Pollution of River presented by the Marquess of SALISBURY.

EARL FORTESCUE expressed satisfaction with the course taken by the Government in proposing to deal with an important question. In his opinion, the most economical and desirable mode of purifying the sewage which now in so many cases polluted our rivers and streams was to filter it through land, which would be immensely fertilized by the process, thus turning what was otherwise a source of disease into one of largely increasing the production of food. This plan had been recently recommended in a remarkable Report from a scientific Commission—the Municipality of Paris—after being tried, on a small scale, with signal success. That sewage could thus not only be rendered innocuous, but made a source of fertility, had been proved; and he therefore impressed upon the Government the desirability of affording facilities for its application to agriculture. He thought compulsory powers should be granted for its conveyance through land to places where it might be required for irrigation; compensation, of course, being allowed under the usual conditions.

Bill read 1st, and to be printed. (No. 81.)

IMPORTATION OF CATTLE—ILL-TREATMENT IN TRANSIT.—QUESTION.

EARL DE LA WARR asked, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been drawn to the statements which have appeared in the public press relative to the ill-treatment of cattle imported into England from the Continent; whether such statements are correct; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government propose to take any steps to prevent a recurrence of the same?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he disputed the accuracy of the statements referred to. The name of the vessel in connection with which the ill-treatment was alleged to have occurred had not been given: but, on seeing the letter in The Times of the 22nd of April, he directed the Inspector of the Privy Council at Deptford—a very experienced officer of 25 years' standing—to inquire into, and make a special report on, the case. The vessel referred to appeared to be one which brought from Antwerp about 200 head of cattle. These beasts were landed at Deptford as usual under the superintendence of the Custom House officers, and remained in charge of an officer of the Privy Council until they were taken away to be slaughtered. The Inspector had himself seen them, but had failed to observe any indications of their having suffered ill-treatment on board ship. They were described as having been packed "like herrings in a barrel;" but the plain truth of the matter was that they were ranged closely side by side with their heads tied up to the side of the vessel—an arrangement which was necessary both for their own safety and to prevent danger and inconvenience to the passengers and crew. With reference to the absence of water, he was informed that it was very difficult indeed to induce cattle to drink on board ship until they had been at sea for a much longer period than appeared to have been taken up on the present voyage—namely, 22 hours. He was informed that during that space of time the discomfort was not unusually so great that quadrupeds as well as bipeds were not much disposed to drink. The Custom House officer, too, stated that he was present during the whole of the landing, and that he saw no acts of cruelty on the part of the drovers, which he should have done had they occurred. Again, at the landing-stage at Deptford the officers of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals were present, with whom would lie the duty of the institution of a prosecution if they were aware that the animals had been cruelly treated. The Inspector of the Privy Council, he might add, concluded his report by stating that in the course of the frequent inspections which he had made of the carcases of animals at the slaughterhouses at Deptford, he found them to be generally free from marks and bruises resulting from blows, and that he had no cause to suppose they were subjected to ill-treatment. As to any cruelty on the part of the drovers, he could only say he had been informed that those men were respectable persons licensed by the Corporation, and he believed that so much care was taken to prevent anything like ill-treatment that the Corporation regulated the size of the goads. He came to the conclusion, as the result of the inquiry, that not only there was no cause of complaint on the particular occasion in question, but that animals were subjected to no more inconvenience in transit than was absolutely unavoidable. He would conclude by calling attention to a letter which had been addressed by the Secretary of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals to the Veterinary Department of the Privy Council. In it he stated that he had seen Captain Stanley early in the morning of the day in which his letter appeared in The Times, but that he could not identify the person in charge of the cattle or any of the actors in the scene which he had described; Captain Stanley added that he did not wish to appear as a witness in the case, and no prosecution, therefore, could well be instituted by the Society. That being so, he was not prepared to take any further steps in the matter, or to make any regulations beyond those which at present existed.

House adjourned at Eight o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Third Reading — Municipal Elections * [118]; Artizans Dwellings * [126], and passed.

The House met at Two of the clock.

PARLIAMENT — PUBLICATION OF DEBATES AND PROCEEDINGS—EXCLUSION OF STRANGERS.—NOTICE.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY gave Notice, that he would, on the Motion of the noble Lord the Member for Radnor (the Marquess of Hartington), relative to the Reporting of the Debates of the House and the presence of Strangers, move—

"That it is expedient to make no permanent alteration in the rules relating to the reports of the debates or proceedings of the House or of any Committee thereof, or as to the presence of strangers, until the House has more fully considered the present system of reporting its proceedings, and the aid of information to be obtained by the appointment of a Select Committee."

ARMY—ROYAL ARTILLERY—THE ROYAL WARRANT OF 1871.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY WILMOT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is intended to grant to Officers of the Royal Artillery, who retired under the Royal Warrant of 1871, the step of honorary rank which is given to Officers of the Royal Marines and Royal Marine Artillery, who retire under the Royal Warrant of 1870?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, he had to state that special steps of honorary rank were allowed in certain cases in the Royal Artillery under the Warrant of 1871, but that was only in consequence of the great block which existed to promotion in that force. Steps of honorary rank were only allowed to officers retiring on full pay after 30 years' service; but it was not intended to grant such a step to those who retired under the Warrant of 1870, who would have the step on the ordinary retirement from the corps.

PARLIAMENT—

PUBLIC BUSINESS—THE PUBLIC WORKS LOAN BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he understood, with reference to the Public Business on the Paper, that if the Peace Preservation Bill was finished that day, the Budget would be taken on Monday next; but, if that were not so, he should like to hear from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he would proceed with the Public Works Loan Bill on Monday?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that the Notice given by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) would make it necessary to consider what should be done with that Bill, and he would undertake not to bring it on for consideration without seeing that ample time should be allowed for the discussion of the important Motion of which Notice was given by the hon. Member for Hackney. In case the Peace Preservation Bill should be finished that day, he would proceed with the Budget on Monday.

ARMY—ACTUARIAL CALCULATIONS. QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will lay before the House, the actuarial calculations that have been made for the War Office, showing the number of soldiers now serving who have enlisted since 1870 for short service, and the probable annual rate at which they will pass into the Army Reserve in the year 1876 and three following years?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, if the hon. and gallant Gentleman would ask him privately, he would confer with him as to the information that could be given.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 77.]

(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 29th April.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 3 (Continuance of Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1870, subject to Amendments and modifications).

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING moved, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 37, to leave out the words—"When any person is charged in any proclaimed district before any justices of the peace assembled at petty sessions." He considered that to give the magistrates such a power of summary jurisdiction would be dangerous when political questions were involved. The first time that summary jurisdiction in degree was given to magistrates in Ireland, under any Coercion Act, was in 1870. That power was, however, limited; but, by the present Bill, it was for the first time proposed to give an extension of power to the magistrates of Ireland which they never possessed before. He believed that the Irish magistrates were as pure as any magistrates in the United Kingdom; but he considered the summary jurisdiction which the magistrates assembled in petty sessions possessed was too great, and the object of his Amendment was to do away with the power as exercised under the Acts of 1847 and 1870.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, the power of summary jurisdiction applied only to the restriction upon the possession of arms, and he had introduced it in the interests of persons accused, his experience on the English Bench having shown that defendants often preferred to be dealt with summarily instead of being committed for trial and having a charge hanging over their heads for an indefinite period. He would accept the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan), that a case should be dealt with summarily only with the consent of the accused, and he was prepared to reduce the term of imprisonment from six months to three in the hope that the clause would not be opposed. The main reason for the insertion of the clause was that it would tend to a speedy and cheap administration of justice in Ireland.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING thanked the right hon. Baronet, and said that he was willing to accept the compromise, and, on the statement just made, would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On the Motion of Mr. M'CARTHY DOWNING, the following Amendments made:—In page 2, line 41, after "think fit" insert the words "and if the person so charged shall himself desire it;" and in page 3, line 4, strike out the words "with or without hard labour."

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH moved, as an Amendment, in page 3, line 5, to leave out "six," in order to substitute "three" months as the term of imprisonment.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING hoped that the usual limit to the magistrates' power of imprisonment would in this case, as in others, be two months, or a fine of £5.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, he thought that three months was the more usual term; and it should be borne in mind that the magistrates could, if they thought fit, limit the imprisonment to two months or any less term.

Amendment agreed to.

Word substituted.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING moved, as an Amendment, in page 3, line 10, after "if," insert "the person charged shall object to having his case summarily disposed of; and shall require same to be sent for trial in the ordinary way or if."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PLUNKET) could not accept the Amendment, as he did not think it would be workable.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BIGGAR (for Mr. FAY), moved, as an Amendment, in page 3, line 22, after "cause," insert "and such dismissal shall in every case carry with it the costs and expenses of the person charged against the prosecutor or prosecutors."

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PLUNKET) said, it was quite impossible for him to entertain the Amendment, or anything of the kind. Of course, in the case of a malicious prosecution the accused could recover costs in the ordinary way.

MR. BIGGAR said, as the Amendment was not his own, he did not feel justified in withdrawing it.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, the Crown being the prosecutor, costs could not be recovered against the Crown. Under the present law a magistrate had power of ordering costs. Therefore, there was no necessity for the Amendment.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA hoped the Amendment would be withdrawn.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING moved, as an Amendment, in page 3, lines 27 and 28, to leave out the words, "and sentenced to a term of imprisonment exceeding one month." The object which he had in view in moving that Amendment was to give an accused person a right of appeal against the decision of the magistrates. A man might be accused wrongfully, and sentenced to imprisonment; and it would be a great hardship, and a most serious act of injustice, to deny him the right of appeal against the sentence when he would have the right if he was fined one pound and a penny.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, lines 27 and 28, to leave out the words "and sentenced to a term of imprisonment exceeding one month." — (MR. DOWNING.)

SIR GEORGE BOWYER hoped Her Majesty's Government would accept the Amendment, as it would be a most serious punishment to imprison an innocent man a month without the right of appeal. He thought that there should be an appeal in cases of imprisonment even though the period was less than a month.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PLUNKET) hoped the Amendment would not be pressed as he could not consent to it. He would remind the Committee that a prisoner had the option of being tried at the Assizes. He could not be tried summarily by the magistrates unless by his own consent. The Government had followed the precedent of the Irish Petty Sessions Act, and under the circumstances he had stated he could not see the hardship which had been complained of as likely to be inflicted.

MR. MELDON expressed his intention of voting for the Amendment. The right of appeal as it stood was in a very unsatisfactory state. Over and over again persons fined £1 or a smaller sum applied to be fined £1 1s., so as to obtain the right of appeal, and there was much greater hardship in cases of imprisonment. They would have prisoners applying to be sentenced to more than a month's imprisonment, for the same reason if the Amendment were not accepted, as he hoped it would be by Her Majesty's Government.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU was of opinion that the Amendment ought to be adopted by the Government. It would be a most serious thing to imprison a man, even for a day, without giving him a right to appeal against a sentence which, he being innocent, might ruin him in the estimation of his neighbours. Take, for instance, a respectable farmer. Such a sentence, without power of appeal, would be ruinous to him, and would embitter his future life. Surely it would be right that a man should have the power of proving before a higher tribunal that he was not a criminal. He was thus far in favour of his hon. Friend's proposal.

MR. BIGGAR supported the Amendment, and contended that such summary power of jurisdiction should not be given to the magistrates.

MR. O'SULLIVAN strongly disapproved of the power of summary jurisdiction being placed in the hands of the magistrates. He supported the Amendment, and hoped the Government would accept it.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, it should be remembered that the cases referred to were those in which the persons accused consented to be tried before the magistrates, and if they so consented they must take the consequences. What was now proposed was that an exception should be made from the general operation of the law, and he did not see why, if they were convicted, they should be placed in a better position than persons tried at quarter sessions. He saw no reason for such an exception, and hoped, therefore, that the clause would be left as it stood.

MR. W. E. FORSTER pointed out, in reply to the Chief Secretary, that that legislation altogether was of an exceptional character, and he thought that if an appeal was given where a man had been sentenced to be imprisoned for a month and a day, it ought not to be refused where the term of imprisonment was only a day less. He could not see why, because a man elected one of two modes to be tried, he should be deprived of the right of appeal.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, that depriving a man of the right of appeal would cause the decisions of magistrates to be looked upon as odious in the extreme. This was a case where it would be justifiable to make some departure from the ordinary law and allow an appeal.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN must protest in the most emphatic manner against the power of summary jurisdiction proposed by the clause to be placed in the hands of magistrates. Imprison an innocent man without the right of appeal and you ruin him for life. The power proposed was most arbitrary, and he hoped the Committee would accept the Amendment.

Question put, "That the words 'and sentenced to a term of imprisonment' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 187; Noes 110: Majority 77.

MR. SULLIVAN (for Mr. BUTT) moved, as an Amendment, in page 3, line 33, at end, insert—

"Every proclamation heretofore issued under any of the Peace Preservation Acts hereby continued, and which shall at the passing of this Act be in force in any district in Ireland, shall, unless previously revoked, continue in force and effect until the first day of August next, and no longer."

The effect of the Amendment was that in putting this measure in force the Government of Ireland should begin as it were with a clear board.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 33, after the word "mentioned," to insert the words "every proclamation heretofore issued under any of the Peace Preservation Acts hereby continued, and which shall at the passing of this Act be in force in any district in Ireland, shall not continue in force and effect after the first day of August next, unless previously renewed."—(Mr. Butt.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, if the Amendment was adopted, and the Bill became law, it would affirm that it was necessary that power should be continued to the Lord Lieutenant to impose by proclamation certain exceptional laws upon such parts of Ireland as he thought fit, and, at the same time, every proclamation now in force would be revoked. That, he thought, would be a perfect absurdity. Under the Bill as it stood, the responsibility of the Lord Lieutenant in continuing a proclamation was just as great as that of issuing it, and they might rely upon it the Irish Government would not keep any district under proclamation longer than was absolutely necessary.

MR. BUTT thought this was a very important Amendment. He obtained a Return last year, and found from it that all the proclamations which had been issued in 1866 were still in force in a great many districts in Ireland. They seemed to be retained as a matter of course, for there did not appear to be any inquiry instituted as to whether they were still necessary. The Chief Secretary had said there was as much responsibility in continuing as in issuing these proclamations, but he would like to know at what particular time that responsibility arose. All that was desired in proposing the Amendment was to make that responsibility distinct. He had the fullest confidence in the promises of the right hon. Baronet, but he wanted to embody in the Bill the pledge given by him that proclamations should be revoked in districts where they were not needed. The right hon. Gentleman said these proclamations were necessary in some counties, but which counties were they? And if it was intended to drop the restrictions gradually, why did not the Government bind themselves to do it? If the right hon. Gentleman wished to protect himself let him give himself the protection pointed out.

MR. W. E. FORSTER thought there was a good deal in the arguments of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and that as they were continuing these Acts for another five years there was some ground for saying it should be made quite clear by the Bill itself that they expected from the Executive Government that it would examine whether these proclamations were really necessary. He would suggest, therefore, that the object of the hon. and learned Member would be better attained if the latter part of his Amendment were struck out and words were substituted providing that the proclamations in question should "not continue in force and effect after the 1st of August next unless previously renewed."

MR. BUTT acceded to the suggested alteration. The difference it would make was very trifling, but it appeared to be an improvement. The same words had occurred to himself, but he rejected them, because they seemed to be clumsy. He would, however, move the Amendment as altered by the right hon. Gentleman.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he could not accept the Amendment. He thought it was a remarkable fact that although the late Government, of which the right hon. Member for Bradford was a Member, brought in a Bill of that kind in 1870, which they afterwards renewed in 1871 for two years, and again in 1873 for another two years, yet on none of those occasions did they insert any such provision as the right hon. Gentleman now suggested, fettering the discretion of, and expressing a want of confidence in, the Irish Government. The inference to be drawn from the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman amounted to this—that he had no confidence either in the promises that had been given, or in the Irish Government. If they accepted that Amendment, it would be assumed that every part of Ireland was prima facie in a state that would not justify the continuance, even in a modified form, of that measure. If the Government believed that to be the case, they would not have asked the House to renew that Act at all, and certainly not to renew it for five years. For his own part he had promised that when the Bill became law, he would carefully look into the circumstances connected with each proclaimed district, and he should do so in the hope that the Government would be able, consistently with law and order, to withdraw the proclamations from several districts and counties of Ireland. Having said that, he asked the Committee to put confidence in the Government, and not fetter its action.

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in answer to the charge of inconsistency made against him by the Chief Secretary, said, that the right hon. Baronet must have forgotten that there was a considerable difference between continuing such an Act for two years and continuing it, as was now proposed, for five years. Moreover, it did not follow that what the late Government thought was necessary some years ago for Ireland was necessary now; and the present Government themselves were making alterations in that code, because they did not think the state of things was the same now as it was before. All that the Chief Secretary was now asked to agree to, was to put into the Bill what he had just promised that the Government would do. That was only fair, under the circumstances, in a matter affecting the liberties of Ireland. He did not wish to fetter in the slightest degree the action of the Irish Government; but he thought hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House should not be charged with want of confidence in the Government now in office, simply because they held that it would be better for all persons to know what was going to be done, and that such intention ought to be stated in the Bill.

CAPTAIN NOLAN, with all due respect for the Chief Secretary, was not prepared to give him the unlimited power which he claimed over the liberties of the people of Ireland. He gathered from the remarks of the right hon. Baronet that the people of Ireland were to trust to him. Well, he might be a very good Chief Secretary in his own estimation, and he (Captain Nolan) had nothing to say on that head, but he would call his attention to the fact that whilst in all the important divisions yesterday there were 40 Irish Members against him, there were only 20 with him. That was an evidence that in Ireland the people did not feel that wonderful confidence in the Irish Chief Secretary which was expected of them.

MR. FRENCH was sure they might put implicit confidence in the promises made by the right hon. Baronet; but they had no guarantee that he would continue in his present office for five years. In that case, the next Gentleman who might be appointed to the office might not consider himself bound by the promises now made by the right hon. Baronet, and they ought to have some guarantee against such a contingency as that.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK, expressed his full concurrence in the observations of the right hon. Member for Bradford.

MR. MELDON supported the Amendment, as he wished to make it imperative on the Government to consider immediately those proclamations which ought to be withdrawn, and those which ought to remain in force.

MR. BUTT said, he was willing, if the right hon. Baronet thought the 1st of August was too soon, to give him to the 1st of September or the 1st of October to reconsider these proclamations. All he wanted was that they should be reviewed at some fixed time known to the public.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 142; Noes 203: Majority 61.

MR. BUTT (for Mr. O'REILLY) moved, as an Amendment, in page 3, line 33, at end, add—

"Nothing herein contained shall have the effect of continuing the seventh and eighth sections of the Act passed in the eleventh year of Her Majesty, entitled 'An Act for the better Prevention of Crime and Outrage in certain parts of Ireland until the 1st day of December, 1849, and the end of the then next Session of Parliament;' and from and after the passing of this Act the said sections shall be and the same are hereby repealed."

Its object was to get rid of the special police tax, levied on an area arbitrarily determined by the Lord Lieutenant, a tax which was very oppressive in incidence, the more so as the Constabulary was not a civil force, but an army of occupation. There were districts in which the tax, added to compensations for outrage, had amounted to 6s. in the pound, a burden which had ruined some undoubtedly innocent persons, as the payment incurred under it fell upon the best behaved classes of the country. All the evidence before the Westmeath Committee was against this special taxation. Its imposition could do no possible good in the repression of crime, and it led many loyal men to view the Government with disaffection.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 33, after the word "mentioned," to insert the words "nothing herein contained shall have the effect of continuing the seventh and eighth sections of the Act passed in the eleventh year of the reign of Her Majesty, entitled 'An Act for the better prevention of Crime and Outrage in certain parts of Ireland until the first day of December one thousand eight hundred and forty-nine, and the end of the then next Session of Parliament;' but from and after the passing of this Act the said sections shall be and the same are hereby repealed."—(Mr. Butt.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he could not accept the Amendment. There was not an argument in favour of fining districts, in order to compensate persons aggrieved or injured through agrarian crime, which did not apply with still greater force to a local tax for the maintenance of special police stations in districts notorious for crime. The ordinary Constabulary Force was paid out of the ordinary Revenue of the United Kingdom; and, therefore, when the conduct of the inhabitants of any particular district rendered it necessary that a special and additional police force should be located amongst them, it was but fair and proper they should bear the expense of it. In 1874, there had been only three instances in which it had been necessary to call the Act into operation, and he believed that the whole of the cost did not exceed £184. He trusted the Committee would not be troubled to divide upon the Amendment.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA urged the unanimity of the evidence before the Westmeath Committee against the police tax. That given by Mr. Rocheford Boyd, Mr. Talbot, and other stipendiary magistrates went to show that the provisions which it was the object of the Amendment to repeal operated with harshness upon the class of small farmers, and alienated them from any sympathy with the Government in the maintenance of law and order. The hon. Baronet read extracts from Mr. Boyd's evidence, complaining of the operation of the law even as it then stood in respect to fines on the inhabitants of certain districts, also a letter addressed to himself (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) by the late J. F. Studdert, resident magistrate, then stationed at Moate, in the County of Westmeath, in which the writer said he believed—

"If the police were kept active, 80 per cent of the crime complained of could be put down, and if the people of the country were fairly treated the remaining 20 per cent would soon cease."

In the great majority of cases, murders in a certain district were not committed by the persons resident in that district, and thus the peaceful inhabitants in which a murder was committed had to smart for outrages perpetrated by a stranger. Every extra constable cost the country £37 per annum, and that was a great tax upon the well-disposed.

Mr. M'CARTHY DOWNING also supported the Amendment, and expressed the belief that the great majority of the magistrates in Ireland would be in favour of the repeal of those Acts. The magistrates who gave evidence before the Westmeath Committee were unanimous in desiring their repeal.

Mr. MOORE also supported the Amendment, and believed that the real reason why men were recently found to be short in Tipperary was in consequence of their not receiving sufficient wages.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, he could not support the Amendment. He had full reason to believe that this power would be exercised with great care, and he was not able to satisfy himself that it would be desirable to relax precautions against agrarian crime. He believed there might be cases of hardship in this particular mode of meeting outrages; but he must admit the justice of the general principles of putting on a district some of the expense of providing against these special crimes, and rough as the remedy might be, he thought it was a fair one. Unfortunately, there were districts in Ireland in which public opinion was not so strongly exerted to put down crime as could be wished, and the cost of maintaining the extra police force was not unlikely to have a beneficial effect. Of course the districts objected; but he could not accept the objections of Members who represented these districts as conclusive.

Mr. SULLIVAN said, that was really a "vengeance tax," and although the peasantry might have no sympathy with the murders committed in the neighbourhood, yet they were made to pay. The mode of its operation was exactly as if one of the Prussian commanders in France had a complaint to make against a particular district, and quartered a division upon the inhabitants in order to requisition the district; for the Lord Lieutenant might send down one of his battalions to punish a certain district, and eventually leave the people not a bed to sleep upon, and thus drive them from their farms and consign them to pauperism and the workhouse, or compel them to emigrate. It was more effective than any other mode for clearing off the small peasant occupiers of land, and he asked any landlord in the house, whether he believed that the position of the Irish peasantry was such that they could afford to pay increased taxes for the maintenance of a police force without letting their rents fall into arrears? And if they fell into arrears with their rent, then their landlords, who were not worse than landlords in any other part of Great Britain, distrained, and they were turned out of their holdings. The unfortunate people were too poor to be able to pay the 6s. 3d. in the pound for the quarter, and had to beg from door to door to get the means of paying the "vengeance money." They went to the police officer, who treated them very kindly, but said he had no power to give them the further time which they asked for. They had to pawn their goods. A Protestant gentleman once told him he had seen such scenes. The people brought their little bits of furniture to the cross roads, and the wretched spectacle was presented of these poor people selling their bedding at prices varying from 3½d. to 3s. 6d., and thus producing a sum of no use to the Government, while it left many poor children without any bed but one of heath, plucked for them from the hillside. As an instance of its oppressive character, in the case of the murder of Mr. Bradshaw, in Tipperary, an extra police force had been stationed in the district; and yet the inquest disclosed that the murder arose from domestic circumstances which had never been probed. The peasantry had to pay a police-tax more than equal in amount to their year's rental. Their rents accordingly fell into arrear, their landlords distrained upon them, and they lost the chance of availing themselves of the compensation clauses of the Tenant Right Act. Again, a Mr. Hunter was shot in Mayo, but not by the peasantry. An iron police barrack was, however, brought down from Dublin, and a police force was quartered on the district. There were 60 families in the district, who were asked to pay 25s. in the pound. They were too poor to pay, and they were obliged to sell everything they had. If English gentlemen could only realize the scenes which took place, and the wretchedness which followed them, they would hesitate before they imposed such legislation. He protested against it, and said, as the police were in reality a military force, they ought to be treated as such, and be paid for in the usual way.

Mr. CLIVE said, he could not support the Amendment, for if there was one clause in the Bill more valuable than another, it was the one in question. He thought there had been some exaggeration in the speech just delivered. A more harmless man than Mr. Hunter never existed, and he oppressed nobody, yet he was murdered. In the following year a farmer was shot at within two miles of his (Mr. Clive's) door, the ball passing through his clothes, and that was done because he had befriended the widow of Mr. Hunter. In the neighbourhood was a very troublesome population, but as soon as the extra police force was stationed in the district they became very quiet and orderly.

THE O'CONOR DON observed, that those cases rather furnished an argument against the tax. The tax in Mr. Hunter's case was enormous, but from his known inoffensive character, and from his general popularity, the inevitable conclusion was that his death was the consequence of a domestic quarrel. There was another case in the same county in which the claim to compensation was resisted on the ground that the murder was committed by a member of the family of the murdered man. In the case of Mr. Hunter, there being no motive for the crime on the part of neighbours, that ought certainly to be an argument against the imposition of a fine so tremendous as was then levied, and as the imposition of this fine led to the bad treatment of the widow, Mrs. Hunter, he maintained that the law had directly led to the commission of crime instead of having repressed it. The subject was very fully gone into before the Westmeath Committee in 1871. A large number of witnesses were examined by it, who knew the country well, and they declared that this provision would have a most injurious effect. Even landlords, who were strongly and urgently in favour of all other means of coercion, were opposed to a resort to this one; and some who avowed that at one time they thought it would be useful, having seen it in operation, declared before the Committee that its operation had been the very contrary of what the Government expected it would be.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided: — Ayes 85; Noes 282: Majority 197.

MR. SULLIVAN moved, as an Amendment, in page 3, line 33, at end, add—

“Provided always, That nothing herein contained shall be deemed or taken to continue the tenth section of the Act passed in the eleventh year of the reign of Her Majesty, entitled ‘An Act for the better Prevention of Crime and Outrage in certain Parts of Ireland until the first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and forty-nine, and to the end of the then next Session of Parliament,’ and from and after the passing of this Act the said section shall be and the same is hereby repealed.”

The hon. Member, referring to the Answer given a few nights ago by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, in reply to his Question as to what the Government intended doing with regard to American gentlemen who were expected in Ireland to shoot in a rifle competition, declared that they were going to exercise the dispensing power which dethroned James II. There was no use blinking the question. Unless the Government repealed the section in question it would be in the power not only of the police, but of any civilian, to walk up to any of those American gentlemen, and on his failing to produce the shooting licence from Dublin Castle have him removed to gaol. The right hon. Gentlemen would not like that 30 American gentlemen should go back to their country, and say “Talk of the British Constitution, why when we got under it our rifles were taken from us, because we had not a police ticket of leave for shooting.” The right hon. Gentleman said that those gentlemen would not be interfered with more than English gentlemen who went to Ireland for sporting purposes; but if those gentlemen were not interfered with, by virtue of any power conferred by statute, the Government were exercising the very same power as drove James II. from his Throne. It was not the case, however, that English gentlemen were left unmolested by the police in Ireland as regarded shooting. On the contrary, he had letters from English gentlemen complaining of their treatment by the police. One gentleman he would mention, who had rented the shooting of rabbits at a warren near Cork, could not produce his ticket-of-leave when called upon, and was bluntly told that unless he ceased firing until he got his ticket-of-leave, his next bedroom would be a cell. He could mention one or two other cases of the kind, but would conclude by moving his Amendment.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he did not know why the hon. Member was so anxious about American riflemen, who were not coming to Ireland at his invitation, and who were not going to be entertained by him. He had been informed, however, by those who had invited these gentlemen, that the same arrangements which had been made on previous occasions in cases of this kind, would be made to prevent the riflemen from coming into collision with the law. The section which the hon. Member proposed to repeal only provided that persons unlawfully carrying arms should be apprehended, and that magistrates should have the power to order a search for arms. It would be evident that it would be impossible to carry out a law restrictive of the use of arms without some such provision; and, looking at the majorities by which the Committee had affirmed the restriction on the possession of arms, he hoped the matter would not longer be contested.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, that, unfortunately, the statement of the right hon. Gentleman as to the riflemen not having been invited by the hon. Member for Louth was perfectly correct. They were not coming at the request of a Representative of the Irish people—he might say at the request of Ireland.

MR. RONAYNE asked, if it was illegal to carry arms, why were people allowed to get over the illegality by this hocus-pocus work? There was evidently some secret communication between the officials of the Castle and the police, by which persons of one class were permitted to commit illegal acts with impunity, for which those of another class were severely punished, and it was this that the people of Ireland objected to. The hon. Member instanced several cases in which gentlemen who had been arrested with arms illegally in their possession had been saved from the necessity of attending at quarter sessions by the interference of friendly magistrates or officials in direct variance with the law.

MR. BIGGAR trusted the Government would accede to the Amendment.

MR. SULLIVAN said, the Committee should insist upon having a statement from the Government on this very important subject. Let him bring out from his secret desk [“Oh, oh!”]—yes, from his secret desk—let him produce some documents showing where he obtained this power to excuse certain persons from the penalties of carrying arms. Hon. Members could not find the power in any of the volumes before them—in neither the common nor the statutory law. Where, he asked, did the Chief Secretary get his power to deal as he proposed with these American riflemen? In a constitutional way he said the right hon. Gentleman must produce it to the Committee if it were in existence. With regard to the taunt which had been directed to him (Mr. Sullivan) as to his not having invited the American riflemen, he would make this offer to the right hon. Gentleman—he would undertake to bring over from America battalion after battalion of riflemen, and let it be seen who would first cry, "Hold! enough!"

MR. R. E. PLUNKETT, as one of the Irish Eight, said, he was certain that when their American guests came over to Ireland, they would not be inconvenienced in any way by the Act in question. If he thought they would be inconvenienced he should not support the Government. The grievance of the hon. Member for Louth was a sentimental one.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH was reminded of the saying about a storm in a tea-cup by the denunciations of the hon. Member for Louth. The hon. Gentleman seemed to imagine that there was some secret and awful power vested by law in the Government which nobody knew of but the present Chief Secretary, and which was never applied before.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he did not imagine anything of the kind, but only said that the right hon. Baronet had foreshadowed it by saying he knew how to arrange matters.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he would explain the simple state of the case to the hon. Gentleman. He was informed by the Secretary of the Irish Rifle Association, that it was the practice to apply to the licensing authority some days before the match came off for licences for the gentlemen they had invited to compete in shooting. These licences were, of course, granted, and nothing took place which could wound the national susceptibilities of any visitor.

MR. RONAYNE wished to know whether the same privilege would be extended to the riflemen whom he and his friends might invite?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, the hon. Member for Cork had repeatedly told them that he would not submit to the degradation of asking for a licence for himself; and it could therefore hardly be supposed that he would ask for licences for his friends or wish that they should degrade themselves by asking on their own behalf.

MR. RONAYNE said, neither would he for himself. He had deprived himself of considerable source of pleasure as a sportsman for some years rather than go through the indignity of asking a policeman for permission to carry a gun.

Amendment negatived.

MR. RONAYNE moved, in page 3, line 33, at end, to add—

"From and after the passing of this Act none of the provisions of the Act of the eleventh year of the reign of Her Majesty which were continued by 'The Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1856,' and are continued by this Act, which relate to the having or carrying arms, or any penalties for same, shall extend to any arms or other things mentioned therein except to guns, pistols, and other firearms, and all such provisions, so far as same are continued by this Act, shall be read as if guns, pistols, and other firearms, and no other arms or weapons, had been included or mentioned therein."

The meaning of the clause would be understood by the definition of the word "arms." The Bill, as it stood, was intended by the Government to put down agrarian crime. Well, as agrarian outrages had never been committed by means of the cutlass, the sword, the pike, or the bayonet, surely these need not be retained in the provisions. A great deal of annoyance had been caused to people through their houses having been searched, and old weapons, such as swords belonging to ancestors being taken away. Under the Bill as it stood, even the possession of foils and stage rapiers was illegal—so that the Bill would deprive the Irish people of the pleasure of acting Shakespeare's plays, for what would Hamlet be without a sword? Then cannon were included in the Bill. Well, he had never heard of a landlord having been shot with a cannon. Yet cannon were included in an Act—the pretence of which was the suppression of agrarian outrage in Ireland. He did not think he was asking anything unreasonable in requesting that his Amendment be accepted.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 33, after the word "mentioned," to insert the words "From and after the passing of this Act none of the provisions of the Act of the eleventh year of the reign of Her Majesty which were continued by 'The Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1856,' and are continued by this Act, which relate to the having or carrying of arms, or any penalties for same, shall extend to any arms or other things mentioned therein, except to guns, pistols, and other firearms, and all such provisions, so far as same are continued by this Act, shall be read as if guns, pistols, and other firearms, and no other arms or weapons had been included or mentioned therein."—(Mr. Ronayne.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH observed that the Amendment would exclude revolvers, swords, cutlasses, pikes, and bayonets from the term "arms." Everybody knew that a pike was not an unknown weapon in Ireland, and instances had come before him of party processions in which imitation pikes had been carried; and he had no doubt real pikes would have been carried but for this prohibition. It was needless to say that he could not agree to the Amendment.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 67; Noes 270: Majority 203.

THE O'CONOR DON, in formally moving the omission of the words giving the Grand Jury power to assess damages upon a district where an outrage had occurred, said, he only did so to put himself in Order. It was admitted by the Prime Minister that there ought to be no fine where the criminal was given up, or where no reasonable ground existed for supposing that evidence which might lead to a conviction was kept back. He had on former occasions strongly objected to the whole system of fining innocent individuals under any circumstances. His objections had not been met. He would not then repeat his arguments; but he wished to know from the Chief Secretary whether he was prepared to make any concession in the direction indicated on a previous evening?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, the question had been fully discussed already, and he hoped it was not about to be re-opened. He had hoped that the hon. Member would himself have proposed an Amendment to give effect to his views, and was rather surprised that he had not done so. He did not, upon consideration, think that it would do to exempt from payment a district in which some person had been convicted of the crime, though it might be hard to punish a district when it was shown that the inhabitants had done their best to deliver the culprit up to justice. However, he was willing, at a later stage of the Bill, to introduce an Amendment to the existing law to the following effect:—

"Provided that no such presentment be made or affirmed unless in the opinion of the grand jury there is reason to believe that material evidence is withheld by any person resident within the districts on which the presentment is to be levied."

Though he did not pledge himself to the exact words, that was the Amendment which he was prepared to propose, and he hoped it would be accepted as a settlement of the difficulty. He wished it to be understood that while the Government would maintain the principles of the Bill intact, they desired to render it as little oppressive as possible.

THE O'CONOR DON thought that the Amendment proposed would be satisfactory. The right hon. Baronet expressed surprise that he (the O'Connor Don) had not put Amendments on the Paper similar in spirit to that which he had himself proposed; but he had such an objection to this legislation in principle that he did not think that he would be justified in making any attempt to patch it up. He, however, hoped that his hon. Friends would withdraw their Amendments, and accept the proposition shadowed forth by the right hon. Baronet.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, he could not agree that this would be a very great improvement, for Grand Juries would generally be of the opinion referred to in the Amendment. What would be a great improvement would be this—that the ratepayers should have the right to traverse the presentment, and try the question before a Judge and jury, as was the practice under the old law, which gave compensation for malicious injuries.

MR. BIGGAR concurred in the objection to the proposed Amendment, and thought that instead of the term "any person," it should be "any ratepayer."

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, he would not again discuss the question whether compensation should be paid to the relations of a murdered man. That question had been already settled by the Committee.

He would only say that if Ireland would not be the pleasantest place in the world to be murdered in it would be so far as the next of kin of the victim were considered, seeing that they were to receive compensation in money in consequence of the commission of the crime. He begged to move as an Amendment in page 3, line 38, after "presentment," to insert—

"That the money shall be levied off a poor law union or off an electoral district of a poor law union, or of several districts of a poor law union, and through the collecting machinery of a poor law union, and in the same proportion between the proprietor and the occupier as that in which the poor rates are now collected, and also."

The rates in Ireland were of two different kinds—the poor rates which were paid equally by the occupiers and the landlords, and the county cess which was paid entirely by the tenants. The theory of the county cess, as settled by this House in 1870, was that the rate should be paid equally in cases of new contracts, but the landlords were in the habit of contracting themselves out of this rate altogether. His contention was, that half of the money presented as compensation should be paid by the landlords and half by the tenants, and this would practically be the case if it was paid out of the poor rates. If they did not adopt the Amendment, they would be declining to carry out a principle which had been adopted in the case of the Explosive Substances Bill and other measures.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, the principle brought forward by the hon. and gallant Member in his Amendment was that the tax should be paid partly by the occupiers and partly by the owners of property, instead of by the occupiers only as at present. He did not propose at present to go into the question of local taxation, nor would he attempt to deal with the question of Grand Jury compensation; but he would address himself to the reason why this should be an occupier's and not an owner's tax. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had accused the Government of going against the principle of existing legislation, but he had to remind him that the 69th section of the Irish Land Act specially provided that charges of this description—for murder or malicious injury—to be levied under the Peace Preservation Act, should not be divided between owner and occupier. The occupier of land, as a rule, would be a resident in the district, whereas the owner would, very likely, be non-resident, and the result of this was that by taxing the occupiers the tax fell on those who would in all probability possess some knowledge of the criminals who had disturbed the peace of the district, whereas if the owners were equally taxed, those who knew nothing whatever of the matter would have to bear the burden equally with those possessing a guilty knowledge.

THE O'CONOR DON regretted that he could not support the Amendment of his hon. and gallant Friend. To do so would be to admit the principle that the person who had suffered an injury arising out of some agrarian cause, was justly entitled to receive a money payment in respect of it, though not entitled to receive such compensation if the injury arose from some other cause. He could never see the justice of this principle, and could assent to no Amendment which embodied it. The only principle on which the compensation rate could be at all justified was, that it would fall, to a certain extent, if not on the perpetrators, at least, on the aiders and abettors in the commission of the crime. He did not mean to say that it was his opinion that even this was a just principle, or that it would really work out as anticipated; but to place any portion of the fine or rate on the proprietors, against whom not the slightest suspicion of complicity with the crime could be raised, seemed to him to embody a most dangerous principle, which might lead to making the enactment permanent.

MR. PEASE said, he perfectly agreed with what the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had said about the tax; the Amendment which the hon. Gentleman had moved, or was going to move, materially altered the position of the case. The case of the Explosive Substances Bill, to which the hon. and gallant Member (Captain Nolan) had referred, was not at all in point. If the Grand Jury were satisfied that occupiers were harbouring criminals, or not doing their best to bring offenders to justice, then alone would the tax be levied, and it ought to be borne by the occupiers. Owners being occupiers would have the tax to pay.

MR. SULLIVAN regretted this policy on the part of the Government, and denounced it as a policy for encouraging the absenteeism of landlords at the expense of those who stayed at home and did their duty. In the counties of Carlow and Wicklow, and elsewhere, where the local gentry remained at home and discharged their duties faithfully, we did not hear of any outbreak of agrarian crime; it was where the landlords were absentees that the people were distressed, and throwing the entire burden of exceptional taxes upon residents was merely offering a premium for absenteeism.

MR. PARNEILL regarded the argument as an unfortunate one that because a landlord was non-resident he should be released from the responsibilities of his position. As a resident Irish landlord, he feared that such a clause as now proposed, which embodied the principle of taxation without representation, would add to the feeling in Ireland that this was a tyrannical Bill.

CAPTAIN NOLAN moved, "That the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

In reply to Mr. STANSFELD,

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, the Committee on the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill would be resumed on Monday. The Public Works (Loans) Amendment Bill would not be proceeded after half-past 10 o'clock on Monday night.

It being now ten minutes to Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Mr. Sullivan

THE IRISH COLLEGE (PARIS).

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. BUTT, in rising to move—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into and report upon the allegations of the Petition from the President and Members of the Irish College at Paris, presented on the 4th day of August last, and also those of the Petition from the Roman Catholic Prelates of Ireland, presented on the 23rd day of March,"

said, these two Petitions prayed for reparation for property confiscated by the French Directory in 1793, and they founded their claim under the Treaty made between the French Government after the Restoration and the English Government, by which a sum of money was transferred to English Commissioners to compensate British subjects whose property had been confiscated. They also prayed for the appointment of a Committee similar to that appointed in the Baron de Bode's case to investigate the whole matter. He knew the subject was one of considerable complication; but he believed he should be able to make the facts known to the House in the few remarks he should have to make; and further, that the appointment of this Committee would be a right and good action. The Irish College in Paris was founded at a time when there was a difficulty in educating Roman Catholic clergymen in Ireland. It was founded entirely by British money—or rather, he ought to say, Irish money. It was always in the hands of Irishmen, subjects of the King of England; always under their management exclusively. Neither the French Government nor the French Episcopacy ever received any control over it. He would not trouble the House with the early history of the College, but would come at once to the year 1789, when a decree was adopted by the National Assembly which confiscated all ecclesiastical property in France to national purposes, and under that decree the French Government attempted to take possession of the property of the Irish College. Lord Gower, however, then the English ambassador at Paris, was instructed to interfere, and the result was the National Assembly appointed a Committee to inquire, and the Committee reported that the property was British property, and it was accordingly restored to the College. Immediately afterwards a decree of the National Assembly was passed exempting the professors and officers of the Irish College from taking the oath required from French ecclesiastics. By the joint action of the two Governments the College was then declared to be a British establishment in the sense of being under the protection of the King of England. Unfortunately, however, the property was afterwards confiscated on the very ground that saved it in 1789, for in 1793, the French Convention passed a decree by which all the property of British subjects was sequestered, and the property of the College seized beyond all question as the property of British subjects. The College was for a time shut, but in the beginning of the century, under the First Consul, it was re-established. Its property, however, was not restored, for it had been sold as part of the confiscated property, and with crippled means the College had ever since subsisted in Paris as a British establishment. After the Restoration, the French King endeavoured to interfere with it, but there was a very interesting account in the "Annual Register" of 1815 of Archbishop Murray applying to the French Government, who had taken possession of the College, and pointing out that it was not a French but a British establishment. Accordingly the French president was removed and an Irish priest appointed as administrator of the College. In 1814, after the first Restoration, by the treaty of peace between the two countries, France undertook to indemnify British subjects who had suffered by the confiscation of 1793, and the Government inscribed on their book a sum of money equal to 3,500,000 francs of Rente for the purpose of meeting the claims to be made. The money, however, was not paid, for before the treaty was carried into effect Napoleon's return interrupted everything; but on the 20th of November, 1815, another treaty was signed between England and France, by which the French Government renewed its obligation to compensate British subjects whose property had been seized, and special provision was made for that purpose in a Convention attached to the treaty. Under that Convention a mixed Commission was appointed to investigate the claims, and he believed it would be established before the Committee—it was positively stated by the authorities of the College on information received from the French Government—that the Mixed Commission declared the claim of the College to be legitimate, and they inscribed it on a register which they were bound to keep to the extent of £67,000. He thought it right to say, however, that he had not been able, with such research as it was in his power to make, courteously assisted as he had been at the Foreign Office, to lay his hands on documents which would prove the fact, although there was no doubt of their having existed. If the Mixed Commission reported in favour of the claim he could not understand why it was not paid in 1818. In that year it became the object of the French and English Governments to get rid of the military occupation of France, and a further sum producing a dividend of 3,000,000 francs a-year was put down as the amount which would discharge in full all claims made by British subjects. It was not clear what was to become of the surplus, if any, but it was clear that all the claims were to be settled before the English Government appropriated it. That was the view, no doubt, of the English Government at the time, because in 1819 an Act was passed appointing an English Commission to deal with these claims, fixing the time the claims were to be made, and authorizing the Treasury to appropriate the balance as they might think desirable. The College originally claimed £103,000, and as he had said, £67,000 was set apart for it, but the money was not paid. The first step taken was not to apply to the English Commissioners for payment, but to the French Government, who had already handed the money over to the Commissioners. The French Government refused to pay. That Government said—

"No, your claim was before a mixed Commission. It was proved, and we handed over a sum of money to meet all the claims made to purely English Commission."

At that time Lord Stuart de Rothesay was British Ambassador at Paris, and he strongly urged the claim upon Mr. Canning, and he (Mr. Butt) believed that if Mr. Canning had lived, the claim would have been satisfied. The case came before the Privy Council, and the ground upon which it was rejected by the Privy Council would be found, in a Parliamentary Paper, as stated by Sir John Leach as Master of the Rolls in 1830, when it was held that the claimants could not be held to come within the meaning of the words "British subjects." The Petitioners, however, alleged, amongst other things, the property in question was clearly the property of British subjects. It must be admitted that the Petitioners came before the House under the difficulty that their claim was an old one, but what he submitted was that if their claim was a just one, no lapse of time could bar it. The first proposition was that the lump sum was transferred by the French Government to the English Government, and the latter, as trustees, were to pay every legitimate payment. They had no right to apply any of the money to their own purposes, and it could not be held that the lapse of time was a bar to a national trust. The Petitioners made several further allegations. They said this property was beyond all doubt property of British subjects; that their establishments were always kept distinct as Irish establishments, and that this property was confiscated as the property of British subjects. They then said there was now in the hands of the English Treasury a sum of money to some extent applicable to them. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: A very small sum.] However small it was, he should be content if the right hon. Gentleman would give it to him, with interest, from the time he got it. He thought he could prove, however, if the Committee were granted, that at least £26,000 was still available for the purpose. Those were the allegations of the Petitioners. They were told that the case of the Baron de Bode was of a similar character, and that the Privy Council had decided against his claim. But in Baron de Bode's case the property was not confiscated but forfeited, and it therefore formed no parallel. Lord Lyndhurst brought the case before the House of Lords in 1852, on a Petition similar to, though not so strong, as the Petition now before the House, and he, too, asked for the appointment of a Committee, which was unanimously acceded to. Some of the observations made by the noble Lords on that occasion applied also to the present case. It was admitted by Lord Lyndhurst that there had been a long lapse of time, but he said it would be disgraceful to Government to avail themselves of it. Lord Truro used strong language, which he (Mr.

Butt) did not see the occasion for. He said the Act of 1819 was a wicked Act—probably meaning that it was wicked to allow the Treasury to appropriate any of the money, whilst there remained a claimant unsatisfied. Lord Derby acceded to the Motion, a Committee of the House of Lords sat, and they reported in favour of the claim to the House of Lords. There was a case which formed an exact precedent to the Motion, and he thought it would only be justice if the facts contained in the present Petition were true to appoint the Committee prayed for. No one would deny that the property confiscated was that of British subjects, for it was by reason of their being British subjects that the property was confiscated. He also thought his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General would agree with him when he said that a lapse of time was no bar to a legal claim, and that no justification could on that ground be given for withholding the payment of a just demand, if that demand were founded on truth and justice. The last allegation in the Petition was that there were funds in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman, by shaking his head, seemed to think that that was not so, but if it was not then it ought to be so. At all events it was not a very singular fact that an annual income derived from the French funds and amounting to 6,500,000 francs was handed over to the English Commissioners in 1818. The French funds were sold, the dividends received, and yet no account was ever given to Parliament of the application of that money until 1871, but in the meantime a great deal of it had been disposed of. The Treasury drew out of it £250,000, partly in order to pay the Duke of York's debts and partly to rebuild York House. It was true the money was repaid when the attention of the Committee of the House of Commons was called to the matter, but it was repaid only after a remission had been made of one-half of the interest. In 1871 an account of the application of the fund was for the first time rendered to Parliament. That account showed a balance of £310 0s. 11d. Some of the items, however, required explanation. For instance, the sum of £23,000 was said to be paid to a claimant by the Commissioners out of the proceeds of the property, which was sequestered in 1793. A note to the Return stated that the particulars had been given in a Paper presented to Parliament in 1836. To pay £23,000 for wrongs inflicted by the British Government upon a French subject out of a fund entrusted to them by the French Government for the giving of compensation for wrongs inflicted upon British subjects by the French Government was certainly a strange proceeding. While the claim of the Irish College at Paris existed, the British Government had no right to apply the money entrusted to them by the French Government in any other way than in satisfying that claim. Why should different justice be dealt out in this case from that dealt out in the case of the Baron de Bode. Ultimately the case of the Baron de Bode broke down. This case, he hoped, would not break down, but if it did, inquiry into it by a Select Committee of the House would show that justice had been done. He wished to know whether there was any answer to the case he had made. The only answer he believed that could be given was the lapse of time, but to rely upon such a quibble as that would be unworthy of a great nation. This was never a settled account. He had beyond all doubt falsified it in one particular, and he thought he had shown reason for falsifying it in another. He contended it had been practically conceded that the claim was one which ought, at all events, to be investigated. There was a prima facie case made out for redress and the proper way to pave the way for that redress was to appoint a Committee. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into and report upon the allegations of the Petition from the President and Members of the Irish College at Paris, presented on the 4th day of August last, and also those contained in the Petition from the Roman Catholic Prelates of Ireland, presented on the 6th day of this instant April,"—(Mr. Butt.)
—instead thereof.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would frankly admit that he was utterly unable to cope, either in point of eloquence or legal knowledge, with the hon. and learned Gentleman. But he must also say that the case which the hon. and learned Gentleman had presented to the House was very far indeed from satisfying his mind that there was any occasion for the appointment of a Select Committee on the question. Without going into all the questions that the hon. and learned Gentleman had raised, he thought he was right in saying that the foundation of this case was simply this—that in the course of the French Revolution, and especially in the troubled year 1793, and the years immediately following it, considerable injuries were inflicted by persons who obtained power in Paris and in France upon British subjects, and great losses were sustained by British subjects, and that amongst the sufferers were to be found the Body known as the Irish College. After the Peace in 1814, conventions and treaties were made between the French and English Governments, and those treaties contained stipulations for making compensation on the part of the French Government to English subjects who had sustained loss. The mode in which that was done appeared to be this—that the French Government appeared to pay over a certain sum or to create in rentes a certain annual sum that should be equal to a certain capital sum which it was supposed would be sufficient to make good the losses sustained by British subjects, and British subjects who had claims were called upon to come forward and make their claims. Those claims were to be investigated and to be made good out of the monies so provided by the French Government. The sum originally deemed to be sufficient was equal to 70,000,000 francs. It was found that that sum was not enough, and it was increased by a further sum of 60,000,000 francs. That sum was given by the French Government in order to compensate those English sufferers who could prove their claims. It was contemplated that the claims would be paid in full, if the gross amount given proved sufficient for the purpose; and, in case of its falling short, a proportionately smaller sum was to be awarded. By 59 Geo. III., passed in 1819, certain Commissioners of Liquidation and Arbitration were appointed to investigate the claims, and other Commissioners—called Commissioners of Deposit—were appointed to administer the fund which was placed in their hands. The same Act provided that in case the decision of the Commissioners failed to give satisfaction, there should be an appeal to the Privy Council. This certainly seemed to him to have been a very efficient machinery for obtaining fair examination and equitable decision as to any claims that might be made. It having been arranged that, in case the fund provided was not sufficient to meet the claims in full a reduced amount was to be paid, it was further provided that, in case there was a surplus, it should be disposed of in such way as the Commissioners of the Treasury for the time being might direct. This being the machinery provided, what was the course of this case of the Irish College? The representatives of the College put in a claim for indemnity, and that claim was heard, like a great many others, by the Commissioners of Liquidation, and they decided against it. No doubt, the Mixed Commission had thought it a proper claim for investigation; but when it had been examined the decision was against it. Then the representatives of the College, not being satisfied with the award of the Commissioners appealed to the Privy Council, and the appeal was heard in 1832. No doubt, the claimants had not then the advantage of the advocacy of the hon. and learned Gentleman, who was then distinguishing himself at Trinity College, Dublin; but they had the assistance of gentlemen of eminence to lay their case before the Privy Council. The judgment of the Council was delivered by the Master of the Rolls, and it turned to a certain extent upon Lord Gifford's judgment in the Douay case, and it was held that they were precluded by the Douay case from any further consideration of the subject. It would be presumptuous in him (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) to criticize that judgment; but this was clear, that there was at that time a certain function performed, and there was no reason to suppose that there was anything wrong in the case, but, on the contrary, that it had been fairly tried and decided on. It was impossible that they could be continually re-opening cases of this sort which had been decided 40 years ago. It was true that in the Baron de Bode's case Parliament did consent to appoint a Committee to look into the matter. They all knew that after extreme perseverance the Baron de Bode succeeded in obtaining one or two hearings, which were more or less formal; but after all they resulted in the same thing, that was in setting up and confirming the decision of the tribunal that was originally engaged in deciding the case. So far as the precedent went, then, it was against rather than in favour of the proposal now made by the hon. and learned Gentleman. He wished to say that the decisions of the Privy Council upon these appeals were not mere matters of form, because in 16 or 17 cases they reversed the awards of the Commissioners, and in some 15 or 16 cases they confirmed the awards. Moreover, if the Government should consent to the appointment of a Committee to look into the case of the Irish College, what could they say should the Marquess of Lansdowne or the parties in any other unsuccessful case ask for a Committee? The hon. and learned Gentleman referred to Lord Truro having called the Act of 1819 a wicked Act, because it barred the claims after the lapse of a certain time; but what happened under it? After the claims which had been sent in in time had been examined there remained a surplus, and the Treasury thereupon relaxed the rule as to the time for sending in notice of claim. In consequence of that, a number of claims of which notice had not been sent in in time were examined into, and in satisfying these claims the surplus was disposed of. The whole of the surplus was adjudicated to one person and another; and, although there ultimately remained £903 in the Exchequer, yet there were claims against it which amounted to rather more than £1,200, so that if all these claims should be brought forward there would be a deficiency. If the Government were to give money to the representatives of the Irish College, why should they not also give money to every other claimant who had not made out his claim? The hon. and learned Gentleman had grossly exaggerated the surplus, and said that there was interest which was unpaid upon the Duke of York's advance; but it seemed, from a Paper which he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) held in his hand, that the money, and also the interest, had been repaid. It was now too late to re-open this case by asking for a Select Committee. If they yielded to the claims of the Representatives of the College, he did not see how they could resist the claims of individuals; but the great objection to the Motion was that it sought to constitute the House of Commons as a Court of Appeal from the more competent tribunal, the Privy Council, which had already given judgment in the matter. He hoped the House would not support the Amendment.

THE O'CONOR DON said, every argument used by the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) might have been applied to the case of the Baron de Bode, and yet Parliament did consent to that case being re-considered. His contention, however, was that this case was quite different from all the other cases which came before the Commissioners, and one, therefore, deserving of consideration. Those Commissioners made no formal award, because they assumed that the Irish College stood on the same footing as the College of Douay, whereas the one was totally different from the other. For that reason, he thought the case should be reheard.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL asked if it was really the intention of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick to appeal to the House against the decision given 40 years ago by the highest tribunals of the country, and which had been also confirmed and solemnly decided by the Privy Council? If that was allowed, the time of the House would be continually occupied with discussions of this kind, greatly to the obstruction of Public Business. It had been urged that the Privy Council, in deciding the case of the Irish College, had considered themselves bound by the previous decision in the Douay College case, and that the circumstances of the two cases were different; but it would be found upon examination that the reasons for an adverse decision were that the College, if British, was an establishment contrary to the law of England, and if French, no claim could be made. However, the real question now was whether, after this lapse of time—or, indeed, after any lapse of time—that House should become a Court of Appeal against the decisions of the highest tribunals. This case was unlike that of the Baron de Bode, who, apart from any treaty, pressed his claim on the British Government.

MR. BUTT, interposing, said, it appeared from documents in his possession, that the Baron de Bode's Petition of Right was founded merely on the Convention of 1815, on the ground that the British Government had funds to pay him, and that he could not get them except under the Act of 1819.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that was so as regarded his Petition of Right; but the Baron de Bode failed in those proceedings, and it was afterwards, as an outsider, not having the benefit of a treaty, that a Committee was obtained in his favour in the House of Lords. He was quite ready to admit that time could not bar a claim of this kind in the case of a trust in which wrong had been done, but then it must be shown that there had been error in the accounts. In this case no such error had been shown, and, neither on principle nor on the precedent cited by his hon. and learned Friend, was there any reason for this House constituting itself into a Court of Appeal to rehear the case of the Irish College at Paris.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he hoped the House would consider for a moment the origin of the College, which was established in France for the education of Irish Roman Catholic youths, to be sent to Ireland as priests after they had been educated and trained. It was always a French College, but called an Irish College, because those educated in it were intended for the Irish Mission. It was established not by Irish funds, but by French funds. The claim was, however, set up because certain inhabitants of Ireland contributed to the establishment; but he thought that the College was subsidized by the French Government previous to the Revolution, and therefore the Commissioners held it to be French property. He added that historical recollection in order to strengthen the hands of Her Majesty's Government in resisting a claim which had been rejected by the tribunals of this country after repeated trials.

MR. O'CLERY said, he wished to correct the hon. Member for North Warwickshire. It was a fact, that owing to the Penal Laws, which prevented the establishment of a College in Ireland for the education of priests to serve on the Irish Mission, it was found absolutely necessary that the students should receive their education abroad; and it was also a matter of fact and history that the funds which established the College in Paris were furnished mainly by British subjects. The French Government never gave a subsidy to the College, but only an official recognition, as a Catholic Government recognizing a Catholic establishment. He considered the case had been made out by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, and it was one which was eminently entitled to the consideration of this House.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 116; Noes 54: Majority 62.

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

ARMY—A CENTRAL ARSENAL. OBSERVATIONS.

MAJOR BEAUMONT, in rising, pursuant to Notice—

"To call the attention of the House to the question of a central Arsenal, and to move for a Select Committee to inquire whether the cost of removal from Woolwich would not be recovered by the altered condition of manufacture and the diminished cost of raw material," said, that after the numerous discussions which had taken place upon theoretical questions in connection with the Army he thought it might be satisfactory to hon. Members to have one of a practical character brought under notice. It was essentially one of defence; and he apprehended that, whatever might be the difference of opinion on matters of offence, on the subject of defence there would be complete unanimity. He attempted to bring it forward last Session, but was not fortunate in the day obtained for the purpose. He however asked the Secretary for War whether the Government would postpone their contemplated purchase of land for a tactical station in the North of England, until the question had been discussed, and though the answer was a negative one, he was happy to learn that no action had been taken by the Government up to the present time in the matter. He did not by his Motion ask the House to commit itself to any question of principle. The onus of proof lay on him, and he was prepared to show on prima facie evidence that the cost of the change he suggested would be more than fully recouped by the improved conditions of manufacture. As to the desirability of a change, he thought that from a military point of view few critics would dissent from the principle that the capital of a country and its arsenal ought not to be in one and the same place. The first object of an invader on entering an enemy's country was to reach its capital and its arsenal. In reaching the capital he paralyzed the Government, interfered with the progress of commercial relations, and crippled the money-producing power of the nation; and in striking at the arsenal he struck a blow which deprived the Army of its force and the country of its strength. Consequently, it was of the utmost importance to an invader that he should be able to attack us in those two vital points by one operation, and it was, of course, most desirable for purposes of defence that he should be prevented from doing so. In his early wars Napoleon's objective point was Berlin. Again, the Prussians marched on Vienna, and in the late struggle between France and Germany the cry on the one side was "To Berlin," and on the other "To Paris." The only thing that would justify the capital and the arsenal of a country being in one situation was the fact that the capital was defended by fortifications, and that the arsenal, being within those fortifications, was in the strongest position in the country. In France the engineers had thought it desirable to spend very large sums of money in perfecting a system of fortifications round Paris which was far from imperfect before the war. He would not discuss whether or not a mode of expending that money could not be found which should give a greater amount of defence; but the circumstances which obtained in Paris were not those which obtained in this country; and he did not think the House of Commons should be called upon to vote money for fortifications round London. The line of works would be too extended to enable them to be properly manned, and their cost would be too great. The Government had, he believed, a plan on paper for the defence of London, and he thought it was all right and proper as long as they confined such a scheme to paper, and went no further. According to the Report of the Commission appointed in 1859 the cost of completing a satisfactory line of fortifications round Woolwich would be between £2,000,000 and £3,000,000; whereas the establishment of defensive forts on the top of Shooter's Hill might be carried into effect for £700,000. There ought, he contended, to be no half-and-half measures, and if Woolwich was to be fortified the work ought to be done completely. He, for one, he might add, as a Northerner, entirely deprecated the idea that the country must give in to an enemy because the South found itself unable to keep him away. It would be, in his opinion, a most pernicious view to get abroad that because London happened to be taken England must therefore be considered as lost. The Commission of 1859 was composed of most able military and scientific authorities, and their recommendations had, on the whole, been carried out very well, although there was one point in their Report which had not, perhaps, been attended to—the establishment of a central Arsenal. In the first part of that Report they referred to Woolwich—the great depôt of our munitions of war—as a place of the most vital importance. The Government in which Lord Herbert was Secretary of State for War deemed the matter to be of such moment that a second Instruction was given to the Commission, to report specially with reference to the question of a central Arsenal, and in the third paragraph of the Report they stated that it was impossible to render Woolwich safe against attack without such an outlay of money as they did not feel justified in recommending. The advantages of Woolwich were, first that it existed, and secondly that it was easy of access for the distribution of stores; but there was the disadvantage that if it was easy of access to us, it would also be so to an enemy. Taking all those circumstances into consideration, he must say he was rather surprised at the boldness of the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Boord) in putting on the Paper an Amendment which challenged the Motion on the Report of that Commission; but, at the same time, he must say that he was eager to hear the arguments that would be brought forward by the hon. Member, as he thought they would be somewhat curious in their bearing upon the matter. The question, he might add, as to the distribution of stores was nothing as compared with the enormous importance of the whole subject in a strategic point of view. He did not propose that all the stores should be removed from Woolwich; on the contrary, he was of opinion that stores from other quarters might with advantage be shifted there. For instance, the Clothing department at Pimlico, and the India Store department might be conveniently transferred to Woolwich, and in that way two valuable sites in London would be set free to be turned to other uses. He would now pass to the question of site, regarding which he would merely say that he did not commit himself to any particular locality. The Report of the Commission, however, had dealt pretty conclusively with the subject, and there were two sites prominently mentioned as being suitable for the purpose. The first was Cannock Chase, which, from its position in connection with railways and canals, was perfectly suitable for the purpose. The recent discovery of minerals, however, under that estate, and certain other circumstances which had come to light since the Report was presented, led the Government not to look so favourably on that site as they had done before. But there was another which appeared to him more than any other to meet the general requirements of the case, and that was the site which had been also under the consideration of the Government—namely, Ilkley, not far from Leeds. There a tract of land of some 7,000 acres in extent could be purchased for a moderate sum. But there were several other sites which would be suitable. In fact there were in this respect an embarras de richesses. The Government, also, had it under consideration to render more perfect the gun-wharves or small arsenals at Plymouth and Portsmouth. He had no objection to offer to that, for it was a very good thing to do; but, supposing it done, it would not meet the requirements of the case. He came now to the question of cost. Engineers had a rough-and-ready rule of thumb for estimating the cost of a building at so much per cubic foot. A fair estimate for such iron buildings as there were at Woolwich would be 3*d.* a cubic foot, and for the brick buildings 5*d.* There were in the Arsenal approximately 40,000,000 cubic feet of building, 15,000,000 of iron, and 25,000,000 of brick; and if these figures were multiplied respectively by three and five we should get a rough were absent from Ireland, and who had no knowledge whatever of those outrages? It was rather hard to say to the landlord that he must live in Ireland and be shot, or be an absentee and be fined. Moreover, the question of putting a tax on absenteeism could not be fairly raised on an Amendment to a Peace Preservation Bill.

MR. MACDONALD concurred in the remarks which had fallen from the hon. Member near him (Mr. Fawcett), and hoped the hon. and gallant Mover of the Amendment would press it. He thought that the Bill, in the present state of Ireland, was totally unneeded; and that it treated Ireland in an exceptional manner, and one which would not be submitted to by the people of England or the people of Scotland. With regard to absentee landlords, he thought that if they were not living in Ireland then they ought to be there, and if they were there, then, in his opinion, this Bill would not be necessary. He further thought that many hon. Members on that side of the House showed a want of interest in the Bill. The hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) had some time ago appealed to the natural Leader of the Liberal party in that House. He thought the hon. Member might have better said the artificial Leader, for he (Mr. Macdonald) had noticed with regret that the front Opposition Benches had been empty night after night, during the discussion on the clauses of a Bill dealing with the liberties of an illustrious people.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, he was glad to see that the front Opposition Benches had a number of occupants that night, which contrasted with their vacant state at previous sittings when the liberties of Ireland were being dealt with. He asked why the landlords who resided in the district referred to should not pay their portion of the tax. Twenty years ago a tenant took his land, having to pay the ordinary cess, but never contemplating the occurrence of agrarian outrages and his having 2s. or, it might be, 5s. in the pound added to his rent, because of outrages committed by persons having no connection with the district. Could hon. Members opposite say conscientiously that such a law as that ought to be enacted? The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Butler-Johnstone) had spoken of the hardship of resident landlords being shot, or absentees being fined.

Mr. Butler Johnstone

It could not be said by hon. Members acquainted with Ireland that the bulk of the farmers resident in the neighbourhood where agrarian crime was committed were not loyal subjects. The landlords ought to pay their portion of this tax, unless the House was prepared to brand the whole population of a district as persons who were disloyal and who participated in crime.

THE O'CONOR DON said, he could not vote for the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway. If the tax were a part of the ordinary expenditure, incurred in carrying out this Act, he would agree that it ought to be paid share and share alike by the owner and occupier; or if this were a permanent Act he should vote for the Amendment. But this was not the case; the tax was justified on the ground that a certain class of occupiers in Ireland had a sympathy with particular descriptions of crimes. Starting from that assumption, and deciding, as they had done, that this tax was to be levied upon this particular ground, it was absurd to argue that it should be extended to the owners as well as occupiers. When they talked about absentee owners, he would remind them that the good landlords who lived in the country, and whose example led to its peace and prosperity were just as much owners as the absentees, and that a tax on the owners of property would just as much affect those who were residents as those who were absentees. Indeed, it seemed to him that this question of absenteeism had nothing to do with the subject. If it were right to tax the owner, it would be equally right to tax the absentee or the resident; but he denied that any justification could be offered for taxing the owner. The point was, were they going to extend this tax to a class with respect to whom it would be absurd to say that they had any sympathy with these crimes, or that they refused to aid in bringing the criminals to justice? If Parliament recognized the principle, he feared the result would be that the tax would become permanent, and he consequently felt himself bound to vote against the Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland told the Committee that he intended to propose an Amendment which he (the O'Connor Don) thought was an extremely good one—namely, that the tax should not be imposed, unless there was some proof

But he would remind the Committee that their discretion was under the guidance of the Act, for they were directed to assess the amount according to rank. They could not help it. What he proposed was that this compensation might vary, but that the punishment inflicted on individuals should not vary or be determined by the rank or position in life of the person maltreated or murdered. Of course, in one case the area would have to be more extensive than in the other. In that rough-and-ready kind of justice—if it could be called justice—borrowed from barbarous times, every feature of it would not bear to be too nicely examined; but he was anxious that the law should not bear cruelly upon innocent people, and that it should not be so manifestly unfair as to awaken indignation and disgust. The kind of evidence produced before Grand Juries in these cases was very curious. The first question they had to consider was whether the outrage was agrarian, and how was that done? Evidence was tendered that the murdered man had made himself most unpopular; had gone to law with his neighbours, and was generally detested in the district. The Committee would observe that this was necessary, in order to give plausibility to the charge of agrarian combination. In fact, the old generous maxim was totally changed, for here it was de mortuis nil nisi malum. All the quarrelsomeness and supposed tyranny of the deceased was raked up; and so, because the people disliked him, the murder was pronounced agrarian. The police, in the next place, testified that the people of the district showed no regret at the occurrence, and would give no information, either as to the identity or whereabouts of the murderer. Nine-tenths of them probably knew no more about it than any persons living 1,000 miles away; and yet they were to be fined to the very blanket upon their beds, and to the very skin of their teeth, until they were driven to despair and to the Union workhouse. He had heard of two small farmers who had been at the Scotch harvest, and they came home to find themselves assessed at 4s. in the pound for a crime they had no more to do with, either in act or sympathy, than they had with the death of Julius Cæsar. The thing was not right. The hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) read to the Committee last Monday a letter written by a highly respected and much esteemed solicitor in Coleraine—a sound Conservative—in which letter the hardships of a case in County Derry were detailed. A small townland has been assessed for the murder of Stephen Church in a sum amounting to nearly 4s. in the pound for 10 years. He believed the Grand Jury of Londonderry to be as just and merciful a body as was to be found in Ireland; but when he found gentlemen whose honour and sense of justice he knew and confided in, making what he called a grievous mistake like that he could not, without remonstrance, assent to the continuance of an oppressive law. If he had mentioned the wrong limit in the Amendment he could compromise it, but he wanted a limit to be imposed. It was a penal question, and he was asking nothing new when he asked that juries and Judges should know how far they went in awarding punishment. He now moved the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 10, at the end of the Clause, to add the words "Provided always, That the whole sum so presented and affirmed shall in no case exceed a rate of one shilling in the pound for one year upon the valuation of the district charged with the same."—(Mr. Richard Smyth.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, he did not know for what reason the hon. Gentleman had suggested 1s. in the pound as the extreme limit. If it were the limit, many cases might arise where the tax would fail of its purpose, as so small a rate in the pound would hardly be felt as a fine, and the amount raised on a district of low valuation or limited area would be so small as to afford but little compensation to the persons injured. It would be far better to adhere to the principle adopted by the late Government when they made the proposal in the Bill of 1870. The late Government left the matter in the hands of the Grand Jury subject to the sanction of the Judge. The Bill now before the Committee made the same proposal, but care was taken that both the Grand Jury and the Judge should have all the circumstances of the case before them. Besides, the Judge would also have before him under the Bill the valuation of the district, the number of instalments by which the amount assessed would have to be levied, the amount of rate necessary, and other important particulars. If, in addition, it were pro-

they would commit one of the worst mistakes that a Legislature could commit, because they, a Legislature of land-owners, were about to draw the line of sympathy with crime at their own doors.

MR. CLIVE explained that in the case referred to, he was one of the magistrates before whom the inquiry was conducted. Two persons, one of whom was his agent, were travelling along the road, one of them was fired at. The face of the man who fired was blackened, and as soon as he fired he disappeared among the mountains. Even if he could have been found, the person at whom he shot would not have been able to recognize him. The Committee had already decided upon this matter, and he thought bringing it again under the consideration of the House was merely conducive of delay.

MR. COLLINS contended that the tenants, as a class, were equally incapable with the landlords of being associated with crime. He supported the Amendment on the ground that the remarks of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) carried conviction with them.

MR. CALLAN, who also supported the Amendment, observed that he thoroughly detested the Bill in every form and shape. His principal objection to the clause was the narrow area of taxation, and he did not see why, if the tenant-farmers suffered, the landlords should not suffer also. He repudiated altogether any sympathy on the part of the tenant-farmers with crime. He must again repeat his statement of the other night that the notorious Ribbon leader, Captain Duffy, had been released on a petition signed by the Westmeath magistracy.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 104; Noes 260: Majority 156.

MR. R. SMYTH moved, as an Amendment, in page 4, line 10, at end, add—

"Provided always, That the whole sum so presented and affirmed shall in no case exceed a rate of one shilling in the pound for one year upon the valuation of the district charged with the same."

The hon. Member said, that he had no intention of re-opening the question of compensation for murder, or for personal injuries, as the Committee had already affirmed the principle in the vote upon the Amendment of the hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don); but assuming that the principle was right, very great hardship and even oppression might be incidental to its application. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had very properly pointed out the other night, that there was a double element or object in the assessment under this clause for compensation. In the first place, there was the element of restitution for damage done to a person or a family; and, in the second place, there was the deterrent object on which the right hon. Gentleman laid the main stress. Now, so far as the first consideration was concerned, a sliding scale as to amount might be quite defensible, and they might justly say that it was the right thing to appraise a man's money or value by his rank or position in life. In the case of death or injury on a railway, Judges and juries constantly made this distinction, and he had nothing to say against it. But when they came to the second and main object of the assessment, how did the present or the proposed law work? An under-bailiff or small farmer was murdered, and the Grand Jury presented, say, £100 as compensation to be levied off a certain district. But suppose it was an agent that was murdered, the Grand Jury would present at least £500, perhaps, £1,000, and it was to be levied off the same area, and from the same occupiers. Now, if it was an impression that they wanted to produce by the severity of the impost, clearly they were more anxious to deter the people from murdering persons in high rank, than from murdering those in low rank. When guilt was proved before a Judge, the same punishment was dealt out for slaying a peasant and for slaying a nobleman; but when the guilt was not proved at all, but there was only a suspicion that there was sympathy with the guilty, they proportioned the punishment according to the rank of the victims. He could not imagine any reasonable defence of such a proportion. They had a right to protect the lives of the poor as carefully as they did the lives of the rich. He did not wish to influence popular passion by dwelling on that most objectionable form of class legislation; but if he did not, other people assuredly would. He might be told that the Grand Jury and the Judge would see that no injustice was inflicted.

But he would remind the Committee that their discretion was under the guidance of the Act, for they were directed to assess the amount according to rank. They could not help it. What he proposed was that this compensation might vary, but that the punishment inflicted on individuals should not vary or be determined by the rank or position in life of the person maltreated or murdered. Of course, in one case the area would have to be more extensive than in the other. In that rough-and-ready kind of justice—if it could be called justice—borrowed from barbarous times, every feature of it would not bear to be too nicely examined; but he was anxious that the law should not bear cruelly upon innocent people, and that it should not be so manifestly unfair as to awaken indignation and disgust. Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 10, at the end of the Clause, to add the words "Provided always, That the whole sum so presented and affirmed shall in no case exceed a rate of one shilling in the pound for one year upon the valuation of the district charged with the same."—(Mr. Richard Smyth.)

If, in addition, it were provided that the Grand Jury should be satisfied that material evidence was being withheld, he thought the matter would be placed on a proper footing. He thought it better that the matter should, with these safeguards, be settled by the local authorities, than that they should now adopt any off-hand proposals for dealing with the question.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 87; Noes 269: Majority 182.

MR. FAY moved, as an Amendment, in page 4, line 10, to insert after "appeals"—

"Provided always, That, notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained, there shall be such right of traverse of any such presentment as is given in respect of malicious injuries in the Act of 6 and 7 William IV., chapter 116."

He contended that they would brand the juries of Ireland with complicity with criminal outrages if they did not admit that those juries were willing to allow compensation to the relatives of those who had suffered from such outrages. Proceedings in Grand Jury rooms in reference to these matters were not always conducted in a very correct manner, and he thought that the ratepayers should have the right to appeal to a common jury in matters wherein they felt aggrieved and that a wrong decision had been arrived at.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 10, after the word "appeals," to insert the words "Provided always, That, notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained, there shall be such right of traverse of any such presentment as is given in respect of malicious injuries under the Act of the sixth and seventh of William the Fourth, chapter one hundred and sixteen."—(Mr. Fay.)

MR. GIBSON said, the effect of the Amendment would be to change the existing tribunal, which had been existing and working ever since the year 1870. It had been appointed by the Peace Preservation Act of 1870 to work out this compensation system. Indeed, he could not imagine a more satisfactory tribunal than the present one, as it consisted of the gentry and those who had the largest interest in the county in every way. All the witnesses were examined before it, and every one of them had an opportunity of stating what he desired in the case; and any ratepayer who had an interest in the matter could, if dissatisfied, take it—before whom? Not before a petty jury, but before one of Her Majesty's Judges, who listened to all on each side, and, after he had heard all on the one side and the other, affirmed or set aside the decision of the Grand Jury. Now, that was a tribunal that had been in operation for the last five years, and which had, to his (Mr. Gibson's) knowledge, worked well. Yet, while the Judges had power to select a wider area for the incidence of taxation—a power exercised by Baron Dease—once an ornament to this House—it was now sought by the hon. Member to set that tribunal aside and adopt another. Let it also be remembered that it was now asked to pass the present Bill for five years only, and that the existing tribunal, which it was sought by the Bill to continue, had been in operation five years. He hoped the Committee would decide in favour of the appeal to Her Majesty's Judges and against the Amendment of the hon. Member.

MR. BIGGAR said, the hon. and learned Member who had just addressed the House asserted that the decisions of Her Majesty's Judges had given great satisfaction; but he (Mr. Biggar) believed the contrary, and he considered the adoption of power of appeal to a common jury desirable.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 61; Noes 221: Majority 160.

CAPTAIN NOLAN moved, as an Amendment, in page 4, at end of clause, to add—

"And he may also determine that such sum shall be levied from the poor rates instead of from the county cess, and award accordingly."

The Government could not call this a revolutionary Amendment, as it merely permitted the Judge to levy half the burden on the landlord and half on the occupier, instead of placing the whole rate on the occupier. The occupiers of the land might not know anything of the injury for which the levy was made, and the question was simply one of compensation. He did not think the proposal was very revolutionary. The Judges might, in certain cases, be of opinion that there had been remissness on the part of the magistrates, and that they should bear a part of the compensation. In such cases the charge ought most certainly to be divided between the landlord and the occupier.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, the Committee having already decided that the monies necessary to provide compensation should be levied upon the county cess, he could not accept a proposal which would put it within the power of the Judges to override the decision of Parliament.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY contended that there was nothing in the decision referred to by the Chief Secretary to prevent the Committee acceding to the proposal of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway. Nothing could be more unjust than to charge the tenantry of a district with the compensation for an outrage in which they manifestly had no part.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING, though he thought his hon. and gallant Friend had the best of the argument, advised the withdrawal of the Amendment, on the ground that they could not at that period of the evening hope to obtain a better division than had already taken place.

MR. BIGGAR trusted the hon. and gallant Gentleman would press his Motion.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, he had now to move an Amendment, which was essentially different from that of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway. The Amendment was this—that, inasmuch as under the 138th section of the Grand Juries Act the Judges had had the power, in the traverse of a presentment, to call a jury to their aid, they should also have the power of calling a jury to assist them, not for the purpose of saying that a malicious outrage was not an agrarian crime, or that there should be no assessment at all, but simply to determine what should be the area over which the taxation should extend, and also to vary the amount of the award. He proposed that the jurors should not be fewer in number than five nor greater than nine. It would be much better that any presentment for agrarian crime should be made over the whole county instead of upon so limited an area.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PLUNKET) said, this was decidedly a less objectionable

Amendment than the one that had recently been rejected. Parliament, however, had deliberately adopted the opposite procedure, and, as it had worked well and the principle had just been re-affirmed by the Committee, he would ask the hon. Gentleman not to press his Amendment to a division.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY, for the sake of consistency, must join in the appeal to his hon. Friend to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On Question, That the clause, as amended, be agreed to?

THE O'CONOR DON asked when the Chief Secretary for Ireland would make the promised additions to the clause?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH thought they would be most conveniently made on the Report.

MR. BIGGAR said, it was his duty to oppose the clause, as it was wholly incomprehensible. The Amendments to the clause were numerous, and it was desirable that the Committee should have them in a comprehensive form before the clause was agreed to. No one seemed to understand the clause. Indeed, he would undertake to say that there not half-a-dozen Members who were clearly acquainted with its meaning.

MR. BUTT desired to know if he rightly understood the change which had been made in reference to the search for arms? The original Act authorized the issue of general warrants, and since 1870, practically, the law had been to give the police the power to make domiciliary visits. These warrants, as he now understood the Chief Secretary, were not being renewed throughout the proclaimed districts of Ireland, but only in those places or parts where the importation of arms was feared. [SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH assented.] That being the case, he could only say it was a great amelioration of the condition of the Irish people; and he desired to know now if there would be any objection, when these warrants became necessary, to have a magistrate's signature attached to them.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, the hon. and learned Member had correctly appreciated the state of affairs which existed. In certain parts of Ireland general warrants were in force, but he could not name the places publicly.

No change had been made in the form of the warrant, and, generally speaking, no warrants for searches were issued without the places being specified.

Mr. BUTT was glad to find that general warrants were not issued, except in special cases; but still, the general warrant was legally in force.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Continuance of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 74, as amended by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 89).

Mr. BUTT moved, as an Amendment, in page 4, in line 17, the omission of the words, "as amended by the Act passed in the Session of Parliament held in the eleventh and twelfth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter seventy-nine." The effect of the Amendment would be to exclude from the operation of the present Bill a power which was no longer required—namely, that of entering a meeting held for a seditious or treasonable purpose and seizing papers, and of remaining there as long as was thought fit. Such a provision might be suited for 1848, but it was altogether uncalled-for now as regarded any part of Ireland.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 17, to leave out the words "as amended by the Act passed in the Session of Parliament held in the eleventh and twelfth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter seventy-nine."—(Mr. Butt.)

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) said, the Government could not accept the Amendment. He was not prepared to admit that the provision referred to was wholly uncalled-for. A statement had been made and repeated more than once in the course of the debate which he would take this opportunity to correct. The noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu) without, of course, wishing to misrepresent him (the Solicitor General for Ireland) had said that he had stated in his speech on the second reading of the Bill, that the Fenian conspiracy was now of the least importance. What he said was that three evils were to be guarded against by this Bill, and the least of the three was Fenianism; but he had never said that this conspiracy which was in full force so short a time ago had lost its importance.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 101; Noes 68: Majority 33.

Mr. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, he had an Amendment on the Paper, altering the year when the operation of the clause should expire from 1880 to 1876; but with the permission of the House he would withdraw it, as the question which it involved was one which had already been discussed and disposed of.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

CAPTAIN NOLAN moved, as an Amendment, that "1877" should be substituted for "1880."

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 21, to leave out the word "eighty," and insert the words "seventy-seven."—(Captain Nolan.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH agreed with the hon. Member for the county of Cork (Mr. M'Carthy Downing) in thinking that this was a matter which had already been disposed of.

Mr. BUTT maintained that it was quite a different question, the former decision having reference to the powers relating to arms.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) said, the principle had been affirmed on three separate occasions.

Question put, "That the word 'eighty' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 87; Noes 85: Majority 2.

Mr. MITCHELL HENRY said, he wished to call the attention of the Chairman to a matter connected with the closing of the door of the House at the time of a division. He had noticed on several occasions lately that there appeared to be a want of harmony between the running out of the sand and the closing of the door. If a Rule of the House required that the door should be shut whenever the sand in the glass had run out, he had no doubt the Chairman would take care that it should be strictly enforced. In discussions like the present—discussions in which Irish Members felt so strongly—it was extremely important that there should be the utmost accuracy in the observance of the rules relating to divisions.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for the county of Galway is perfectly right in assuming that the moment the sand in the glass has run out the ringing of the bell ought to cease and the door ought to be closed. I have always risen in my place at that moment for the purpose of showing that the door ought then to be shut. It has, however, happened sometimes that, owing to a crowd of Members rushing in, it has been difficult to carry out the Rule with the utmost precision. My attention was privately called to the matter yesterday, and I at once put myself in communication with the Sergeant-at-Arms in order to secure that, as far as possible, the door should always be closed at the proper moment.

CAPTAIN NOLAN, as he was at the door, wished to say that he thought everything there on the last occasion was conducted with perfect fairness towards both sides. On other occasions, two or three days ago, he might have complained of what occurred.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) said, he wished to move the Amendment which stood on the Paper in his name. As originally drawn, the clause proposed to exempt the Odd Fellows and Free Foresters from the operation of the statute against unlawful societies; but after further consideration of the matter, the Government had come to the conclusion that it would be better to follow as closely as possible the words of the Friendly Societies Act for England, a course which would have the advantage of placing the law of both countries more nearly on the same basis and also of including within its protection other friendly societies besides the Free Foresters and Odd Fellows. He begged therefore to move, in page 4, line 21, to leave out from after "eighty" to end of Clause, and insert—

"But the provisions of the said Acts shall not extend to any society now established, or hereafter to be established, under the statutes regulating Friendly Societies, or to any meeting of the members or officers thereof, in which society, or at which meeting, no business whatever is transacted other than that which, directly and immediately, relates to the objects of the society as declared in the rules thereof, and set forth in the certified copy thereof: Provided, That the trustees or other officers of the society, when required under the hands of two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace, shall give full information to such justices of the nature, objects, proceedings, and practices of such society; and, in default thereof, the provisions of the said Acts shall be in force in respect of such society."

MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON said, that, when it was first proposed to exempt by name the Free Foresters and Odd Fellows, he had put on the Paper an Amendment to exempt another society in which he was interested—namely, the Orangemen, who were entitled to equal privileges with those other associations; but the Amendment just moved by the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland deprived him of the opportunity of moving his own Amendment. He certainly would not claim for the Orangemen a privilege that he would not extend to other societies. At the same time, he was not prepared to admit the illegality of the Orange Society, still less could he for a moment allow that the aims of that institution should be put on a par with those of the Ribbon Society. The Ribbon Society had for its object murder and assassination; whereas the Orange Society had for its object the maintenance of the Protestant religion, the support of the rightful Sovereign, and the upholding of the laws of the Realm, the Legislative Union, and the succession to the Throne in the House of Brunswick being Protestant. It was composed exclusively of men who were attached to the principles of the Reformation and averse from religious persecution. He knew it had been the custom to malign the Orange Society, and he did not pretend that every member of it was individually infallible; but he asserted that it had a noble purpose, and one with which every loyal citizen of the Empire should sympathize.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland had implied that Foresters and Oddfellows came within the provisions of the Acts against illegal oaths. He was informed that the Foresters took no oaths, and he knew the Oddfellows did not; and he therefore wished for some explanation on this point.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) said, that last year it was suggested that a clause should be introduced to prevent the possibility of these societies being exposed to penalties under the Unlawful Oaths

Acts. The Friendly Societies Act (1855) provided an exemption in favour of these societies only against the Unlawful Oaths Act—the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 48—then in force in Ireland, but long since spent. As it was intended by this Bill to continue the measures against unlawful oaths it was thought desirable to renew the exemption, and he had done so as nearly as possible in the words of the English Friendly Societies Act. There was no insinuation that these societies were conducted in such a way as willingly to expose themselves to the provisions of the Unlawful Oaths Acts.

MR. BUTT said, it was the misfortune of his hon. and learned Friend to mislead the Committee when he addressed them on this Bill. This Bill had no more to do with unlawful oaths than any Bill which had been introduced by the Government; but it was a Bill to prevent the use of signs and passwords in Ireland. Now, any society in England could have signs and passwords; then why should there be a law against the use of such things in Ireland? Although he did not intend to oppose the clause, he thought that this legislation against signs and passwords was most absurd and childish.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. GIBSON proposed, as an Amendment, to add to the end of the clause the following words:—

“Provided always, That all Freemasons or Friendly Brothers who have by reason of inadvertence or neglect not heretofore complied with the directions contained in the second section of the said Act of the second and third Victoria, chapter seventy-four, shall be, and they are hereby indemnified, freed, and discharged from all penalties incurred by reason of any such inadvertence or neglect: And inasmuch as certain associations of Freemasons exist which according to the rules and usages of the said society are not denominated lodges, but are designated councils, chapters, colleges, priories, preceptories, or otherwise, it is hereby enacted that any person making any such certificate upon oath as in the second section of the said Act of the second and third Victoria, chapter seventy-four mentioned, shall be at liberty to designate in such certificate the society, the holding whereof shall be therein certified by the name or designation by which it is usually distinguished according to the usage of the said society of Freemasons: Provided also, That if any such certificates shall be duly registered within one year after the passing of this Act, it shall not be necessary in any succeeding year to register with the clerk of the peace the name or denomination of any branch of the said societies of Freemasons, or the usual place or places, or the time or times of its meetings, or the names or descriptions of the members thereof, anything in the said Act of the second and third Victoria, chapter seventy-four, to the contrary notwithstanding.”

Some hon. Member had on another occasion referred to the fact that the Lord Lieutenant was a Mason. This was true. He belonged to the Grand Lodge, which had been duly registered according to the requirements of law. [MR. CALLAN: Since when?] Since the Lord Lieutenant had been a member of the lodge it had been registered, and therefore his Excellency was in no sense open to any imputation of acting in violation of the law. The Masons were a charitable body, and everyone knew that both the Masons and the Friendly Brothers, if they were proud of anything, were proud of their loyalty. Owing to negligence or inadvertence, however, the secretaries of the various divisions had omitted to perform the necessary work, and the result was, as had been stated in the Amendment, that these loyal and charitable bodies had not entirely complied with the requirements by which they were to be exempted from the purview of the statute. The Amendment was intended to exempt those bodies from the penalties they had incurred. He himself had the honour to belong to both of the societies, and he was not sure whether he was not within the purview of the Acts.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU rose to Order. He had listened to his hon. and learned Friend, as he did not care to interrupt him whilst he was speaking, but he wished to put it to the Chairman whether the clause could be proposed. In Sir Erskine May's book, page 502, it was stated that—

“No amendment could properly be proposed to a clause irrelevant to the matter of that clause,” and “If a clause or amendment irrelevant to the subject-matter of the Bill be offered, the Chairman will decline to put the question.” —[pp. 502, 507.]

Well, the title and scope of the Bill were utterly alien to the subject-matter of this clause. It was a Bill to continue certain Peace Preservation Acts in Ireland; it was a Bill imposing Pains and Penalties on Ireland; but this clause was to indemnify certain rich persons from the penalty of felony which they had incurred. In the next place, they had incurred that penalty under an Act which was not embodied in this Bill,

the 50th Geo. III; and, thirdly, this Bill was only a temporary Act, whereas the effect of the Amendment would not be temporary; it would extend to all time. The scope of the Amendment and the Bill, therefore, were not identical. It would be a great misfortune if that House should send to Ireland a Bill of most severe Pains and Penalties, which contained within it a clause of indemnity to certain rich persons, while inflicting penalties on the poor.

MR. MELDON also rose to Order. He wished to know whether an hon. Member who admitted that he was himself liable to the penalty of felony could come to that House and ask to be relieved of it?

MR. GIBSON would admit that perhaps he might be out of Court on that score; but he had been extremely cautious when he stated that he belonged to these bodies, for he had said that he was not "sure" that he was affected. In answer to the noble Lord, he might say that the Masons were not all rich, for the members of that body did not belong to any particular class; therefore, it was a mistake to say that the clause was to indemnify the rich. The only qualifications absolutely insisted on were loyalty and adherence to all the ordinary dictates of Christian charity. He submitted that the Amendment was perfectly relevant to the Bill, for he only wished by his clause to amend the Acts as they were recited in the Preamble.

MR. CALLAN asked whether it was consistent with the Rules of the House that a Member should vote on any matter in which he was personally interested?

MR. GIBSON said, he did not positively know that he was personally interested in the matter.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the Standing Order to which reference had been made by the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan) related to the case of Members who had a pecuniary interest in the matter before the House. He believed that on a former occasion exception had been taken to a Member of the House taking part in the discussion of a case in which he was exposed to a penalty; but the Member having stated in his place that he had received no Notice, it was ruled that he was entitled to address the House. The points raised by the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath were much more important. The first objection was that the Amendment was not within the scope and title of the Bill. That would have been a perfectly valid objection up to the year 1854, when this House adopted a new Standing Order, that any Amendment might be introduced which was relevant to the subject-matter of the Bill; and it was no longer enough to say that the Amendment was not within the scope of the Bill. Of course, it would follow, if such an Amendment were adopted, that the Preamble and Title of the Bill should be amended accordingly. The point, therefore, to be decided was as to the relevancy of this Amendment. Now, though he had for a moment entertained some doubt on the subject, he could not undertake to say that this Amendment was irrelevant. He might, perhaps, point out that some of the words had been embodied in the clause, which had been, however, struck out in order to introduce other words, by which there had been conveyed a somewhat similar exemption. These words stated that the said Act should be so construed as if the provision extended to Foresters and Odd Fellows. It was therefore intended by the framers of the Act that it should have a retrospective effect as far as freeing certain persons from the penalties imposed by the Acts which it amended. Another objection was that there was no mention of the 50th Geo. III. within the four corners of the Bill. But he would call attention to the wording of this particular clause, which stated that it was—

"An Act to extend and render more effectual the Act passed in the reign of His Majesty George IV. (to amend an Act passed in the 50th year of His Majesty George III.), as amended by an Act, the 2nd and 3rd of Her Majesty."

Therefore, it appeared to him, that a clause containing this Act of George IV. might be described as amending the Act of George III. That Act of George IV. exempted Masonic lodges from certain penalties attaching to them, and he could not see that an Amendment further extending the mitigation provided by the Act of George IV. to the Masonic body in Ireland was irrelevant. Therefore, having given the best consideration in his power to the important points raised by the noble Lord, he considered the Amendment in Order, and could not refuse to put it from the Chair.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "Provided always, That all Freemasons or Friendly Brothers who have by reason of inadvertence or neglect not heretofore complied with the directions contained in the second section of the said Act of the second and third Victoria, chapter seventy-four, shall be and they are hereby indemnified, freed, and discharged from all penalties incurred by reason of any such inadvertence or neglect. And inasmuch as certain associations of Freemasons exist which according to the rules and usage of the said society are not denominated lodges, but are designated councils, chapters, colleges, priories, preceptories, or otherwise, it is hereby enacted that any person making any such certificate upon oath as in the second section of the said Act of the second and third Victoria, chapter seventy-four, mentioned, shall be at liberty to designate in such certificate the society, the holding whereof shall be therein certified by the name or designation by which it is usually distinguished according to the usage of the said Society of Freemasons: Provided also, That if any such certificate shall be duly registered within one year after the passing of this Act, it shall not be necessary in any succeeding year to register with the clerk of the peace the name or denomination of any branch of the said Society of Freemasons, or the usual place or places, or the time or times of its meetings, or the names or descriptions of the members thereof, anything in the said Act of the second and third Victoria, chapter seventy-four, to the contrary notwithstanding."—(Mr. Gibson.)

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that he, of course, accepted the ruling of the Chairman, and would now address himself to the Amendment. This was not a question whether certain Freemasons were rich and others were poor, but whether Freemasons in Ireland who had contravened the law, and were therefore subject to the heavy penalties of felony, should receive an indemnity under this Bill. It seemed rather hard to impose penalties upon persons who followed the plough in Ireland, and who could not be supposed to be acquainted with laws so complicated and involved, while persons who had much better means of knowing what the law was should receive an indemnity for its transgression. There was a series of Acts, beginning with the 50th Geo. III. c. 102, relating to unlawful oaths, and by these Acts Freemasons were clearly felons, and liable to be transported. The 2 and 3 Vict. c. 54 made the exemption to which the hon. and learned Member had alluded; but in some respects it was still more strict, as it made every society liable to the penalty whose members were known to each other by secret signs and passwords. It exempted the Freemasons on two conditions, and, if these had been complied with, there would have been no necessity for the hon. and learned Member to bring in an indemnity clause. He had moved for a Return, which would be shortly in the hands of hon. Members, and which would show that not a single lodge in Ireland had fulfilled the conditions. The hon. and learned Member had said that the Grand Lodge had done so since the Duke of Abercorn had joined. But the Duke of Abercorn joined at a time when every member of the lodge was a felon. It was a rule of the debates of this House that no Member should, for the purpose of influencing the debates, mention the name of the Sovereign, and therefore it would not be becoming in him to mention the name of one closely related to the Sovereign. He would, however, state that the Papers ordered would show that the Grand Master was his Excellency the Duke of Abercorn, and the Senior Grand Deacon was the Hon. D. R. Plunket, M.P. The question before the Committee then was whether, in a Bill which inflicted Pains and Penalties on poor people in Ireland not guilty of any crime against the law of God, they should, to please the Government, introduce an indemnity clause in favour of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, the Solicitor General for Ireland, and others. If a separate Indemnity Bill for the Freemasons were brought in, he did not suppose anyone would oppose it.

MR. CALLAN said, he objected to the proposed clause, on the same ground that he objected to Fenianism, to Manchester murderers, or any other proceedings which violated the law. As to the Friendly Brothers Society, the hon. and learned Gentleman ought to know that no Roman Catholic could be a member of them; but if he would say that the clause he now proposed was to be an Act of Indemnity for himself, he should certainly not move any Amendment; but, if not, he would do so, and divide the Committee upon it.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he was not aware that the Freemasons were an illegal society. They had been recognized in the whole of the Three Kingdoms. It was well known that they were a well-disposed body all over Europe. ["Oh, oh!"] He interpreted the cry of "Oh!" to refer to Italy, but in Italy the King was at the head of the society. The same was the case in Sweden. In this country the Heir Apparent to the Throne was at their head, and in Ireland their head was the Representative of Her Majesty. It was therefore a pure misrepresentation to say that Freemasons were a secret or illegal body.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he was not a member of the Freemasons' Society, nor did he know what it was. Would any hon. Member tell the Committee why its members were deserving of the exemption it was now proposed to give them? The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Macartney) said the King of Italy was a member, the King of Sweden a member, and so was the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland. Well, was he not at least able to give him (Mr. Sullivan) the information he required? He wished to know what were their rites, rules, and mysteries? The Committee were asked to vote for an exemption blindfold. Prove the merits and qualifications of the order, and if it was to be a benefit to the human race, let the Committee know a little more about it. He wished some "man and brother," if that was the proper phrase, to tell the uninitiated whether they were morally justified in passing a Bill of exemption of this nature. He knew a great many excellent men who were members of Freemasons' lodges, and had nothing to say against them; but he was ignorant of the mysteries of the craft, and he hoped that some Member would get up and tell the Committee all about it.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) said, there was not, so far as he was aware, any rule in Freemasonry which would prevent the hon. Member for Louth from becoming one of the order. Nor was there any reason why the hon. Member should not become acquainted with all the rites if he saw fit. Only there were certain proceedings of a preliminary character, which, however, were not so formidable as they were supposed to be, and if the hon. Gentleman was disposed to press the matter forward, he should be happy to give him every facility and advantage which lay in his power as a member of the Craft. But the hon. Gentleman must remember it was not they who had dragged this matter forward; it was the ingenuity—the misuse of ingenuity—of the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath who had discovered that the conditions prescribed by the Act had not been complied with. He confessed, though he (the Solicitor General) had read the statute on the subject, and had almost been brought up a Freemason, he was ignorant until now that all the conditions had not been fulfilled, as had been asserted by the noble Lord. There was no doubt that up to a few years ago all these conditions had been fully complied with, and that they would also be complied with in the future. He need scarcely inform the House that the Unlawful Oaths Acts were as severe in England as in Ireland against the Freemasons, and if the noble Lord extended his research to England he might find omissions here also. He considered the proposal before the Committee a very fair one.

MR. MUNDELLA hoped the Irish Members would not stultify themselves by voting against this Amendment. They were contending for the same rights and privileges as were enjoyed by their fellow-countrymen in England, and how then could they consistently vote for the retention of a coercive clause against a large section of their fellow-countrymen to whom no crime was imputed? Odd Fellows, Freemasons, and Friendly Brothers were under no coercion in England, and why should they be so in Ireland?

MR. MELDON said, he did not think this was an Amendment which ought to provoke mirth in any way. This was a Bill affecting Ireland alone; it was a Bill brought forward for the purpose of coercion; and it was proposed to offer an indemnity only to one particular class—the Freemasons, or, in other words, to the rich of the land. ["No, no!"] He maintained that it was so. He said rich, because 99 hundredths almost of the Irish people believed that the Freemasons Society was an illegal society, and a society of which they ought not to become members. Reference had been made to the Viceroy of Ireland. Well, in his opinion, the appointment of the Viceroy to the head of the Freemasons of Ireland was an insult to 99 hundredths of the Irish people. He could not shut his eyes to the fact that the society in Italy was as atrocious a society as ever existed—he could not shut his eyes to the fact that on a very recent occasion in this metropolis a deputation waited upon the head of the order in England and was received privately.

Mr. BUTLER-JOHNSTONE pointed out that "Secret Society" was an equivocal term. A society might be called secret because its rites and ceremonies were secret, or else because it was not known who were its members. In the latter sense Freemasonry was not a secret society, for their names were all published; and if the Ribbon Societies would publish the names of their members there would be no objection to them.

Mr. CALLAN moved to omit from the proposed Amendment the words "or the names or descriptions of the members thereof."

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, that although his own religious opinions would not permit him to join a society like the Freemasons, yet he did not see why he should seek to deny to others the privilege of doing so. He would rather exercise that charity in reference to matters of opinion that it was the duty of all of them to inculcate in Ireland. Gentlemen had from inadvertence offended against the law, and when they wished to withdraw from the unfortunate position into which they had got, he should not join in any attempt to prevent them doing so.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU hoped that there would be no division against the original Amendment, because he thought it would be quite sufficient that they should have protested against the bad taste of the proposed mode of exempting the Freemasons.

Mr. BUTT also thought that it would be unfortunate to have a division upon the question, though the matter was not such a light one as some persons supposed. The question was now not as to unlawful oaths, but as to societies which had "signs and passwords." Such societies were declared illegal, but Freemasons' societies were exempted from the enactment if they performed certain conditions, which in many cases had not been performed. It was certain that there were Masonic lodges in Dublin which had not complied with this absurd legislation. As, however, it was persons of rank and position who had violated the law, the matter was not treated as being at all serious. It would have been better if there had been a clause indemnifying every one who was in a similar position, and not simply persons who were members of a particular society, because in such a mode of proceeding there would be nothing of an exceptional kind, neither would it tend, as the proposed Amendment did, to make felony appear respectable in the eyes of the Irish people.

Mr. MITCHELL HENRY said, his intention was to vote in favour of liberty and against any restrictions upon the rights of his fellow-subjects. There were, he was aware, societies that had "secret signs," and there was a society called the "Catholic Union Society," but he did not know whether that society had any secret signs or not. ["No, no!"] Well, he did not say that it had; but even if it was proved it had passwords, he would never give a vote which would operate against such a society. He would here say that there ought to be but one law for England and for Ireland.

Amendment (Mr. Callan) to said proposed Amendment negatived.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 311; Noes 3: Majority 308.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Continuance of certain parts of Protection of Life and Property in certain Parts of Ireland Act, 1871.)

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA, in page 4, line 32, moved, as an Amendment, to leave out "seventy-seven," and insert instead "seventy-six," the object of which was to limit the duration of the Westmeath Act to one year. He did not know that it was necessary for him to enter into any general argument on this question, the subject having been already exhausted. The question for the Committee was whether the renewal of the Act for one year only should be adopted.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. BUTT then moved an Amendment to the effect that so much of the Act of 1871 as provided that no writ of Habeas Corpus should issue to bring up the body of any one arrested under it should be repealed. All that could be intended by the measure was that the Lord Lieutenant should have the power of indefinitely detaining a man in custody instead of bringing him to trial at the next Assizes; but it was unjust and unprecedented that a man so imprisoned should be shut out from his constitutional right to move for a writ of Habeas Corpus to be brought before the Court to obtain its judgment on the legality and sufficiency of the warrant under which he was detained. There was, he contended, no Act previous to the Westmeath Act which took away the right to a writ of Habeas Corpus which existed at Common Law previous to the passing of any statute. That Act, therefore, was in violation of all the usages of English legislation, and he therefore hoped the Amendment would be assented to.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 38, at the end thereof, to add the words "Provided always, That so much of said Act as provides that 'no writ of habeas corpus should issue to bring up the body of any person arrested or committed or detained by force of a warrant issued under the authority of the said Act' shall be and the same is hereby repealed."—(Mr. Butt.)

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PLUNKET) said, the Act in question had been drawn with exceptional severity to meet an exceptional state of things, and carried out in a most complete and accurate way that which was the express intention of the Legislature. The Amendment, if carried, would, to some extent, weaken the effect of the Act, and he should not, therefore, advise the Committee to agree to it. No person arrested under this power would be subjected to unfair treatment, but would be dealt with as an untried prisoner.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, the hon. and learned Member had altogether failed to meet the constitutional argument raised by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick. He (Sir George Bowyer) wished it to be understood, as a matter of Constitutional Law, that the clause did what no suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act ever before effected, because it took away from the subject detained under this Act the Common Law right of Habeas Corpus, and deprived the Sovereign of the right to inquire whether the subject was or was not legally detained. The warrant might be wrong in point of law, yet its legality could not be inquired into. He should, therefore, oppose this unconstitutional provision.

MR. SULLIVAN was confident that nine-tenths of those whom he addressed were under the impression that the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act meant no more than that the Lord Lieutenant might detain a man in prison without bringing him to trial; whereas it went further and gave the Lord Lieutenant the power, if necessary, to send a prisoner beyond the jurisdiction of a writ. What his hon. and learned Friend asked was that Parliament should leave untouched the right of the subject to have the legality of the warrant under which he was detained reviewed by one of the Courts of Common Law. Let them confer, if they would, the simple power of detention on the Lord Lieutenant; but let them leave untouched the right at Common Law which existed before the time of Charles II. of challenging the substance of his procedure, and not place the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act beyond all law, all supervision, and all review. Let them not give to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland a power which, rather than confer it upon the Monarch of England, they would first take his head. ["Oh, oh!"] They had done so before, and in the history of England there was no constitutional question that had been more fiercely contested in the interests of popular rights. In the present case, while the Act of Charles II., which they so much boasted of, gave an accused person a right to speedy trial, they were by this Act taking away every constitutional right from the Irish people. Such a clause would give the Lord Lieutenant power to inflict torture in the Irish prisons.

MR. RONAYNE appealed to the Leader of the Opposition to give effect on that occasion to the utterance of the late Prime Minister, when a similar Bill was under discussion in a former year, to the effect that he knew not what was worse than tranquillity purchased by the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act except civil war. Yet this was the state to which they proposed to reduce Ireland, a country which was at peace and free from agrarian crimes.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING reminded the House that in the case of Wolfe Tone, when sentence of death had been passed upon him by a military tribunal for high treason, the Court of Queen's Bench issued its writ of Habeas Corpus—though the Courts had been

vided that the Grand Jury should be satisfied that material evidence was being withheld, he thought the matter would be placed on a proper footing. He thought it better that the matter should, with these safeguards, be settled by the local authorities, than that they should now adopt any off-hand proposals for dealing with the question.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 87; Noes 269: Majority 182.

MR. FAY moved, as an Amendment, in page 4, line 10, to insert after "appeals"—

"Provided always, That, notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained, there shall be such right of traverse of any such presentment as is given in respect of malicious injuries in the Act of 6 and 7 William IV., chapter 116."

He contended that they would brand the juries of Ireland with complicity with criminal outrages if they did not admit that those juries were willing to allow compensation to the relatives of those who had suffered from such outrages. Proceedings in Grand Jury rooms in reference to these matters were not always conducted in a very correct manner, and he thought that the ratepayers should have the right to appeal to a common jury in matters wherein they felt aggrieved and that a wrong decision had been arrived at.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 10, after the word "appeals," to insert the words "Provided always, That, notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained, there shall be such right of traverse of any such presentment as is given in respect of malicious injuries under the Act of the sixth and seventh of William the Fourth, chapter one hundred and sixteen."—(Mr. Fay.)

MR. GIBSON said, the effect of the Amendment would be to change the existing tribunal, which had been existing and working ever since the year 1870. It had been appointed by the Peace Preservation Act of 1870 to work out this compensation system. Indeed, he could not imagine a more satisfactory tribunal than the present one, as it consisted of the gentry and those who had the largest interest in the county in every way. All the witnesses were examined before it, and every one of them had an opportunity of stating what he desired in the case; and any ratepayer who had an interest in the matter could, if dissatisfied, take it—before whom? Not before a petty jury, but before one of Her Majesty's Judges, who listened to all on each side, and, after he had heard all on the one side and the other, affirmed or set aside the decision of the Grand Jury. Now, that was a tribunal that had been in operation for the last five years, and which had, to his (Mr. Gibson's) knowledge, worked well. Yet, while the Judges had power to select a wider area for the incidence of taxation—a power exercised by Baron Dease—once an ornament to this House—it was now sought by the hon. Member to set that tribunal aside and adopt another. Let it also be remembered that it was now asked to pass the present Bill for five years only, and that the existing tribunal, which it was sought by the Bill to continue, had been in operation five years. He hoped the Committee would decide in favour of the appeal to Her Majesty's Judges and against the Amendment of the hon. Member.

MR. BIGGAR said, the hon. and learned Member who had just addressed the House asserted that the decisions of Her Majesty's Judges had given great satisfaction; but he (Mr. Biggar) believed the contrary, and he considered the adoption of power of appeal to a common jury desirable.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 61; Noes 221: Majority 160.

CAPTAIN NOLAN moved, as an Amendment, in page 4, at end of clause, to add—

"And he may also determine that such sum shall be levied from the poor rates instead of from the county cess, and award accordingly."

The Government could not call this a revolutionary Amendment, as it merely permitted the Judge to levy half the burden on the landlord and half on the occupier, instead of placing the whole rate on the occupier. The occupiers of the land might not know anything of the injury for which the levy was made, and the question was simply one of compensation. He did not think the proposal was very revolutionary. The Judges might, in certain cases, be of opinion that there had been remissness on the part of the magistrates, and that they should bear a part of the compensation. In such cases the charge ought most certainly to be divided between the landlord and the occupier.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, the Committee having already decided that the monies necessary to provide compensation should be levied upon the county cess, he could not accept a proposal which would put it within the power of the Judges to override the decision of Parliament.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY contended that there was nothing in the decision referred to by the Chief Secretary to prevent the Committee acceding to the proposal of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway. Nothing could be more unjust than to charge the tenantry of a district with the compensation for an outrage in which they manifestly had no part.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING, though he thought his hon. and gallant Friend had the best of the argument, advised the withdrawal of the Amendment, on the ground that they could not at that period of the evening hope to obtain a better division than had already taken place.

MR. BIGGAR trusted the hon. and gallant Gentleman would press his Motion.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, he had now to move an Amendment, which was essentially different from that of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway. The Amendment was this—that, inasmuch as under the 138th section of the Grand Juries Act the Judges had had the power, in the traverse of a presentment, to call a jury to their aid, they should also have the power of calling a jury to assist them, not for the purpose of saying that a malicious outrage was not an agrarian crime, or that there should be no assessment at all, but simply to determine what should be the area over which the taxation should extend, and also to vary the amount of the award. He proposed that the jurors should not be fewer in number than five nor greater than nine. It would be much better that any presentment for agrarian crime should be made over the whole county instead of upon so limited an area.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PLUNKET) said, this was decidedly a less objectionable

Amendment than the one that had recently been rejected. Parliament, however, had deliberately adopted the opposite procedure, and, as it had worked well and the principle had just been re-affirmed by the Committee, he would ask the hon. Gentleman not to press his Amendment to a division.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY, for the sake of consistency, must join in the appeal to his hon. Friend to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On Question, That the clause, as amended, be agreed to?

THE O'CONOR DON asked when the Chief Secretary for Ireland would make the promised additions to the clause?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH thought they would be most conveniently made on the Report.

MR. BIGGAR said, it was his duty to oppose the clause, as it was wholly incomprehensible. The Amendments to the clause were numerous, and it was desirable that the Committee should have them in a comprehensive form before the clause was agreed to. No one seemed to understand the clause. Indeed, he would undertake to say that there not half-a-dozen Members who were clearly acquainted with its meaning.

MR. BUTT desired to know if he rightly understood the change which had been made in reference to the search for arms? The original Act authorized the issue of general warrants, and since 1870, practically, the law had been to give the police the power to make domiciliary visits. These warrants, as he now understood the Chief Secretary, were not being renewed throughout the proclaimed districts of Ireland, but only in those places or parts where the importation of arms was feared. [Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH assented.] That being the case, he could only say it was a great amelioration of the condition of the Irish people; and he desired to know now if there would be any objection, when these warrants became necessary, to have a magistrate's signature attached to them.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, the hon. and learned Member had correctly appreciated the state of affairs which existed. In certain parts of Ireland general warrants were in force, but he could not name the places publicly.

No change had been made in the form of the warrant, and, generally speaking, no warrants for searches were issued without the places being specified.

MR. BUTT was glad to find that general warrants were not issued, except in special cases; but still, the general warrant was legally in force.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Continuance of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 74, as amended by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 89).

MR. BUTT moved, as an Amendment, in page 4, in line 17, the omission of the words, "as amended by the Act passed in the Session of Parliament held in the eleventh and twelfth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter seventy-nine." The effect of the Amendment would be to exclude from the operation of the present Bill a power which was no longer required—namely, that of entering a meeting held for a seditious or treasonable purpose and seizing papers, and of remaining there as long as was thought fit. Such a provision might be suited for 1848, but it was altogether uncalled-for now as regarded any part of Ireland.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 17, to leave out the words "as amended by the Act passed in the Session of Parliament held in the eleventh and twelfth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter seventy-nine."—(Mr. Butt.)

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PLUNKET) said, the Government could not accept the Amendment. He was not prepared to admit that the provision referred to was wholly uncalled-for. A statement had been made and repeated more than once in the course of the debate which he would take this opportunity to correct. The noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu) without, of course, wishing to misrepresent him (the Solicitor General for Ireland) had said that he had stated in his speech on the second reading of the Bill, that the Fenian conspiracy was now of the least importance. What he said was that three evils were to be guarded against by this Bill, and the least of the three was Fenianism; but he had never said that this conspiracy which was in full force so short a time ago had lost its importance.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 101; Noes 68: Majority 33.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, he had an Amendment on the Paper, altering the year when the operation of the clause should expire from 1880 to 1876; but with the permission of the House he would withdraw it, as the question which it involved was one which had already been discussed and disposed of.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

CAPTAIN NOLAN moved, as an Amendment, that "1877" should be substituted for "1880."

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 21, to leave out the word "eighty," and insert the words "seventy-seven."—(Captain Nolan.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH agreed with the hon. Member for the county of Cork (Mr. M'Carthy Downing) in thinking that this was a matter which had already been disposed of.

MR. BUTT maintained that it was quite a different question, the former decision having reference to the powers relating to arms.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PLUNKET) said, the principle had been affirmed on three separate occasions.

Question put, "That the word 'eighty' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 87; Noes 85: Majority 2.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he wished to call the attention of the Chairman to a matter connected with the closing of the door of the House at the time of a division. He had noticed on several occasions lately that there appeared to be a want of harmony between the running out of the sand and the closing of the door. If a Rule of the House required that the door should be shut whenever the sand in the glass had run out, he had no doubt the Chairman would take care that it should be strictly enforced. In discussions like the present—discussions in which Irish Members felt so strongly—it was extremely important that there should be the utmost accuracy in the observance of the rules relating to divisions.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for the county of Galway is perfectly right in assuming that the moment the sand in the glass has run out the ringing of the bell ought to cease and the door ought to be closed. I have always risen in my place at that moment for the purpose of showing that the door ought then to be shut. It has, however, happened sometimes that, owing to a crowd of Members rushing in, it has been difficult to carry out the Rule with the utmost precision. My attention was privately called to the matter yesterday, and I at once put myself in communication with the Sergeant-at-Arms in order to secure that, as far as possible, the door should always be closed at the proper moment.

CAPTAIN NOLAN, as he was at the door, wished to say that he thought everything there on the last occasion was conducted with perfect fairness towards both sides. On other occasions, two or three days ago, he might have complained of what occurred.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) said, he wished to move the Amendment which stood on the Paper in his name. As originally drawn, the clause proposed to exempt the Odd Fellows and Free Foresters from the operation of the statute against unlawful societies; but after further consideration of the matter, the Government had come to the conclusion that it would be better to follow as closely as possible the words of the Friendly Societies Act for England, a course which would have the advantage of placing the law of both countries more nearly on the same basis and also of including within its protection other friendly societies besides the Free Foresters and Odd Fellows. He begged therefore to move, in page 4, line 21, to leave out from after "eighty" to end of Clause, and insert—

"But the provisions of the said Acts shall not extend to any society now established, or hereafter to be established, under the statutes regulating Friendly Societies, or to any meeting of the members or officers thereof, in which society, or at which meeting, no business whatever is transacted other than that which, directly and immediately, relates to the objects of the society as declared in the rules thereof, and set forth in the certified copy thereof: Provided, That the trustees or other officers of the society, when required under the hands of two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace, shall give full information to such justices of the nature, objects, proceedings, and practices of such society; and, in default thereof, the provisions of the said Acts shall be in force in respect of such society."

MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON said, that, when it was first proposed to exempt by name the Free Foresters and Odd Fellows, he had put on the Paper an Amendment to exempt another society in which he was interested—namely, the Orangemen, who were entitled to equal privileges with those other associations; but the Amendment just moved by the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland deprived him of the opportunity of moving his own Amendment. He certainly would not claim for the Orangemen a privilege that he would not extend to other societies. At the same time, he was not prepared to admit the illegality of the Orange Society, still less could he for a moment allow that the aims of that institution should be put on a par with those of the Ribbon Society. The Ribbon Society had for its object murder and assassination; whereas the Orange Society had for its object the maintenance of the Protestant religion, the support of the rightful Sovereign, and the upholding of the laws of the Realm, the Legislative Union, and the succession to the Throne in the House of Brunswick being Protestant. It was composed exclusively of men who were attached to the principles of the Reformation and averse from religious persecution. He knew it had been the custom to malign the Orange Society, and he did not pretend that every member of it was individually infallible; but he asserted that it had a noble purpose, and one with which every loyal citizen of the Empire should sympathize.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland had implied that Foresters and Oddfellows came within the provisions of the Acts against illegal oaths. He was informed that the Foresters took no oaths, and he knew the Oddfellows did not; and he therefore wished for some explanation on this point.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) said, that last year it was suggested that a clause should be introduced to prevent the possibility of these societies being exposed to penalties under the Unlawful Oaths

Acts. The Friendly Societies Act (1855) provided an exemption in favour of these societies only against the Unlawful Oaths Act—the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 48—then in force in Ireland, but long since spent. As it was intended by this Bill to continue the measures against unlawful oaths it was thought desirable to renew the exemption, and he had done so as nearly as possible in the words of the English Friendly Societies Act. There was no insinuation that these societies were conducted in such a way as wilfully to expose themselves to the provisions of the Unlawful Oaths Acts.

MR. BUTT said, it was the misfortune of his hon. and learned Friend to mislead the Committee when he addressed them on this Bill. This Bill had no more to do with unlawful oaths than any Bill which had been introduced by the Government; but it was a Bill to prevent the use of signs and passwords in Ireland. Now, any society in England could have signs and passwords; then why should there be a law against the use of such things in Ireland? Although he did not intend to oppose the clause, he thought that this legislation against signs and passwords was most absurd and childish.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. GIBSON proposed, as an Amendment, to add to the end of the clause the following words:—

“Provided always, That all Freemasons or Friendly Brothers who have by reason of inadvertence or neglect not heretofore complied with the directions contained in the second section of the said Act of the second and third Victoria, chapter seventy-four, shall be, and they are hereby indemnified, freed, and discharged from all penalties incurred by reason of any such inadvertence or neglect: And inasmuch as certain associations of Freemasons exist which according to the rules and usages of the said society are not denominated lodges, but are designated councils, chapters, colleges, priories, preceptories, or otherwise, it is hereby enacted that any person making any such certificate upon oath as in the second section of the said Act of the second and third Victoria, chapter seventy-four mentioned, shall be at liberty to designate in such certificate the society, the holding whereof shall be therein certified by the name or designation by which it is usually distinguished according to the usage of the said society of Freemasons: Provided also, That if any such certificates shall be duly registered within one year after the passing of this Act, it shall not be necessary in any succeeding year to register with the clerk of the peace the name or denomination of any branch of the said societies of Freemasons, or the usual place or places, or the time or times of its meetings, or the names or descriptions of the members thereof, anything in the said Act of the second and third Victoria, chapter seventy-four, to the contrary notwithstanding.”

Some hon. Member had on another occasion referred to the fact that the Lord Lieutenant was a Mason. This was true. He belonged to the Grand Lodge, which had been duly registered according to the requirements of law. [MR. CALLAN: Since when?] Since the Lord Lieutenant had been a member of the lodge it had been registered, and therefore his Excellency was in no sense open to any imputation of acting in violation of the law. The Masons were a charitable body, and everyone knew that both the Masons and the Friendly Brothers, if they were proud of anything, were proud of their loyalty. Owing to negligence or inadvertence, however, the secretaries of the various divisions had omitted to perform the necessary work, and the result was, as had been stated in the Amendment, that these loyal and charitable bodies had not entirely complied with the requirements by which they were to be exempted from the purview of the statute. The Amendment was intended to exempt those bodies from the penalties they had incurred. He himself had the honour to belong to both of the societies, and he was not sure whether he was not within the purview of the Acts.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU rose to Order. He had listened to his hon. and learned Friend, as he did not care to interrupt him whilst he was speaking, but he wished to put it to the Chairman whether the clause could be proposed. In Sir Erskine May's book, page 502, it was stated that—

“No amendment could properly be proposed to a clause irrelevant to the matter of that clause,” and “If a clause or amendment irrelevant to the subject-matter of the Bill be offered, the Chairman will decline to put the question.”—[pp. 502, 507.]

Well, the title and scope of the Bill were utterly alien to the subject-matter of this clause. It was a Bill to continue certain Peace Preservation Acts in Ireland; it was a Bill imposing Pains and Penalties on Ireland; but this clause was to indemnify certain rich persons from the penalty of felony which they had incurred. In the next place, they had incurred that penalty under an Act which was not embodied in this Bill, the 50th Geo. III; and, thirdly, this Bill was only a temporary Act, whereas the effect of the Amendment would not be temporary; it would extend to all time. The scope of the Amendment and the Bill, therefore, were not identical. It would be a great misfortune if that House should send to Ireland a Bill of most severe Pains and Penalties, which contained within it a clause of indemnity to certain rich persons, while inflicting penalties on the poor.

MR. MELDON also rose to Order. He wished to know whether an hon. Member who admitted that he was himself liable to the penalty of felony could come to that House and ask to be relieved of it?

MR. GIBSON would admit that perhaps he might be out of Court on that score; but he had been extremely cautious when he stated that he belonged to these bodies, for he had said that he was not "sure" that he was affected. In answer to the noble Lord, he might say that the Masons were not all rich, for the members of that body did not belong to any particular class; therefore, it was a mistake to say that the clause was to indemnify the rich. The only qualifications absolutely insisted on were loyalty and adherence to all the ordinary dictates of Christian charity. He submitted that the Amendment was perfectly relevant to the Bill, for he only wished by his clause to amend the Acts as they were recited in the Preamble.

MR. CALLAN asked whether it was consistent with the Rules of the House that a Member should vote on any matter in which he was personally interested?

MR. GIBSON said, he did not positively know that he was personally interested in the matter.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the Standing Order to which reference had been made by the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan) related to the case of Members who had a pecuniary interest in the matter before the House. He believed that on a former occasion exception had been taken to a Member of the House taking part in the discussion of a case in which he was exposed to a penalty; but the Member having stated in his place that he had received no Notice, it was ruled that he was entitled to address the House. The points raised by the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath were much more important. The first objection was that the Amendment was not within the scope and title of the Bill. That would have been a perfectly valid objection up to the year 1854, when this House adopted a new Standing Order, that any Amendment might be introduced which was relevant to the subject-matter of the Bill; and it was no longer enough to say that the Amendment was not within the scope of the Bill. Of course, it would follow, if such an Amendment were adopted, that the Preamble and Title of the Bill should be amended accordingly. The point, therefore, to be decided was as to the relevancy of this Amendment. Now, though he had for a moment entertained some doubt on the subject, he could not undertake to say that this Amendment was irrelevant. He might, perhaps, point out that some of the words had been embodied in the clause, which had been, however, struck out in order to introduce other words, by which there had been conveyed a somewhat similar exemption. These words stated that the said Act should be so construed as if the provision extended to Foresters and Odd Fellows. It was therefore intended by the framers of the Act that it should have a retrospective effect as far as freeing certain persons from the penalties imposed by the Acts which it amended. Another objection was that there was no mention of the 50th Geo. III. within the four corners of the Bill. But he would call attention to the wording of this particular clause, which stated that it was—

"An Act to extend and render more effectual the Act passed in the reign of His Majesty George IV. (to amend an Act passed in the 50th year of His Majesty George III.), as amended by an Act, the 2nd and 3rd of Her Majesty."

Therefore, it appeared to him, that a clause containing this Act of George IV. might be described as amending the Act of George III. That Act of George IV. exempted Masonic lodges from certain penalties attaching to them, and he could not see that an Amendment further extending the mitigation provided by the Act of George IV. to the Masonic body in Ireland was irrelevant. Therefore, having given the best consideration in his power to the important points raised by the noble Lord, he considered the Amendment in Order, and could not refuse to put it from the Chair.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "Provided always, That all Freemasons or Friendly Brothers who have by reason of inadvertence or neglect not heretofore complied with the directions contained in the second section of the said Act of the second and third Victoria, chapter seventy-four, shall be and they are hereby indemnified, freed, and discharged from all penalties incurred by reason of any such inadvertence or neglect. And inasmuch as certain associations of Freemasons exist which according to the rules and usage of the said society are not denominated lodges, but are designated councils, chapters, colleges, priories, preceptories, or otherwise, it is hereby enacted that any person making any such certificate upon oath as in the second section of the said Act of the second and third Victoria, chapter seventy-four, mentioned, shall be at liberty to designate in such certificate the society, the holding whereof shall be therein certified by the name or designation by which it is usually distinguished according to the usage of the said Society of Freemasons: Provided also, That if any such certificate shall be duly registered within one year after the passing of this Act, it shall not be necessary in any succeeding year to register with the clerk of the peace the name or denomination of any branch of the said Society of Freemasons, or the usual place or places, or the time or times of its meetings, or the names or descriptions of the members thereof, anything in the said Act of the second and third Victoria, chapter seventy-four, to the contrary notwithstanding."—(Mr. Gibson.)

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that he, of course, accepted the ruling of the Chairman, and would now address himself to the Amendment. This was not a question whether certain Freemasons were rich and others were poor, but whether Freemasons in Ireland who had contravened the law, and were therefore subject to the heavy penalties of felony, should receive an indemnity under this Bill. It seemed rather hard to impose penalties upon persons who followed the plough in Ireland, and who could not be supposed to be acquainted with laws so complicated and involved, while persons who had much better means of knowing what the law was should receive an indemnity for its transgression. There was a series of Acts, beginning with the 50th Geo. III. c. 102, relating to unlawful oaths, and by these Acts Freemasons were clearly felons, and liable to be transported. The 2 and 3 Vict. c. 54 made the exemption to which the hon. and learned Member had alluded; but in some respects it was still more strict, as it made every society liable to the penalty whose members were known to each other by secret signs and passwords. It exempted the Freemasons on two conditions, and, if these had been complied with, there would have been no necessity for the hon. and learned Member to bring in an indemnity clause. He had moved for a Return, which would be shortly in the hands of hon. Members, and which would show that not a single lodge in Ireland had fulfilled the conditions. The hon. and learned Member had said that the Grand Lodge had done so since the Duke of Abercorn had joined. But the Duke of Abercorn joined at a time when every member of the lodge was a felon. It was a rule of the debates of this House that no Member should, for the purpose of influencing the debates, mention the name of the Sovereign, and therefore it would not be becoming in him to mention the name of one closely related to the Sovereign. He would, however, state that the Papers ordered would show that the Grand Master was his Excellency the Duke of Abercorn, and the Senior Grand Deacon was the Hon. D. R. Plunket, M.P. The question before the Committee then was whether, in a Bill which inflicted Pains and Penalties on poor people in Ireland not guilty of any crime against the law of God, they should, to please the Government, introduce an indemnity clause in favour of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, the Solicitor General for Ireland, and others. If a separate Indemnity Bill for the Freemasons were brought in, he did not suppose anyone would oppose it.

MR. CALLAN said, he objected to the proposed clause, on the same ground that he objected to Fenianism, to Manchester murderers, or any other proceedings which violated the law. As to the Friendly Brothers Society, the hon. and learned Gentleman ought to know that no Roman Catholic could be a member of them; but if he would say that the clause he now proposed was to be an Act of Indemnity for himself, he should certainly not move any Amendment; but, if not, he would do so, and divide the Committee upon it.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he was not aware that the Freemasons were an illegal society. They had been recognized in the whole of the Three Kingdoms. It was well known that they were a well-disposed body all over Europe. ["Oh, oh!"] He interpreted the cry of "Oh!" to refer to Italy, but in Italy the King was at the head of the society. The same was the case in Sweden. In this country the Heir Apparent to the Throne was at their head, and in Ireland their head was the Representative of Her Majesty. It was therefore a pure misrepresentation to say that Freemasons were a secret or illegal body.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he was not a member of the Freemasons' Society, nor did he know what it was. Would any hon. Member tell the Committee why its members were deserving of the exemption it was now proposed to give them? The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Macartney) said the King of Italy was a member, the King of Sweden a member, and so was the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland. Well, was he not at least able to give him (Mr. Sullivan) the information he required? He wished to know what were their rites, rules, and mysteries? The Committee were asked to vote for an exemption blindfold. Prove the merits and qualifications of the order, and if it was to be a benefit to the human race, let the Committee know a little more about it. He wished some "man and brother," if that was the proper phrase, to tell the uninitiated whether they were morally justified in passing a Bill of exemption of this nature. He knew a great many excellent men who were members of Freemasons' lodges, and had nothing to say against them; but he was ignorant of the mysteries of the craft, and he hoped that some Member would get up and tell the Committee all about it.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) said, there was not, so far as he was aware, any rule in Freemasonry which would prevent the hon. Member for Louth from becoming one of the order. Nor was there any reason why the hon. Member should not become acquainted with all the rites if he saw fit. Only there were certain proceedings of a preliminary character, which, however, were not so formidable as they were supposed to be, and if the hon. Gentleman was disposed to press the matter forward, he should be happy to give him every facility and advantage which lay in his power as a member of the Craft. But the hon. Gentleman must remember it was not they who had dragged this matter forward; it was the ingenuity—the misuse of ingenuity—of the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath who had discovered that the conditions prescribed by the Act had not been complied with. He confessed, though he (the Solicitor General) had read the statute on the subject, and had almost been brought up a Freemason, he was ignorant until now that all the conditions had not been fulfilled, as had been asserted by the noble Lord. There was no doubt that up to a few years ago all these conditions had been fully complied with, and that they would also be complied with in the future. He need scarcely inform the House that the Unlawful Oaths Acts were as severe in England as in Ireland against the Freemasons, and if the noble Lord extended his research to England he might find omissions here also. He considered the proposal before the Committee a very fair one.

MR. MUNDELLA hoped the Irish Members would not stultify themselves by voting against this Amendment. They were contending for the same rights and privileges as were enjoyed by their fellow-countrymen in England, and how then could they consistently vote for the retention of a coercive clause against a large section of their fellow-countrymen to whom no crime was imputed? Odd Fellows, Freemasons, and Friendly Brothers were under no coercion in England, and why should they be so in Ireland?

MR. MELDON said, he did not think this was an Amendment which ought to provoke mirth in any way. This was a Bill affecting Ireland alone; it was a Bill brought forward for the purpose of coercion; and it was proposed to offer an indemnity only to one particular class—the Freemasons, or, in other words, to the rich of the land. ["No, no!"] He maintained that it was so. He said rich, because 99 hundredths almost of the Irish people believed that the Freemasons Society was an illegal society, and a society of which they ought not to become members. Reference had been made to the Viceroy of Ireland. Well, in his opinion, the appointment of the Viceroy to the head of the Freemasons of Ireland was an insult to 99 hundredths of the Irish people. He could not shut his eyes to the fact that the society in Italy was as atrocious a society as ever existed—he could not shut his eyes to the fact that on a very recent occasion in this metropolis a deputation waited upon the head of the order in England and was received privately.

MR. BUTLER-JOHNSTONE pointed out that "Secret Society" was an equivocal term. A society might be called secret because its rites and ceremonies were secret, or else because it was not known who were its members. In the latter sense Freemasonry was not a secret society, for their names were all published; and if the Ribbon Societies would publish the names of their members there would be no objection to them.

MR. CALLAN moved to omit from the proposed Amendment the words "or the names or descriptions of the members thereof."

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, that although his own religious opinions would not permit him to join a society like the Freemasons, yet he did not see why he should seek to deny to others the privilege of doing so. He would rather exercise that charity in reference to matters of opinion that it was the duty of all of them to inculcate in Ireland. Gentlemen had from inadvertence offended against the law, and when they wished to withdraw from the unfortunate position into which they had got, he should not join in any attempt to prevent them doing so.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU hoped that there would be no division against the original Amendment, because he thought it would be quite sufficient that they should have protested against the bad taste of the proposed mode of exempting the Freemasons.

MR. BUTT also thought that it would be unfortunate to have a division upon the question, though the matter was not such a light one as some persons supposed. The question was now not as to unlawful oaths, but as to societies which had "signs and passwords." Such societies were declared illegal, but Freemasons' societies were exempted from the enactment if they performed certain conditions, which in many cases had not been performed. It was certain that there were Masonic lodges in Dublin which had not complied with this absurd legislation. As, however, it was persons of rank and position who had violated the law, the matter was not treated as being at all serious. It would have been better if there had been a clause indemnifying every one who was in a similar position, and not simply persons who were members of a particular society, because in such a mode of proceeding there would be nothing of an exceptional kind, neither would it tend, as the proposed Amendment did, to make felony appear respectable in the eyes of the Irish people.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, his intention was to vote in favour of liberty and against any restrictions upon the rights of his fellow-subjects. There were, he was aware, societies that had "secret signs," and there was a society called the "Catholic Union Society," but he did not know whether that society had any secret signs or not. ["No, no!"] Well, he did not say that it had; but even if it was proved it had passwords, he would never give a vote which would operate against such a society. He would here say that there ought to be but one law for England and for Ireland.

Amendment (Mr. Callan) to said proposed Amendment negatived.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 311; Noes 3: Majority 308.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Continuance of certain parts of Protection of Life and Property in certain Parts of Ireland Act, 1871.)

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA, in page 4, line 32, moved, as an Amendment, to leave out "seventy-seven," and insert instead "seventy-six," the object of which was to limit the duration of the Westmeath Act to one year. He did not know that it was necessary for him to enter into any general argument on this question, the subject having been already exhausted. The question for the Committee was whether the renewal of the Act for one year only should be adopted.

Amendment negatived.

MR. BUTT then moved an Amendment to the effect that so much of the Act of 1871 as provided that no writ of Habeas Corpus should issue to bring up the body of any one arrested under it should be repealed. All that could be intended by the measure was that the Lord Lieutenant should have the power of indefinitely detaining a man in custody instead of bringing him to trial at the next Assizes; but it was unjust and unprecedented that a man so imprisoned should be shut out from his constitutional right to move for a writ of Habeas Corpus to be brought before the Court to obtain its judgment on the legality and sufficiency of the warrant under which he was detained. There was, he contended, no Act previous to the Westmeath Act which took away the right to a writ of Habeas Corpus which existed at Common Law previous to the passing of any statute. That Act, therefore, was in violation of all the usages of English legislation, and he therefore hoped the Amendment would be assented to.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 38, at the end thereof, to add the words "Provided always, That so much of said Act as provides that 'no writ of habeas corpus should issue to bring up the body of any person arrested or committed or detained by force of a warrant issued under the authority of the said Act' shall be and the same is hereby repealed."—(Mr. Butt.)

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) said, the Act in question had been drawn with exceptional severity to meet an exceptional state of things, and carried out in a most complete and accurate way that which was the express intention of the Legislature. The Amendment, if carried, would, to some extent, weaken the effect of the Act, and he should not, therefore, advise the Committee to agree to it. No person arrested under this power would be subjected to unfair treatment, but would be dealt with as an untried prisoner.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, the hon. and learned Member had altogether failed to meet the constitutional argument raised by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick. He (Sir George Bowyer) wished it to be understood, as a matter of Constitutional Law, that the clause did what no suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act ever before effected, because it took away from the subject detained under this Act the Common Law right of Habeas Corpus, and deprived the Sovereign of the right to inquire whether the subject was or was not legally detained. The warrant might be wrong in point of law, yet its legality could not be inquired into. He should, therefore, oppose this unconstitutional provision.

Mr. SULLIVAN was confident that nine-tenths of those whom he addressed were under the impression that the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act meant no more than that the Lord Lieutenant might detain a man in prison without bringing him to trial; whereas it went further and gave the Lord Lieutenant the power, if necessary, to send a prisoner beyond the jurisdiction of a writ. What his hon. and learned Friend asked was that Parliament should leave untouched the right of the subject to have the legality of the warrant under which he was detained reviewed by one of the Courts of Common Law. Let them confer, if they would, the simple power of detention on the Lord Lieutenant; but let them leave untouched the right at Common Law which existed before the time of Charles II. of challenging the substance of his procedure, and not place the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act beyond all law, all supervision, and all review. Let them not give to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland a power which, rather than confer it upon the Monarch of England, they would first take his head. ["Oh, oh!"] They had done so before, and in the history of England there was no constitutional question that had been more fiercely contested in the interests of popular rights. In the present case, while the Act of Charles II., which they so much boasted of, gave an accused person a right to speedy trial, they were by this Act taking away every constitutional right from the Irish people. Such a clause would give the Lord Lieutenant power to inflict torture in the Irish prisons.

Mr. RONAYNE appealed to the Leader of the Opposition to give effect on that occasion to the utterance of the late Prime Minister, when a similar Bill was under discussion in a former year, to the effect that he knew not what was worse than tranquillity purchased by the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act except civil war. Yet this was the state to which they proposed to reduce Ireland, a country which was at peace and free from agrarian crimes.

Mr. M'CARTHY DOWNING reminded the House that in the case of Wolfe Tone, when sentence of death had been passed upon him by a military tribunal for high treason, the Court of Queen's Bench issued its writ of Habeas Corpus—though the Courts had been

vided that the Grand Jury should be satisfied that material evidence was being withheld, he thought the matter would be placed on a proper footing. He thought it better that the matter should, with these safeguards, be settled by the local authorities, than that they should now adopt any off-hand proposals for dealing with the question.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 87; Noes 269: Majority 182.

MR. FAY moved, as an Amendment, in page 4, line 10, to insert after "appeals"—

"Provided always, That, notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained, there shall be such right of traverse of any such presentment as is given in respect of malicious injuries in the Act of 6 and 7 William IV., chapter 116."

He contended that they would brand the juries of Ireland with complicity with criminal outrages if they did not admit that those juries were willing to allow compensation to the relatives of those who had suffered from such outrages. Proceedings in Grand Jury rooms in reference to these matters were not always conducted in a very correct manner, and he thought that the ratepayers should have the right to appeal to a common jury in matters wherein they felt aggrieved and that a wrong decision had been arrived at.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 10, after the word "appeals," to insert the words "Provided always, That, notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained, there shall be such right of traverse of any such presentment as is given in respect of malicious injuries under the Act of the sixth and seventh of William the Fourth, chapter one hundred and sixteen."—(Mr. Fay.)

MR. GIBSON said, the effect of the Amendment would be to change the existing tribunal, which had been existing and working ever since the year 1870. It had been appointed by the Peace Preservation Act of 1870 to work out this compensation system. Indeed, he could not imagine a more satisfactory tribunal than the present one, as it consisted of the gentry and those who had the largest interest in the county in every way. All the witnesses were examined before it, and every one of them had an opportunity of stating what he desired in the case; and any ratepayer who had an interest in the matter could, if dissatisfied, take it—before whom? Not before a petty jury, but before one of Her Majesty's Judges, who listened to all on each side, and, after he had heard all on the one side and the other, affirmed or set aside the decision of the Grand Jury. Now, that was a tribunal that had been in operation for the last five years, and which had, to his (Mr. Gibson's) knowledge, worked well. Yet, while the Judges had power to select a wider area for the incidence of taxation—a power exercised by Baron Dease—once an ornament to this House—it was now sought by the hon. Member to set that tribunal aside and adopt another. Let it also be remembered that it was now asked to pass the present Bill for five years only, and that the existing tribunal, which it was sought by the Bill to continue, had been in operation five years. He hoped the Committee would decide in favour of the appeal to Her Majesty's Judges and against the Amendment of the hon. Member.

MR. BIGGAR said, the hon. and learned Member who had just addressed the House asserted that the decisions of Her Majesty's Judges had given great satisfaction; but he (Mr. Biggar) believed the contrary, and he considered the adoption of power of appeal to a common jury desirable.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 61; Noes 221: Majority 160.

CAPTAIN NOLAN moved, as an Amendment, in page 4, at end of clause, to add—

"And he may also determine that such sum shall be levied from the poor rates instead of from the county cess, and award accordingly."

The Government could not call this a revolutionary Amendment, as it merely permitted the Judge to levy half the burden on the landlord and half on the occupier, instead of placing the whole rate on the occupier. The occupiers of the land might not know anything of the injury for which the levy was made, and the question was simply one of compensation. He did not think the proposal was very revolutionary. The Judges might, in certain cases, be of opinion that there had been remissness on the part of the magistrates, and that they should bear a part of the compensation. In such cases the charge ought most certainly to be divided between the landlord and the occupier.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, the Committee having already decided that the monies necessary to provide compensation should be levied upon the county cess, he could not accept a proposal which would put it within the power of the Judges to override the decision of Parliament.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY contended that there was nothing in the decision referred to by the Chief Secretary to prevent the Committee acceding to the proposal of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway. Nothing could be more unjust than to charge the tenantry of a district with the compensation for an outrage in which they manifestly had no part.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING, though he thought his hon. and gallant Friend had the best of the argument, advised the withdrawal of the Amendment, on the ground that they could not at that period of the evening hope to obtain a better division than had already taken place.

MR. BIGGAR trusted the hon. and gallant Gentleman would press his Motion.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, he had now to move an Amendment, which was essentially different from that of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway. The Amendment was this—that, inasmuch as under the 138th section of the Grand Juries Act the Judges had had the power, in the traverse of a presentment, to call a jury to their aid, they should also have the power of calling a jury to assist them, not for the purpose of saying that a malicious outrage was not an agrarian crime, or that there should be no assessment at all, but simply to determine what should be the area over which the taxation should extend, and also to vary the amount of the award. He proposed that the jurors should not be fewer in number than five nor greater than nine. It would be much better that any presentment for agrarian crime should be made over the whole county instead of upon so limited an area.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PLUNKET) said, this was decidedly a less objectionable

Amendment than the one that had recently been rejected. Parliament, however, had deliberately adopted the opposite procedure, and, as it had worked well and the principle had just been re-affirmed by the Committee, he would ask the hon. Gentleman not to press his Amendment to a division.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY, for the sake of consistency, must join in the appeal to his hon. Friend to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On Question, That the clause, as amended, be agreed to?

THE O'CONOR DON asked when the Chief Secretary for Ireland would make the promised additions to the clause?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH thought they would be most conveniently made on the Report.

MR. BIGGAR said, it was his duty to oppose the clause, as it was wholly incomprehensible. The Amendments to the clause were numerous, and it was desirable that the Committee should have them in a comprehensive form before the clause was agreed to. No one seemed to understand the clause. Indeed, he would undertake to say that there not half-a-dozen Members who were clearly acquainted with its meaning.

MR. BUTT desired to know if he rightly understood the change which had been made in reference to the search for arms? The original Act authorized the issue of general warrants, and since 1870, practically, the law had been to give the police the power to make domiciliary visits. These warrants, as he now understood the Chief Secretary, were not being renewed throughout the proclaimed districts of Ireland, but only in those places or parts where the importation of arms was feared. [Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH assented.] That being the case, he could only say it was a great amelioration of the condition of the Irish people; and he desired to know now if there would be any objection, when these warrants became necessary, to have a magistrate's signature attached to them.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, the hon. and learned Member had correctly appreciated the state of affairs which existed. In certain parts of Ireland general warrants were in force, but he could not name the places publicly.

No change had been made in the form of the warrant, and, generally speaking, no warrants for searches were issued without the places being specified.

MR. BUTT was glad to find that general warrants were not issued, except in special cases; but still, the general warrant was legally in force.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Continuance of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 74, as amended by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 89).

MR. BUTT moved, as an Amendment, in page 4, in line 17, the omission of the words, "as amended by the Act passed in the Session of Parliament held in the eleventh and twelfth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter seventy-nine." The effect of the Amendment would be to exclude from the operation of the present Bill a power which was no longer required—namely, that of entering a meeting held for a seditious or treasonable purpose and seizing papers, and of remaining there as long as was thought fit. Such a provision might be suited for 1848, but it was altogether uncalled for now as regarded any part of Ireland.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 17, to leave out the words "as amended by the Act passed in the Session of Parliament held in the eleventh and twelfth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter seventy-nine."—(Mr. Butt.)

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PLUNKET) said, the Government could not accept the Amendment. He was not prepared to admit that the provision referred to was wholly uncalled for. A statement had been made and repeated more than once in the course of the debate which he would take this opportunity to correct. The noble Lord the Member for Westmeath (Lord Robert Montagu) without, of course, wishing to misrepresent him (the Solicitor General for Ireland) had said that he had stated in his speech on the second reading of the Bill, that the Fenian conspiracy was now of the least importance. What he said was that three evils were to be guarded against by this Bill, and the least of the three was Fenianism; but he had never said that this conspiracy which was in full force so short a time ago had lost its importance.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 101; Noes 68: Majority 33.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, he had an Amendment on the Paper, altering the year when the operation of the clause should expire from 1880 to 1876; but with the permission of the House he would withdraw it, as the question which it involved was one which had already been discussed and disposed of.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

CAPTAIN NOLAN moved, as an Amendment, that "1877" should be substituted for "1880."

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 21, to leave out the word "eighty," and insert the words "seventy-seven."
—(Captain Nolan.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH agreed with the hon. Member for the county of Cork (Mr. M'Carthy Downing) in thinking that this was a matter which had already been disposed of.

MR. BUTT maintained that it was quite a different question, the former decision having reference to the powers relating to arms.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PLUNKET) said, the principle had been affirmed on three separate occasions.

Question put, "That the word 'eighty' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 87; Noes 85: Majority 2.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he wished to call the attention of the Chairman to a matter connected with the closing of the door of the House at the time of a division. He had noticed on several occasions lately that there appeared to be a want of harmony between the running out of the sand and the closing of the door. If a Rule of the House required that the door should be shut whenever the sand in the glass had run out, he had no doubt the Chairman would take care that it should be strictly enforced. In discussions like the present—discussions in which Irish Members felt so strongly—it was extremely important that there should be the utmost accuracy in the observance of the rules relating to divisions.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for the county of Galway is perfectly right in assuming that the moment the sand in the glass has run out the ringing of the bell ought to cease and the door ought to be closed. I have always risen in my place at that moment for the purpose of showing that the door ought then to be shut. It has, however, happened sometimes that, owing to a crowd of Members rushing in, it has been difficult to carry out the Rule with the utmost precision. My attention was privately called to the matter yesterday, and I at once put myself in communication with the Sergeant-at-Arms in order to secure that, as far as possible, the door should always be closed at the proper moment.

CAPTAIN NOLAN, as he was at the door, wished to say that he thought everything there on the last occasion was conducted with perfect fairness towards both sides. On other occasions, two or three days ago, he might have complained of what occurred.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) said, he wished to move the Amendment which stood on the Paper in his name. As originally drawn, the clause proposed to exempt the Odd Fellows and Free Foresters from the operation of the statute against unlawful societies; but after further consideration of the matter, the Government had come to the conclusion that it would be better to follow as closely as possible the words of the Friendly Societies Act for England, a course which would have the advantage of placing the law of both countries more nearly on the same basis and also of including within its protection other friendly societies besides the Free Foresters and Odd Fellows. He begged therefore to move, in page 4, line 21, to leave out from after "eighty" to end of Clause, and insert—

"But the provisions of the said Acts shall not extend to any society now established, or hereafter to be established, under the statutes regulating Friendly Societies, or to any meeting of the members or officers thereof, in which society, or at which meeting, no business whatever is transacted other than that which, directly and immediately, relates to the objects of the society as declared in the rules thereof, and set forth in the certified copy thereof: Provided, That the trustees or other officers of the society, when required under the hands of two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace, shall give full information to such justices of the nature, objects, proceedings, and practices of such society; and, in default thereof, the provisions of the said Acts shall be in force in respect of such society."

MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON said, that, when it was first proposed to exempt by name the Free Foresters and Odd Fellows, he had put on the Paper an Amendment to exempt another society in which he was interested—namely, the Orangemen, who were entitled to equal privileges with those other associations; but the Amendment just moved by the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland deprived him of the opportunity of moving his own Amendment. He certainly would not claim for the Orangemen a privilege that he would not extend to other societies. At the same time, he was not prepared to admit the illegality of the Orange Society, still less could he for a moment allow that the aims of that institution should be put on a par with those of the Ribbon Society. The Ribbon Society had for its object murder and assassination; whereas the Orange Society had for its object the maintenance of the Protestant religion, the support of the rightful Sovereign, and the upholding of the laws of the Realm, the Legislative Union, and the succession to the Throne in the House of Brunswick being Protestant. It was composed exclusively of men who were attached to the principles of the Reformation and averse from religious persecution. He knew it had been the custom to malign the Orange Society, and he did not pretend that every member of it was individually infallible; but he asserted that it had a noble purpose, and one with which every loyal citizen of the Empire should sympathize.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, the hon. and learned Solicitor General for Ireland had implied that Foresters and Oddfellows came within the provisions of the Acts against illegal oaths. He was informed that the Foresters took no oaths, and he knew the Oddfellows did not; and he therefore wished for some explanation on this point.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) said, that last year it was suggested that a clause should be introduced to prevent the possibility of these societies being exposed to penalties under the Unlawful Oaths

Acts. The Friendly Societies Act (1855) provided an exemption in favour of these societies only against the Unlawful Oaths Act—the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 48—then in force in Ireland, but long since spent. As it was intended by this Bill to continue the measures against unlawful oaths it was thought desirable to renew the exemption, and he had done so as nearly as possible in the words of the English Friendly Societies Act. There was no insinuation that these societies were conducted in such a way as wilfully to expose themselves to the provisions of the Unlawful Oaths Acts.

MR. BUTT said, it was the misfortune of his hon. and learned Friend to mislead the Committee when he addressed them on this Bill. This Bill had no more to do with unlawful oaths than any Bill which had been introduced by the Government; but it was a Bill to prevent the use of signs and passwords in Ireland. Now, any society in England could have signs and passwords; then why should there be a law against the use of such things in Ireland? Although he did not intend to oppose the clause, he thought that this legislation against signs and passwords was most absurd and childish.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. GIBSON proposed, as an Amendment, to add to the end of the clause the following words:—

“Provided always, That all Freemasons or Friendly Brothers who have by reason of inadvertence or neglect not heretofore complied with the directions contained in the second section of the said Act of the second and third Victoria, chapter seventy-four, shall be, and they are hereby indemnified, freed, and discharged from all penalties incurred by reason of any such inadvertence or neglect: And inasmuch as certain associations of Freemasons exist which according to the rules and usages of the said society are not denominated lodges, but are designated councils, chapters, colleges, priories, preceptories, or otherwise, it is hereby enacted that any person making any such certificate upon oath as in the second section of the said Act of the second and third Victoria, chapter seventy-four mentioned, shall be at liberty to designate in such certificate the society, the holding whereof shall be therein certified by the name or designation by which it is usually distinguished according to the usage of the said society of Freemasons: Provided also, That if any such certificates shall be duly registered within one year after the passing of this Act, it shall not be necessary in any succeeding year to register with the clerk of the peace the name or denomination of any branch of the said societies of Freemasons, or the usual place or places, or the time or times of its meetings, or the names or descriptions of the members thereof, anything in the said Act of the second and third Victoria, chapter seventy-four, to the contrary notwithstanding.”

Some hon. Member had on another occasion referred to the fact that the Lord Lieutenant was a Mason. This was true. He belonged to the Grand Lodge, which had been duly registered according to the requirements of law. [MR. CALLAN: Since when?] Since the Lord Lieutenant had been a member of the lodge it had been registered, and therefore his Excellency was in no sense open to any imputation of acting in violation of the law. The Masons were a charitable body, and everyone knew that both the Masons and the Friendly Brothers, if they were proud of anything, were proud of their loyalty. Owing to negligence or inadvertence, however, the secretaries of the various divisions had omitted to perform the necessary work, and the result was, as had been stated in the Amendment, that these loyal and charitable bodies had not entirely complied with the requirements by which they were to be exempted from the purview of the statute. The Amendment was intended to exempt those bodies from the penalties they had incurred. He himself had the honour to belong to both of the societies, and he was not sure whether he was not within the purview of the Acts.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU rose to Order. He had listened to his hon. and learned Friend, as he did not care to interrupt him whilst he was speaking, but he wished to put it to the Chairman whether the clause could be proposed. In Sir Erskine May's book, page 502, it was stated that—

“No amendment could properly be proposed to a clause irrelevant to the matter of that clause,” and “If a clause or amendment irrelevant to the subject-matter of the Bill be offered, the Chairman will decline to put the question.” —[pp. 502, 507.]

Well, the title and scope of the Bill were utterly alien to the subject-matter of this clause. It was a Bill to continue certain Peace Preservation Acts in Ireland; it was a Bill imposing Pains and Penalties on Ireland; but this clause was to indemnify certain rich persons from the penalty of felony which they had incurred. In the next place, they had incurred that penalty under an Act which was not embodied in this Bill, the 50th Geo. III; and, thirdly, this Bill was only a temporary Act, whereas the effect of the Amendment would not be temporary; it would extend to all time. The scope of the Amendment and the Bill, therefore, were not identical. It would be a great misfortune if that House should send to Ireland a Bill of most severe Pains and Penalties, which contained within it a clause of indemnity to certain rich persons, while inflicting penalties on the poor.

MR. MELDON also rose to Order. He wished to know whether an hon. Member who admitted that he was himself liable to the penalty of felony could come to that House and ask to be relieved of it?

MR. GIBSON would admit that perhaps he might be out of Court on that score; but he had been extremely cautious when he stated that he belonged to these bodies, for he had said that he was not "sure" that he was affected. In answer to the noble Lord, he might say that the Masons were not all rich, for the members of that body did not belong to any particular class; therefore, it was a mistake to say that the clause was to indemnify the rich. The only qualifications absolutely insisted on were loyalty and adherence to all the ordinary dictates of Christian charity. He submitted that the Amendment was perfectly relevant to the Bill, for he only wished by his clause to amend the Acts as they were recited in the Preamble.

MR. CALLAN asked whether it was consistent with the Rules of the House that a Member should vote on any matter in which he was personally interested?

MR. GIBSON said, he did not positively know that he was personally interested in the matter.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the Standing Order to which reference had been made by the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan) related to the case of Members who had a pecuniary interest in the matter before the House. He believed that on a former occasion exception had been taken to a Member of the House taking part in the discussion of a case in which he was exposed to a penalty; but the Member having stated in his place that he had received no Notice, it was ruled that he was entitled to address the House. The points raised by the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath were much more important. The first objection was that the Amendment was not within the scope and title of the Bill. That would have been a perfectly valid objection up to the year 1854, when this House adopted a new Standing Order, that any Amendment might be introduced which was relevant to the subject-matter of the Bill; and it was no longer enough to say that the Amendment was not within the scope of the Bill. Of course, it would follow, if such an Amendment were adopted, that the Preamble and Title of the Bill should be amended accordingly. The point, therefore, to be decided was as to the relevancy of this Amendment. Now, though he had for a moment entertained some doubt on the subject, he could not undertake to say that this Amendment was irrelevant. He might, perhaps, point out that some of the words had been embodied in the clause, which had been, however, struck out in order to introduce other words, by which there had been conveyed a somewhat similar exemption. These words stated that the said Act should be so construed as if the provision extended to Foresters and Odd Fellows. It was therefore intended by the framers of the Act that it should have a retrospective effect as far as freeing certain persons from the penalties imposed by the Acts which it amended. Another objection was that there was no mention of the 50th Geo. III. within the four corners of the Bill. But he would call attention to the wording of this particular clause, which stated that it was—

"An Act to extend and render more effectual the Act passed in the reign of His Majesty George IV. (to amend an Act passed in the 50th year of His Majesty George III.), as amended by an Act, the 2nd and 3rd of Her Majesty."

Therefore, it appeared to him, that a clause containing this Act of George IV. might be described as amending the Act of George III. That Act of George IV. exempted Masonic lodges from certain penalties attaching to them, and he could not see that an Amendment further extending the mitigation provided by the Act of George IV. to the Masonic body in Ireland was irrelevant. Therefore, having given the best consideration in his power to the important points raised by the noble Lord, he considered the Amendment in Order, and could not refuse to put it from the Chair.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "Provided always, That all Freemasons or Friendly Brothers who have by reason of inadvertence or neglect not heretofore complied with the directions contained in the second section of the said Act of the second and third Victoria, chapter seventy-four, shall be and they are hereby indemnified, freed, and discharged from all penalties incurred by reason of any such inadvertence or neglect. And inasmuch as certain associations of Freemasons exist which according to the rules and usage of the said society are not denominated lodges, but are designated councils, chapters, colleges, priories, preceptories, or otherwise, it is hereby enacted that any person making any such certificate upon oath as in the second section of the said Act of the second and third Victoria, chapter seventy-four, mentioned, shall be at liberty to designate in such certificate the society, the holding whereof shall be therein certified by the name or designation by which it is usually distinguished according to the usage of the said Society of Freemasons: Provided also, That if any such certificate shall be duly registered within one year after the passing of this Act, it shall not be necessary in any succeeding year to register with the clerk of the peace the name or denomination of any branch of the said Society of Freemasons, or the usual place or places, or the time or times of its meetings, or the names or descriptions of the members thereof, anything in the said Act of the second and third Victoria, chapter seventy-four, to the contrary notwithstanding."—(Mr. Gibson.)

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that he, of course, accepted the ruling of the Chairman, and would now address himself to the Amendment. This was not a question whether certain Freemasons were rich and others were poor, but whether Freemasons in Ireland who had contravened the law, and were therefore subject to the heavy penalties of felony, should receive an indemnity under this Bill. It seemed rather hard to impose penalties upon persons who followed the plough in Ireland, and who could not be supposed to be acquainted with laws so complicated and involved, while persons who had much better means of knowing what the law was should receive an indemnity for its transgression. There was a series of Acts, beginning with the 50th Geo. III. c. 102, relating to unlawful oaths, and by these Acts Freemasons were clearly felons, and liable to be transported. The 2 and 3 Vict. c. 54 made the exemption to which the hon. and learned Member had alluded; but in some respects it was still more strict, as it made every society liable to the penalty whose members were known to each other by secret signs and passwords. It exempted the Freemasons on two conditions, and, if these had been complied with, there would have been no necessity for the hon. and learned Member to bring in an indemnity clause. He had moved for a Return, which would be shortly in the hands of hon. Members, and which would show that not a single lodge in Ireland had fulfilled the conditions. The hon. and learned Member had said that the Grand Lodge had done so since the Duke of Abercorn had joined. But the Duke of Abercorn joined at a time when every member of the lodge was a felon. It was a rule of the debates of this House that no Member should, for the purpose of influencing the debates, mention the name of the Sovereign, and therefore it would not be becoming in him to mention the name of one closely related to the Sovereign. He would, however, state that the Papers ordered would show that the Grand Master was his Excellency the Duke of Abercorn, and the Senior Grand Deacon was the Hon. D. R. Plunket, M.P. The question before the Committee then was whether, in a Bill which inflicted Pains and Penalties on poor people in Ireland not guilty of any crime against the law of God, they should, to please the Government, introduce an indemnity clause in favour of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, the Solicitor General for Ireland, and others. If a separate Indemnity Bill for the Freemasons were brought in, he did not suppose anyone would oppose it.

MR. CALLAN said, he objected to the proposed clause, on the same ground that he objected to Fenianism, to Manchester murderers, or any other proceedings which violated the law. As to the Friendly Brothers Society, the hon. and learned Gentleman ought to know that no Roman Catholic could be a member of them; but if he would say that the clause he now proposed was to be an Act of Indemnity for himself, he should certainly not move any Amendment; but, if not, he would do so, and divide the Committee upon it.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he was not aware that the Freemasons were an illegal society. They had been recognized in the whole of the Three Kingdoms. It was well known that they were a well-disposed body all over Europe. ["Oh, oh!"] He interpreted the cry of "Oh!" to refer to Italy, but in Italy the King was at the head of the society. The same was the case in Sweden. In this country the Heir Apparent to the Throne was at their head, and in Ireland their head was the Representative of Her Majesty. It was therefore a pure misrepresentation to say that Freemasons were a secret or illegal body.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he was not a member of the Freemasons' Society, nor did he know what it was. Would any hon. Member tell the Committee why its members were deserving of the exemption it was now proposed to give them? The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Macartney) said the King of Italy was a member, the King of Sweden a member, and so was the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland. Well, was he not at least able to give him (Mr. Sullivan) the information he required? He wished to know what were their rites, rules, and mysteries? The Committee were asked to vote for an exemption blindfold. Prove the merits and qualifications of the order, and if it was to be a benefit to the human race, let the Committee know a little more about it. He wished some "man and brother," if that was the proper phrase, to tell the uninitiated whether they were morally justified in passing a Bill of exemption of this nature. He knew a great many excellent men who were members of Freemasons' lodges, and had nothing to say against them; but he was ignorant of the mysteries of the craft, and he hoped that some Member would get up and tell the Committee all about it.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) said, there was not, so far as he was aware, any rule in Freemasonry which would prevent the hon. Member for Louth from becoming one of the order. Nor was there any reason why the hon. Member should not become acquainted with all the rites if he saw fit. Only there were certain proceedings of a preliminary character, which, however, were not so formidable as they were supposed to be, and if the hon. Gentleman was disposed to press the matter forward, he should be happy to give him every facility and advantage which lay in his power as a member of the Craft. But the hon. Gentleman must remember it was not they who had dragged this matter forward; it was the ingenuity—the misuse of ingenuity—of the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath who had discovered that the conditions prescribed by the Act had not been complied with. He confessed, though he (the Solicitor General) had read the statute on the subject, and had almost been brought up a Freemason, he was ignorant until now that all the conditions had not been fulfilled, as had been asserted by the noble Lord. There was no doubt that up to a few years ago all these conditions had been fully complied with, and that they would also be complied with in the future. He need scarcely inform the House that the Unlawful Oaths Acts were as severe in England as in Ireland against the Freemasons, and if the noble Lord extended his research to England he might find omissions here also. He considered the proposal before the Committee a very fair one.

MR. MUNDELLA hoped the Irish Members would not stultify themselves by voting against this Amendment. They were contending for the same rights and privileges as were enjoyed by their fellow-countrymen in England, and how then could they consistently vote for the retention of a coercive clause against a large section of their fellow-countrymen to whom no crime was imputed? Odd Fellows, Freemasons, and Friendly Brothers were under no coercion in England, and why should they be so in Ireland?

MR. MELDON said, he did not think this was an Amendment which ought to provoke mirth in any way. This was a Bill affecting Ireland alone; it was a Bill brought forward for the purpose of coercion; and it was proposed to offer an indemnity only to one particular class—the Freemasons, or, in other words, to the rich of the land. ["No, no!"] He maintained that it was so. He said rich, because 99 hundredths almost of the Irish people believed that the Freemasons Society was an illegal society, and a society of which they ought not to become members. Reference had been made to the Viceroy of Ireland. Well, in his opinion, the appointment of the Viceroy to the head of the Freemasons of Ireland was an insult to 99 hundredths of the Irish people. He could not shut his eyes to the fact that the society in Italy was as atrocious a society as ever existed—he could not shut his eyes to the fact that on a very recent occasion in this metropolis a deputation waited upon the head of the order in England and was received privately.

MR. BUTLER-JOHNSTONE pointed out that "Secret Society" was an equivocal term. A society might be called secret because its rites and ceremonies were secret, or else because it was not known who were its members. In the latter sense Freemasonry was not a secret society, for their names were all published; and if the Ribbon Societies would publish the names of their members there would be no objection to them.

MR. CALLAN moved to omit from the proposed Amendment the words "or the names or descriptions of the members thereof."

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, that although his own religious opinions would not permit him to join a society like the Freemasons, yet he did not see why he should seek to deny to others the privilege of doing so. He would rather exercise that charity in reference to matters of opinion that it was the duty of all of them to inculcate in Ireland. Gentlemen had from inadvertence offended against the law, and when they wished to withdraw from the unfortunate position into which they had got, he should not join in any attempt to prevent them doing so.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU hoped that there would be no division against the original Amendment, because he thought it would be quite sufficient that they should have protested against the bad taste of the proposed mode of exempting the Freemasons.

MR. BUTT also thought that it would be unfortunate to have a division upon the question, though the matter was not such a light one as some persons supposed. The question was now not as to unlawful oaths, but as to societies which had "signs and passwords." Such societies were declared illegal, but Freemasons' societies were exempted from the enactment if they performed certain conditions, which in many cases had not been performed. It was certain that there were Masonic lodges in Dublin which had not complied with this absurd legislation. As, however, it was persons of rank and position who had violated the law, the matter was not treated as being at all serious. It would have been better if there had been a clause indemnifying every one who was in a similar position, and not simply persons who were members of a particular society, because in such a mode of proceeding there would be nothing of an exceptional kind, neither would it tend, as the proposed Amendment did, to make felony appear respectable in the eyes of the Irish people.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, his intention was to vote in favour of liberty and against any restrictions upon the rights of his fellow-subjects. There were, he was aware, societies that had "secret signs," and there was a society called the "Catholic Union Society," but he did not know whether that society had any secret signs or not. ["No, no!"] Well, he did not say that it had; but even if it was proved it had passwords, he would never give a vote which would operate against such a society. He would here say that there ought to be but one law for England and for Ireland.

Amendment (Mr. Callan) to said proposed Amendment negatived.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 311; Noes 3: Majority 308.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Continuance of certain parts of Protection of Life and Property in certain Parts of Ireland Act, 1871.)

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA, in page 4, line 32, moved, as an Amendment, to leave out "seventy-seven," and insert instead "seventy-six," the object of which was to limit the duration of the Westmeath Act to one year. He did not know that it was necessary for him to enter into any general argument on this question, the subject having been already exhausted. The question for the Committee was whether the renewal of the Act for one year only should be adopted.

Amendment negatived.

MR. BUTT then moved an Amendment to the effect that so much of the Act of 1871 as provided that no writ of Habeas Corpus should issue to bring up the body of any one arrested under it should be repealed. All that could be intended by the measure was that the Lord Lieutenant should have the power of indefinitely detaining a man in custody instead of bringing him to trial at the next Assizes; but it was unjust and unprecedented that a man so imprisoned should be shut out from his constitutional right to move for a writ of Habeas Corpus to be brought before the Court to obtain its judgment on the legality and sufficiency of the warrant under which he was detained. There was, he contended, no Act previous to the Westmeath Act which took away the right to a writ of Habeas Corpus which existed at Common Law previous to the passing of any statute. That Act, therefore, was in violation of all the usages of English legislation, and he therefore hoped the Amendment would be assented to.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 38, at the end thereof, to add the words "Provided always, That so much of said Act as provides that 'no writ of habeas corpus should issue to bring up the body of any person arrested or committed or detained by force of a warrant issued under the authority of the said Act' shall be and the same is hereby repealed."—(Mr. Butt.)

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) said, the Act in question had been drawn with exceptional severity to meet an exceptional state of things, and carried out in a most complete and accurate way that which was the express intention of the Legislature. The Amendment, if carried, would, to some extent, weaken the effect of the Act, and he should not, therefore, advise the Committee to agree to it. No person arrested under this power would be subjected to unfair treatment, but would be dealt with as an untried prisoner.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, the hon. and learned Member had altogether failed to meet the constitutional argument raised by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick. He (Sir George Bowyer) wished it to be understood, as a matter of Constitutional Law, that the clause did what no suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act ever before effected, because it took away from the subject detained under this Act the Common Law right of Habeas Corpus, and deprived the Sovereign of the right to inquire whether the subject was or was not legally detained. The warrant might be wrong in point of law, yet its legality could not be inquired into. He should, therefore, oppose this unconstitutional provision.

MR. SULLIVAN was confident that nine-tenths of those whom he addressed were under the impression that the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act meant no more than that the Lord Lieutenant might detain a man in prison without bringing him to trial; whereas it went further and gave the Lord Lieutenant the power, if necessary, to send a prisoner beyond the jurisdiction of a writ. What his hon. and learned Friend asked was that Parliament should leave untouched the right of the subject to have the legality of the warrant under which he was detained reviewed by one of the Courts of Common Law. Let them confer, if they would, the simple power of detention on the Lord Lieutenant; but let them leave untouched the right at Common Law which existed before the time of Charles II. of challenging the substance of his procedure, and not place the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act beyond all law, all supervision, and all review. Let them not give to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland a power which, rather than confer it upon the Monarch of England, they would first take his head. ["Oh, oh!"] They had done so before, and in the history of England there was no constitutional question that had been more fiercely contested in the interests of popular rights. In the present case, while the Act of Charles II., which they so much boasted of, gave an accused person a right to speedy trial, they were by this Act taking away every constitutional right from the Irish people. Such a clause would give the Lord Lieutenant power to inflict torture in the Irish prisons.

MR. RONAYNE appealed to the Leader of the Opposition to give effect on that occasion to the utterance of the late Prime Minister, when a similar Bill was under discussion in a former year, to the effect that he knew not what was worse than tranquillity purchased by the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act except civil war. Yet this was the state to which they proposed to reduce Ireland, a country which was at peace and free from agrarian crimes.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING reminded the House that in the case of Wolfe Tone, when sentence of death had been passed upon him by a military tribunal for high treason, the Court of Queen's Bench issued its writ of Habeas Corpus—though the Courts had been closed—on the ground that there had been illegality in the trial and conviction. He protested against a system under which a man could be removed from one gaol to another, without his family knowing where he was incarcerated.

Mr. LAW said, his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Limerick stated that he did not propose by his Amendment to interfere with the really effective part of the clause which empowered the Lord Lieutenant to issue his warrant authorizing the arrest and detention of persons without cause assigned, and without any obligation of bringing them to trial. It appeared to him therefore that the Amendment, leaving untouched that power, was valueless, and not in the least calculated to better secure the rights of the subject. The words, moreover, which were now objected to had been deliberately introduced into the Act by the then Law Officers of the Crown, and approved by the House a few years ago, and he must say he had heard no good reason why they should be omitted. It was a matter of extreme regret to him, as well as those with whom he acted, that exceptional legislation should be still required for Ireland, but, as the necessity unfortunately existed, he thought they might as well continue the Act for a short time longer just as it stood. He supported the clause before the Committee as it stood.

Mr. BUTT said, that even if a prisoner were tortured he could obtain no redress. No Act of Parliament ever contained such a clause as that now in question—a clause which went further than a suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and placed a prisoner entirely beyond the pale of the law. Indeed, prisoners had been treated in such a manner that it had wrung from the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) the statement that the treatment was terrible. In the case of a man named Casey, the prisoner was most disgracefully treated, and he himself had applied on his behalf for a writ of Habeas Corpus, which was refused by the Judge, who, however, said he would have granted it, but for the existence of the Act. Any imaginable illegality might occur under the Act, and no Court would have the power to inquire into it. This clause if left in its present state would create among the Irish people a rankling hatred of our legislation, and he, as the clause was not yet passed, might add that it would justly do so. [Cries of "Divide!"]

Mr. D. MACGREGOR rose to say a word on a point of Order. He thought they were entitled to hear what hon. Members had to say, and it was quite impossible to do so if all this noise went on. He could not absolve hon. Gentlemen around him and behind him from being very much in the way of his hearing what had been said on this matter. He did not think it was right, and he protested with all his heart against the practice of people chatting and talking very loudly in this manner.

Mr. BUTLER-JOHNSTONE thought they ought to have some explanation from the Treasury Bench for a continuance of those exceptional powers of governing what was supposed to be a free country.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, that the Westmeath Act, when originally passed, was well considered by the responsible Officers of the Crown. Its provisions being of a very exceptional character, were very carefully worded; and he thought the Committee would be of opinion, that if renewed, it should be renewed in its entirety, and not interfered with by Amendments. Leaving his hon. and learned Friends to deal with the legal aspects of the question, he would say generally that the Government being reluctantly compelled to ask for that renewal of an Act which had proved a most efficient instrument for dealing with the crimes at which it was aimed, could not accept any proposal which might impair the efficiency of that instrument. When the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended, a person might be arrested for any crime and kept in prison without trial; but, in the present case, the arrest must be for a particular offence.

Mr. BUTT reminded the right hon. Gentleman that when the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended in 1865, the warrant which had to be issued was the Lord Lieutenant's. The right hon. Gentleman had given no reason for this exception upon exceptional legislation—one that in the most despotical times no Parliament had ever passed.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he did not dispute the general principles which had been enunciated by the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), or the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir George Bowyer), with regard to the circumstances which led to the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, nor did he say that the provisions of the Act of 1871 were not an exceptional interference with the liberty of the subject; but he did say that in 1871, and again in 1873, it had been thought necessary to sanction such exceptional interference; and, in regard to the present measure, it had been admitted that, to some extent at least, they must continue exceptional legislation, and those who were charged with the preservation of peace in Ireland considered that it would be idle to continue the Act of 1871, if the words referred to in the Amendment were to be removed.

Mr. M'Carthy Downing

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, that the Bill went further than the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, for it took away from the Judges all power to interfere in regard to any mode of imprisonment, no matter how arbitrary or cruel. He had heard no answer whatever given to the argument of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick. There was, he believed, no similar provision in any previous Act of Parliament, and he believed it was one of which no lawyer could approve. The argument of the Attorney General came to this—that as they had made a mistake in 1871, and again in 1873, they ought to make the same mistake now.

MR. HERSHELL took a similar view of the Amendment, and urged upon the Government the propriety of introducing words which would still retain the legal rights of prisoners and of Judges, both of which were taken away by the Bill as it stood. If that was not done, he feared the Bill would cause great mischief in Ireland, where the legislation would be considered more onerous and more severe than any heretofore passed by that House.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he could assure the Committee that the words to which objection was now taken were not inserted inadvertently in 1871. As the Bill was introduced in 1871 it did not contain these words, but after the measure came down from the House of Lords his learned Friend Baron Dowse thought they were necessary to make the meaning of the Bill perfectly clear. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) raised exactly the same point in the discussion on the Bill of 1873; and being then in the unfortunate position of having no legal adviser in that House, he himself promised in Committee on the Bill to make inquiry before the Report whether those words were still deemed necessary. The hon. and learned Gentleman appeared to have been satisfied with that assurance, and no division was taken on the clause in Committee; nor, from reference to Hansard, did any action seem to have been taken in the matter on the Report. Therefore, he supposed he had then been more fortunate than the legal Gentlemen had been that night in showing that those words were required. ["No."] They certainly were not introduced without due consideration. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick referred to the case of a prisoner named Casey, as establishing the fact that a real practical grievance might arise under the Bill. Now, that man's case was brought forward in a previous year, and he had obtained very full particulars about it. The hon. and learned Gentleman had said his statement of Casey's case drew from the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) the declaration that the treatment of the prisoner was terrible, and that it was almost incredible that such a thing could occur in a civilized country. Well, repeated memorials from the prisoner and his friends were sent in, which were fully inquired into, and the medical authorities reported that there was no foundation for the statements that Casey was suffering. Indeed, in a memorial presented towards the close of his imprisonment, Casey himself said he had no cause to complain of his treatment in prison.

MR. BUTT emphatically repeated the declaration he had previously made on affidavits as to Casey's case. Casey was imprisoned for four years without trial, without accusation, without knowing who were his accusers—his father and his family also swearing that up to the time of his arrest they had not heard even a suspicion that he had done any illegal act. Yet, notwithstanding all that the Committee were now told, he had stated he had nothing to complain of; but if he wanted an argument to prove the necessity of allowing the broad light of English law to penetrate into the prisons in which these unhappy men were confined, it would be found in the abject declaration referred to of a man dependent on the good-will of his gaolers. He asked again, had his challenge been answered? Had anyone shown him a single Act of Parliament in which the provision in question had ever been contained?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH reminded the hon. and learned Gentleman that he was not quite accurate in saying that Casey was confined for four years. The period of his imprisonment was only two and a-half years, he being put in prison on the 13th December, 1871, and released in the month of July, 1874.

MR. SULLIVAN read a passage from the affidavit of the man's father, who stated that he had no knowledge of the offence for which his son had been arrested; that he had been kept a long time in prison; that he had not been allowed to speak as to the state of his health; and that he believed if he had the opportunity given him he would be able to refute any charge which might be made against him. Now, such a case as that, he contended, would be a disgrace to the most despotic Government in Europe.

MR. MUNDELLA said, that although the man was not in prison for four years, he was arrested without a warrant, kept in prison without trial, and discharged without anything having been alleged against him. Such a proceeding was a disgrace to civilization and to a constitutional system. In order to put an end to such an atrocious system, he should vote for the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that the very object of this Act was to permit of persons being arrested without a warrant. But, he asked, was anything more than mere imprisonment intended? In the case under notice, the prisoner was arrested because he was suspected, and kept in solitary confinement for between three and four years, and debarred from all communication with his family. His belief was that the man was forgotten, and remained in prison until his case was brought before the House. It excited great astonishment, and the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield characterized the transaction in terms justly befitting it. The right hon. Baronet promised to make inquiry. He did so, and in the most secret manner the man was immediately released. That showed that, in the opinion of the right hon. Baronet, there was neither sufficient ground for bringing the man to trial nor for keeping him in prison. The same kind of legislation was now proposed when there was not a single person in prison. If this Bill should pass, he trusted the House would pass it in such a shape that if a man was imprisoned he should not be prevented from bringing his case before the Courts to ascertain whether the warrant was lawfully granted or not.

MR. CALLAN said, that the Home Rule Party had repudiated the Leadership of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington), and he was glad of the opportunity to declare that the English Liberal Party, with whom the Home Rulers wished to act, repudiated that Leadership also.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 113; Noes 238: Majority 125.

MR. BUTT moved that the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

MR. DISRAELI thought the best thing the Committee could do would be to proceed with the Bill, and so avoid a Morning Sitting.

MR. SULLIVAN was willing to proceed with the Bill; but if it was intended to have a Morning Sitting, he thought the House ought to adjourn as soon as possible.

MAJOR O'GORMAN failed to see why there should be a Morning Sitting, and hoped somebody would divide the House upon the subject.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House will this day, at Two of the Clock, again resolve itself into the said Committee."

MAJOR O'GORMAN moved that the House meet at 4 to-morrow instead.

MR. BIGGAR seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "Two of the Clock."—(Major O'Gorman.)

Mr. Butt

Question proposed, "That the words 'Two of the Clock' stand part of the Question."

MR. SULLIVAN appealed to his hon. and gallant Friend to withdraw the Motion, as there was a clear understanding that there was to be a Morning Sitting.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Committee to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) (SUTHERLAND AND CAITHNESS) BILL.
(The Marquess of Stafford, Sir John Sinclair, Sir Robert Anstruther, Mr. Whitbread.)

[BILL 145.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(The Marquess of Stafford.)

MR. DALRYMPLE said, he must object to the Bill, which, though a small one, was a selfish one also. It was introduced by the landed proprietors of the two counties referred to, and its purpose was to extend certain privileges in the Act of 1872 which were accorded to the counties of Ross, Argyll, and Inverness, to Sutherland and Caithness. It might be right or wrong to extend these privileges; but the extension meant adding taxation to the rest of the country, and the people of Scotland were already suffering very severely from the taxation imposed upon them by the Scotch Education Act. Such a Bill as that ought to be introduced at least on the authority of the Government. He (Mr. Dalrymple) did not say that the principle of the privilege was wrong, but it wanted inquiring into. There were many who thought that the application of the privilege should be to parishes where the rate was high, and not to counties where there was great inequality in the rates. It was well known that in the counties which now enjoyed the privilege the rate was by no means equally high; and even in the counties which the Bill referred to, Caithness did not, in respect to all cases, stand on the same footing with Sutherlandshire. But, more than that, this Bill proposed to meddle with the incidence of the rate in a piecemeal fashion, and he (Mr. Dalrymple) was specially anxious that the point should not be prejudged, before he ascertained whether the whole question was to be considered during the present Session. He had no special love for the Education Act, but it was an Act which had been very skilfully drawn—as no one could doubt—and it would not be easy to amend it in a nibbling way. If Amendment were needed, it should be done on the authority of Her Majesty's Government. The time would, no doubt, come when the Education Act would be more thoroughly understood than it was at present, and then he was quite sure there would be an outcry against the taxation incident to it. In the meantime, he objected to a Bill like that being introduced, until the time had come for dealing with it in a comprehensive way.

MR. WHITBREAD said, he did not think the hon. Gentleman had a right to characterize the Bill as a selfish one, because it simply proposed to relieve two Highland counties from exceptional taxation. The counties of Sutherland and Caithness had been omitted from the Education Act by accident, and they had a right to be placed on the same footing as Ross, Argyll, and Inverness.

SIR TOLLEMACHE SINCLAIR also bore testimony to the fact that the Education Act operated very severely on the ratepayers of Caithness and Sutherland, and that this Bill would simply do an act of justice.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that during the passage through the House of the Scotch Education Act in 1872, the then Lord Advocate introduced a special clause to meet the case of the counties of Inverness, Cromarty, Ross, and Argyll. More recently the noble Lord who introduced this measure (the Marquess of Stafford) represented to the noble Duke the President of the Council (the Duke of Richmond) the advantage of extending that clause to Sutherlandshire; but the Government thought it would not be advisable for them to bring forward a Bill on the subject. The Government, however, informed the noble Lord that they would not offer any opposition to a measure which would simply give to Sutherland and Caithness the same advantages in respect to education as had been granted to the counties of Inverness and Ross. The Bill, he believed, would do nothing further than that; and, therefore, on the part of the Government, he would support the second reading. At the same time, they reserved to themselves a discretion as to the course they would pursue in case of the introduction of a measure on larger principles.

MR. DALRYMPLE said, he had never doubted that the case of Sutherlandshire was a very hard one; but he contended there were other counties in as bad a condition in particular localities. It now appeared that an arrangement had been made between the noble Marquess and the noble Duke the President of the Council, and therefore he would not press his objection to the Bill at that stage, though he might say that the arrangement had been made unknown to Scotch Members, whose ignorance was the more pardonable as he did not think all the Members of the Government were aware of the arrangement which had been entered into that the Bill should not be opposed.

MR. HUNT said, as one of those Members, he was perfectly aware of the arrangement.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK thought that the House should have some explanations concerning the Bill, which seemed to throw a portion of the charge for education in Scotland on the English taxpayer.

MR. RAMSAY said, the sole object of the Bill was to provide that in parishes in these two counties in which there was a rate of 9*d.* in the pound, the Education Department should have power to make grants towards the erection of schools' buildings.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY was of opinion a Bill like that ought to have been in the charge of the Government, and not in the hands of a private Member.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

MR. DALRYMPLE gave Notice that on the Motion for going into Committee, he should move that the House go into Committee on the Bill that day month.

Debate adjourned at half after One o'clock.
